THE LIFE OF LORD BYRON

GEORGE GORDON BYRON was born in Holles street, London, on the 22d day of January, 1788. Soon after his birth, his father deserted him, and the whole responsibility of his early training devolved on his mother, who, with him, soon after repaired to Aberdeen, where they resided for some time in almost complete seclusion.

The infancy of Byron was marked with the workings of that wild and active spirit which he so fully displayed in all subsequent years of his life. As a child, his temper was violent, or rather, sullenly passionate. Being angrily reprimanded by his nurse, one day, for having soiled or torn a new frock in which he had just been dressed, he got into one of his "silent rages," (as he termed them,) seized the frock with both hands, rent it from top to bottom, and stood in aisleness setting his cusener and her wrath at defiance.

Notwithstanding these unruly out-breaks, in which he was too much encouraged by the example of his mother, who frequently proceeded to the same extremities with her own caps, gowns, &c., there was in his disposition a mixture of affectionate sweetness and playfulness, which attached many to him, and which rendered him then, as in riper years, easily manageable by those who loved and understood him sufficiently to be at once gentle and firm enough for the task.

The undivided affection of the mother was naturally centered in her son, who was her darling; and when he only went out for an ordinary walk, she would entreat him, with tears in her eyes, to take care of himself, as "she had nothing on earth but him to live for;" a conduct not at all pleasing to his adventurous spirit; the more especially as some of his companions, who beheld the affectionate scene, would laugh and ridicule about it. This excessive maternal affection and indulgence, and the entire absence of that salutary discipline so necessary to childhood, doubtless contributed to the formation of these unpleasant traits of character that distinguished Byron from all others in subsequent years.

An accident, at the time of birth, caused a formation of one of his feet. Many expedients were used to restore the limb to its proper shape, under the direction of Dr. Hunter. His nurse, to whom fell the task of putting on the bandages, would often sing him to sleep, or relate to him stories and legends, in which, like most other children, he manifested great delight. She also taught him to repeat a great number of Psalms; and the first and twenty-third were among the earliest that he committed to memory. Out of these lessons arose, long afterwards, the "Hebrew Melodies," which, but for them, never would have been written, though Byron studied Lowth on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews all his life. It is a remarkable fact, that, through the care and daily instruction of this nurse, he attained a far earlier and more intimate acquaintance with the Sacred Writings, than falls to the lot of most young people.

The defect in the formation of his foot, and a great weakness of constitution, induced his mother to keep him from an attendance on school, that he might expand his lungs and brace his limbs, upon the mountains of the neighborhood.

This was evidently the most judicious method for imparting strength to his bodily frame; and the sequel showed that it likewise imparted tone and vigoreto his mind. The savage grandeur of nature around him; the feeling that he was upon the hills where

"Foreign tyrant never stood,
But freedom, with her fashion bright,
Started the stranger from her sight!"

his intercourse with a people whose chief amusements consisted in the recital of heroic tales of other times, feats of strength, and a display of independence, blended with the wild, supernatural stories peculiar to remote and thinly-peopled districts; all these were calculated to foster that peculiar poetical feeling innate in his character.

The malformation of his foot was a subject on which young Byron was extremely sensitive. As his nurse was walking with him one day, she was joined by a female friend, who said, "What a pretty boy, Byron is! what a pity he has such a leg." On hearing this allusion to his infirmity, the child's eyes flashed with anger, and, striking at her with a little whip which he held in his hand, he impatiently exclaimed, "Don't speak of it!"

As an instance of his quickness and energy at this period, might be mentioned a little incident that occurred one night during the performance of "Taming a Shrew," which his nurse had taken him to see. He had attended some time, with silent interest; but, in the scene between Katherine and Petruchio where the following dialogue takes place,—

"Kath.—I know it is the moon.
Pet.—Nay, then, you lie,—it is the blessed sun,"

George started up, and cried out boldly, "But I say it is the moon, sir."

Byron was not quite five years of age when he was sent to a day school at Aberdeen, taught by Mr. Bowers. At that school he remained about one year.

During his schoolboy days he was lively, warm-hearted, generous, and high-spirited. He was, however, passionate and resentful. If he received an injury, he was sure to revenge it: though the castigation he inflicted might be long on its way, yet it came at length, and severely.
He was a brave youth, and was much more anxious to excel his fellows by prowess in sport and gymnastic exercises, than by advancement in learning.

When any study pleased him, he devoted all his attention to it, and was quick in the performance of his task. He cared but little where he stood in his class; and at the foot was as agreeable to him as at the head.

He remained at school until the year 1796, when an attack of scarlet fever weakened his, by no means strong, constitution, and he was removed by his father to the Highlands.

From the period of his residence in the Highlands, Byron dated his love of mountainous countries and his equally ardent love of solitude. While at Aberdeen, he would escape unnoticed, and find his way to the sea-side. At one time, it was supposed he was lost, and after a long and anxious search he was found struggling for his life in a sort of moras or marsh, in which he would undoubtedly have perished, had not some one came to the rescue.

Many like instances occurred during his residence among the Highlands. His love of adventure often led him into difficulty and danger. While scrambling over a declivity that overhung a small waterfall, called the Linn of Dee, some one caught his hat, and he fell. He was rolling down the hill on the edge of the water, when the attendant luckily caught him, and was but just in time to save him from being killed.

On the 17th of May, 1796, William, the fifth Lord Byron, died at Newstead, and young Byron, then in his tenth year, succeeded to his titles and his estates; and his cousin, the Earl of Carlisle, the son of the late Lord's sister, was appointed his guardian.

Under a fortune, Lord Byron was removed from under the immediate care of his mother.

In the latter part of 1798 he went with his mother to Newstead Abbey. On their arrival, he was placed at Newington, under the care of a person who professed to be able to cure his lameness; at the same time, he made some advancement in Latin studies, under the tuition of a schoolmaster of that town, a Mr. Rogers, who read parts of Virgil and Cicero with him. The name of the man whose pretensions in curing exceeded his skill, and under whose empiricism the young lord was placed, was Lavender; and the manner in which he proceeded to his cure by the foot embargoed a prominent foot, for a long time with handful of oil, and then forcibly twisting the foot round, and binding it up in a sort of a machine, with about as much care and thought of the pain he might give, as if straightening up a crooked limb of a tree.

Byron, during his lessons with Mr. Rogers, was often in violent pain; and one day the latter said to him, "It makes me uncomfortable, my lad, to see you sitting there in such pain as I know you must be suffering." "Never mind, Mr. Rogers," answered the boy; "you shall not see any signs of it in me,"

This gentleman often spoke of the gaitety of his pupil, and the delight he experienced in exposing Lavender's "patients" to his views. On one occasion why he wrote down on a sheet of paper all the letters of the alphabet, put together at random, and placing them before this concentrated body of pretension, asked him very seriously what language it was. Not wishing to terrify, and not dreaming of the snare to trip him, he replied as seriously as the inquiry was put, that it was Italian, to the infinite delight of the young satirist, who burst into the most hilarious laughter.

At about this period, Lord Byron's first symptom of a tendency to rhyme manifested itself. The occasion which gave rise to it is thus related:—

An elderly lady, who was in the habit of visiting his mother, had made use of some expressions that very much affected him; and these slight, his nurse said, he generally resented violently and implacably. The old lady had some curious notions respecting the soul, which, she imagined, took its flight to the moon after death, as a preliminary essay, before it proceeded further. One day, after a repetition, it is supposed, of her original insult to the boy, he appeared before his nurse in a violent rage. "Well, my little hero," she asked, "what's the matter with you, now? Upon which the child answered, "This old woman put him in a terrible passion,—that he could not bear the sight of her," &c., &c., and then broke out into the following doggerel, which he repeated eye and ear, as if delighted with the vent he had found for his rage:

"In Nottingham county, three stone at Swith Green,
As cupian old lady as ever was seen;
And when she does die, which I hope will be soon,
She firmly believes she will go to the moon."

This was the occasion and the result of his first effort at rhyming. His "first dash at poetry," as he calls it, was made one year later, during a vacation visit of the house of a cousin, Miss Parker. Of that poem, he says, "It was the embellishment of a passion for my first cousin, one of the most beautiful of evanescent beings. I have long forgotten the verses, but it would be difficult for me to forget her—her dark eventful eye, her completely Greek cast of face and figure; I was then about twelve—she rather older, perhaps a year." Love for this young lady obtained strong hold of his heart. Of her personal appearance, he says, "I do not recollect any thing equal to the transparent beauty of my cousin, or to the sweetness of her temper, during the short period of our intimacy. She looked as if she had been made out of a rainbow—all beauty and grace.'

After a short visit at Cheltenham, in the summer of 1801, at the earnest solicitation of his mother, he was placed at Harrow, under the tuition of Doctor Drury, to whom he testified his gratitude in a note to the fourth canto of Childe Harold. In one of his manuscript journals, he says, "Dr. Drury was the best, the kindest friend I ever had—and I look upon him still as a father."

"Though he was lame," says one of his schoolfellows, "he was a great lover of sports, and preferred hockey to Horace, relinquished even Helicon for 'duck piddle,' and gave up the best poet that ever wrote hard Latin for a game of cricket on the common."

Notwithstanding his natural love for learning, he was always a clever, plain-spoken, and undaunted boy. I have seen him fight by the hour like a Trojan, and stand up against the disadvantage of his lameness with all the spirit of an ancient combatant.

It was during a vacation, and his residence at Newstead, that he formed an acquaintance with Miss Chaworth, an event which, according to his own deliberate persuasion, exercised a lasting and paramount influence over the whole of his subsequent character and eventful career. Twice had he loved, and now a third time he bowed before beauty, wit, and virtue. The father of the young lady had been killed in a duel by the eccentric grand-uncle of Byron, and the union of the young peer with her, the heiress of Annesley Hall, "would," as he said, "have healed all wounds in which blood had been shed. If it would have joined lands rich and broad; it would have joined at least one heart, and two persons ill-matched in years." But all this was destined to exist but in imagination. They had a parting interview in the following year: Miss Chaworth was married to Mr. Musters, with whom she lived unhappily. She died in 1831. Many of his smaller poems are addressed to this lady. The scene of the poem in which she is most exquisitely described is in "The Dream."
of the Abbé de Rouillé. The vacation of 1804 he spent with his mother at Southwell, and in October, 1805, he left Harrow, and entered Trinity College, Cambridge. He left with feelings of sadness. He says, "I always hated Harrow till the last, and a half, but then I liked it." He now began to feel that he was no longer a boy, and in solitude he mourned over the truth; this sorrow he could not at all times repress in public.

Soon after entering college, he formed an attachment with a lady so much as to persuade himself to write in warmth and romance all his schoolboy attachments.

In the summer of 1806, another visit to Southwell resulted in an acquittance with the family of Pigot, to a lady of which the earliest of his publish'd letters were addressed.

The temper of his mother exceeded all bounds. This temper, Byron in a great degree inherited. In his childhood, this passion often broke out in the most violent manner. Mother and son were often quarrelling, and provocations finally led to a separation, in August, 1806. Byron fled to London, where his mother followed him, made overtures of peace, but female discord remained untasted.

Early in November, his first volume of poems were put in press. It was entitled "Poems on Various Occasions," and was printed anonymously by Mr. Ridge, a bookseller at Newark. Becoming known, the volume was not only printed, but was reprinted in January, in which he omitted many pieces which had appeared in the first. This was not intended for public scrutiny, but merely circulated among his friends, and his personal acquaintance, gives the following description of the house in which the present lord has lately fitted up.

"The house and gardens are entirely surrounded by a wall with battlements. In front is a large lake, bordered here and there with castellated buildings, the chief of which Kirkwall is. Byron was received by the lord, at the further extremity of it. Fancy all this surrounded with bleak and barren hills, with scarce a tree to be seen for miles, except a solitary clump or two, and a few old brick houses as the limit of the property."

"So much for the place, concerning which I have thrown together these few particulars. But if the place itself appears rather strange to you, the ways of its inhabitants will not appear much less so. Ascend, therefore, among the cliffs, and I will introduce you to my lord and his visitants. But have a care how you proceed; be mindful to go there in broad daylight, and with your eyes about you. For, should you make any blunders,—should you go to the right of the wall steps, you are laid hold of by a bear; and should you go to the left, your case is still worse, for you run full against a wolf."

His residence was now at Newstead, where during the preparation of the new edition of his poems, he dispensed with a liberal hand the hospitalities of the old Abbey to a party of college friends. C. S. Matthewes, one of this party, in a letter to an acquaintance after the visit to the Abbey at that time, and amusing account of the proceedings and habits of its occupants:

"Newstead Abbey is situated one hundred and thirty-six miles from London—four on this side Mansfield. There are two large rooms, or suites, fallen in, but still standing, and a court, or room between them, which, though not inhabited, nor in an inhabited state, might easily be made so; and many of the original rooms, amongst which is a fine stone hall, are still in use. Of the abbey-church only one end remains; and the old kitchen, with a long range of apartments, is reduced to a heap of rubbish. Leading from the abbey to the modern part of the habitation is a noble room, seventy feet in length and twenty-three in breadth; but every part of the structure is in deep decay: I have several of the present lord has lately fitted up."

"The house and gardens are entirely surrounded by a wall with battlements. In front is a large lake, bordered here and there with castellated buildings, the chief of which Kirkwall is. Byron was received by the lord, at the further extremity of it. Fancy all this surrounded with bleak and barren hills, with scarce a tree to be seen for miles, except a solitary clump or two, and a few old brick houses as the limit of the property."

"Our party consisted of Lord Byron and four others, and was, now and then, increased by the presence of a neighboring parson. As for our way of living, the order of the day was generally this: for breakfast we had no set hour, but each suited his own convenience,—everything remaining on the table till the whole party had done; though had one wished to breakfast at the early hour of seven, one would have been rather lucky to find any of the servants up. Our average hour of rising was one, I, who generally got up between eleven and twelve, was always—even when an invalid—the first of the party to rise; and the hour of early rising. It was frequently past two before the breakfast party broke up. Then, for the amusement of the morning, there was reading, fencing, single-stick, or shuttlecock, in the great room; or practicing with both pistol in the half-decayed, railing, cricket, sailing on the lake, playing with the bear teasing the wolf. Between seven and eight we dined; and our evening lasted from that time till the two, or three, in the morning. The evening diversions may be easily conceived."

"I must not omit the custom of handing round after dinner, on the removal of the cloth, a human skull filled with Burgundy. After revelling on choice vouches, and the finest wines of France, we adjourned to tea, where he amused ourselves with reading or improving conversations, according to his fancy, and, after sandwiches, c., retired to rest. A set of monastic dresses, which had been provided, with all the proper apparatus of crosses, beads, tonsures, &c., often gave a variety to our appearance, and to our pursuits. "

Byron was at London when he put the finishing touches upon the new edition, which, having done, he took leave of that city, and soon after sailed for Lisbon, where he was to leave Atalanta. He arrived at his destination, in company with his friend, Mr. John Cam Hobhouse. They remained but a short time in Lisbon, from whence they travelled on horseback back to Cadiz. He was as free and easy in each of these places as he had been at home. In Lisbon, as he said, he ate oranges, talked bad Italian to the monks, went into society with pocket pistols, swam the Tagus, and became the victim of unique risques. A lady of character became fondly attached to him, and at parting gave him a lock of her hair "three feet in length," which he sent home to his mother. In Cadiz, "Miss Cordova and her little brother," became his fast friends, and during his stay, no course could not be pursued, and he swam three miles.

He arrived at Constantinople on the 13th of May while there, he wore a scarlet coat, richly embroidered with gold, with two heavy epaulettes and a feathered cap. He remained about two months, during which time he was presented to the Sultan, and made a journey to the Black Sea and other places of note in that vicinity. On the 14th of July, they left in the Salette frigate,—Mr. Hobhouse intending to accompany Mr. Adair, the English ambassador, to England, and Byron determined to visit Greece.

The latter landed at Zea, with two Albanians, a Tartar, and an English servant. Leaving Zea, he reached Athens on the 18th. From thence, he made another tour over the same places he had previously visited, and returned to Athens in December, with the purpose of remaining there during his sojourn in Greece. The persons with whom he was associated at Athens, were—Lord Sligo, Lady Hester Stanhope, and Mr. Bruce. Most of his time was employed in collecting materials for those notes on the state of modern Greece, appended to the second canto of "Childe Harold." He also had "Hints from Horace," a satire full of London life, yet, singular as it may appear, dated, "Athens, Capuchin Convent, March 12, 1811."

He intended to have gone to Egypt, but failing to receive expected remittances, he was obliged to forego the pleasure of that trip, and he left Athens and landed at Malta. There he suffered severely from a attack of fever, recovering from which, he sailed in the Volage frigate for England. He left Greece with more feelings of regret than he had left his native land, and the memories of his sojourn in the East, immortalized in Childe Harold, were among the pleasantest that accompanied him through life.

He arrived at London after an absence of just two years. Mr. Dallas, the gentleman who had superintended the publication of "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," called on him the day after his arrival; Lord Byron meeting him having written a new satire, and handed the MSS. to him for examination. Mr. Dallas was grieved, supposing that the inspiring lands of the East had brought from his mind no new and unexpected facts. Meeting him the next morning, Mr. Dallas expressed surprise that he had, during his absence, written nothing more. Upon this, Lord Byron told him that he had occasionally written short poems besides a great many stanzas in Spencer's measure, relative to the countries he had visited. "They are not worth troubling you with," said Byron, "but you shall have them all with you, if you like."

He then took Childe Harold's Pilgrimage from a small trunk, and handed it to Mr. Dallas, at the same time expressing a desire to have the "Hints from Horace" put to press immediately. He undervalued Childe Harold, and overvalued the "Hints." He thought the former inferior to the latter. As time passed on, he altered his mind in reference to this matter. "Had Lord Byron," says Moore, "persisted in his original purpose of giving this poem to the press, instead of Childe Harold, it is more than probable, that he would now, and always, as a point to the world."

He finally consented to the publication of Childe Harold, yet to the last, he expressed doubts as to its merit, and the reception it would meet with at the hands of the public. Doubts and difficulties arose as to a publisher. Messrs. Longman had refused to publish "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers;" and it was expressly stipulated with Mr. Dallas, to whom Lord Byron had presented the copyright, that Childe Harold should not be offered to any publisher. An application was made to Mr. Miller, but owing to the severity in which a personal friend of that gentleman was mentioned, in the poem, he declined publishing it. At length it was proposed by the hands of Mr. Murray, then residing in Fleet street, who was proud of the undertaking, and by whom it was immediately put to press:

and thus was laid the foundation of that friendly and profitable connection, between that publisher and the great poet, which continued, with but little interruption, during the poet's life."

About this time, the fifth edition of his satire was issued, and, soon after, every copy that could be found was taken and destroyed. In America, however, and on the continent, where the law of England had no power, it continued to meet with an unprohibited sale.

While busily engaged in literary projects, he was suddenly called to Newstead, by information of the sickness of his mother. He immediately departed, and travelled with all possible speed, yet death preceded him. When he arrived, he found her dead.

In a letter, the day after, he says, "I now feel the truth of Mr. Gray's observation, that we can only have one mother." Mrs. Byron had, undoubtedly, loved her son, and he her, with a depth of feeling hardly susceptible by those who had seen them in their fits of ungovernable passion. An incident that occurred at this time, and the grief of the poet at the news, was the only wakening of the sincerity of his affection. On the night after his arrival, the waiting woman of Mrs. Byron, in passing the door of the room, where the deceased lady lay, heard a sound as of some one sighing heavily from within; and, on entering the chamber, found, to her surprise, Lord Byron, sitting in the dark, beside the bed. On her representing to him the weakness of thus giving way to grief, he burst into tears, and exclaimed, "O, Mrs. By, I had but one friend in the world, and she is gone!"

He was early at this time to mourn over the loss, not only of his mother, but of six relatives and intimate friends.

He returned to London in October, and resumed the toils of literary labor, revising Childe Harold, and making many additions and alterations. This work he had, also, at this time, two other works in press, "Hints from Horace," and "The Curse of Minerva." In January, the two cantos of Childe Harold were printed, but not ready for sale until the month of March, when the national effect of his death, as a poet to the world, says Moore, "was as instantaneous as it has proved deep and lasting. It was electric;—his fame had not to wait for any of the ordinary gradations, but seemed to spring up, like the palace of a fairy tale, in a night."

Byron, himself in a medley of the sudden and wholly unexpected effect, said, "I awoke one morning, and found myself famous."

It was just previous to this period, that he became acquainted with Moore, the poet. The circumstance which led to their acquaintance was a correspondence caused by a note appended to "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." The acquaintance was thus made, in the utmost familiarity, through life. Lord Byron was personally introduced to Moore at the house of Rogers, the poet, where, on the same day, these three, together with Campbell, dined.

Among the natural persons of genius, which Lord Byron received, was that of the Prince Regent. At an evening party he was presented to that personage, at the request of the latter. The Regent expressed his admiration of Childe Harold and entered into a cordial and animated conversation, which continued all the evening.

In the month of August, 1811, the new theatre in Drury Lane was finished, and, after being urgently requested, Byron wrote an opening address for the fairy tale, "The Corsair," which rapidly passed through several editions. The first contained but about four hundred lines, the last edition, about fourteen hundred. Many of its choicest parts were not in the early copies, yet it was received with the greatest favor, and the admirers of Childe Harold equally admired this new production.

In December, 1813, he published "The Bride of Abysius." To this, while being printed, he added nearly two hundred lines. It met with a better reception, if possible, than either of his former works. Fourteen thousand of his copies were sold in one week, and it was with the greatest difficulty and labor that the demand for it could be supplied. In January following, appeared the "The Corsair." In April the "Ode to Napoleon," and, during the ensuing month, he published "Hebrew Melodies."

In May, he adopted the strange and singular resolution of calling in all he had written, buying up all his copyrights, and not writing any more. For two years, he lived as the literary idol of the people. They had bestowed upon his genius all the words of praise, and shouted his genius and fame to the skies. His name had ever been on the lips, his writings in the head, and his sentiments in the heart of the whole nation. This strong public feeling began to wane, as the excitement caused by the sudden appearance of any new thing, always will. The papers raised a hue and cry against a few of his minor poems. His moral and social character was brought into prominence; this had been during his short, but eventful, life, and much that had never an existence, except in the minds of his opponents, was related with minute particularity. Not only this, but the slight opinion these journals expressed of his just and noble life, was occasioned by that inward dissatisfaction with his own powers. which they, whose standard of excellence is highest, are always surest to feel, mortified and disturbed him. In publishing these attacks, he remarks, "I am afraid what you call tracts is plagiary to the purpose, and, to tell the truth, for some time past, I have been myself much of the same opinion." In this state of mind, he resolved upon bidding farewel to literature and to himself to some other pursuit. Mentioning this determination to Mr. Murray, that gentleman doubted his seriousness; but on the arrival of a letter, enclosing a draft on himself for £500, and a request to withdraw all the advertisements, and destroy all copies of his poems, remaining in store, except two of each for himself, all doubts vanished. Mr. Murray wrote an answer, that such an act would be deeply injurious to both parties, and finally induced him to continue publishing.

In connection with "Jacqueline," a poem, by Mr. Rogers, "Lara" appeared in August. This was his last appearance as an author, until the spring of 1816.

On the 2d of January, 1816, Lord Byron proposed and was accepted in marriage, by an heiress, Miss Milbanke, daughter of Sir Ralph Milbanke, a sad but interesting tale. The "Tales of Belphegor," had just been published. His fortune was upwards of ten thousand pounds sterling, which was considerably increased by the death of her parents, a few years subsequent to her union with the poet. This union cast a shade on his hitherto brilliant career, and which he appears to have marked with a feeling of sorrow and resignation. In November, he was not only obliged to sell his library, but his furniture, and even his beds, were seized by the bailiffs.

As soon as the separation took place, the full tide of public opinion set against him, and those who had so long been his enemies, Mr. Moore and Lord Byron, were among the first to take advantage of his misfortunes, and misunderstandings, dissoluted it, and the lady retired to the country-seat of her parents, from the unpleasant scenes of her own home.

One child was the result of this marriage, Ada Margaret Byron. Previous to the separation, Byron's muse was stimulated to exertion by his fast-gathering misfortunes, and he produced the "Siege of Corinth" and "Parisina." At the time of his divorce, Lord Byron and Lady Milbanke resided in London. He entered into a giddy whirlpool of frolicking and unrestrained gaiety, which at length brought upon him great pecuniary embarrassments, which so increased, that in November, he was not only obliged to sell his library, but his furniture, and even his beds, were seized by the bailiffs.

Thus miserable, yet conscious of his newly-awakening strength, Byron determined to leave England. At leaving, the only person with whom he parted with regret, was his sister, and to her he penned the touching tribute, "Though the Day of my Destiny's over." To Mr. Moore he addressed, "My Boat is on the Shore;" and to Lady Byron, "Fare thee well." He arrived at Ostend on the 25th of April. His journey lay by the Rhine. He made a short stay at Brussels. At Geneva he spent the remainder of the summer. Living in a beautiful villa on the borders of the lake, he had frequent excursions to Coppet, Chamonix, the Bernese Alps, and other places of interest. Mr. and Mrs. Shelley were also residing at Geneva at that time. It was in this villa, on the banks of the lake, that he finished the third canto of "Childe Harold." He also wrote, "The Prisoner of Chillon," "To Augusta," "The Fragment," "Darkness," and "The Dream." In the month of August he was visited by Mr. M. G. Lewis, Mr. Hobhouse, and Mr. S. Davies, with whom he made the excursions previously alluded to. It was while here, that he began his poem, "The Romance of the "Vampire;" also another, founded upon the story of the Marriage of Belphégor, both of which he left unfinished.

From the marriage of the year 1817, to that of 1820, Lord Byron's principaloccupation was at Venice. Soon after reaching that city, he began the study of the Armenian language, in which he made considerable progress. While there, he pursued his literature, and was successful in it. He wrote "The Lament of Tasso," the fourth canto of "Childe Harold," the dramas of "Marino Faliero," and the "Two Folcari," "Rapso," "Mazeppa," and the first canto of "Don Juan."

He formed an acquaintance with Madame Guiccioli, who soon grew to a passionate love, and was duly reciprocated by her. She was a Romagnole lady. Her father was Count Gamba, a nobleman of high rank and ancient name, at Ravenna. She had been married, when at the age of sixteen, without reference to her choice or affection, to the Count Guiccioli, an old and wealthy widower. At the time he entered on the acquaintance of Byron, she was twenty; with fair and delicate complexion, large, dark eyes, and a profusion of auburn hair. This lady almost entirely governed the movements of Byron, while in Italy; and it was a government of which he approved and from which he was led to expect no desire to escape.

She proceeded with her husband to Ravenna, in April, 1819, and Lord Byron soon followed. He shortly returned to Venice, where he received a visit from Moore, in the course of which he presented to him a large manuscript volume, entitled, "My Life and Adventures." As he handed it to him, he remarked, "It is not a thing that can be published during my life; but you may have it, if you like.—there, do whatever you please with it;" and soon after added, "This will make a nice legacy for my little Tom, who shall astonish the latter days of the nineteenth century with it."

This manuscript was a collection of various journals, memorandums, etc. At Byron's request, Mr. Moore sold the copyright to Murray for two thousand pounds, with the stipulation that it was not to be published until after the author's decease. When news of this event was published, the author, Mr. Murray, the money advanced, and placed the manuscript at the disposal of Lord Byron's sister, Mrs. Leigh; at whose request, and, with the accordant opinion of Lord Byron's best friends. The motive for its destruction is said to have been an unwillingness to offend the feelings of many of the individuals mentioned in it.

Towards the close of the year 1819, Lord Byron removed to Ravenna, where he wrote "The Prophesy of Dante," "Sardanapalus," "Cain," "Heaven and Earth," the third, fourth, and fifth canto of "Don Juan," and "The Vision of Judgment."

He remained at Ravenna during the greater part of the two succeeding years. In the autumn of 1821 he removed to Lisa, in Tuscany, where he remained until the middle of May. His habits of life, while at Lisa, are thus described by Moore:—

"At two, he usually breakfasted, and at three, or, as the year advanced, at four o'clock, those persons who were in the habit of accompanying him in his rides, called upon him. After, occasionally, a game of billiards, he proceeded,—and in order to avoid the bustle of the little town, where his horses met him. At first, the route he chose for these rides was in the direction of the Cascine, and of the pine forest which reaches towards the sea; but having found a spot more convenient for his pistols, he went west towards the Portails Spiaigia to the east of the city, he took daily this course during the remainder of his stay. When arrived at the Podere, or farm, in the gardens of of which he was allowed to erect their target, his friends and he dismounted, and, after devoting about half an hour to a trial of skill at the pistol, returned, a little before sunset, into the city."

Leaving Pisa, he removed to Genoa, where he remained till his final departure for Greece, in July, 1822. During this time, he produced "Werther," "The Deformed Transformed," "The Island," "The Age of Bronze," and the last cantos of "Don Juan."

He became interested in the struggle of the Greeks for freedom, and offered his services in their behalf. He obtained the advance of a large sum of money, and chartered an English vessel, the Herecles, for the purpose of taking him to Greece.

All things being ready, on the 13th of July, he, and those who were to accompany him, embarked. His suite consisted of Count Pietro Gamba, brother of the Countess Guiccioli; Mr. Trelawny, an Englishman; and Doptor Bruno, an Italian physician, who had just left the university, and was universally acquainted with surgery. He had, also, at his service, eight servants.

There were on board five horses, arms and ammunition for the use of his party, and medicine enough for the supply of one thousand men for one year.

On the morning of the 14th of July, the Herecles sailed; but, encountering a severe storm, was obliged to put back. On the evening of the 15th, they set sail, and after four days' hard work, reached Leghorn, where they shipped a supply of gunpowder, and other English goods. Receiving these, they immediately sailed for Cephalonia, and reached Patras, the 21st of July. He was warmly received by the Greeks and English, among whom his presence created a lively sensation.

Wishing information, in order to determine upon his course for Greece, he despatched Mr. Trelawny and Mr. Hamilton Browne with a letter to the Greek government, in order to obtain an account of the state of public affairs. Here, as in many other places, he displayed his generosity, by relieving the distressed, who had fled from Scio. He was delayed by Argolodii about six weeks, by adverse winds. At length, the wind becoming fair, he embarked on board the Misticco, and Count Gamba, with the horses and heavy baggage, in a large barge.

The latter was brought to by a Turkish frigate, and carried, with its valuable cargo, into Patras, where the commander of the Turkish fleet was stationed, and desired to proceed with the English vessels, and was so fortunate as to obtain the release of his vessel and freight; and sailing, reached Missolonghi on the 4th of January. He was surprised to learn that Lord Byron had not arrived.

On his Lordship's departure from Dragomestri, a violent gale came on, and the vessel was twice driven into imminent danger on the rocks; and it was owing to Lord Byron's firmness and nautical skill, that the vessel, several lives, and twenty-five thousand pounds and goods were saved.

It was while at Dragomestri, that an imprudent oath brought on a cold, which was the foundation of that sickness which resulted in his death.

He reached Missolonghi on the 9th of January, 1823. During his stay at this place, his expressions of joy, No mark of welcome or honor that the Greeks could devise, was omitted.

One of the first acts of Lord Byron, was an attempt to mitigate the ferocity of war, which had broken out. A Turk from the hands of some sailors, kept him at his house a few days, until an opportunity occurred to send him to Patras. He sent four Turkish prisoners to the Turkish Chief of Patras, and requested the Turkish officers, on both sides, be henceforward treated with humanity.

Forming a corps of Sulioties, he equipped them at his own expense. They numbered about six hundred, brave and hearty mountainiers, but wholly undisciplined and manageable. Of these, having obtained a commission, he, on the first of Febru

An expedition against Lepanto was proposed; but, owing to some difficulty with the rude and riotous soldiery, it was suspended.

Disease now began to prey upon him, and he was attacked with a fit of epilepsy on the 15th of February, which deprived him, for a short time, of all control over his senses. On the following morning, he appeared to be much better, but still quite ill.

On the 9th of April, after returning from a ride with Count Gamba, during which they had met a violent shower, he was again prostrated with disease. He was seized with shuddering, and complained of rheumatic pains. The following day he arose at his accustomed hour, transacted business, and rode into the olive woods, accompanied by his long train of Sulioties.

On the 11th his fever increased; and on the 12th he kept his bed all day, complaining that he could not sleep, and taking no nourishment whatever. The two following days, he suffered much from pain in the head, though his fever had subsided. On the 14th, after a successful finding, urged the necessity of his being beds. But of this Lord Byron would not hear. At length, however, after repeated entreaties, he promised that, though he should for a time be left to his fate, he would declare himself. He was bled; but the relief did not answer the expectations of any one. The restlessness and agitation increased, and he spoke several times in an incoherent manner. On the 17th, it was repeated.

His disease continued to increase; he had not, till now, thought himself dangerously ill; but now, the fearful truth was apparent, not only in his own feelings, but in the countenances and actions of his friends and attendants.

A consultation of physicians was had. Soon after, a fit of delirium ensued, and he began to talk wildly, calling out, half in English, half in Italian, "Forwards!—forwards!—courage!—follow my example!" &c., &c.

On Fletcher's asking him whether he should bring pen and paper to take down his words, he replied:—"Oh, no, there is no time—it is now nearly over. Go to my sister—tell her—go to Lady Byron—you will see her—say—"

"No, nor tell the world, and be warned—"

"What a pity!—then it is too late;—all is over."

"I hope not," answered Fletcher; but the Lord's will be done!"

"Yes, not mine, "said Byron. He then attempted to say something; but nothing was intelligible, except "my sister—my child."

About six o'clock in the evening of the 19th, he said, "Now I shall go to sleep;" and, turning round, fell into that slumber from which he never awoke.

The sad intelligence was received by the people of Missolonghi with feelings of sorrow, which we are unable to describe; and all Europe was in mourning over the loss of this great man, as its tidings spread through its cities, towns, and villages.

It was but a short time previous, that the Greeks were inspired by his presence, and inspired by the touch of his ever-powerful genius. Now, all was over. The future triumphs which they had pictured forth for their country's freedom, vanished. Their bright hopes departed, and lamentation filled hearts constantly with rejoicing.

In various parts of Greece, honors were paid to his memory.

The funeral ceremony took place in the church of St. Nicholas. His remains were carried on the shoulders of the officers of his corps. On his coffin were placed a helmet, a sword, and a crown of laurel. The church was crowded to its utmost extent, during the service.

On the 2d of May the body was conveyed to Zante, under a salute from the guns of the fortress. From thence, it was sent in the English brig Florida, in charge of Col. Stanhope; and, being landed under the direction of his executors, Mr. Hobhouse and Mr. Hanson, it was removed to the house of Sir Edward Knatchbull, where it lay in state during the 9th and 10th of July. On the 16th of July, the last duties were paid to the remains of the great poet, by depositing them close to those of his mother, in the family vault in the small village church of Hucknall, near Newstead. It is a somewhat singular fact, that on the same day of the same month in the preceding year, he said to Count Gamba—"Where shall we be in another year?"

On a tablet of white marble, in the chancel of the church of Hucknall, is the following inscription:

IN THE VAULT BENEATH,
WHERE MANY OF HIS ANCESTORS AND HIS MOTHER ARE BURIED, LIE THE REMAINS OF GEORGE GORDON NOEL BYRON,
LORD BYRON, OF ROCHEDALE,
IN THE COUNTY OF LANCASHIRE;
THE AUTHOR OF
"CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE."
HE WAS BORN IN LONDON, ON THE 22D OF JANUARY, 1788;
ENGAGED IN THE GLORIOUS ATTEMPT TO RESTORE THAT COUNTRY TO HER ANCIENT FREEDOM AND RENOWN.

HIS SISTER, THE HONORABLE
AUGUSTA MARIA LEIGH,
PLACED THIS TABLET TO HIS MEMORY.

Thus lived and died the poet Byron. With a mind blest with an active genius, which few but are privileged to possess, he passed through this world, like a comet, on its bright but erratic course, leaving a luminous trace behind to mark his passage, and to keep his memory fresh in the hearts of many future generations. It is not our purpose, in this place, to speak of the general tone of his writings or of their influence. That he had faults, we are ready to admit; and that he had an inward goodness of heart, we are as ready to assert. But few men, with like temperament and associations with his, would have pursued a different course.

In height he was five feet eight inches and a half. His hands were very white and small. Of his face, the beauty may be pronounced to have been of the highest order, as combining at once regularity of features with the most varied and interesting expression. His eyes were of a light gray, and capable of all extremes of expression, from the most joyous hilarity to the deepest sadness, from the very sunshine of benevolence to the most concentrated scorn or rage.

But it was in the mouth and chin that the great beauty of his countenance lay. Says a fair critic of his features, "Many pictures have been painted of him, with various success; but the excessive beauty of his lips escaped every painter and sculptor. In their ceaseless play they represented every emotion, whether pain with anger, or curled in disdain, smiling in triumph, or dimpled with archness and love. This extreme facility of expression, was sometimes painful, for I have seen him look absolutely ugly—have seen him look so hard and cold that you must hate him, and then, in a moment, brighter than the sun, with such playful softness in his look, such affectionate eagerness kindling in his eyes, and dimpling his lips into something more sweet than a smile, that you forgot the man, the Lord Byron, in the picture of beauty presented to you, and gazed with intense curiosity. I had almost said—as if to satisfy yourself, that thus looked the god of poetry, the god of the Vatican, when he conversed with the sons and daughters of man."

His head was small; the forehead high, on which glossy, dark-brown curls clustered. His teeth were white and regular, and his countenance colorless.

He believed in the immortality of the soul. In one of his letters, he said that he once doubted it; but that reflection had taught him better. The publication of "Cain, a Mystery," brought down upon him the severest denunciations of many of the clergy, whose zeal took rapid flight and bore away their reason and judgment. They called it blasphemous. This, Lord Byron denied in the most positive terms. The misunderstanding was owing to the fact that Byron caused each of the characters to speak as it was supposed they would speak, judging from their actions, and that these fault-finders, who raised such an outcry, understood the language to be the belief of the author, than which nothing could be more unreasonable.

At the time of Byron's death many tributes to his memory were paid by the most celebrated authors. Among them was one from Rogers, from which we take the following as best fitted, in closing this sketch, to leave on the mind of our reader a just view of the strange and eventful life of the poet, and at the same time to call forth that charity in judgment which it is our duty to bestow:

"Thou art gone;
And he who would shall deem thee in thy grave,
Oh, let him pause! for who among us all,
Tried as thou wert—even from thy earliest years,
Wes he a wonder, yet unpolish, a Highland boy—
Tried as thou wert, and with thy love of fame;
Pleasure, while yet the down was on thy cheek,
Glittering, peering, and to lips like thine,
Her charmed cup—ah, who amongst us all
Could say he had not loved as much and more!"
CHILDE HAROLD’S PILGRIMAGE.

A ROMAUNT.

Preface.

The following poem was written, for the most part, amid the scenes which it attempts to describe. It was begun in Albania; and the parts relative to Spain and Portugal were composed from the author’s observations in those countries. Thus much it may be necessary to state for the correctness of the descriptions. The scenes attempted to be sketched are in Spain, Portugal, Epirus, Acarnania, and Greece. There for the present the poem stops: its reception will determine whether the author may venture to conduct his readers to the capital of the East, through Ionia and Phrygia: these two cantos are merely experimental.

A fictitious character is introduced for the sake of giving some connexion to the piece; which, however, makes no pretension to regularity. It has been suggested to me by friends, on whose opinions I set a high value, that in this fictitious character, ‘Childe Harold,’ I may incur the suspicion of having intended some real personage: this I beg leave, once for all, to disclaim—Harold is the child of imagination, for the purpose I have stated. In some very trivial particulars, and those merely local, there might be grounds for such a notion; but in the main points, I should hope, none whatever.

It is almost superfluous to mention that the appellation ‘Childe,’ as ‘Childe Waters,’ ‘Childe Childers,’ &c., is used as more consonant with the old structure of the versification which I have adopted. The ‘Good Night,’ in the beginning of the first canto, was suggested by ‘Lord Maxwell’s Good Night,’ in the Border Minstrelsy, edited by Mr Scott.

With the different poems which have been published on Spanish subjects, there may be found some slight coincidence in the first part, which treats of the Peninsula, but it can only be casual; as, with the exception of a few concluding stanzas, the whole of this poem was written in the Levant.

The stanza of Spenser, according to one of our most successful poets, admits of every variety. Dr Beattie makes the following observation: ‘Not long ago I began a poem in the style and stanza of Spenser, in which I propose to give full scope to my inclination, and be either droll or pathetic, descriptive or sentimental, tender or satirical, as the humor strikes me; for, if I mistake not, the measure which I have adopted admits equally of all these kinds of composition.’—Strengthened in my opinion by such high authority, and by the example of some in the highest order of Italian poets, I shall make no apology for attempts at similar variations in the following composition; satisfied that, if they are unsuccessful, their failure must be in the execution, rather than in the design sanctioned by the practice of Ariosto, Thomson, and Beattie.

Addition to the Preface.

I have now waited till almost all our periodical journals have distributed their usual portion of criticism. To the justice of the generality of their criticisms I have nothing to object; it would ill become me to quarrel with their very slight degree of censure, when, perhaps, if they had been less kind they had been more candid. Returning, therefore, to all and each my best thanks for their liberality, on one point alone shall I venture an observation. Among the many objections justly urged to the very indifferent character of the ‘vagrant Childe,’ (whom, notwithstanding many hints to the con trary, I still maintain to be a fictitious personage,) it has been stated, that, besides the anachronism, he is very unknighthly, as the times of the Knights were times of love, honor, and so forth. Now it so happens that the good old times, when "l'amour du bon vieux temps l'amour antique" flourished, were the most profligate of all possible centuries. Those who have any doubts on this subject may consult St. Palaye, passim, and more particularly vol. ii., page 69. The vows of chivalry were no better kept than any other vows whatsoever; and the songs of the Troubadours were not more decent, and certainly were much less refined, than those of Ovid. The "Cours d'amour, parlemens d'amour ou de courtesie et de gentillesse" had much more of love than of courtesy or gentleness. See Rolland on the same subject with St. Palaye. Whatever other objection may be urged to that most unamiable personage, Child Harold, he was so far perfectly knightly in his attributes—"No walter, but a knight templar."* By the by, I fear that Sir Tristrem and Sir Lancelot were no better than they should be, although very poetical personages and true knights "sans peur," though not "sans reproche." If the story of the institution of the "Garter" be not a fable, the knights of that order have for several centuries borne the badge of a Countess of Salisbury of indifferent memory. So much for chivalry. Burke need not have regretted that its days are over, though Maria Antoinette was quite as chaste as most of those in whose honors lances were shivered, and knights unhorsed.

Before the days of Bayard, and down to those of Sir Joseph Banks, (the most chaste and celebrated of ancient and modern times,) few exceptions will be found to this statement, and I fear a little investigation will teach us not to regret these monstrous mummeries of the middle ages.

I now leave "Childe Harold," to live his day, such as he is; it had been more agreeable, and certainly more easy, to have drawn an amiable character. It had been easy to varnish over his faults, to make him do more and express less, but he never was intended as an example, further than to show that early perversion of mind and morals leads to safety of past pleasures and disappointment in new ones, and that even the beauties of nature, and the stimulus of travel (except ambition, the most powerful of all excitements) are lost on a soul so constituted, or rather misdirected. Had I proceeded with the poem, this character would have deepened as he drew to the close; for the outline which I once meant to fill up for him was, with some exceptions, the sketch of a modern Timon, perhaps a poetical Zelucus.

BYRON'S WORKS.

TO IANTHE.

Not in those climes where I have late been straying,
Though Beauty long hath there been matchless deem'd;
Not in those visions to the heart displaying
Forms which it sighs but to have only dream'd,
Hath aught like thee in truth or fancy seem'd:
Nor, having seen thee, shall I vainly seek
To paint those charms which varied as they beam'd:
To such as see thee not my words were weak;
To those who gaze on thee what language could they speak?

Ah! may'st thou ever be what now thou art,
Nor unseem the promise of thy spring,
As fair in form, as warm yet pure in heart,
Love's image upon earth without his wing,
And guileless beyond Hope's imagining!
And surely he who now so fondly rears
Thy youth, in thee, thus hourly brightening,
Beholds the rainbow of her future years,
Before whose heavenly hues all sorrow disappears.

Young Peri of the West—'tis well for me
My years already doubly number things;
My long lost eye unmov'd may gaze on thee,
And safely view thy ripening beauties shine;
Happy, I ne'er shall see them in decline;
Happier, that while all younger hearts shall bleed,
Mine shall escape the doom thine eyes assign
To those whose admiration shall succeed,
But mix'd with pangs to Love's even loveliest hours decreed.

Oh! let that eye, which, wild as the Gazelle's,
Now brightly bold or beautifully shy,
Wins as it wanders, dazzles where it dwells,
Glance o'er this page, nor to my verse deny
That smile for which my breast might vainly sigh,
Could I to thee be ever more than friend:
This much, dear maid, accord: nor question why
To one so young my strain I would commend,
But bid me with my wreath one matchless lily blend.

Such is thy name with this my verse entwined;
And long as kinder eyes a look shall cast
On Harold's page, Ianth's here enshrined
Shall thus be first beheld, forgotten last;
My days once number'd, should this homage past
Attract thy fairy fingers near the lyre
Of him who hail'd thee, loveliest as thou wast,
Such is the most my memory may desire;
Though more than Hope can claim, could Frierd ship less require 3
CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE

CANTO I

I.
On thou in Hellas deem'd of heavenly birth, Muse! form'd or fabled at the minstrel's will! Since shamed full oft by later lyres on earth, Mine dares not call thee from thy sacred hill: Yet there I've wander'd by thy vaunted rill; Yes! sigh'd o'er Delphi's long deserted shrine, Where, save that feeble fountain, all is still; Nor mote my shell awake the weary Nine For grace so plain a site—this lowly lay of mine.

II.
Whilome in Albion's isle there dwelt a youth, Who ne in virtue's ways did take delight; But spent his days in riot most uncomplish'd, And vex'd with mirth the drowsy ear of Night. Ah, me! in sooth he was a shameless wight, Sore given to revel and ungodly glee; Few earthly things found favor in his sight Save concubines and carnal companie, And haunt'd wassailers of high and low degree.

III.
Childe Harold was he hight,—but whence his name? And lineage long, it suits; ne not to say; Suffice it, that perchance they were of fame, And had been glorious in another day: But one sad level soils a same for aye, However mighty in the o'den time: Nor all that heralds rake from coffin'd clay, Nor florid grace, nor hero'd lies of rhyme, Can blazon evil deeds, or consecrate a crime.

IV.
Caidle Harold bask'd him in the noontide sun, Disporting there like any other fly; Nor deem'd before his little day was done One blast might chill him into misery. But long ere scarce a third of his pass'd by, Worse than ad'cently the Childe befell; He felt the fulness of satiety; Then loath'd he in his native land to dwell, Which seem'd to him more lone than Eremita's sad cell.

V.
For he through Sin's long labyrinth had run, Nor made atonement when he did amiss, Had sigh'd to many though he loved but one. And that loved one, alas! could ne'er be his. Ah, happy she! to scape from him whose kiss Had been pollution unto aught so chaste; Who soon had left her charms for vulgar bliss, And spoil'd her goodly lands to gild his waste, Nor cain domestic peace had ever deign'd to taste.

VI.
And now Childe Harold was sore sick at heart And from his fellow bacchanales would flee, 'Tis said, at times the sullen tear would start, But Pride conceal'd the drop within his eye: Apart he staid in joyless reverie, And from his native land resolv'd to go, And visit scorching climes beyond the seas; With pleasure drugg'd he almost long'd for wo. And e'en for change of scene would seek the shades below.

VII.
The Childe departed from his father's hall: It was a vast and venerable pile; So old, it seemed only not to fall, Yet strength was pillar'd in each massy aisle. Monastic dome! condemn'd to uses vile! Where Superstition once had made her den, Now Paphian girls were known to sing and smile; And monks might deem their time was come again, If ancient tales say true, nor wrong these holy men.

VIII.
Yet oftentimes in his maddest mirthful mood Strange pangs would flash along Childe Harold's As if the memory of some deadly feud [brow, Or disappointed passion lurk'd below: But this none knew, nor haply cared to know; For his was not that open, artless soul That feels relief by bidding sorrow flow, Nor sought he friend to counsel or condole What'er his grief mote be, which he could not control.
IX.
And none did love him—though to hall and bower
He gather’d revellers from far and near,
He knew them flatt’r’rs of the festal hour;
The heartless parasites of present cheer.
Yet! none did love him—not his lemans dear—
But bomp and power alone are woman’s care,
And where these are light Eros finds a fere;
Maidens, like moths; are ever caught by glare,
And Mammon wins his way where Seraphs might despair.

X.
Child Harold had a mother—not forgot,
Though parting from that mother he did shun;
A sister whom he loved, but saw her not
Before his weary pilgrimage begun:
If friends he had, he bade adieu to none.
Yet deem not thence his breast a breast of steel;
Ye, who have known what ‘tis to dote upon
A few dear objects, will in sadness feel
Such partings break the heart they fondly hope to heal.

XI.
His house, his home, his heritage, his lands,
The laughing damos in whom he did delight,
Whose large blue eyes, fair locks, and snowy hands
Might shake the saintship of an anchorite,
And long had fed his youthful appetite;
His goblets brimm’d with every costly wine,
And all that mote to luxury invite,
Without a sigh he left, to cross the brine,
And traverse Paynim shores, and pass Earth’s central line.

XII.
The sails were fill’d, and fair the light winds blew,
As glad to waft him from his native home;
And fast the white rocks faded from his view,
And soon were lost in circumambient foam:
And then, it may be, of his wish to roam
Repeated he, but in his bosom slept
The silent thought, nor from his lips did come
One word of wail, whilst others eat and wept,
And to the reckless gales unmanly moaning kept.

XIII.
But when the sun was sinking in the sea
He seized his harp, which he at times could string,
And strike, albeit with untaught melody,
When deem’d he no strange ear was listening:
And now his fingers o’er it he did fling,
And tuned his farewell in the deep twilight.
While flew the vessel on her snowy wing,
And destining shores receded from his sight,
Thus to the elements he pour’d his last “Good Night.”

1. “Adieu! adieu! my native shore
Fades o’er the waters blue;
The Night-winds sigh, the breakers roar,
And shrieks the wild sea-mew.
Yon Sun that sets upon the sea
We follow in his flight;
Pardon awhile to him and thee,
My native Land—Good Night!”

2. “A few short hours, and He will rise
To give the Morrow birth;
And I shall hail the main and skies,
But not my mother Earth.
Deserted is my own good hall,
Its hearth is desolate;
Wild weeds are gathering on the wall;
My dog howls at the gate.

3. “Come hither, hither, my little page!
Why dost thou weep and wail?
Or dost thou dread the billows’ rage,
Or tremble at the gale?
But dash the tear-drop from thine eye,
Our ship is swift and strong;
Our fleetest falcon scarce could fly
More merrily along.”

4. ’Let winds be shrill, let waves roll high,
I fear not wave nor wind;
Yet marvel not, Sir Childo, that I
Am sorrowful in mind;
For I have from my father gone,
A mother whom I love,
And have no friend, save these alone.
But thee—and one above.

5. ’My father bless’d me fervently,
Yet did not much complain;
But sorely will my mother sigh
Till I come back again.’—
”Enough, enough, my little lad!
Such tears become thine eye;
If I thy guileless bosom had,
Mine own would not be dry.

6. “Come hither, hither, my staunch yeoman
Why dost thou look so pale?
Or dost thou dread a French foeman?
Or shiver at the gale?”
”Deem’st thou I tremble for my life?
Sir Childo, I’m not so weak;
But thinking on an absent wife
Will blanch a faithful cheek.

7. ’My spouse and boys dwell near thy hall,
Along the bordering lake;
And when they on their father call,
What answer shall she make?’—
”Enough, enough, my yeoman good,
Thy grief let none gainays;
But I, who am of lighter mood,
Will laugh to see away.

8. “For who would trust the seeming sighs
Of wife or paramour?
Fresh feres will dry the bright blue eyes
We late saw streaming o’er.
For pleasures past I do not grieve,
Nor perils gathering near;
My greatest grief is that I leave
No thing that claims a tear.”
9.

"And now I'm in the world alone,
Upon the wide, wide sea:
But why should I for others groan,
When none will sigh for me?

New chance my dog will whine in vain:
Till fed by stranger hands;
But long ere I come back again,
He'd tear me where he stands.

10.

"With thee, my bark, I'll swiftly go
A'athwart the foaming brine;
Nor care what land thou bear'st me too,
So not again to mine.

Welcome, welcome, ye dark blue waves,
And when you fail my sight,
Welcome, ye deserts, and ye caves!
My native Land—Good Night!"

XIV.

On, on the vessel flies, the land is gone,
And winds are rude in Biscay's sleepless bay.
Four days are sped, but with the fifth, anon,
New shores descried make every bowman say;

And Cintra's mountain greets them on their way,
And Tagus dashing onward to the deep;
His fabled golden tribute bent to pay;
And soon on board the Lusian pilots leap,

And steer 'twixt fertile shores where yet few rustics reap.

XV.

Oh, Christ! it is a goodly sight to see
What Heaven hath done for this delicious land!
What fruits of fragrance blush on every tree!
What goodly prospects o'er the hills expand!

But man would war with them with an impious hand:
And when the Almighty lifts his fiercest scourge
'Gainst those who most transgress his high command,
With treble vengeance will his hot shafts urge Saul's locust host, and earth from fallest foemen purge.

XVI.

What beauties doth Lisbon first unfold!
Her image floating on that noble tide,
Which poets vainly pave with sands of gold,
But now wherein a thousand keels did ride
Of mighty strength, since Albion was allied,
And to the Lusians did her aid afford:
A nation sworn with ignorance and pride,
Who lick yet loathes the hand that waves the sword
To save them from the wrath of Gaul's unsparing lord.

XVII.

But whose enterth within this town,
That, sheening far, celestial seems to be,
Disconsolate will wander up and down,
'Mid many things unsightly to strange eye;
For hut and palace show like filthy:
The dingy denizens are reared in dirt;
Ne personage or high or mean degree
Doth care for cleanliness of surtost or shirt,
Through shent with Egypt's plague, unkempt,
Unwash'd, unhurt.

XVIII.

Poor, paltry slaves! yet born 'midst nobles' scenes
Why, Nature, waste thy wonders on such men?
Lo! Cintra's glorious Eden intervenes
In variegated maze of mount and glen.

Ah, me! what hand can pencil guide, or pen
To follow half on which the eye dilates,
Through views more dazzling unto mortal ken
Than those whereof such things the bard relates,
Who to the awe-struck world unlock'd Elysium's gates?

XIX.

The horrid crags, by toppling convent crown'd,
The cork-trees hoar that clothe the shaggy steep
The mountain-moss by searching skies imbro'n'd,
The sunken glen, whose sunless shrubs must weep.
The tender azure of the unruffled deep,
The orange tints that gild the greenest bough,
The torrents that from cliff to valley leap,
The vine on high, the willow branch below,
Mix'd in one mighty scene, with varied beauty glow.

XX.

Then slowly climb the many-winding way,
And frequent turn to linger as you go,
From loftier rocks now loveliness surveys,
And rest yet at our "Lady's house of wo;" a

Where frugal monks their little relics show,
And sundry legends to the stranger tell:
Here impious men have punish'd been, and lo.
Deep in yon cave Honorious long did dwell, In hope to merit heaven by making earth a Hell.

XXI.

And here and there, as up the crags you spring,
Mark many rude-carved crosses near the path:
Yet deem not these devotion's offering—
These are memorials frail of murderous wrath:
For wheresoe'er the shrieking victim hath
Pour'd forth his blood beneath the assassin's knife,
Some hand erects a cross of mouldering lath;
And grove and glen with thousand such are rife
Throughout this purple land where law secures not life.2

XXII.

On sloping mounds, or in the vale beneath,
Are domes where whilome kings did make repair; But now the wild flowers round them only breathe,
Yet min' splendor still is lingering there.
And yonder towers the Prince's palace fair;
There thou too, Yathuck! England's wealthiest son,
Once form'd thy Paradise, as not aware (done,
When wanton Wealth her mightiest deeds hath
Meek Peace volup'tuous lures was ever wont to sun.

XXIII.

Here didst thou dwell, here schemes of pleasure plan,
Beneath yon mountain's ever beauteous brow.
But now, as if a thing unblest by Man.
Thy fairy dwelling is as lone as thou!
Here giant weeds a passage scarce allow
To halls deserted, portals gaping wide;
Fresh lessons to the thinking bosom, how
Vain are the pleasantries on earth supplied;
Swept into wrecks anon by Time's ungentle tide
XXXIV.

Behold the hall where chiefs were late convened! Oh! done displeasing unto British eye! With disdain hight fooleap. lo! a fiend, A little fiend that scofts incessantly, There sits in parchment robe array'd, and by His side is hung a seal and sable scroll, Where blazon'd glamer names known to chivalry, And sundry signatures adorn the roll, Whereat the Urchin points and laughs with all his soul.

XXXV.

Convention is the dwarfish demon styled That foil'd the knights in Marialva's dome: Of brains (if brains they had) he them beguiled, And turn'd a nation's shallow joy to gloom. Here Folly dash'd to earth the victor's plume, And Policy regained what arms had lost; For chiefs like ours in vain may laurels bloom! Wo to the conquering, not the conquer'd host, Since baffled Triumph droops on Lusitania's coast.

XXXVI.

And ever since that martial synod met, Britannia sickens, Cintra! at thy name; And folks in office at the mention fret, And fain would blush, if blush they could, for How will posterity the deed pechum! [shame. Will not our own and fellow-nations sneer, To view these champions cheated of their fame, By foci in fight o'erthrown, yet victors here, Where Scorn her finger points through many a coming year?

XXXVII.

So deem'd the Childe, as o'er the mountains he Did take his way in solitary guise: Sweet was the scene, yet soon he thought to flee, More restless than the swallow in the skies: Though here a while he learned to moralize, For meditation fix'd at times on him; And conscious Reason whisper'd to despire His early youth mispent in maddest whim; But as he gazed on truth his aching eyes grew dim.

XXXVIII.

To horse! to horse! he quits, for ever quits A scene of peace, though soothing to his soul; Again he rouses from his napping fits, But seeks not now the harlot and the bowl. Onward he flies, nor fix'd as yet the goal Where he shall rest him on his pilgrimage; And o'er him many changing scenes must roll Ere toll his thirst for travel can assuage, Or he shall calm his breast, or learn experience sage.

XXXIX.

Yet Mafra shall one moment claim delay, Where dwell of yore the Lusians' luckless queen; And church and court did mingle their array, And mass and revel were alter't ste seen; Lordlings and friers—ill-sorted fry I ween! But here the Babylonian whose hand hath built A dome, where flaunts she in such glorious sheen, That men forget the blood which she hath spilt, And how the knee to Pomp that loves to varnish guilt.

XXX.

O'er vales that teem with fruits, romantic hills, (Oh, that such hills upheld a free-born race!) Whereon to gaze the eye with pleasure fills, [place. Child! Harold wends through many a pleasant Though sluggards deem it but a foolish chase, And men should quit their easy chair, The toilsome way, and long, long league to trace, Oh! there is sweetness in the mountain air, And life, that bloated Ease can never hope to share.

XXXI.

More bleak to view the hills at length recede, And, less luxuriant, smoother vales extend: Immense horizon-bounded plains succeed! Far as the eye discerns, withouten end, Spain's realms appear whereon her shepherds tend Flocks, whose rich fleece right well the trader knows — Now must the pastor's arm his lambs defend: For Spain is compass'd by unfailing foes, And all must shield their all, or share Subjection's woes.

XXXII.

Where Lusitania and her sister meet, Deem ye what bounds the rival realms divide? Or ere the jealous nations of greeet, Doth Tayo interpose his mighty tide? Or dark Sicerras rise in craggy pride? Or fence of art, like Chinu's vasty wall? — Ne barrier wall, we river deep and wide, Ne horrid crags, nor mountains dark and tall, Rise like the rocks that part Hispania's land from Gaul.

XXXIII.

But these between a silver streamlet glides, And scarce a name distinguisheth the brook Though rival kingdoms press its verdant sides. Here leans the idle shepherd on his crook, And vacant on the rippling waves doth look, That peaceful still 'twixt bitterest foes, few flow; For prond each peasant as the noblest duke: Well doth the Spanish hint the difference know 'Twixt him and Lusian slave, the lowest of the low

XXXIV.

But ere the mingling bounds have far been pass'd, Dark Guadiana rolls his power along In sullen billows, murmuring and vast, So noted ancient roundelays among. Whilemore upon his banks did legions throng Of Moor and knight, in unled splendor dress Here ceased the swift their race, here sunk the The Paynim turban and the Christian crest [strong; Mix'd on the bleeding stream, by floating hosts opp'ress'd.

XXXV.

Oh, lovely Spain! renown'd romantic land! Where is that standard which Pelagio bore, When Cava's traitor-sire first call'd the band That dyed thy mountain streams with Gothic gore? Where are those bloody banners which of yore Waved o'er thy sons, victorious to the gale, And drove at last the spoilers to their shore? [gale, Red gleam'd the cross, and waned the crescent While Afric's echoes thrill'd with Moorish maroon'd wall.
XXXVI.

Teems not each ditty when the glorious tale?
Ah! such, alas! the hero's simplest fate!
When granite moulders and when records fail,
A peasant's plaint prolongs his dubious date.

Pride! bend thine eye from heaven to thine
See how the mighty shrink into a song!
[estate,
XLIII.
Can Volume, Pillar, Pile, preserve the great?
Or must thou trust Tradition's simple tongue,
Where Flattery sleeps with thee, and History does Nec wrong?

XXXVII.

Awake, ye sons of Spain! awake! advance!
Lo! Chivalry, your ancient goddess, cries;
But yields not, as of old, her thirsty lance,
Nor shakes her crimson plumage in the skies:
Now on the smoke of blazing bolts she flies,
And speaks in thunder through your eagle's roar:
In every peal she calls--"Awake! arise!"
Say, is her voice more feebler than of yore,
When her war-song was heard on Andalusia's shore?

XXXVIII.

Hark! heard you not those hoarse of dreadful note?
Sounds not the clang of conflict on the heath?
Saw ye not whom the reckoning sabre smote;
Nor saved your brethren ere they sank beneath
Tyrians and tyrants' slaves?--the fires of death
The bale-fires flash on high:--from rock to rock
Each volley tells that thousands cease to breathe,
Death rides upon the sulph'ry Siroc,
Re'd Battle stamps his foot, and nations feel the shock.

XXXIX.

Lo! where the giant on the mountain stands,
His blood-red tresses deep'ning in the sun,
With death-shot glowing in his fiery hands,
And eye that searcheth all it glares upon;
Restless it rolls, now fix'd, and now anon
Flash'd afar, and at his iron feet
Destruction causers, to mark what deeds are done;
For on this morn three potent nations meet,
To shed before his shrine the blood he deems most sweet.

XL.

By heaven, it is a splendid sight to see
(For one who hath no friend, no brother there)
Their rival scars of mix'd embroidery,
Their various arms that glitter in the air! [air
What gallant war-hounds rouse them from their
And gnash their fangs, loud yelling for the prey!
All join the chase, but few the triumph share;
T'o Grave shall bear the chiefest prize away,
And Iluove scarce for joy can number their array.

XLI.

Three hosts combine to offer sacrifice;
Three tongues prefer strange orisons on high;
Three sanguine standards flout the pale blue skies;
The shouts are France, Spain, Albion, Victory!
The foe, the victim, and the fond ally
That fights for all, but ever fights in vain,
Are met--as if at home they could not die--
To feed the crow on Talavera's plain,
And fertilize the field that each pretends to gain

XLII.

There shall they rot--Ambition's honor I fools
Yes, honor decks the turf that wraps their clay
Vain Sophistry! in these behold the tools,
The broken tools, that tyrants cast away
By myriads, when they dare to pave their way
With human hearts—to what?—a dream alone.
Can despots compass ought that hails their sway.
Or call with truth one span of earth their own,
Save that wherein at last they crumble bone by bone?

XLIII.

Oh, Albani! glorious field of grief!
As o'er thy plain the Pilgrim pride'd his steel,
Who could foresee thee, in a space so brief, [bled.
A scene where mingling foes should boast and Peace to the perish'd! may the warrior's meed
And tears of triumph their reward prolong!
Till others fall where other chieftains lead,
Thy name shall circle round the gaping throng,
And shine in worthless lays, the theme of transient song!

XLIV.

Enough of Battle's minions! let them play
Their game of lives, and barter breath for fame:
Fame that will scarce reanimate their clay,
Though thousands fall to deck some single name.
In sooth 'twere sad to thwart their noble aim [good,
Who strike, blest hirelings! for their country's
And die, that living might have proved her shame;
Perish'd, perchance, in some domestic feud,
Or in a narrower sphere wild Rapine's path pursued.

XLV.

Full swiftly Harold wends his lonely way
Where proud Sevilla triumphs unsubdued:
Yet is she free—the spoiler's wished-for prey!
Soon, soon shall Conquest's fiery foot intrude,
Blackening her lovely domes with traces rude.
Inevitable hour! 'Gainst fate to strive
Where Desolation plants her famish'd brood
Is vain, or Ilion, Tyre, might yet survive,
And Virtue vanquish all, and Murder cease to thrive.

XLVI.

But all unconscious of the coming doom,
The feast, the song, the revel here abounds;
Strange modes of merriment the hours consume,
Nor bleed these patriots with their country's wounds:
Nor here War's clarion, but Love's rebeck sounds;
Here Folly still his votaries inthralls;
And young-cicé Lew'ness walks her midnight!
Girt with the silent crimes of Capitals, [grounds
Still to the last kind Vice clings to the to'tring walls.

XLVII.

Not so the rustic—with his trembling mate
He lurks, nor casts his heavy eye afar,
Least he should view his vineyard desolate
Blasted below the dun hot breath of war
No more beneath soft Eve's consoling star
Pandango twirls his jocund castanet;
Ah, monarchs! could ye taste the mirth ye mar,
Not in the toils of Glory would ye fret.
The hoarse dull drum would sleep, and Man is happy yet!
XLVIII.

How carols now the lusty muleteer?
Of love, romance, devotion, is his lay,
As whilome he was wont the leagues to cheer,
His quick bells wildly jinging on the way?
No! as he speeded, he chants "Viva el Rey!"
And sings his song to extirpate Godoy;
The royal wittol Charles, and curse the day [boy],
When first Spain's queen beheld the black-eyed
And grim-faced Treason sprung from her adulterate joy.

XLIX.

On you long level plain, at distance crown'd
With crags, whereon those Moorish turrets rest,
Wide scattered hoof-marks dint the wounded ground;
[vest
And, weather'd by fire, the greensward's darken'd;
Tells that the foe was Andalusia's guest:
Here was the camp, the watch-dame, and the host,
Here the bold peasant storm'd the dragon's nest;
Still does he mark it with triumphant boast,
And points to yonder cliffs, which oft were won and lost.

L.

And whomsoever along the path you meet,
Bears in his cap the badge of crimson hue,
Which tells you whom to shun and whom to greet;
Wo to the man that walks in public view
Without of loyalty this token true:
Sharp is the knife, and sudden is the stroke;
And sorely would the Gallie foeman rue,
If subtle poniards, warp beneath the cloak,
Could blunt the sabre's edge, or clear the cannon's smoke.

LI.

At every turn Morena's dusky height
Sustains aloft the battery's iron load;
And, far as mortal eye can compass sight,
The mountain-howitzer, the broken road,
The bristling pallisade, the fosse o'erflow'd,
The station'd bands, the never-vacant watch,
The magazine in rocky durance stow'd,
The bolster'd steed beneath the shed of thatch,
The ball-piled pyramid, the ever-blazing match.

LII.

Portend the deeds to come—but he whose nod
Has tumbled feckler desposts from their sway,
A moment pauseth ere he lifts the rod;
A little moment deigneth to delay:
[way; Soon will his legions sweep through these their
The West must own the Scourger of the world.
Ah! Spain! how sad will be thy reckoning-day,
When soars Gaul's Vulture, with his wings unfurl'd,
And thou shalt view thy sons in crowds to Hades hurl'd.

LIII.

And must they fall? the young, the proud, the brave,
To swell one blotted Chief's unsanctified reign?
No step between submission and a grave?
The rise of raving and the fall of Spain?
And doth the Power that man adores ordain
Their doom, nor heed the suppliant's appeal?
Is all that desperate Valor acts in vain?
And Counsel sage, and patriotic zeal,
The Veteran's skill, the Youth's fire, and Manhood's heart of steel.

LIV.

Is it for this the Spanish maid, aroused,
Hangs on the willow her unstrung guitar,
And, all unseen, the anhice hath espoused,
Sung the loud song, and dared the deed of war?
And she, whom once the semblance of a sea
Appall'd, an owllet's harum child'd with dread,
Now views the column-scattering bay-net jar,
The falchion flash, and o'er the yet warm dead
Stalks with Minerva's step where Mars might quake to tread.

LV.

Ye who shall marvel when you hear her tale,
Oh! had you known her in her softer hour, [veil,
Mark'd her black eye that mocks her coal-black
Heard her light, lively tones in Lady's bower,
Seen her long locks that foil the painter's power,
Her fairy form, with more than female grace,
Scarce would you deem that Saragossa's tower
Beheld her smile in Danger's Gorgon face,
Thin the closed ranks, and lead in Glory's fearful chase.

LVI.

Her lover sinks—she sheds no ill-timed tear;
Her chief is slain—she fills his fatal post;
Her fellows flee—she checks their base career;
The foe retires—she heads the Sallying host;
Who can appease like her a lover's ghost?
Who can avenge so well a leader's fall?
What maid retrieve when man's flush'd hope is
Who hang so fiercely on the flying Gaul, [lost?
Foil'd by a woman's hand, before a batter'd wall?

LVII.

Yet are Spain's maids no race of Amazons
But form'd for all the witching arts of love
Though thus in arms they emulate her sons
And in the horrid phalanx dare to move,
'Tis but the tender fierceness of the dove,
Pecking the hand that hovers o'er her mate:
In softness as in firmness far above
Remoter females, famed for sickening prate
Her mind is nobler sure, her charms perchance as great.

LVIII.

The seal Love's dimpling finger hath impress'd
Denotes how soft that chin which bears his touch:
Her lips, whose kisses pout to leave their nest,
Did man be valiant ere he merit such:
Her glance how wildly beautiful! how much
Hath Phebus woo'd in vain to spoil her cheek,
Which glows yet smoother from his amorous clutch:
Who round the North for paler dames would seek
How poor their forms appear! how languid, wan,
And weak!

LIX.

Match me, ye climes! which poets love to laud
Match me, ye harams of the land! where now
I strike my strain, far distant, to applaud
 Beauties that ev'n a cynic must avow
Match me those Hoursies, whem ye scarce allow
To taste the gale lest Love should ride the wind,
With Spain's dark-glancing daughters—deign to
There your wise Prophet's paradise we find. [know
His black-eyed maids of Heaven, angelically kind.
CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE.

LX.
Oh, thou Parnassus! whom I now survey,
Not in the frenzy of a dreamer's eye,
Not in the fabled landscape of a lay,
But soaring snow-clad through thy native sky
In the wild pomp of mountain majesty!
What marvel if I thus essay to sing?
The humblest of thy pilgrims passing by
Would gladly woo thine Echoes with his string, Though from thy heights no more one Muse will wave her wing.

LXI.
Oft have I dream'd of Thee! whose glorious name
Who knows not, knows not man's divinest lore:
And now I view thee, 'tis, alas! with shame
That I in feeblest accents must adore.
When I recount thy worshippers of yore
'tis tremble, and can only bend the knee;
Nor raise my voice, nor vainly dare to soar,
But gaze beneath thy cloudy canopy
In silent joy to think at last I look on Thee!

LXII.
Happier in this than mightiest bards have been,
Whose fate to distant homes confined their lot,
Shall I unmov'd behold the hallowed scene,
Which others rave of, though they know it not?
Though here no more Apollo haunts his grot,
And thou, the Muses' seat, art now their grave,
Some gentle spirit still pervades the spot,
Sighs in the gale, keeps silence in the cave,
And glides with glassy foot o'er yon melodious wave.

LXIII.
Of thee hereafter.—Ev'n amidst my strain
I turn'd aside to pay my homage here;
Forgot the land, the sons, the maidens of Spain:
Her fate, to every freeborn bosom dear;
And hail'd thee! not perchance without a tear.
Now to my theme—but from thy holy haunt
Let me some remnant, some memorial bear;
Yield me one leaf of Daphne's deathless plant,
Nor let thy votary's hope be deem'd an idle vaunt.

LXIV.
But ne'er didst thou, fair Mount! when Greece was Seer round thy giant base a brighter choir, [young,
No. e'er did Delphi, when her priestess sung,
The Pythian hymn with more than mortal fire,
Behold a train more fitting to inspire
The song of love than Andalusa's maidens,
Nusret in the glowing lap of soft desire:
An! that to these were given such peaceful shades
As Greece can still bestow, though Glory fly her glades.

LXV.
Fair is proud Seville; let her country boast
Her strength, her wealth, her site of ancient
But Cadiz, rising on the distant coast, [days;^14
Calls forth a sweeter, though ignoble praise.
Ah! Vice! how soft are thy voluptuous ways!
While boyish blood is mantling who can 'scape
The fascination of thy magic gaze?
A Cherub-nydra round us dost thou gape,
And mould to every taste thy dear delusive shape.

LXVI.
When Paphos fell by time—accursed Time!
The queen who conquers all must yield to thee—
The Pleasures fled, but sought as warm a clime
And Venus, constant to her native sea,
To naught else constant, hither deign'd to fly;
And fix'd her shrine within these walls of white
Though not to one dome circumscribes she
Her worship, but, devoted to her rite,
A thousand altars rise, for ever blazing bright.

LXVII.
From morn till night, from night till startled Morn
Peeps blushing on the revel's laughing crew,
The song is heard, the rosy garment worn,
Devices quaint, and frolics ever new,
Tread on each other's kibes. A long adieu
He bids to sober joy that here sojourns:
Nought interrupts the riot, though in lieu
Of true devotion monkish incense burns,
And love and prayer unite, or rule the hour by turns.

LXVIII.
The Sabbath comes, a day of blessed rest;
What hallows it upon this Christian shore?
Lo! it is sacred to a solemn feast;
Hark! heard you not the forest monarch's roar?
Crashing the lance, he snuffs the spouting gore
Of man and steed, o'erthrown beneath his horn,
The throng'd arena shakes with shouts for more;
Yells the mad crowd o'er entrails fresh'storn,
Nor shrinks the female eye, nor ev'n affects to mourn.

LXIX.
The seventh day this; the jubilee of man.
London! right well thou know'st the day of prayer:
Then thy spruce citizen, wash'dl'artisan,
And smug apprentice gulp their weekly air;
Thy coach of Hackney, whiskey, one-horse chal,
And humblest gig through sundry suburbs whirl,
To Hampstead, Brentford, Harrow make repair;
Till the tired jade the wheel forgets to hurl,
Provoking effusive gibe from each pedestrian chal.

LXX.
Some o'er thy Thames row the ribbon'd fair,
Others along the safer turnpike fly;
Some Richmond-hill ascend, some scud to Ware,
And many to the steep of Highgate lie.
Ask ye, Boetian shades! the reason why? [15
'Tis to the worship of the solemn Horn,
Grasp'd in the holy hand of Mystery, [swara,
In whose dread name both men and maidens are
And consecrate the oath with draught, and dance
'till morn.

LXXI.
All have their fooleries—not unlike are thine,
Fair Cadiz, rising o'er the dark blue sea!
Soon as the matin bell proclaimeth nine,
Thy saint adorers count the rosary:
Much is the Virgin teased to shrieve them free
(Well do I ween the only virgin there)
From crimes as numerous as her beadsmen be;
Then to the crowded circus forth they fare:
Young, old, high, low, at once the same diversion share.
LXXII.
The lists are c'ed, the sparsicus area clear'd,
Thousands on thousands piled are seatd round;
Long ere the first loud trumpet's note is heard,
Ne vacant space for lated wight is found:
Here dons, grandees, but chiefly dames abound,
Skill'd in the ogie of a roguish eye,
Yet ever well inclined to heal the wound;
N'ne through their cold disdain are doom'd to die,
As moonstruck bards complain, by Love's sad archery.

LXXIII.
Hush'd is the din of tongues—on gallant steeds,
With milk-white crest, gold-spur, and light-poss'd
Four cavaliers prepare for venturous deeds, [lance,
And lowly bending to the lists advance;
Rich are their scars, their chargers fealty prance:
If in the dangerous game they shine to-day,
The crowd's loud shout and ladies' lovely glance,
Best prize of better acts, they bear away,
And all that kings or chiefs o'er gain their toils repay.

LXXIV.
In costly sheen and gaudy cloak array'd,
But all afoot, the light-thing'd Matadore
Stands in the centre, eager to invade
The lord of loving herds; but not before
The ground, with cautious tread, is traversed o'er,
Lost aught unseen should lurk to thwart his speeds;
His arms a dart, he fights alfo'f, nor more
Can man achieve without the friendly stead—
Alas! too off condemn'd for him to bear and bleed.

LXXV.
Thrice sounds the clarion; lo! the signal falls,
The den expands, and Expectation mute
Gapes round the silent circle's peopled walls.
Bonds with one lashing spring the mighty brute,
And, wildly staring, spurns, with sounding foot,
The sand, nor blindly rushes on his foe;
Here, there, he points his threatening front, to suit
His first attack, wide waving to and fro
His angry tail; red rolls his eye's dilated glow.

LXXVI.
Sudden he stops; his eye is fix'd away
Away, thou heedless boy! prepare the spear:
Now to the time, to perish, or display;
The skill that yet may check his mad career.
With well-timed croupe the nimble coursers veer;
On foams the bull, but not unsucced he goes;
Streams from his flank the crimson torrent clear:
He flies, he wheels, distracted with his throes;
Dart follows dart; lance, lance; loud lowlings speak his woes.

LXXVII.
Aga.; he comes; nor dart nor lance avail,
Nor the wild plunging of the tortured horse;
Though man, and man's avenging arms assail,
Vain are his weapons, vainer is his force.
One gallant steed is stretch'd a mangled corse;
Another, hideous sight! unseam'd appears,
His gory chest unveils life's panting source;
Though death-struck, still his feeble frame he bears,
Staggering, but stemming all, his lord unharmed he bears.

LXXVIII.
Foil'd, bleeding, breathless, furious to the 'ast,
'Full in the centre stands the bull at bay,
'Mid wounds, and clinging darts, and lance and bras
And foes disabled in the brutal fray;
And now the Matadores around him play.
Shake the red cloak, and pose the ready brand
Once more through all he bursts his thundering way
Vain rage! the mantle quits the everlast hand,
Wraps his fierce eye—'tis past—i.e. sunk upon the sand!

LXXIX.
Where his vast neck just mingles with the spine
Shedeth in his form the deadly weapon lies.
He stops—he starts—disdaining to decline:
Slowly he falls, amidst triumphant cries,
Without a groan, without a struggle, dies.
The decorated car appears—on high
The corse is piled—sweet sight for vulgar eyes—
Four steeds that spurn the rein, as swift as shy,
Hurl the dark bulk along, scarce scorn in dashing by

LXXX.
Such the ungenteel sport that oft invites
The Spanish maid, and cheers the Spanish swain
Nurtured in blood betimes, his heart delights
In vengeance, gloating on another's pain.
What private feuds the troubled village stain!
Though now one phalanx'd host should meet the Enough, alas! in humble homes remain,
[foe
'To meditate 'gainst friends the secret blow,
For some slight cause of wrath, whence life's warm stream must flow.

LXXXI.
But Jealousy has fled: his bars, his bolts,
His wither'd sentinel, Dacuma sage!
And all whereat the generous soul revolts,
Which the stern dotard deem'd he could encage,
Have pass'd to darkness with: the vanish'd age.
Who late so free as Spanish girls were seen,
(Ere War uprose in his volumic rage.)
With braided tresses bounding o'er the green,
While on the gay dance shone Night's lover-loving Queen?

LXXXII.
Oh! many a time, and oft, had Harold loved,
Or dream'd he loved, since Rapture is a dream;
But now his wayward bosom was unmoved,
For not yet had he drunk of Letha's stream,
And lately had he learn'd with truth to deem
Love has no gift so grateful as his wings;
How fair, how young, how soft soe'er he seem,
Full from the fount of Joy's delicious springs
Some bitter o'er the flowers its bubbling venoms flings.16

LXXXIII.
Yet to the beauteous form he was not blind,
Though now it mov'd him as it moves the wise,
Not that Philosophy on such a mind
E'er deign'd to bend her chastely-awful eyes.
But Passion raves itself to rest, or flies;
And Vice, that digs her own voluptuous tomb,
Had buried long his hopes, ne more to rise:
Pleasure's pall'd victim! life-abhiring gloom
Wrote on his faded brow curs'd Cain's unresting doom.
LXXXIV.

Still he beheld, nor mingled with the throng;
But view'd them not with misanthropic hate:
Fain would he now have joined the dance, the song,
But who may smile that sinks beneath his fate?
Nought that he saw his sadness could abate:
Yet once he struggled 'gainst the demon's sway,
And as in Beauty's bower he pensive sate,
Pour'd forth this unpremeditated lay
To charms as fair as those that soothed his happier day.

TO INEZ.

Nay, smile not at my sullen brow;
Alas! I cannot smile again:
Yet Heaven avert that ever thou
Shouldst weep, and haply weep in vain.

And dost thou ask, what secret wo
I bear, corroding joy and youth?
And wilt thou vainly seek to know
A pang, ev'n thou must fail to sooth?

3.

It is not love, it is not hate,
Nor low Ambition's honors lost,
That bids me loathe my present state,
And fly from all I prized the most.

It is that weariness which springs
From all I meet, or hear, or see;
To me no pleasure Beauty brings;
Thine eyes have scarce a charm for me.

5.

It is that settled, ceaseless gloom
The fabled Hebrew wanderer bore;
That will not look beyond the tomb,
But cannot hope for rest before.

What Exile from himself can flee?
To Zones, though more and more remote,
Still, still pursues, where'er I be,
The blight of life—the demon Thought.

Ye! others rapt in pleasure seem,
And taste of all that I forsake;
Oh! may they still of transport dream,
And ne'er, at least like me, awake!

Through many a clime 'tis mine to go,
With many a retrospection curst;
And all my sojourn is to know,
Whate'er betides, I've known the worst.

What is that worst? Nay do not ask—
In pity from the search forbear:
Smile on—nor venture to unmask
Man's heart, and view the Hell that's there.

LXXXV.

Adieu, fair Cadiz! yea, a long adieu!
Who may forget how well thy walls have stood?
When all were changing thou alone wast true
First to be free and last to be subdu'd.
And if amidst a scene, a shock so rude,
Some native blood was seen thy streets to dye;
A traitor only fell beneath the feud:
Here all were noble, save Nobility;
None hugg'd a conqueror's chain, save fallen Chivalry!

LXXXVI.

Such be the sons of Spain, and strange her fates.
They fight for freedom who were never free;
A Kingless people for a nerveless state,
Her vassals combat when their chieftains flee,
True to the veriest slaves of Treachery:
Fond of a land which gave them nought but life,
Pride points the path that leads to Liberty;
Back to the struggle, baffled in the strife,
War, war is still the cry, "War even to the knife!"

LXXXVII.

Ye, who would more of Spain and Spaniards know,
Go, read whate'er is writ of bloodiest strife:
Whate'er keen Vengeance urged on foreign foe,
Can act, is acting there against man's life:
From flashing scimitar to secret knife,
War mouldeth there each weapon to his need:
So may he guard the sister and the wife,
So may he make each curst oppressor bleed,
So may such foes deserve the most remorseless deed.

LXXXVIII.

Flows there a tear of pity for the dead?
Look o'er the ravage of the rocking plain;
Look on the hands with female slaughter red,
Then to the dogs resign the unburied slain,
Then to the vulture let each corse remain:
Albeit unworthy of the prey-Bird's maw,
Let their bleach'd bones, and blood's unbleaching
Long mark the battle-field with hideous awe:
Thus only may our sons conceive the scenes we saw!

LXXXIX.

Nor yet, alas! the dreadful work is done,
Fresh legions pour adown the Pyreneen:
It deepens still, the work is scarce begun,
Nor mortal eye the distant end foresee:
Fall'n nations gaze on Spain; if freed, she frees
More than her fell Pizarros once enchain'd:
Strange retribution! now Columbia's case
Repairs the wrongs that Quito's sons sustain'd;
While o'er the parent-clime prows Murder un-restrain'd.

XC.

Not all the blood at Talavera shed,
Not all the marvels of Barossa's fight,
Not Albueara lavish of the dead,
Have won for Spain her well-asserted right.
When shall her Olive-Branch be free from blight;
When shall she breathe her from the blushing toil;
How many a doubtful day shall sink in night,
Ere the Frank robber turn him from his spoil,
And Freedom's stranger-tree grow native of the soil.
XCI.

And thou, my friend!—since unavailing wo
Burst from my heart, and mingles with the strain—
Had the sword laid thee with the mighty low,
Pride might forbid ev'n Friendship to complain;
But thus unshrou'd to descend in vain,
By all forgotten, save the lonely breast,
And mix unbleeding with the boasted slain,
While Glory crowns so many a meaner crest!

What hadst thou done to sink so peacefully to rest?

XCII.

Oh, known the earliest, and esteem'd the most!
Dear to a heart when nought was left so dear!
Though to my hopeless days for ever lost,
In dreams deny me not to see thee here!
And Morn in secret shall renew the tear
Of Consciousness awaking to her woes,
And Fancy hover o'er thy bloodless bier,
Till my frail frame return to whence it rose,
And mourn'd and mourner lie united in repose.

XCVIII.

Here is one yet of Harold's pilgrimage:
Ye who of him may further seek to know,
Shall find some tidings in a future page,
If he that rhymeth now may scribble moe.
Is this too much? stern Critic! say not so:
Patience! and ye shall hear what he beheld
In other lands, where he was doom'd to go:
Lands that contain the monuments of Eld,
Mere Greece and Grecian arts by barbarous hands we quell'd.

CANTO II.

I.

COME, blue-eyed maid of heaven!—but thou, alas,
Didst never yet one mortal song inspire—
Goddess of Wisdom! here thy temple was,
And is, despite of war and wasting fire,
And years, that bade thy worship to expire;
But worse than steel, and flame, and ages slow,
Is the dread sceptre and dominion dire
Of men who never felt the sacred glow
That thoughts of thee and thine on polish'd breasts bestow.

II.

Ancient of days! august Athena! where,
Where are thy men of might? thy grand in soul?
Gone, glistening through the dream of things that
First in the race that led to Glory's goal were:
They won, and pass'd away—is this the whole?
A schoolboy's tale, the wonder of an hour
The warrior's weapon and the sophists stole
Are sought in vain, and o'er each mouldering tower.

O'er with the mist of years, gray flits the shade of Power.

III.

Son of the morning, rise! approach ye here,
Come—but most leat not yeanceless urn:
Look on this spot—a nation's sepulchre!
Abode of gods, whose shrines no longer burn.
Even gods must yield—religions take their turn
'Twas Jove's—'tis Mahomet's—and other creeds
Will rise with other years, till man shall learn
Vainly his incense soars, his victim feeds;
Poor child of Doubt and Death, whose hope is built
On reeds.

IV.

Bound to the earth, he lifts his eye to heaven—
Is't not enough, unhappy thing! to know
Thou art? Is this a boon so kindly given,
That being, thou would'st be again, and go
Thou know'st not, reck'st not to what region,
On earth no more, but mingled with the skies?
Still wilt thou dream on future joy and wo?
Regard and weigh you dust before it flies;
That little urn saith more than thousand homilies.

V.

Or burst the vanish'd Hero's lofty mound;
Far on the solitary shore he sleeps;
He fell, and falling nations mourn'd around;
But now not one of saddening thousands weeps,
Nor war-like worshipper his vigil keeps.
Where demi-gods appear'd, as records tell,
Remove you scull from out the scatter'd heaps:
Is that a temple where a God may dwell?
Why ev'n the worm at last disdains her shatter'd cell?

VI.

Look on its broken arch, its ruin'd wall,
Its chambers desolate, and portals foul;
Yes, this was once Ambition's airy hall,
The dome of Thought, the palace of the Soul;
Behold through each eyeless, lusterless hole,
The gay recess of Wisdom and of Wit,
And Passion's host, that never brook'd control;
Can all saint, sage, or sophist ever writ,
People this lonely tower, this tenement refit?

VII.

Voll didst thou speak, Athena's wisest son!
"All that we know, nothing can be known."
Why should we shrink from what we cannot shun?
Each has his pang, but feeble sufferers groan
With brain-born dreams of evil all their own.
Pursue what Chance or Fate proclaimeth best;
Peace waits us on the shores of Acheron:
There no forced banquet claims the sated guest,
But Silence spreads the couch of ever welcome rest.

VIII.

Yet if, as holiest men have deem'd, there be
A land of souls beyond that sable shore,
To shun the doctrine of the Sadducee
And sophists, madly vain of dubious lore;
How sweet it were in concert to adore
With those who made our mortal labors bright!
To hear each voice we fear'd to hear no more!
Behold each mighty shade reveal'd to sight,
The Bactrian, Samian sage, and all who taught the right.
IX.

There, thou!—whose love and life together fled,
Mourning left me here to love and live in vain—
Twined with my heart, and can I deem thee dead
When busy Memory flashes on my brain?
Well—I will dream that we may meet again,
And woo the vision to my vacant breast;
If aught of young Remembrance then remain,
Be as it may Futility's behest.

X.

Here let me sit upon this massy stone,
The marble column's yet unshaken base;
Here, son of Saturn! was thy fav'rite throne.

Mightiest of many such! hence let me trace
The latent grandeur of thy dwelling-place.
It may not be; nor ev'n can Fancy's eye
Restore what Time hath labored to deface.
Yet these proud pillars claim no passing sigh:
Unmoved the Moslem sits, the light Greek carols by.

XI.

But who, of all the plunderers of yon fame
On high, where Pallas linger'd, loath to see
The latest relic of her ancient reign?
The last, the worst, dull spoiler, who was he?
Blush, Caledonia! such thy son could be!
England! I joy no child he was of thine: [free;
Thy free-born men should spare what once was
Yet they could violate each saddening shrine,
And hear these altars o'er the long-rebellant brine.

XII.

But most the modern Pict's ignoble boast,
To rive what Goth, and Turk, and Time hath
Cold as the crags upon his native coast, [spared;
His mind as barren and his heart as hard,
Is he whose head conceived, whose hand prepared
Aught to displace Athena's poor remains.
Her sons too weak the sacred shrine to guard,
Yet felt some portion of their mother's pains?
And never knew, till then, the weight of Despot's chains.

XIII.

What! shall it e'er be said by British tongue,
Albion was happy in Athena's tears?
Though in thy name the slaves her bosom wrung.
Tel not the deed to blushing Europe's ears;
The ocean queen, the free Britannia, bears
The last poor plunder from a bleeding land;
Yes, she, whose gen'rous aid her name endears,
Tore down those remnants with a harpy's hand,
Which envious Elb forbore, and tyrants left to stand.

XIV.

Where was thine Ægis, Pallas, that appall'd
Stern Alaric and Havoc on their way?
Where Pelus' son? whom Hell in vain enthral'd,
His shades from Hades upon that dread day
Bursting to light in terrible array!
What! could not Pluto spare the chief once more,
To scare a second robber from his prey?
Idly he wander'd on the Stygian shore,
Nor now preserved the walls he loved to shield

XV.

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage.

Cold is the heart, fair Greece! that looks n thee;
Nor feels as lovers o'er the dust they loved.
Dull is the eye that will not weep to see
Thy walls defaced, thy mouldering shrines ro
By British hands, which it had best behove
To guard those relics ne'er to be restored.
Curst be the hour when from their isle they rove,
And once again thy hapless bosom grieve!
And snatch'd thy shrinking Gods to northern climes

XVI.

But where is Harold? shall I then forget
To urge the gloomy wanderer o'er the wave?
Little reck'd he of all that men regret;
No loved one now in feign'd lament could rave;
No friend the parting hand extended gave,
Ere the cold stranger pass'd to other climes:
Hard is his heart whom charms may not enslave,
But Harold felt not as in other times,
And left without a sigh the land of war and crimes.

XVII.

He that has sail'd upon the dark blue sea
Has view'd at times, I ween, a full fair sight;
When the fresh breeze is fair as breeze may be,
The white sail set, the gallant frigate tight
Masts, spires, and strand retiring to the right,
The glorious main expanding o'er the bow,
The convoy spread like wild swans in their flight
The dullest sailer wearing bravely now,
So gaily curl the waves before each dashing prow

XVIII.

And oh, the little warlike world within!
The well-reved guns, the netted canopy
The hoarse command, the busy humming din,
When, at a word, the tops are marr'd on high;
Hark to the Boatswain's call, the cheering cry!
While through the seaman's hand the tackle glides;
Or schoolboy Midshipman, that, standing by,
Strains his shrill pipe as good or ill betides,
And well the docile crew that skillful urchins guides.

XIX.

White is the glassy deck, without a stain,
Where on the watch the said Lieutenant walks;
Look on that part which sacred doth remain
For the lone chieftain, who majestic stalks,
Silent and fear'd by all—not oft he talks
With aught beneath him, if he would preserve
That strict restraint, which broken, ever balks,
Conquest and Fame: but Britons rarely swerve
From law, however stern, which tends their strength to nerve.

XX.

Blow! swiftly blow, thou keel-compelling gale!
Till the broad sun withdrew his lessening ray;
Then must the pennant-bearer slacken sail,
That lagging barks may make their lazy way.
Ah! grievance sore, and listless dull delay,
To waste on sluggish hulks the sweetest breeze!
What leagues are lost, before the dawn of day,
Thus loitering pensive on the willing seas,
The flapping sail haul'd down to halt for logs like these!
The moon is up by Heaven, a lovely eve!
Long streams of light o'er dancing waves expand;
Now lads on shore may sigh, and maidens believe.
Such be our fate when we return to land!
Meantime, some rude Arion's restless hand
Wakes the briny harmony that sailors love;
A circle there of merry listeners stand,
Or to some well-known measure feastily move,
Thoughtless, as if on shore they still were free to rove.

Through Calpe's straits survey the steepy shore;
Europe and Afric on each other gaze!
Lands of the dark-eyed Maid and dusky Moor
Alike beheld beneath pale Hecate's blaze;
How softly on the Spanish shore she plays,
Disclosing rock, and slope, and forest brown,
Distinct, though darkening with her waning phase;
But Mauritania's giant-shadows frown.

From mountain cliff to coast descending sombre town.

'Tis night, when Meditation bids us feel
We once have loved, though love is at end.
The heart, lone mourner of its balled seal,
Though friendless now, will dream it had a friend.
Who with the weight of years would wish to bend?
When Youth itself survives young Love and Joy?
Ah! when mingling souls forget to blend,
Death hath but little left him to destroy!
Ah! happy years! once more who would not be a boy?

Thus bending o'er the vessel's laving side,
To gaze on Dian's wave reflected sphere,
The soul forgets her schemes of Iope and Pride.
And flies unconscious o'er each backward year.
None are so desolate but something dear,
Dearer than self, possesses or possess'd
A thought, and claims the homage of a tear;
A flashing pang! of which the weary breast
Would still, albeit in vain, the heavy heart divest.

To sit on rocks, to muse o'er flood and fell,
To slowly trace the forest's shady scene,
Where things that own not man's dominion dwell,
And mortal foot hath ne'er or rarely been;
To climb the trackless mountain all unseen,
With the wild flock that never needs a fold;
Alone o'er steeps and foaming falls to lean;
This is not solitude; 'tis but to hold
Converse with Nature's charms, and view her store unroll'd.

But midst the crowd, the hum, the shock of men,
To tear, to see, to feel, and to possess,
And roam along, the world's tired denizen,
With none who bless us, none whom we can bless.
Minions of splendor, shrinking from distress!
None that, with kindred consciousness ended,
If we were not, would seem to smile the less
Of all that flatter'd, follow'd, sought, and sned:
This is to be alone; this, this is solitude!

More blest the life of godly Eremita,
Such as on lonely Athos may be seen,
Watching at eve upon the giant height
Which looks o'er waves so blue, skies so serene
That he who there at such an hour hath been
Will wistful linger on that hallowed spot;
Then slowly tear him from the witching scene,
Sigh forth one wish that such had been his lot,
Then turn to hate a world he had almost forgot.

Pass we the long, unvarying course, the track
Oft trod, that never leaves a trace behind;
Pass we the calm, the gale, the change, the tack
And each well known caprice of wave and wind;
Pass we the joys and sorrows sailors find,
Coop'd in their winged sea-girt citadel;
The soul, the fair, the contrary, the kind,
As breezes rise and fall and billows swell,
Till on some jocund morn —io, land! and all is well.

But not in silence pass Calypso's isles.
The sister tenants of the middle deep;
There for the weary still a haven smiles,
Though the fair goddess long hath ceased to weep
And o'er her cliffs a fruitless watch to keep
For him who dared prefer a mortal bride:
Here, too, his boy essay'd the dreadful leap
Stern Mentor urged from high to yonder tide;
While thus of both bereft, the nymph-queen don'd Sigh'd.

Her reign is past, her gentle glories gone;
But trust not this; too easy youth, beware!
A mortal sovereign holds her dangerous throne,
And thou may'st find a new Calypso there.
Sweet Florence! could another ever share
This wayward, loveless heart; it would be thine
But check'd by every tie, I may not dare
To cast a worthless offering at thy shrine,
Nor ask so dear a breast to feel one pang for mine.

Thus Harold deem'd, as on that lady's eye
He look'd, and met its beam without a thought,
Save Admiration glancing harmless by:
Love kept aloof, albeit not far remote,
Who knew his votary often lost and caught,
But knew him as his worshipper no more,
And ne'er again the boy his bosom sought;
Since now he vainly urged him to adore,
Well deem'd the little God his ancient sway was o'er.

Fair Florence found, in sooth with some amaze
One who, 'twas said, still sigh'd to all he saw,
Withstand, unmoved, the lustre of her gaze.
Which others hail'd with real or mimic awe;
Their hope, their doom, their punishment, their plea
All that gay Beauty from her bondmen claims;
And much she marvelli'd that a youth so raw
Nor felt, nor feign'd at least, the oft-told flames,
Which, though sometimes they frown'd, yet rarely anger daimes.
XXXIII.
Little knew she that seeming marble heart,
Now mask'd in silence or withheld by pride,
Was not unskillful in the spoiler's art,
And spread its smears licentious far and wide;
Nor from the base pursuit had turn'd aside,
As long as aught was worthy to pursue:
But Harold on such arts no more relish'd;
And had he doted on those eyes so blue,
Yet never would he join the lover's whining crew.

XXXIV.
Not much he kens, I ween, of woman's breast,
Who thinks that wanton thing is won by sighs;
What careth she for hearts when once possess'd?
Do proper homage to thine idol's eyes;
But not too humbly, or she will despise
Thee and thy suit, though told in moving tropes:
Disguise ev'n tenderness, if thou art wise;
Brisk confidence still best with woman copes;
Fique her and sooth in turn, soon Passion crowns thy hopes.

XXXV.
Tis an old lesson; Time approves it true,
And those who know it best, deplore it most;
When all is won that all desire to woo,
The pultry prize is hardly worth the cost;
Youth wasted, minds degraded, honor lost,
These are thy fruits, successful Passion! these!
If, kindly cruel, early Hope is crost,
Still to the last it rankles, a disease,
Not to be cured when Love itself forgets to please.

XXXVI.
Away! nor let me loiter in thy song,
For we have many a mountain-path to tread,
And many a varied shore to sail along,
By pensive Sadness, not by Fiction, led—
Climes, fair withal as ever mortal head
 Imagined in its little schemes of thought;
Or e'er in new Utopian were read,
To teach man what he might be, or he ought;
If that corrupted thing could ever such be taught.

XXXVII.
Dear Nature is the kindest mother still,
Though alway changing, in her aspect mild;
From her base bosom let me take my fill,
Her never-wean'd, though not her favor'd child.
Oh! she is fairest in her features wild,
Where nothing polish'd dares pollute her path;
To me by day or night she ever smiled,
Though I have mark'd her when none other hath,
And sought her more and more, and loved her best in wrath.

XXXVIII.
Land of Albania! where Iskander rose,
Theme of the young, and beacon of the wise,
And he his namesake, whose oft-baffled foes
Shrank from his deeds of chivalrous emprise:
Land of Albania! let me bend mine eyes
On thee, thou rugged nurse of savage men!
The Cross descends, thy minarets arise,
And the pale crescent sparkles in the glen,
Through many a cypress grove within each city's ken.

XXXIX.
Childe Harold sail'd, and pass'd the barren spot
Where said Penelope o'erlook'd the wave;
And onward view'd the mount, not yet forgot,
The lovers refuge, and the Lesbian's grave.
Dark Sappho! could not verse immortal save
That breast imbued with such imm.ortal fire?
Could she not live who life eternal gave?
If life eternal may await the lyre,
That only Heaven to which Earth's children may aspire.

XL.
'Twas on a Grecian autumn's gentle eve
Childe Harold sail'd Lucedia's Cape afar;
A spot he long'd to see, nor cared to 'save
Oft did he mark the scenes of vanish'd war,
Actium, Lepanto, fatal Trafalgar; 13
Mark them unmoved, for he would not delight
(Born beneath some remote inglorious star)
In themes of bloody fray, or gallant fight,
But loathed the brave's trade, and laughed at martial wight.

XLI.
But when he saw the evening star above
Lucedia's far-projecting rock of wo,
And sail'd the last resort of fruitless love,14
He felt, or deem'd he felt, no common glow;
And as the stately vessel glided slow
Beneath the shadow of that ancient mount,
He watch'd the billows' melancholy flow,
And, sunk albeit in thought as he was wont,
More placid seem'd his eye, and smooth his pall'd front.

XLII.
Morn dawns; and with it storn Albania's hills
Dark Sul's rocks, and Pindus' inland peak,
Robed half in mist, bedeck'd with snowy rills,
Arrayed in many a dun and purple streak,
Arose; and, as the clouds along them break,
Disclose the dwelling of the mountaineer:
Here roams the wolf, the eagle whets his beak,
Birds, beasts of prey, and wilder men appear,
And gathering storms around convulse the closing year.

XLIII.
Now Harold felt himself at length alone,
And bade to Christian tongues a long adieu;
Now he adventured on a shore unknown,
Which all admire, but many dread to view; [few
His breast was arm'd 'gainst fate, his wants were Peril he sought not, but ne'er shrank to meet;
The scene was savage, but the scene was new;
This made the ceaseless toil of travel sweet,
Beat back keen winter's blast, and welcomed soon
mer's heat.

XLIV.
Here the red cross, for still the cross is here,
Though sadly scoff'd at by the circumcised,
Forgets that pride to pamper'd priesthood dear,
Churchman and votary alike despised.
Foul Superstition! howso'er disguised,
Idol, saint, virgin, prophet, crescent, cross,
For whatsoever symbol thou art prized,
Thou sacerdotal gain, but general loss!
Who from true worship's gold can separate thy dross?
XLV.

Ambracia's gulf behold, where once was lost
A world for woman, lovely, harmless thing!
In yonder rippling bay, their naval host
Did many a Roman chief and Asian king
To doubtful conflict, certain slaughter bring:
Look where the second Caesar's trophies rose!
Now, like the hands that round'd them, withering:
Imperial anarchs, doubling human woes!

Soul! was thy globe ordain'd for such to win and lose?

XLVI.

From the dark barriers of that rugged clime,
Ev'n to the centre of Illyria's vale,
Childe Harold pass'd o'er many a mount sublime,
Through lands scarce noticed in historic tales;
Yet in famed Attica such lovely dales
Are rarely seen; nor can fair Tempe boast
A charm they know not; loved Parnassus falls,
Though classic ground, and consecrated most,
To match some spots that lurk within this lowering coast.

XLVII.

He pass'd bleak Pindus, Acherusia's lake,
And left the primal city of the land,
And onwards did his further journey take
To greet Albania's chief, whose dread command
Is lawless law; for with a bloody hand
He sways a nation, turbulent and bold;
Yet here and there some daring mountain band
Disdain his power, and from their rocky hold
Hurl their defiance far, nor yield, unless to gold.

XLVIII.

Monastic Zitza! from thy shady brow,
Though small, but favor'd spot of holy ground!
Where'er we gaze, around, above, below,
What rainbow tints, what magic charms are found!
Rock, river, forest, mountain, all abound,
And bluest skies that harmonize the whole:
Beneath, the distant torrent's rushing sound
Tells where the volumed cataract doth roll
Between those hanging rocks, that shock yet please the soul.

XLIX.

Amidst the grove that crowns yon tufted hill,
Which, were it not for many a mountain nigh
Rising in lofty ranks, and loftier still,
Might well itself be deemed of dignity,
The convent's white walls glisten fair on high:
Here dwells the caloyer, n or rude is he,
Nor niggard of his cheer; the passer by
Is welcome still; nor heedless will he fce
From hence, if he delight kind Nature's sheen to see.

L.

Here in the sultriest season let him rest,
Fresh is the green beneath those aged trees;
Here winds of gentlest wing will fan his breast,
From heaven itself he may inhale the breeze:
The plain is far beneath—oh! let him seize
Pure pleasure while he can; the scorching ray
Here pierceth not, impregnate with disease;
Then let his length the loitering pilgrim lay,
And gaze, untired, the morn, the noon, the eve away.

L.

Dusky and huge, enlarging on the sight,
Nature's volcanic amphitheatre.
Chimera's alps extend from left to right;
Beneath, a living valley seems to stir;
Flocks play, trees wave, streams flow, the mountain
Nodding above: behold black Acheron!
Once consecrated to the sepulchre,
Pluto! if this be hell I look upon

Close shamed Elysium's gates, my shade shall seek for none!

LII.

Ne city's towers pollute the lovely view;
Unseen is Yanina, though not remote,
Veil'd by the screen of hills; here men are few,
Scanty the hamlet, rare the lonely cot;
But peering down each precipice, the goat
Browseth; and, pensive o'er his scatter'd flock,
The little shepherd in his white capote.
Doth lean his boyish form along the rock,
Or in his cave awaits the tempest's short-lived shock

LIII.

Oh! where, Dodona! is thine aged grove,
Prophetic fount, and oracle divine?
What valley echo'd the response or Jove?
What trace remaineth of the Thunderer's shrine?
All, all forgotten—and shall man repine
That his frail bonds to fleeting life are broke?
Cease, fool! the fate of Gods may well be thine.
Wouldst thou survive the marble or the oak?
When nations, tongues, and worlds must sink beneath the stroke!

LIV.

Epirus' bounds recede, and mountains fall,
Tired of up-gazing still, the wearied eye
Reposes gladly on as smooth a vale,
As ever Spring yelad in grassy die;
Ev'n on a plain no humble beauties lie,
Where some bold river breaks the long expanse,
And woods along the banks are waving high,
Whose shadows in the glassy waters dance,
Or with the moonbeam sleep in midnight's solemn trance.

LV.

The sun had sunk behind vast Temerit,
And Laos wide and fierce came roaring by;
The shades of wonted night were gathering yet,
When, down the steep banks winding warily,
Childe Harold saw, like meteors in the sky,
The glittering minarets of Top telaen,
Whose walls o'erlook the stream; and drawing
He heard the busy hum of warrior men
Swelling the breeze that sigh'd along the length-ing gle.

LVI.

He pass'd the sacred Haram's silent tower,
And underneath the wide o'erarching gate
Survey'd the dwelling of this chief of power,
Where all around proclaims his high estate.
Amidst no common pomp the despot sate,
While busy preparation shook the court,
Slaves, eunuchs, soldiers, guests, and spects wait
Within, a palace, and without, a fort:
Here men of every clime appear to make resort.
LVII.

lightly caparison'd, a ready row
Of armed horse, and many a warlike store,
Circled the wide extending court below;
Above, strange groups adorn'd the corridor;
And ofttimes through the area's echoing door
Some high-capp'd Tartar spurr'd his steed away:
The Turk, the Greek, the Albanian, and the Moor,
Here mingled in their many-hued array,
While the deep war-drum's sound announced the close of day.

LVIII.

The wild Albanian kirtled to his knee,
With shawl-girt head and ornamented gun,
And gold-embroider'd garments, fair to see;
The crimson-seared men of Macedon;
The Delhi with his cap of terror on,
And crooked glaive: the lively, supple Greek,
And swarthy Nubia's mutilated son;
The bearded Turk that rarely deigns to speak,
Master of all around, too potent to be meek,

LIX.

Are mix'd conspicuous: some recline in groups,
Scanning the motley scene that varies round;
There some grave Moslem to devotion stoops,
And some that smoke, and some that play, are found;
Here the Albanian proudly treads the ground;
Half whispering there the Greek is heard to prate;
Hark! from the mosque the nightly solemn sound,
The Muezzin's call doth shake the minaret,
There is no god but God:—to prayer—lo! God is great!

LX.

Just at this season Ramazani's fast
Through the long day its penance did maintain:
But when the lingering twilight hour was past,
Revel and feast assumed the rule again:
Now all was bustle, and the menial train
Prepared and spread the plenteous board within;
The vacant gallery now seem'd made in vain,
But from the chambers came the mingling din,
As page and slave anon were passing out and in.

LXI.

Here woman's voice is never heard: apart,
And scarce permitted, guarded, veild, to move,
She yields to one her person and her heart,
Tamed to her cage, nor feels a wish to rove;
For, not unhappy in her master's love,
And joyful in a mother's gentlest cares,
Best cares! all other feelings far above!
Herself more sweetly rears the babe she bears,
Who never quits the breast, no measurer passion shares.

LXII.

In marble-paved pavilion, where a spring
Of living water from the centre rose,
Whose bubbling did a genial freshness fling,
And soft volupitous couches breathed repose,
All reclined, a man of war and woes;
Yet in his lineaments ye cannot trace,
While Gentleness her milder radiance throws
Along that aged venerable face,
The deeds that lurk beneath, and stain him with disgrace.

LXIII.

It is not that you hoary lengthening beard
Ill suits the passions which belong to youth;
Love conquers age—so Hasz hath aver'd,
So sings the Teian, and he sings in sooth—
But crimes that scorn the tender voice of Ruth,
Beseeing all men ill, but most the man
In years, have mark'd him with a tiger's tooth;
Blood follows blood, and, through their mortal span,
In bloodlier acts conclude those who 'with blood began.

LXIV.

Mid many things most new to ear and eye
The pilgrim rested here his weary feet,
And gazed around on Moslem luxury,
Till quickly weary'd with that spacious seat
Of Wealth and Wantonness, the choice retreat
Of sated Grandeur from the city's noise:
And were it humbler in sooth were sweet;
But Peace abhorreth artificial joys,
And Pleasure, leagued with Pomp, the zest of both destroys.

LXV.

Fierce are Albania's children. yet they lack
Not virtues, were those virtues more mature.
Where is the foe that ever saw their back?
Who can so well the toil of war endure?
Their native fastnesses not more secure
Than they in doubtful times of troublous need
Their wrath how deadly! but their friendship sure
When Gratitude or Val.'s o'er them bleed,
Unshaken rushing on where'er their chief may lead.

LXVI.

Childe Harold saw them in their chieftain's tower
Thronging to war in splendor and suceed;
And after viewed them when, within their power
Himself, awhile the victim of distress;
That saddening hour when bad men hotter press
But these did shelter him beneath their roof,
When less barbarians would have cheer'd him less,
And fellow-countrymen have stood aloof—
In effect, that tried the heart how few withstand the proof!

LXVII.

It chanced that adverse winds did drive his bark
Full on the coast of Suli's shaggy shore,
When all around was desolate and dark,
To land was perilous, to sojourn more;
Yet for a while the mariners forbore,
Doubious to trust where treachery might lurk:
As at length they ventured forth, though doubting
That those who loathe the like the Frank and Turk
Might once again renew their ancient butcher-work.

LXVIII.

Vain fear! the Suliotes stretch'd the welcome hand,
Led them o'er rocks and past the dangerous swamp,
Kinder than polish'd slaves, though not so bland,
And pil'd the hearth, and wrung their garments damp,
And fill'd the bowl, and trimm'd the cheerful lamp,
And spread their fare; though homely, all they had Such conduct bears Philanthropy's rare stamp—
To rest the weary and to sooth the sad,
Both lesson happier men, and shines at least the bad.
LXIX.

It came to pass, that when he did address
Himself to quit at length this mountain-land,
Combined marauders half-way barr’d egress,
And wasted far and near with glaive and brand;
And therefore did he take a trusty band
To traverse Acastania’s forest wide,
No war well season’d, and with labors tann’d,
Till he did greet white Acheleus side,
And from his further bank Aetolia’s wounds espied.

LXX.

Where Ione Utrakey forms its circling cove,
And weary waves retire to gleam at rest,
How brown the foliage of the green hill’s grove,
Nodding at midnight o’er the calm bay’s breast,
As winds come lightly whispering from the west
Kissing, not ruffling, the blue deep’s serene:
—Here Harold was received a welcome guest;
Nor did he pass unmoved the gentle scene,
For many a joy could he from Night’s soft presence glean.

LXXI.

On the smooth shore the night-fires brightly blazed,
The feast was done, the red wine circling fast,
And he that unawares had there yazed
With gaping wonderment had stared aghast;
For ere night’s midmost, stillest hour was past,
The native revels of the troop began:
Each Palkai his sabre from him cast,
And bounding hand in hand, man link’d to man,
Yelling their uncouth dirge, long daunted the kirtled clan.

LXXII.

Child’se Harold at a little distance stood
And view’d, but not displeased, the revelrie,
Nor brutal harmless mirth, however rude;
In sooth, it was no vulgar sight to see
Their barbarous, yet their not indecent, glee;
And, as the flames along their faces gleam’d,
Their gestures nimble, dark eyes flashing free,
The long wild locks that to their girdles stream’d,
While thus in concert they this lay half sang, half scream’d:

1. Tambourgi! Tambourgi! * thy larum afar
Gives hope to the valiant, and promise of war;
All the sons of the mountains arise at the note,
Chimariot, Illyrian, and dark Suliote!

2. Oh! who is more brave than a dark Suliote,
In his snowy casque and his shaggy capote?
To the wolf and the vulture he leaves his wild flock,
And descends to the plain like the stream from the rock.

3. Shall the sons of Chimen, who never forgive
The fault of a friend, bid an enemy live?
Let those guns so uncerr’d such vengeance forego?
What mark is so fair as the breast of a foe?

4. Macedonia sends forth her invincible race;
For a time they abandon the cave and the chase:
But those scars of blood-red shall be redder, before
The sabre is sheathed and the battle is o’er.

Then the pirates of Parga that dwell by the waves
And teach the pale Franks what it is to be slaves,
Shall leave on the beach the long galley and oar,
And track to his covert the captive on shore.

I ask not the pleasures that riches supply,
My sabre shall win what the feeble must buy;
Shall win the young bride with her long flowing hair.
And many a maid from her mother shall tear.

I love the fair face of the maid in her youth,
Her caresses shall lull me, her music shall sooth;
Let her bring from the chamber her many-to: e’d lyte
And sing us a song on the fall of her sire.

Remember the moment when Previsa fell,
The shrieks of the conquer’d, the conquerors’ yell,
The roofs that we fired, and the plunder we shared,
The wealthy we slaughter’d, the lovely we spared.

I talk not of mercy, I talk not of fear;
He neither must know who would serve the Vizier:
Since the days of our prophet the Crescent ne’er saw
A chief ever glorious like Ali Pashaw.

Dark Muchtar his son to the Danube is sped,
Let the yellow-hair’d Giaours* view his horse- *ai’
with dread;
When his Delhi’s come dashing in blood o’er the bank
How few shall escape from the Muscovite ranks!

Solicitar! unsheathe then our chief’s scimitar:
Tambourgi! thy larum gives promise of war.
Ye mountains, that see us descend to the shore,
Shall view us as victors, or view us no more!

LXXXIII.

Fair Greece! sad relic of departed worth!
Immortal, though no more; though fallen, great!
Who now shall lead thy scatter’d children forth.
And long accustom’d bondage uncreate?
Not such thy sons who whilome did await,
The hopeless warriors of a willing doom,
In bleak Thermopyla’s sepulchral strait—
Oh! who that gallant spirit shall resume,
Leap from Eutra’s banks, and call thee from the tomb?

LXXXIV.

Spirit of freedom! when on Phyle’s brow
Thou sat’st with Thrasylalus and his train,
Couldst thou forebode the dismal hour which now
Dims the green beauties of thine Attic plain?
Not thirty tyrants now enforce the chain,
But every carle can lord it o’er thy land;
Nor rise thy sons, but idly rail in vain.
Trembling beneath the scourge of Turkish hand,
From birth till death enslaved; in word, in deed, unmann’d.

* Yellow is the epithet given to the Redanens.
† Immortal.
‡ Horse-tails are the insignia of a Pacha.
§ Horsemen, answering to our forlorn hope.
|| Sword-bearer.
LXXV.
In all save form alone, how changed! and who
That marks the fire still sparkling in each eye,
Who but would deem their bosoms burn’d as new
With thy unquenched beam, lost Liberty!
And many dream withal the hour is nigh
That gives them back their fathers’ heritage:
For foreign arms and aid they fondly sigh,
Nor solely dare encounter hostile rage,
Or tear their name defiled from Slavery’s mournful page.

LXXVI.
Hereditary bondsmen! know ye not [break?]
Who would be free themselves must strike the blow?
By their right arms the conquest must be wrought?
Will Gaul or Muscovite redress ye? no!
True, they may lay your proud despowers low; but
Not for you will Freedom’s altars flame.
Shades of the Halots! triumph o’er your foe!
Greece! change thy lords, thy state is still the same;
Thy glorious day is o’er, but not thy years of shame.

LXXVII.
The city won for Allah from the Giaour,
The Giaour from Othman’s race again must wret;
And the Serail’s impenetrable tower
Receive the fiery Frank, her former guest; 35
Or Wahab’s rebel brood who dared divest
The 36 prophet’s tomb of all its pious spoil,
May wind their path of blood along the West;
But ne’er will freedom seek this fated soil,
But slave succeed to slavish years of endless toil.

LXXVIII.
Yet mark their mirth—ere lenten days begin
That penance which their holy rites prepare
To shrive from man his weight of mortal sin,
By daily abstinence and nightly prayer;
But ere his sackcloth garb Repentance wear,
Some days of joyannce are decreed to all,
To take of pleasantness each his secret share;
In motley robe to dance at masquing ball,
And join the mimic train of merry Carnival.

LXXIX.
And whose mere rife with merriment than thine,
Oh Stamboul! once the empress of their reign?
Though turbans now pollute Sophia’s shrine,
And Greece her very altars eyes in vain:
(Alas! her woes will still pervade my strain!) Gay were her minstrels once, for free her throng,
All felt the common joy they now must feign,
Nor oft I’ve seen such sight, nor heard such song,
as woe’d the eye, and thrill’d the Bosphorus along.

LXXX.
Loud was the lightsome tumult of the shore,
Oft Music changed, but never ceased her tone,
And timely echo’d back the measured roar,
And rippling waters made a pleasant moan:
The Queen of tides on high consenting shine,
And when a transient breeze swept o’er the wave,
Twas, as if darting from her heavenly throne,
A brighter glance her form reflected gave,
ill sparkling billows seem’d to light the banks they line.

LXXXI.
Glanced many a light caigne along the foam,
Danced on the shore the daughters of the land,
Ne thought had man or maid of rest or home,
While many a languid eye and thrilling hand
Exchanged the look few bosoms may withstand,
Or gently press, return’d the pressure still:
Oh Love! young Love! bound in thy rosebry band,
Let sage or cynic prattle as he will,
These hours, and only these, redeem Life’s years of ill!

LXXXII.
But, midst the throng in merry masquerade,
Lurk there no hearts that throb with secret pain,
Even through the closest sward of half-betray’d;
To such the gentle murmurs of the main
Seem to reach all they mourn in vain;
To such the gladness of the gamesome crowd
Is source of wayward thought and stern disdain:
How do they loathe the laughter idly loud,
And long to change the robe of revel for the shroud.

LXXXIII.
This must he feel, the true-born son of Greece,
If Greece one true-born patriot still can boast:
Not such as prize of war, but skulld in peace,
The bondman’s peace, who sighs for all he lost,
Yet with smooth smile his tyrant can accost,
And wield the slavish sickle, not the sword:
Ah! Greece! they love thee least who o’er thee most!
Their birth, their blood, and that sublime record
Of hero sires, who shame thy now degenerate horde

LXXXIV.
When riseth Lacedæmon’s hardihood,
When Thebes Epaminondas rear again,
When Athens’ children are with hearts endued,
When Grecian mothers shall give birth to men,
Then may’st thou be restored; but not till then.
A thousand years scarce serve to form a state;
An hour may lay it in the dust: and when
Can man in shatter’d splendor renovate,
Recall its virtues back, and vanquish Time and Fate.

LXXXV.
And yet how lovely in thine age of wâ,
Land of lost gods and godlike men! art thou!
Thy vales of evergreen, thy hills of snow, 57
Proclaim thee Nature’s varied favorite now:
Thy fame, thy temples to thy surface bow,
Commengling slowly with heroic earth,
Broke by the share of every rustic plough
So perish monuments of mortal birth,
So perish all in turn, save well-recorded Worth,

LXXXVI.
Save save where some solitary column mourns
Above its prostrate brethren of the cave; 86
Save where Triton’s airy shrine adorns
Colonna’s cliff, and gleams along the wave;
Save o’er some warrior’s half-forgotten grave,
Where the gray stones and unmolested grass
Ages, but not oblivion, feebly brave,
While strangers only not regardless pass,
Lingerling like me, perchance, to gaze, and sign
“Alas!”
LXXXVII.
Yet are thy skies as blue, thy crags as wild;
Sweet are thy groves, and verdant are thy fields,
Thine olive ripe as when Minerva smiled,
And still his honied wealth Hymentus yields;
There the blithe bee his fragrant fortress builds,
The freeborn wanderer of thy mountain-air;
Apollo still thy long, long summer gilds,
Still in his beam Mendell's marbles glare;
Art. Glory, Freedom fail, but Nature still is fair.

LXXXVIII.
Where'er we tread 'tis haunted, holy ground;
No earth of thine is lost in vulgar mould,
But one vast realm of wonder spreads around,
And all the Muse's tales seem truly told,
Till the sense aches with gazing to behold
The scenes our earliest dreams have dwelt upon:
Each hill and vale, each deepening Glen and wold
Defies the power which crush'd thy temples gone:
Age shakes Athera's tower, but spares gray Marathon

LXXXIX.
The sun, the soil, but not the slave, the same;
Unchanged in all except its foreign lord—
Preserves alike its bounds and boundless fame
The Battle-field, where Persia's victim horde
First bow'd beneath the brunt of Helian's sword,
As on the morn to distant Glory dear,
When Marathon became a magic word;
Which utter'd, to the hearer's eye appears
The camp, the host, the fight, the conqueror's career.

XC.
The flying Mede, his shaftless broken bow;
The fiery Greek, his red pursuing spear;
Mountains above, Earth's, Ocean's plain below,
Death in the front, Destruction in the rear!
Such was the scene—what now remaineth here?
What sacred trophy marks the hallow'd ground,
Recording freedom's smile, and Asia's tear?
The rifled urn, the violated mound,
The dust thy courser's hoof, rude stranger! spurns around.

XCI.
Yet tc the remnants of thy splendor past
Shall pilgrims, pensive, but unwearied throng;
Long shall the voyager, with th' Ionian blast,
Hall the bright clime of battle and of song;
Long shall thine annals and immortal tongue
Fill with thy fame the youth of many a shore;
Boast of the aged! lesson of the young!
Which sages venerate, and bards adore,
As Pallas and the Muse unveil their awful lore.

XCI.
The parted bosom clings to wonted home,
If aught that's kindred cheer the welcome heart;
He that is lonely, hither let him roam,
And gaze complacent on congenial earth.
But he whom Sadness sootheth may abide,
And scarce regret the region of his birth,
When wandering slow by Delphi's sacred side, 'j
Or gazing o'er the plains where Greek and Persian died.

XCIII.
Let such approach this consecrated land,
And pass in peace along the magic waste;
But spare its relics—let no busy hand
Deface the scenes, already how defaced!
Not for such purpose were these altars placed;
Revere the remnants nations once revered;
So may our country's name be undisgraced,
So may'st thou prosper where thy youth was reared
By every honest joy of love and life endear'd!

XCV.
For thee, who thus in too protracted song
Hath soothe'd thine idlesse with inglorious lays,
Soon shall thy voice be lost amid the throng
Of louder minstrels in these later days;
To such resign the strife for fading lays,—
Ill may such contest now the spirit move
Which needs nor keen reproach nor partial praise;
Since cold each kinder heart that might approve,
And none are left to please, when none are left to love.

XCV.
Thou too art gone, thou loved and lovely one!
Whom youth and youth's affections bound to me,
Who did for me what none beside have done,
Nor shrank from one albeit unworthy thee.
What is my being? thou hast ceased to be!
Nor staid to welcome here thy wanderer home,
Who mourns o'er hours which we no more shall see:
Would they had never been, or were to come!
Would he had ne'er returned, to find fresh cause to roam.

XCVI.
Oh! ever loving, lovely, and beloved!
How selfish Sorrow poisons on the past,
And clings to thoughts now better far removed!
But Time shall tear thy shadow from me last.
All thou couldst have of mine, stern Death! thou
The parent, friend, and now the more than friend;
Ne'er yet for one thine arrows flew so fast,
And grief with grief continuing still to blend,
Hath snatch'd the little joy that life had yet to lend.

XCVII.
Then must I plunge again into the crowd,
And follow all that Peace disdains to seek?
Where Revel calls, and Laughter, vainly loud,
False to the heart, distorts the hollow cheek,
To leave the flagging spirit doubly weak;
Still o'er the features, which perfecute they cheer,
To feign the pleasure or conceal the pique;
Smiles form the channel of a future tear,
Or raise the writhing lip with ill-dissembled snorer.

XCVIII.
What is the worst of woes that wait on age?
What stamps the wrinkle deeper on the brow?
To view each loved one glanced from life's page,
And be alone on earth, as I am now.
Before the Chastener humbly let me bow
O'er hearts divided, and o'er hopes destroy'd;
Roll on, vain days! full reckless may ye flow,
Since Time hath reft whate'er my soul resolv'd,
And with the ills of Eld mine earlier years alloy'd.
CANTO III.

"Afin que cette epilletion vous fagisse de penser  a autre chose; il n'y a un..."—Leire du Roi de Prusse a

I.

Is thy face like thy mother's, my fair child! Ais! sole daughter of my house and heart? When last I saw thy young blue eyes they smiled, and then we parted,—not as now we part, but with a hope.—

Awakening with a start, the winds lift up their voices: I depart, whither I know not; but the hour's gone by, when Albion's lessening shores could grieve or glad mine eye.

II.

Once more upon the waters! yet once more! And the waves bound beneath me as a steed That knows his rider. Welcome, to their roar! Swift be their guidance, wheresoe'er it lead! Though the strain'd mast should quiver as a reed, and the rent canvas fluttering strew the gale, still must I on; for I am a weed, Flung from the rock, on Ocean's foam to sail Where'er the surge may sweep, the tempest's breath prevail.

III.

In my youth's summer I did sing of One, The wandering outlaw of his own dark mind; Again I seize the theme, then but begun, and bear it with me, as the rushing wind Bears the cloud onwards: in that tale I find The furrows of long thought, and dried-up tears, which, ebbing, leave a sterile track behind, O'er which all heavily the journeying years Flo'd the last sands of life,—where not a flower appears.

IV.

Since my young days of passion—joy, or pain, perchance my heart and harp have lost a string, and both may jar; it may be, that in vain I would essay as I have sung to sing. Yet, though a dreary strain, to this I cling, so that it ween me from the weary dream Of selfish grief or gladness—so it flings forgetfulness around me—it shall seem the, though to none else, a not ungrateful theme.

V.

He, who grown aged in this world of woe, in deeds, not years, piercing the depths of life, so that no wonder waits him; nor below can love, or sorrow, fame, ambition, strife, cut to his heart again with the keen knife of silent, sharp endurance: he can tell why thought seeks refuge in lone caves, yet rife with airy innres, and shapes which dwell still unimpair'd though old, in the soul's haunted cell.

VI.

'Tis to create, and in creating live A being more intense, that we endow With form or fancy, gaining as we give The life we imagine, even as I do now. What am I? Nothing: but not so art thou, soul of my thought! with whom I traverse earth Invisible but gazing, as I glow Mix'd with thy spirit, blended with thy bith, and feeling still with thee in my crush'd feelings death.

VII.

Yet must I think less wildly:—I have thought too long and darkly, till my brain became, in its own eddy boiling and o'erwrought, a whirling gulf of phantasy and dream; and thus, untaught in youth my heart to tame, my springs of life were poison'd. 'Tis too late! Yet am I changed; though still enough the same in strength to bear what time can not abate, and feed on bitter fruits without accusing Fa.

VIII.

Something too much of this:—but now 'tis past, and the spell closes with its silent seal. Long absent Harold reappears at last; he of the breast which fain no more would feel, Wrang with the wounds which kill not, but ne'er yet time, who changes all, had alter'd him [heal; in soul and aspect as in age; years steal fire from the mind as vigor from the limb; and life's enchanted cup but sparkles near the brim.

IX.

His had been quaff'd too quickly, and he found the dregs were wormwood; but he fill'd again, and from a purer fount, on holier ground, and deem'd its spring perpetual; but in vain! still round him clung invisibly a chain which gall'd, for ever fettering though unseen, and heavy though it clank'd not; worn with pain, which pined although it spoke not, and grew keen, entering with every step it took through many a scene.

X.

Secure in guarded coldness, he had mix'd again in faneied safety with his kind, and deem'd his spirit now so firmly fix'd and sheath'd with an invulnerable mind, that, if no joy, no sorrow lurk'd behind; and he, as one, might midst the many stand Unheeded, searching through the crowd to dote fit speculation; such as in strange land he found in wonder-works of God and Nature's hand.

XI.

But who can view the ripen'd rose, nor seek to wear it? who can curiously behold the smoothness and the sheen of beauty's cheek, nor feel the heart can never all grow old? who can contemplate fame through clouds unfold the star which rises o'er her steep, nor climb? Harold, once more within the vortex, roll'd on with the giddy circle, chasing Time, yet with a nobler aim than in his youth's fenth prime.
XII.
But soon he knew himself the most unfit
Of men to herd with Man; with whom he held
Little in common; untaught to submit {quell'd
His thoughts to others, though his soul was
In youth by his own thoughts; still unconquell'd,
He would not yield dominion of his mind
To spirits against whom his own rebel'd;
Proud though in desolation; which could find
A life within itself, to breath without mankind.

XIII.
Where rose the mountains, there to him were friends;
Where roll'd the ocean, thereon was his home;
Where a blue sky, and glowing elime, extends,
He had the passion and the power to roam;
The desert, forest, cavern, breaker's foam,
Were unto him companionship; they spake
A mutual language, clearer than the tone
Of his land's tongue, which he would oft forsake
For Nature's pages glass'd by sunbeams on the lake.

XIV.
Like the Chaldean, he could watch the stars,
Till he had peopled them with beings bright
As their own beaux; and earth, and earth-born
And human frailties, were forgotten quite: [Jars,
Could he have kept his spirit to that flight
He had been happy: but this clay will sink
Its spark immortal, curving it the light
To which it mounts, as if to break the link
That keeps us from you heaven which wos us to its brink.

XV.
But in Man's dwellings he became a thing
Restless and worn, and stern and weirsome,
Droop'd as a wild-born falcon with elipt wing,
To whom the boundless air alone were home;
Then came his fit again, which to o'ercome,
As eagerly the hair'd-up bird will beat
His breast and beat against his wry dome
Till the blood tinge his plumage, so the heat
Of his impeded soul would through his bosom eat.

XVI.
Self-exiled Harold wanders forth again,
With nought of hope left, but with less of gloom;
The very knowledge that he lived in vain,
That all was over on this side the tomb,
Had made Despair a smilingness assume, [wreck
Which, though 'twere wild,—as on the plunder'd
When mariners would madly meet their doom
With draughts intemperate on the sinking deck,
Did yet inspire a cheer, which he forbore to check.

XVII.
Stop!—For thy tread is on an Empire's dust.
An Earthquake's spoil is sepulchred below!
Is thee spot mark'd with no colossal bust?
Nor column triumphed for triumphal shows?
None; but the moral's truth tells simpler so,
As the ground was before, thus let it be;—
How that red rain hath made the harvest grow!
And is this all the world has gain'd by thee,
Thou first and last of fields! king-making Victory?

XVIII.
And Harold stands upon this place of skulls
The grave of France, the deadly Waterloo;
How in an hour the power which gave annuls
Its gifts, transferring fame as fleeting too!
In "pride of place"! here last the eagle few,
Then tore with bloody talon the rent plain.
Pierced by the shaft of banded nations through,
Ambition's life and labors all were vain;
He wears the shattered links of the world's broken chain.

XIX.
Fit retribution! Gaul may champ the bit
And foam in fetters;—but is Earth more free?
Did nations combat to make One submit;
Or league to teach all kings true sovereignty?
What! shall reviving Thraldom again be
The patch'd-up idol of enlighten'd days?
Shall we, who struck the Lion down, shall we Pay the Wolf homage? proferring lowly gaze
And servile knees to thrones? No: prove before ye praise!

XX.
If not, o'er one fallen despot boast no more!
In vain fair cheeks were furrow'd with hot tears
For Europe's flowers long rooted up before,
The trampler of her vineyards; in vain, years
Of death, depopulation, bondage, tears,
Have all been borne, and broken by the accord
Of roused-up millions; all that most endears
Glory, is when the myrtle wreathe a sword
Such as Harmodius! drew on Athens' tyrant lord.

XXI.
There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Belgium's capital had gather'd then
Her Beauty and her Chivalry, and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men;
A thousand hearts beat happily: and when
Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes look'd to love to eyes which spake again,
And all went merry as a marriage-bell;хи
But hush! hark! a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

XXII.
Did ye not hear it?—No; 'twas but the wind,
Or the ear rattling o'er the stony street,
On with the dance! let joy be unconfin'd;
No sleep till morn, when Youth and Pleasure meet
To chase the glowing Hours with flying feet
But, hark!—that heavy sound breaks in once more,
As if the clouds its echo would repeat;
And nearer, clearer, deadlier than before!
Arm! Arm! it is— it is—the cannon's opening roar!

XXIII.
Within a window'd niche of that high hall
Sate Brunswick's fated chieftain; he did hear
That sound the first amidst the festival,
And caught its tone with Death's prophetic ear;
And when they smiled because he deem'd it near
His heart more truly knew that peal too well
Which stretch'd his father on a bloody bier,
And roused the vengeance blood alone could quell.
He rush'd into the field, and, foremost fighting fell
XXIV.

Ah. then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears and tremblings of distress,
And cheeks all pale, which but an hour ago
Blest'd at the praise of their own loveliness;
And there were sudden partings, such as press
The life from out young hearts, and choking sighs
Which ne'er might be repeated; who could guess
If ever more should meet those mutuel eyes,
Since upon night so sweet such awful morn could rise?

XXV.

And there was mounting in hot haste: the steed
The mustering squadron, and the clattering car,
Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
And swiftly forming in the ranks of war;
And the deep thunder peal on peal afar;
And near, the beat of the alarming drum;
Roused up the soldier ere the morning star;
While throng'd the citizens with terror dumb;
Or whispering, with white lips—'The foe! They come! They come!'

XXVI.

And wild and high the "Camerons gathering;"
The war-note of Lochiel, which Albyn's hills rose!
Have heard, and heard, too, have her Saxon foes;
How in the noon of that pitroch thrills,
Savage and shrill! But with the breath which fills
Their mountain-pipe, so fill the mountainerds With the fierce native daring which instills
The stirring memory of a thousand years, And 'Evan's, 'Donald's fame rings in each clansman's ears!

XXVII.

And Ardennes waves above them her green leaves
Dewy with nature's tear-drops, as they pass
Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves,
Over the unreturning brave,—alas!
Ere evening to be trodden like the grass
Which now beneath them, but above shall grow
In its next verdure, when this fiery mass
Of living valor, rolling on the foe,
And burning with high hope, shall moulder cold and low.

XXVIII.

Last noon beheld them full of lusty life,
Last eve in beauty's circle proudly gay,
The midnight brought the signal-sound of strife,
The moru the marshalling in arms,—the day
Battle's magnificently-tern array!
The thunder-clouds close o'er it, which when rent,
The earth is covered thick with other clay,
Wh'ch her own clay shall cover, heap'd and pent,
Rider and horse,—friend, foe,—in one red burial blent!

XXIX.

Their praise is hymn'd by loftier harps than mine;
Yet one I would select from that proud throng,
Partly because they blend me with his line,
And partly that I did his sires some wrong,
And partly that bright names will hallow song;
And his was of the bravest, and when shower'd
The death-bolts deadliest the thum'd flies alang,
Even where the thickest of war's tempest lower'd,
They reach'd no nobler breast than thine, young, gallant Howard!

XXX.

There have been tears and breaking hearts for thee;
And mine were nothing, had I such to give;
But when I stood beneath the fresh green tree,
Which living waves where thou didst cease to live
And saw around me the wide field revive
With fruits and fertile promise, and the Spring
Come forth her work of gladness to contrive,
With all her reckless birds upon the wing,
I turn'd from all she brought to those she could not bring.'

XXXI.

I turn'd to thee, to thousands, of whom each
And one as all a ghostly gap did make
In his own kind and kindred, whom: t teach
Forgetfulness were mercy for their sake;
The Archangel's trump, not Glory's, must awake
Those whom they thirst for; though the sound of May for a moment sooth, it cannot slake
The fever of vain longing, and the name
So hon'd but assumes a stronger, bitter claim.

XXXII.

They mourn, but smile at length; and, smiling,
The tree will wither long before it fall; [mourn:
The hull drives on, though mast and sail be torn:
The roof-tree sinks, but moulders on the hall
In massy hoariness; the ruin'd wall
Stands when its wind-worn battlements are gone;
The bars survive the captive they enthrall; [sea.
The day drags through those storms keep out the
And thus the heart will break, yet brokenly live on

XXXIII.

Even as a broken mirror, which the glass
In every fragment multiplies; and makes
A thousand images of one that was,
The same, and still the more, the more it breaks
And thus the heart will do which not forsakes,
Living in shatter'd guise, and still, and cold,
And bloodless, with its sleepless sorrow ache;
Yet withers on till all without is old,
Showing no visible sign, for such things are unote

XXXIV.

There is a very life in our despair,
Vitality of poison,—a quick root
Which feeds these deadly branches; for it was
As nothing did we die; but Life will suit
Itself to Sorrow's most detested fruit,
Like to the apples on the 'Dead Sea's shore,
All ashes to the taste: Did man compute
Existence by enjoyment, and count o'er
Such hours' gainst years of life,—say, would he name threescore?

XXXV.

The Psalmist number'd out the years of war:
They are enough; and if thy tale be true,
Thou, who didst grudge him even the fleeting span
More than enough, thou fata! Waterloo!
Millions of tongues record thee, and anew
Their children's lips shall echo them, and say—
"Here, where the sword united nations drew,
Our countrymen were warring on that day!"
And this is much, and all which will not pass away
XXXVI.
There sunk the greatest, nor the worst of men,
Whose spirit antithetically mixt
One moment of the mightiest, and again
On little objects with like firmness fixt,
Extreme in all things! hadst thou been betwixt,
Thy throne had still been thine, or never been;
For during mode thy rise as fall: thou seek'st
Even now to reassume the imperial mien,
And shake again the world, the Thunderer of the scene!

XXXVII.
Conqueror and captive of the earth art thou!
She trembles at thee still, and thy wild name
Was ne'er more bruited in men's minds than now
That thou art nothing, save the jest of Fame,
Who woul'd thee once, thy vassal, and became
The flatterer of thy fierceness, till thouwert
A god unto thyself; nor less than
To the astounded kingdoms all inert,
Who deem'd thee for a time whate'er thou didst assert.

XXXVIII.
Oh, more or less than man—in high or low,
Battling with nations, flying from the field;
Now making monarchs' necks thy footstool, now
More than thy meanest soldier sought to yield;
An empire thou couldst crush command, rebuild,
But govern not thy pettiest passion, nor,
However deeply in men's spirits skill'd,
Look through thine own, nor curb the lust of war,
Nor learn that tempted Fate will leave the loftiest star.

XXXIX.
Yet well thy soul hath brook'd the turning tide,
With that untaught innate philosophy,
Which, be it wisdom, coldness, or deep pride,
Is gall and wormwood to an enemy.
When the whole host of hatred stood hard by,
To watch and mock thee shrinking, thou hast
With a sedate and all-enduring eye:—[smiled]
When Fortune fled her spoil'd and favorite child,
He stood unbow'd beneath the ills upon him piled.

XL.
Sager than thy fortunes; for in them
Ambition steel'd thee on far to show
That just habitual scorn which could contemn
Men and their thoughts; 'twas wise to feel, not so
To wear it ever on thy lip and brow,
And spurn the instruments thou wert to use,
Till they were turn'd unto thine overthrow;
"Is but a worthless world to win or lose;
So hath it proved to thee, and all such lot who choose.

XLI.
If, like a tower upon a headlong rock,
Thou hadst been made to stand or fall alone,
Such scorn of man had help'd to brave the shock;
But men's thoughts were the steps which paved thy
Their admiration thy best weapon shone; [throned.
The part of Philip's son was thine, not then (Unless as 'twixt thy purple had been thrown)
Like stern Diogenes to mock at men;
For sceptred cynics earth were far too wide a den!

XLII.
But quiet to quick bosoms is a hell,
And there hath been thy bane; there is r. thy
And motion of the soul which will not dwell
In its own narrow being, but aspire
Beyond the fitting medium of desire;
And, but once kindled, quenchless evermore
Preys upon high adventure, nor can tire
Of aught but rest; a fever at the core,
Fatal to him who bears, to all who ever bore.

XLIII.
This makes the madmen who have made men mad
By their contagion; Conquerors and Kings,
Founders of sects and systems, to whom add
Sophists, Bard's, Statesmen, all unquiet things
Which stir too strongly the soul's secret springs
And are themselves the foes to those they fool;
Envied, yet how unenviable! what stings
Are theirs! One breast laid open were a school
Which would unteach mankind the lust to anien a rule;

XLIV.
Their breath is agitation, and their life
A storm whereon they ride, to sink at last,
And yet so nursed and bigoted to strife,
That should their days, surviving perils past,
Melt to calm twilight, they feel overcast
With sorrow and supineness, and so die;
Even as a flame unfed, which runs to waste
With its own flickering, or a sword laid by,
Which eats into itself, and rusts ingloriously.

XLV.
He who ascends to mountain-tops, shall find
The loftiest peaks most wapt in clouds and snow
He who surpasses or subdues mankind,
Must look down on the hate of those below.
Though high above the sun of glory glow,
And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
Contending tempests on his naked head,
And thus reward the toils which to those sumptu led.

XLVI.
Away with these! true Wisdom's world will be Within its own creation, or in thine,
Maternal Nature! for who esteans like thee,
Thus on the banks of thy majestic Rhine?
There Harol'd gazes on a work divine,
A blending of all beauties; streams and dells,
Fruit, foliage, crag, wood, cornfield, mountain vine,
And chiefless castles breathing stern savages
From gray but leafy walls, where Ruin greenly dwells.

XLVII.
And there they stand, as stands a lofty mind.
Worn, but unstooping to the baser crowd,
All tenantless, save to the cranieing wind.
Or holding dark communion with the cloud
There was a day when they were young and proud.
Banners on high, and battles pass'd below.
But they who fought are in a bloody shroud.
And those which waved are shredless dust ere now
And the bleak battlements shall bear no future blow.
XLVIII.

beneath these battlements, within those walls,
Power dwelt amidst her passions; in proud state
Each robber chief upheld his armed halls,
Doing his evil will, nor less elate
Than mightier heroes of a longer date. [have?]
What want these outlaws\textsuperscript{10} conquerors should
But History's purchased page to call them great?
A wider space, an ornamented grave?
Their hopes were not less warm, their souls were full as brave.

XLIX.

In their baronial feuds and single fields,
What deeds of prowess unrecorded died!
And love, which lent a blazon to their shields,
With emblems well devised by amorous pride,
Through all the mail of iron hearts would glide;
But still their flame was fiercest, and drew on Keen contest and destruction near allied,
And many a tower for some fair mischief won,
\textit{Faw} the discolor'd Rhine beneath its ruin run.

L.

But Thou, exulting and unbounding river!
Making thy waves a blessing as they flow
Through banks whose beauty would be ever
Could man but leave thy bright creation so,
Nor its fair promise from the surface now
With the sharp scythe of conflict,—then to see
Thy valley of sweet waters, were to know
Earth paved like Heaven; and to seem such to me, \textit{E'en now what wants thy stream?}—that it should Lethe be.

LI.

A thousand battles have assail'd thy banks,
But these and half their fame have pass'd away,
And Slaughter heap'd on high his welterin ranks;
Their very graves are gone, and what are they?
Thy tide was 'd not the blood of yesterday,
And all was statuesless, and on thy clear stream
Glass'd with its dancing light the sunny ray;
But o' the blacken'd memory's blighting dream
Thy waves would vainly roll, all sweeping as they seem.

LII.

Thus Harold inly said, and pass'd along,
Yet not insensibly to all which here
Awoke the jocund birds to early song in glens which might have made even exile dear;
Though on its brow were graven lines austere,
And tranquil stremes which had ta'en the place
Of feelings fierier far but less severe,
\textit{Joy was not always absent from his face},
\textit{But in such scenes would steal with transient trace.}

LIII.

Nor was all love shut from him, though his days
Of passion had consumed themselves to dust.
It is in vain that we would coldly gaze
On such as smile upon us; the heart must
Leap kindly back to kindness, though disgust
Hath wear'd it from all worldlings: thus he felt,
For there was soft remembrance, and sweet trust
In one fond breast, to which his own would melt,
And in its tenderer hour on that his bosom dwelt.

LIV.

And he had learned to love,—\textit{I know not why},
For this in such as him seems strange of mood.—
The helpless looks of blooming infancy,
Even in its earliest nurture; what subdued,
To change like this, a mind so far imbued
With scorn of man, it little boots to know;
But thus it was; and though in solitude
Small power the nipp'd affections have to grow,
In him this glow'd when all beside had ceased to glow.

LV.

And there was one soft breast, as hath been said,
Whose breast to his was bound by stronger ties
Than the church links withal; and, though unwed
\textit{That love was pure, and, far above disgrace,}
Had stood the test of mortal enmities
Still, undivided, and cemented more
By peril, dreaded most in female eyes;
But this was firm, and from a foreign shore
Well to that heart might his these absent greetings pour.

1.

The castled crag of Drachenfels
Frowns o'er the wide and winding Rhine.
Whose breast of waters broadly swells
Between the banks which bear the vine.
And hills all rich with blossom'd trees,
And fields which promise corn and wine,
And scatter'd cities crowning these,
Whose far white walls along them shine,
Have strew'd a scene which I should see
With double joy were thou with me.

2.

And peasant girls, with deep blue eyes
And hands which offer early flowers,
Walk smiling o'er this paradise;
Above, the frequent feudal towers
Through green leaves lift their walls of gray,
And many a rock which steeply lowers,
And noble arch in proud decay,
Look o'er this vale of vintage-bowers;
But one thing want these banks of Rhine,—
Thy gentle hand to clasp in mine!

3.

I send the lilies given to me;
Though long before thy hand they wore
I know that they must wither'd be
But yet reject them not as such;
For I have cherish'd them as dear,
Because they yet may meet thine eye,
And guide thy soul to mine even here,
When thou behold'st them drooping nigh
And know'st them gather'd by the Rhine,
And offer'd from my heart to thine!

4.

The river nobly foams and flows,
The charm of this enchanted ground,
And all its thousand turns disclose
Some freshness beauty varying round:
The haughtiest breast its wish might bound
Through life to dwell delighted here;
Nor could on earth a spot be found
To nurture and to me so dear,
Could thy dear eyes in following mine
Still sweeten more these banks of Rhine!
LVI.

By Coblenz, on a rise of gentle ground,
There is a small and simple pyramid,
Crowning the summit of the verdant mound;
Beneath its base are heroes’ ashes hid,
Our enemy’s—but let not that forbid
Honor to Marceau! o’er whose early tomb
Tears, big tears, gush’d from the rough soldier’s lid,
Lamenting and yet envying such a doom,
Falling for France, whose rights he battled to resume.

LVII.

Brief, brave, and glorious was his young career,—
His mourners were two hosts, his friends and foes;
And fitly may the stranger lingering here
Pray for his gallant spirit’s bright repose;
For he was freedom’s champion, one of those,
The few in number, who had not o’erstept
The charter to chastise which she bestows
On such as wield her weapons; he had kept
The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o’er him wept. 12

LVIII.

Here Ehrenbreitstein, 13 with her shatter’d wall
Black with the miner’s blast, upon her height
Yet shows of what she was, when shell and ball
Rebounding idly on her strength did light:
A tower of victory! from whence the flight
Of balled foes was watch’d along the plain;
But Peace destroy’d what war could never blight,
And laid those proud roofs bare to Summer’s rain—
On which the iron shower for years had pour’d in vain.

LIX.

Adieu to thee, fair Rhine! How long delighted
The stranger fare w毡ed on his way!
Thine is a scene alike where souls united
Or lonely Contemplation thus might stray;
And could the ceaseless vultures cease to prey
On self-condemning loosons, it were here,
Where Nature, nor too sombre nor too gay,
Wild but not rude, awful yet not austere,
Is to the mellow Earth as Autumn to the year.

LX.

Adieu to thee again! a vain adieu!
There can be no farewell to scenes like thine;
The mind is color’d by thy every hue;
And if reluctantly the eyes resign
Their ghastly gaze upon thee, lovely Rhine!
’Tis with the thankful glance of parting praise;
More mighty spots may rise—more glaring shine,
But none unite in one attaching maze
The brilliant, fair, and soft,—the glories of old days.

LXI.

The negligently grand, the fruitful bloom
Of coming ripeness, the white city’s sheen,
The rolling stream, the precipice’s gloom,
The forest’s growth, and Gothic walls between,
The wild rocks shaped as they had turrets been,
In meekery of man’s art; and these withal
A race of faces happy as the scene,
Whose fertile bounties here extend to all,
Still springing o’er thy banks, though Empires near them fall.

LXII.

But these recede. Above me are the Alps,
The palaces of Nature, whose vast walls
Have pinnacled in clouds their snowly scalps,
And crowned Eternity in icy halls
Of cold sublimity, where forms and falls
The avalanche—the thunderbolt of snow!
All that expands the spirit, yet appals,
Gather around these summits, as to show
How earth may pierce to Heaven, yet leave vain man below.

LXIII.

But ere these matchless heights I dare to scan,
There is a spot should not be passe’d in vain,—
Morat! the proud, the patriot field! where man
May gaze on ghastly trophies of the slain,
Nor blush for those who conquer’d on that plain
Here Burgundy besought his tombless host,
A bony heap, through ages to remain,
Themselves their monument; the Stygian coast
Unsepulchred they roam’d, and shrack’d each wandering ghost. 14

LXIV.

While Waterloo with Canne’s carnage vies,
Morat and Marathon twin names shall stand;
They were true Glory’s stainless victories,
Won by the unambiguous heart and hand
Of a proud, brotherly, and civic band,
All unbought champions in no princely cause
Of vice-entail’d Corruption; they no land
Doom’d to bow in the blasphemy of laws
Making kings’ rights divine, by some Draconic clause.

LXV.

By a lone wall a lonelier column rears
A gray and grief-worn aspect of old days;
’Tis the last remnant of the wreck of years,
And looks as with the wild-bewilder’d gaze
Of one to stone converted by amaze,
Yet still with consciousness; and there it stands
Making a marvel that it docs not decay,
When the coeval pride of human hands,
Levell’d 15 Aventicum, hath strew’d her subject lands.

LXVI.

And there—oh! sweet and sacred be the name!—
Julia—the daughter, the devoted—gave
Her youth to Heaven; her heart, beneath a claim
Nearest to Heaven’s, broke o’er a father’s grave.
Justice is sworn ‘gainst tears, and hers would rave
The life she lived in, but the judge was just,
And then she died on him she could not save.
Their tomb was simple, and without a bust,
And held within their urn one mind, one heart, one dust. 16

LXVII.

But these are deeds which should not pass away,
And names that must not wither, though the earth
Forgets her empires with a just decay, [birth,
The enslavers and the enslaved, their death and
The high, the mountain-majesty of worth
Should be, and shall, survivor of its wo,
And from its immortality look forth.
In the sun’s face, like yonder Alpine snow
Imperishably pure beyond all things below.
LXXII.
Lake Leman woo'd me with its crystal face,
The mirror where the stars and mountains view
The stillness of their aspect in each trace
Its clear depth yields of their fair height and hue:
There is too much man of here, to look through
With a fit mind the might which I behold;
But soon in me shall Loneliness renew
Thoughts hid, but not less cherished than of old,
Are mingling with the herd had penn'd me in their fold.

LXXI.

LXXVIII.

LXIX.
To fly from, need not be to hate, mankind:
All are not fit with them to stir and toil,
Nor is it discontent to keep the mind
Deep in its fountain, lest it overboil
In the hot throng, where we become the spoil
Of our infection, till too late and long
We may deplore and struggle with the coil,
In wretched interchange of wrong for wrong
Midst a contentious world, striving where none are strong.

LXX.
There, in a moment, we may plunge our years
In fatal penitence, and in the blight
Of our own soul turn all our blood to tears,
And color things to come with hues of Night;
The race of life becomes a hopeless flight
To those that walk in darkness: on the sea,
The boldest steer but where their ports invite,
But there are wanderers' o'er Eternity
Whose bark drives on and on, and anchor'd never shall be.

LXXI.
Is it not better, then, to be alone,
And love Earth only for its earthly sake?
By the blue rushing of the arrow Rhone, 18
Or the pure bosom of its nursing lake,
Which feeds it as a mother who doth make
A fair but froward infant her own care,
Kissing its cries away as these awake:—
Is it not better thus our lives to bear?
Than join the crushing crowd, doom'd to infest or bear?

LXXX.
I live not in myself, but I become Portion of that around me: and to me
High mountains are a feeling, but the hum
Of human cities torture: I can see
Nothing to loathe in nature, save to be
A link reluctant in a fleshly chain,
Class'd among creatures, when the soul can flee,
And with the sky, the peak, the heaving plain
Of ocean, or the stars, mingle, and not in vain.

LXXIII.
And thus I am absorb'd, and this is life;
I look upon the peopled desert past,
As on a place of agony and strife,
Where, for some sin, to Sorrow I was cast,
To act and suffer, but remount at last
With a fresh pinion: which I feel to spring,
Though young, yet waxing vigorous, as the blast
Which it would cope with, on delighted wing,
E'purng the a]y-cold bonds which round our being tling.

LXXIV.
And when, at length, the mind shall be all free
From what it hates in this degraded form,
Reft of its carnal life, save what shall be Existent happier in the fly and worm,—
When elements to elements conform,
And dust is as it should be, shall I not Feel all I see, less dazzling, but more warm?
The bodi:as thought? the Spirit of each spot?
Of which, even now, I share at times the immorta lot;

LXXV.
Are not the mountains, waves, and skies, a part
Of me and of my soul, as I of them?
Is not the love of these deep in my heart
With a pure passion? should I not contemn
All objects, if compared with these? and stem
A tide of suffering, rather than forego
Such feelings for the hard and worldly phlegm
Of those whose eyes are only turn'd below,
Gazing upon the ground, with thoughts which dare not glow?

LXXVI.
But this is not my theme; and I return
To that which is immediate, and require
Those who find contemplation in the urn,
To look on One, whose dust was once all fire.
A native of the land where I respire
The clear air for a while—a passing guest,
Where he became a being,—whose desire
Was to be glorious; 'twas a foolish quest,
The which to gain and keep, he sacrifice all rest.

LXXVII.
Here the self-torturing sophist, wid RousscUe.
The apostle of affliction, he who threw
Enchantment over passion, and from wo
Wrung overwhelming eloquence, first drew
The breath which made him wretched; yet he knew
How to make madness beautiful, and cast
O'er erring deeds and thoughts a heavenly hue
Of words, like sunbeams, dazzling as they past
The eyes, which o'er them shed tears feelingly and fast.

LXXVIII.
His love was passion's essence—as a tree
On fire by lightning; with ethereal flame
Kindled he was, and blasted; for to be
Thus, and enamor'd, were in him the same
But his was not the love of living dame,
Nor of the dead who rise upon our dreams,
But of ideal beauty, which became
In him existence, and o'erflowing teems
Along his burning page, distemper'd though! it seems

LXXIX.
This breathed itself to life in Julie, this Invested her with all that's wild and sweet.
This hollow'd, too, the memorable kiss
Which every morn his fever'd lip would greet.
From hers, who but with friendship his would meet.
But to that gentle touch, through brain and breast
Flash'd the thrill'd spirit's love-devouring heat;
In that absorbing sigh perchance more blest,
Than vulgar minds may be with all they seek.

porest. 19
LXXX.

His life was one long war with self-sought foes,
Or friends by him self-banished; for his mind
Had grown Suspicion's sanctuary, and chose
For its own cruel sacrifice, the kind
'Gainst whom he raged with fury strange and blind.
But he was frenzied,—wherefore, who may know?
Since cause might be which skill could never find;
But he was frenzied by disease or wo,
To that worst pitch of all, which wears a reasoning show.

LXXXI.

For then he was inspired, and from him came,
As from the Pythian's mystic cave of yore,
Those oracles which set the world in flame,
Nor ceased to burn till kingdoms were no more;
Did he not this for France? which lay before
Bow'd to the inborn tyranny of years?
Broken and trembling to the yoke she bore,
Till by the voice of him and his compeers
Roused up to so much wrath, which follows o'ergrown fears?

LXXXII.

They made themselves a fearful monument!
The wreck of old opinions—things which grew
Breathed from the birth of time; the veil they
And what behind it lay all earth shall view. [rent,
But good with ill they also overthrew,
Leaving but ruins, wherewith to rebuild
Upon the same foundation, and renew [fell'd,
Dungeons and thrones, which the same hour re-
As heretofore, because ambition was self-will'd.

LXXXIII.

But this will nor endure, nor be endured! [felt.
Mankind have felt their strength, and made it
They might have used it better, but allured
By their new vigor, sternly have they dealt
On one another: pity ceased to melt
With her once natural charities. But they,
Who in oppression's darkness caved had dwelt,
They were not eagles, nourish'd with the day;
What marvel then, at times, if they mistook their prey?

LXXXIV.

What deep wounds ever closed without a scar?
The heart's blood longest, but heal to wear
That which disfigures it; and they who war [hear
With their own hopes, and have been vanquish'd,
Silence, but not submission: in his lair
Fix'd passion holds his breath, until the hour
Which shall atone for none; none need despair:
It came, it cometh, and will come,—the power to punish or forgive—in one we shall be slower.

LXXXV.

Clear, placid Leman! thy contrasted lake,
With the wild world I dwelt in, is a thing
Which warns me, with its stillness to forsake
Earth's troubled waters for a purer spring.
This quiet sail is as a noiseless wing
To waft me from distraction; once I loved
Torn ocean's roar, but thy soft murmuring
Sounds sweet as if a sister's voice repriev'd,
That I with stern delights should e'er have been so moved.
XCII.

The sky is chang'd!—and such a change! Oh night,
And storm, and darkness, ye are wondrous strong,
Yet lovely in your strength, as it the light
Of a dark eye in woman! Far along,
From peak to peak, the rattling crags among,
Leaps the live thunder! Not from one lone cloud,
But every mountain now hath found a tongue,
And Jura answers, through her misty shroud,
Back to the jevous Alps, who call to her aloud.

And this is in the night:—Most glorious night!
Thou wert not sent for slumber! let me be
A sharer in thy fierce and far delight,—
A portion of the tempest and of thee.
How the lit lake shines, a phosphoric sea,
And the big rain comes dancing to the earth!
And now again 'tis black, and now, the gleam
Of the loud hills shakes with its mountain birth,
As if they did rejoice o'er a young earthquake's birth.

Now, where the swift Rhone leaves his way between Heights which appear as lovers who have parted,
In hate, whose mining depths so intervene,
That they can meet no more, though broken-hearted.
Thou'rt in their souls, which thus each other thwarted.
Love was the very root of the fond rage [parted:
Which blighted their life's bloom, and then de-
Itself expired, but leaving them an age
Of years all winters,—war within them ives to wage.

Now, where the quick Rhone Thus hath cleft his way
The mightiest of the storms hath ta'en his stand:
For here, not one, but many, make their play,
And fling their thunderbolts from hand to hand,
Flashing and cast around: of all the band, 'foke'd
The brightest through these parted hills hath
His lightnings,—as if he did understand,
That in such gaps as desolation work'd,
There the hot shaft should blast whatever therein lurk'd.

Sky, mountains, river, winds, lake, lightnings! ye!
With night, and clouds, and thunder, and a soul
To make these felt and feeling, well may be Things that have made me watchful; the far roll
Of your departing voices, is the Abel
Of what in me is sleepless,—if I rest.
But where of ye, oh tempests! is the goal?
Are ye like those within the human breast?
Or do ye find, at length, like eagles, some high nest?

Could I embody and unbosom now,
That which is most within me,—could I wreak
My thoughts upon expression, and thus throw
Soul, heart, mind, passions, feelings, strong or weak,
All that I would have sought, and all I seek,
Bear, know, feel, and yet breathe—into one word,
And that one word were lightning, I would speak;
But as it is, I live and die unheard,

With a most voiceless thought, sheathing it as a

XCIII.

The morn is up again, the dewy morn,
With breath all intense, and with cheek all bloom
Laughing the clouds away with playful scorn.
And living as if earth contain'd no tomb,
And glowing into day; we may resume
The march of our existence: and thus I
Still on thy shoos, fair Leman! may find room
And food for meditation, nor pass by Much, that may give us pause, if ponder'd fittingly.

Clarens! sweet Clarens, birth-place of deep love,
Thine sir is the young breath of passionate thought!
Thy trees take root in love: the snows above
The very Glaciers have his colors caught,
And sunset into rose hues sees them wrought
By rays which sleep there lovingly; the rocks
The permanent crags, tell here of love, who sought
In them a refuge from the worldly shocks,
Which stir and sting the soul with hope that woos,
Then mocks.

Clarens! by heavenly feet thy paths are trod,
Undying love's, who here ascends a throne
To which the steps are mountains; where the god
Is a pervading life and light,—so shown
Not on those summits solely, nor alone
In the still cave and forest; o'er the flower
His eye is sparkling, and his breath hath blown
His soft and summer breath, whose tender power
Passes the strength of storms in their most desolate hour.

Cl.

All things are here of him; from the black pines.
Which are his shade on high, and the loud roar
Of torrents, where he listeneth, to the vines
Which slope his green path downward to the shore.
Where the bow'd waters meet him, and adore
Kissing his feet with murmurs; and the wood
The covert of old trees, with trunks all hoar,
But light leaves, young as joy, stands where it stood,
Offering to him, and his, a populous solitude.

CII.

A populous solitude of bees and birds,
And fairy-form'd and many-color'd things, [words,

Fearless and full of life; the gush of springs,
And fall of lofty fountains, and the bend
Of stirring branches, and the bud which brings
The swiftest thought of beauty, here extend,
Mingling, and made by Love, unto one mighty end.

CIII.

He who hath loved not, here would learn that love,
And make his heart a spirit: he who knows
That tender mystery, will love the more,
For this is love's recess, where vain men's woes,
And the world's waste, have driven him far from
For 'tis his nature to advance or die; [those
He stands not still, but or decays, or grows:
Into a boundless blessing, which may vie
With the immortal lights, in its eternity
CIV.
'Twas not for fiction chose Rousseau this spot,
Peopling it with affections; but he found
It was the scene which passion most allot
To the mind's purified beings; 'twas the ground
Where early Love his Psyche's zone unbound,
And hallow'd it with loveliness: 'tis lone,
And wonderful, and deep, and hath a sound,
And sense, and sight of sweetness: here the Rhone Hath spread himself a couch, the Alps have rear'd a thronve.

CV.

Lausanne! and Ferney! ye have been the abodes
Of names which unto you bequeath'd a name;
Mortals, who sought and found, by dangerous
A path to perpetuity of fame; [roads,
They were gigantic minds, and their steep aim
Was, Titan-like, on daring doubts to pile [flame Thoughts which should call down thunder, and the
Of heaven, again assaul'd, if heaven the while
On man and man's research could deign do more than smile.

CVI.
The one was fire and sickleness, a child,
Most mutable in wishes, but in mind;
A wit as various,—gay, grave, sage, or wild,—
Historian, bard, philosopher, combined;
He multiplied himself among mankind,
The Proteus of their talents; But his own
Breathed most in ridicule,—which, as the wind,
Blew where it listeth, laying all things prone,—
Now to o'erthrow a fool, and now to shake a throne.

CVII.
The other, deep and slow, exhausting thought,
And hiving wisdom with each studious year,
In meditation dwelt, with learning wrought,
And shaped his weapon with an edge severe,
Sapping a solemn creed with solemn sner;
The lord of irony,—that master-spell, [fear,
Which stung his foes to wrath, which grew from
And doom'd him to the zealot's ready Itell,
Which answers to all doubts so eloquently well.

CVIII.
Yet, peace be with their ashes,—for by them,
If merited, the penalty is paid;
It is not ours to judge,—far less condemn; [made
The hour must come when such things shall be Known unto all,—or hope and dread alay'd
By slumber, on one pillow,—in the dust,
Which, thus much we are sure, must lie decay'd;
And when it shall revive, as is our trust,
'Twill be to be forgiven, or suffer what is just.

CIX.
But let me quit man's works, again to read
His Maker's, spread around me, and suspend
This page, which from my reveries I feed,
Until it seems prolonging without end.
The clouds above me to the white Alps tend,
And I must pierce them, and survey whate'er
May be permitted, as my steps I bend
To their most great and growing region, where
The earth to her embrace compels the powers of air.
Canto IV.

"Aye be Toscan, Lombardis, Romagnis,
Quod Monte chuiride, e quel che semra

Armanda, Serata III.

Venice, January 2, 1818.

JOHN HOBH JUSE, ESQ., A.M. F.R.S.
&c., &c., &c.

MY DEAR HOUSE,

After an interval of eight years between the composition of the first and last cantos of Childe Harold, the conclusion of the poem is about to be submitted to the public. In parting with so old a friend, it is not extraordinary that I should recur to it still older and better—to one who has beheld the birth and death of the other, and to whom I am far more indebted for the social advantages of an enlightened friendship, than—though not ungrateful—I can or could be, to Childe Harold for any public favor reflected through the poem on the poet, to one, whom I have known long, and accompanied for; whom I have found wakeful over my sickness, and kind in my sorrow; glad in my prosperity, and firm in adversity; true in counsel, and trusty in peril—to a friend often tried and never found wanting—in yourself.

In so doing, I recur from fiction to truth, and in dedicating to you in its complete, or at least concluded state, a poetical work which is the longest, the most thoughtfull and comprehensive of my compositions, I wish to do honor to myself by the record of many years’ intimacy with a man of learning, of talent, of steadiness, and of honor. It is not for minds like ours to give or to receive flattery; yet the praises of sincerity have ever been permitted to the voice of friendship, and it is not for you, no, even for others, but to relieve a heart which has not elsewhere, or lately, been so much accustomed to the encounter of good-will as to withstand the shock firmly, ‘tis I thus attempt to commemorate your good qualities, or rather the advantages which I have derived from their exertion. Even the recurrence of the date of this letter, the anniversary of the most unfortunate day of my past existence, but which cannot poison my future, while I retain the resource of your friendship, and of my own faculties, will henceforth have a more agreeable recollection for both, insomuch as it will remind us of this my attempt to thank you for an indefatigable regard, such as few men have experienced, and one could experience without thinking better of his species and of himself.

It has been our fortune to traverse together, at various periods, the countries of chivalry, history, and fable—Spain, Greece, Asia Minor, and Italy: and what Athens and Constantinople were to us a few years ago, Venice and Rome have been more recently. The poem also, or the pilgrim, or both, have accompanied me from first to last; and perhaps it may be a pardonable vanity which induces me to reflect with complacency on a composition which in some degree connects me with the spot where it was produced, and the object, it would fail to describe; and however unworthy it may be deemed of those magical and memorable abodes, however short it may fall of our distant conceptions and immediate impressions, yet, as a mark of respect for what is venerable, and as a feeling for what is glorious, it has been to me a source of pleasure in the production, and I part with it with a kind of regret, which I hardly suspected that events could have left me for imaginary objects.

With regard to the conduct of the last canto, there will be found less of the pilgrim than in any of the preceding, and that little slightly, if at all, separated from the author speaking in his own person. The fact is, that I had become weary of drawing a line which every one seemed determined not to perceive: like the Chinche in Goldsmith’s “Citizen of the World,” whom nobody would believe to be a Chinese, it was in vain that I asserted, and imagined that I had drawn, a distinction between the author and the pilgrim; and the very anxiety to preserve this difference, and disappointment at finding it unavailing, so far crushed my efforts in the composition, that I determined to abandon it altogether—and have done so. The opinions which have been, or may be, formed on that subject, are now a matter of indifference; the work is to depend on itself, and not on the writer; and the author, who has no resources in his own mind beyond the reputation, transient or permanent, which is to arise from his literary efforts, deserves the fate of authors.

In the course of the following canto, it was my utention, either in the text or in the notes, to have touched upon the present state of Italian literature, and perhaps of manners. But the text, within the limits I proposed, I soon found hardly sufficient for the labyrinth of external objects and the consequent reflections; and for the whole of the notes, excepting a few of the shortest, I am indebted to myself, and these were necessarily limited to the elucidation of the text.

It is also a delicate, and no very grateful task, to dissert upon the art and manners of a nation so dissimilar; and requires an attention and impartiality which would induce us,—though perhaps no inattentive observers, nor ignorant of the language or customs of the people amongst whom we have recently abode,—to distrust, or at least defer our judgment, and more narrowly examine our information. The state of literary, as well as political party, appears to run, or to have run, so high, that for a stranger to steer impartially between them is next to impossible. It may be enough then, at least for my purpose, to quote from their own beautiful language,—"Mi pare che in un paese tutto poetico, che vanta la lingua più nobil ed insieme la più dolce, tutte tutte le vie diversi si possono tentare, e che sinche la patria di Alfieri e di Monti non ha perduto l'antico valore, in tutte esse dovrebbe essere la prima." Italy has great names still—Canova, Monti, Ugo Foscolo, Fidentemont, Visconti, Morelli, Ciccognara, Albrizzi, Mezzopphanti, Mai, Mustovidi, Aglietti, and Vacea, will surely, with the present generation an honorable place in most of the departments of Art, Science, and Belles Lettres; and in some of the very highest;—Europe—the World—has but one Canova.

It has been somewhere said by Alfieri, that "La piatta uomo masce più robusta in Italia che in qualunque altra terra—e chi gessi stessi stroci delitti chi vi si commettano ne sono una prova." Without subscribing to the latter part of his proposition, a dangerous doctrine, the truth of which may be disputed on better grounds, namely, that the Italians are in no respect more ferocious than their neighbors, that man must be willfully blind, or ignorantly heedless, who is not struck with the extraordinary capacity of this people, or, if such a word be admissible, their capabiliies, the facility of their acquisitions, the rapidity of their conceptions, the fire of their genius, their sense of beauty, and amidst all the disadvantages of repeated revolutions, the desolation of battles, and the despair of ages, their still unquenched "longing after immortality," the immortality of independence. And when we ourselves, in riding round the walls of Rome, heard the simple lament of the laborers' chorus, "Roma! Roma! Roma non è più come era prima,", it was difficult not to contrast this melancholy dirge with the bacehunal roar of the songs of exultation still yelled from the London taverns, over the carving of Mount St. Jean, and the betrayal of Genoa, of Italy, of France, and of the world, by men whose conduct you yourself have exposed in a work worthy of the better days of our history. For me,

"Non piace il mio cor a
Ora la torme di me ce lido son.

What Italy has gained by the late transfer of nations, it were useless for Englishmen to inquire, till it becomes ascertained that England has acquired something more than a permanent army and a suspended Habeas Corpus; it is enough for them to look at home. For what they have done abroad, and especially in the South, "Verily they will have their reward," and at no very distant period.

Wishing you, my dear Hobhouse, a safe and agreeable return to that country whose real welfare can be dearer to none than to yourself, I dedicate to you this poem in its completed state; and repeat once more how truly I am ever

Your obliged and affectionate friend,

BYRON.

I

I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs; 1
A palace and a prison on each hand:
I saw from out the wave her structures rise
As from the stroke of the enchanter's wand:
A thousand years their cloudy wings expand
Around me, and a dying glory smiles
O'er the far times, when many a subject bard
Look'd to the winged Lion's marble piles,
Where Venice sate in state, throned on her hundred isles!

II.

She looks a sea-Cybele fresh from ocean
Rising with her tiara of proud towers 2
At airy distance, with majestic motion,
A ruler of the waters and their powers,
And such she was; her daughters had their dovers
From spoils of nations, and the exquisites East
Pour'd in her lap all gems in sparkling showers
In purple was she robed, and of her feast
Monarchs partook, and deem'd their dignity in creased.

III.

In Venice, Tasso's echoes are no more, 3
And silent rows the soughing gondolier;
Her palaces are crumbling to the shore,
And music meets not always now the ear:
Those days are gone—but beauty still is here—
States fall, arts fade—but Nature doth not die;
Nor yet forget how Venice once was dear,
The pleasant place of all festivity,
The revel of the earth, the masque of Italy.

IV.

But unto us she hath a spell beyond
Her name in story, and her long array
Of mighty shadows, whose dim forms respond
Above the dogeless city's vanished way;
Ours is a trophy which will not decay
With the Rialto; Shylock and the Moor,
And Pierra, cannot be swept or worn away—
The keystones of the arch! though all were o'er
For us reproved were the solitary shore.

V.

The beings of the mind are not of clay;
Essentially immortal, they create
And multiply in us a brighter ray
And more beloved existence: that which fate
Prohibits to dull life, in this our state
Of mortal bondage, by these spirits supplied,
First exiles, then replaces what we hate;
Watering the heart whose early flowers have died.
And with a fresher growth replenishing the void.
VI.

such is the refuge of our youth and age,
The first from Hope, the last from Vacancy;
And this worn feeling peoples many a page,
And, may be, that which grows beneath mine eye;
Yet there are things whose strong reality
Outshines our fairy-hood; in shape and hues
More beautiful than our fantastic sky,
And the strange constellations which the Muse
O'er her wild universe is skilful to diffuse:

VII.

I saw or dream'd of such,—but let them go—
They came like truth, and disappear'd like dreams;
And whatso'er they were—are now but so:
I could replace them if I would; still teems
My mind with many a form which aptly seems
Such as I sought for, and at moments found;
Let these too go—for waking reason deems
Such overwhelming phantasties unsound,
And other voices speak, and other sights surround.

VIII.

I've taught me other tongues—and in strange eyes
Have made me not a stranger; to the mind
Which is itself, no changes bring surprise;
Nor is it harsh to make, nor hard to find
A country with,—ay, or without mankind;
Yet was I born where men are proud to be,
Not without cause; and should I leave behind
The invidiate isle of the sage and free,
And seek me out a home by a remote sea,

IX.

Perhaps I loved it well; and should I lay
My ashes in a soil which is not mine,
My spirit shall resume it—if we may Unbodied choose a sanctuary. I twine
My hopes of being remember'd in my line
With my land's language: if too fond and far
These aspirations in their scope incline,—
If my fame should be, as my fortunes are,
Of hasty growth and blight, and dull Oblivion bar

X.

My name from out the temple where the dead
Are honor'd by the nations—let it be—
And light the laurels on a loftier head!
And be the Spartan's epitaph on me
"Sparta hath many a worthier son than he." 4
Mormito I seek no sympathies, nor need;
The thorns which I have reap'd are of the tree
I planted,—they have torn me,—and I bleed;
I should have known what fruit would spring from such a seed.

XI.

The spouseless Adriatic mourns her lord;
And, annual marriage now no more renew'd,
The Buceantor lies rotting unrestored,
Neglected garment of her widowhood!
St. Mark yet sees his Lion where he stood 5
Stand, but in mockery of his wither'd power,
Over the proud place where an Emperor sued,
And monarchs gazed and envied in the hour
When Venice was a queen with an unequall'd dower.

XII.

The Sauubian sue, and now the Austrian reigns—
An Emperor tramples where an Emperor kneel'd;
Kingdoms are shrunk to provinces, and chains
Clank over sceptered cities; nations melt
From power's high pinnacle, when they have felt
The sunshine for a while, and downward go
Like lauine loosen'd from the mountain's belt;
Oh for one hour of blind old Dundolo! 7
Th' octogenarian chief, Byzantium's conquering foe

XIII.

Before St. Mark still glow his steeds of brass,
Their gilded collars glittering in the sun;
But is not Doria's menace come to pass? 8
Are they not bridled!—Venice, lost and won,
Her thirteen hundred years of freedom done
Sinks, like a sea-weed, into whence she rose!
Better be whelm'd beneath the waves, and shun
Even in destruction's depth, her foreign foes,
From whom submission wrings an infamous repose.

XIV.

In youth she was all glory,—a new Tyre,—
Her very by-word sprung from victory,
The "Planter of the Lion," 9 which through fire
And blood she bore o'er subject earth and sea;
Though making many slaves, herself still free,
And Europe's bulwark 'gainst the Ottomite;
Witness Troy's rival, Candia! Vouch it, ye
Immortal waves that saw Lepanto's fight!
For ye are names no time nor tyranny can blight.

XV.

Statues of glass—all shiver'd—the long file
Of her dead Doges are declined to dust;
But where they dwell, the vast and sumptuous pile
Bespakes the pageant of their splendid trust;
Their sceptre broken, and their sword in rust,
Have yielded to the stranger; empty halls,
Thick streets, and foreign aspects, such as must
Too oft remind her who and what enthral'd,
Have flung a desolate cloud o'er Venice's lovely walls.

XVI.

When Athens' armies fell at Syracuse,
And etter'd thousands bore the yoke of war
Redemption rose up in the Attic Muse, 11
Her voice their only ransom from afar;
See! as they chant the tragic hymn, the ear
Of the o'ermaster'd victor stops, the reins
Fall from his hands—his idle scimitar
Starts from its belt—he rends his captive's chains
And bids him thank the bard for freedom and his strains.

XVII.

Thus, Venice, if no stronger claim were thine,
Were all thy proud historic deeds forgot,
Thy choral memory of the Bard divine,
Thy love of Tasso, should have cut the knot
Which ties thee to thy tyrants; and thy lot
Is shameful to the nations,—most of all,
Albion! to thee: the Ocean queen should ne'er
Abandon Ocean's children; in the fall
Of Venice think of thine, despite thy watery wall
XVIII.

I loved her from my boyhood—she to me
Was as a fairy city of the heart,
Rising like water-columns from the sea,
Of joy the sojourn, and of wealth the mart;
And Otway, Radcliffe, Schiller, Shakspeare's art,13
Had stamp'd her image in me, and even so,
Although I found her thus, we did not part,
Perchance even dearer in her day of wo,

But from their nature will the tannen grow13
Loftiest on loftiest and least shelter'd rocks,
Rooted in barreness, where nought below
Of soil supports them 'gainst the Alpine shocks
Of eddying storms; yet springs the trunk, and moeks
The howling tempest, till its height and frame
Are worthy of the mountains from whose blocks
Of bleak, gray granite into life it came,
And grew a giant tree—the mind may grow the same.

Existence may be borne, and the deep root
Of life and sufferance make its firm abode
In bare and desolate bosoms: mute
The camel labors with the heaviest load,
And the wolf dies in silence, not bestow'd
In vain should such example be; if they,
Things of ignoble or of savage mood,
Endure and shrink not, we of nobler clay
May temper it to bear, it is but for a day.

All suffering doth destroy, or is destroy'd,
Even by the sufferer; and in each event,
Ends—Some with hope replenish'd and rebuoy'd,
Return to whence they came—with like intent,
And weave their web again; some, bow'd and bent,
Wax gray and ghastly, withering ere their time,
And perish with the reed on which they leant;
Some seek devotion, toil, war, good or crime,
According as their souls were form'd to sink or climb:

But ever and anon of griefs subdued
There comes a token like a scorpion's sting,
Scarce seen, but with fresh bitterness imbued;
And slight withal may be the things which bring Back on the heart the weight which it would fling
Aside for ever; it may be a sound—
A tone of music—summer's eve—or spring—
A flower—the wind—the ocean—which shall

And how and why we know not, nor can trace
Home to a cloud this lightning of the mind,
But feel the shock renew'd, nor can efface
The blight and blackening which it leaves behind
Which out of things familiar, undisguiz'd,
When least we deem of such, calls up to view
The spectres whom no exorcism can bind, [sown,
The cold—the changed—peregrine the dead—
The monk'd, the loved, the last—too many!—yet how few!

But my soul wanders; I demand it back
To meditate amongst decay, and stand
A ruin amidst ruins; there to track
Fall'n states and buried greatness, o'er a land
Which was the mightiest in its old command,
And is the loveliest, and must ever be
The master-mould of Nature's heavenly hand,
Wherein were cast the heroic and the free,
The beautiful, the brave—the lords of earth and sea.

The commonwealth of kings, the men of Rome!
And even since, and now, fair Italy!
Thou art the garden of the world, the home
Of all Art yields, and Nature can decree;
Even in thy desert, what is like to thee?
Thy very weeds are beautiful, thy waste
More rich than other climes' fertility;
Thy wreck a glory, and thy ruin grace
With an immaculate charm which can not be defaced.

The Moon is up, and yet it is not night—
Sunset divides the sky with her—a sea
Of glory streams along the Alpine height
Of blue Friuli's montains; Heaven is free
From clouds, but of all colors seems to be Melted to one vast Iris of the West,
Where the Day joins the past Eternity:
While, on the other hand, meek Dian's crest
Floats through the azure air—an island of the blest

A single star is at her side, and reigns
With her o'er half the lovely heaven; but still14
Yon sunny sea heaves brightly, and remains
Roll'd o'er the peak of the far Rhætan hill,
As Day and Night contending were, until
Nature reclaim'd her order—gently flows
The deep-dyed Brenta, where their hues instil
The odorous purple of a new-born rose,
Which streams upon her stream, and glasse'd within it glows,

Fill'd with the face of heaven, which, from afar,
Comes down upon the waters; all its hues,
From the rich sunset to the rising star,
Their magical variety diffuse,
And now they change; a paler shadow shows
Its mantle o'er the mountains; parting day
Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbrues
With a new color as it gasps away,
The last still loveliest, till—tis gone—and all is gray.
XXX.

There is a tomb in Arqua,—yard in air,
Pillar'd in their sarcophagus, repose
The bones of Laura's lover; here repair
Many familiar with his well-sung woes,
The pilgrims of his genius. He arose
To raise a language, and his land reclaim
From the dull yoke of her barbaric foes:
Watering the tree which bears his lady's name
With his melodious tears, he gave himself to fame.

XXXI.

They keep his dust in Arqua, where he died;
The mountain-village where his latter days
Went down the vale of years; and 'tis their pride—
An honest pride—and let it be their praise,
To offer to the passing stranger's gaze
His mansion and his sepulcre; both plain
And venerably simple, such as raise
A feeling more accordant with his strain,
Than if a pyramid form'd his monumental fame.

XXXII.

And the soft quiet hamlet where he dwelt
Is one of that complexion which seems made
For those who their mortality have felt,
And sought a refuge from their hopes decay'd
In the deep unbroken of a green hill's shade,
Which shows a distant prospect far away
Of busy cities, now in vain display'd,
For they can lure no further; and the ray
Of a bright sun can make sufficient holiday,—

XXXIII.

Developing the mountains, leaves and flowers,
And shining in the brawling brook, where-by,
Clear as its current, glide the sauntering hours
With a calm languor, which, though to the eye
Idlesse it seem, hath its morality,
If from society we learn to live.
'Tis solitude should teach us how to die;
It hath no flatterers; vanity can give
No hollow aid; alone—man with his God must strive:

XXXIV.

Or, it may be, with demons, who impair
The strength of better thoughts, and seek their prey
In melancholy bosoms, such as were
Of moody texture from their earliest day,
And loved to dwell in darkness and dismay,
Deeming themselves predestined to a doom
Which is not of the pangs that pass away;
Making the sun like blood, the earth a tomb,
The tomb a hell, and hell itself a munker gloom.

XXXV.

Ferrara! in thy wide and grass-grown streets,
Whose symmetry was not for solitude,
There seems as 'twere a curse upon the seats
Of former sovereigns, and the antique brook
Of Este, which for many an age made good
Its strength within thy walls, and was of yore
Patron or tyrant, as the changing mood
Of petty power impell'd, of those who wore
The wreath which Dante's brow alone had worn

XXXVI.

And Tasso is their glory and their shame.
Hark to his strain! and then survey his cell!
And see how dearly earn'd Torquato's fame,
And where Alfonso bade his poet dwell:
The miserable despot could not quell
The insulted mind he sought to quench, and blend
With the surrounding manias, in the hell
Where he had plunged it. Glory without end
Scatter'd the clouds away—and on that name attend.

XXXVII.

The tears and praises of all time; while thine
Would rot in its oblivion—in the sink
Of worthless dust, which from thy boasted line
Is shaken into nothing; but the link
Thou fornest in his fortunes bids us think
Of thy poor malice, naming thee with scorn—
Alfonso! how thy ducal pageants shrink
From thee! if in another station born,
Searce fit to be the slave of him thou mad'st to mourn:

XXXVIII.

'How! form'd to eat, and be despised, and die,
Even as the beasts that perish, save that thou
Hast a more splendid trough and wider sty:
He with a glory round his furrow'd brow,
Which emanated then, and dazzles now.
In face of all his foes, the Cruscan quire,
And Boileau, whose rash envy could allow
No strain which shamed his country's creaking
That whetstone of the teeth—monotony in wire!

XXXIX.

'Peace to Torquato's injur'd shade! 'twas his
In life and death to be the mark where Wrong
Aim'd with her poison'd arrows, but to miss.
Oh, victor unsurpass'd in modern song!
Each year brings forth its millions; but how long
The tide of generations shall roll on,
And not the whole combined and countless throng
Compose a mind like thine? though all in one
Condensed their scatter'd rays, they would not form a sun.

XL.

Great as thou art, yet parallè'd by those,
Thy countrymen, before thee born to shine—
The bards of Hell and Chivalry: first rose
The Tuscan father's comedy divine:
Then not unequal to the Florentine,
The southern Scott, the minstrel who call'd for a
A new creation with his magic line,
And, like the Ariosto of the North,
Sang lady-love and war, romance and knightly worth.

XLI.

The lightning rent from Ariosto's bust
The iron crown of laurel's mimic'd leaves
Nor was the ominous element unjust,
For the true laurel-wreath which Glory weaves
Is of the tree not bolt of thunder cleaves,
And the false semblance but disgraced his brow
Yet still if fondly Superstition grieves,
Know, that the lightning sanctifies below
Whate'er it strikes;—you head is doubly sacred now
XLII.

Italia! oh Italia! thou who hast
The fatal gift of beauty, which became
A funeral dwar of present woes and past,
On thy sweet brow is sorrow plough’d by shame,
And annals graved in characters of flame.
Oh God! that thou wert in thy nakedness
Less lovely or more powerful, and couldst claim
Thy right, and awe the robbers back, who press
To shed thy blood and drink the tears of thy distress:

XLIII.

Then might’st thou more appall; or, less desired,
Be homely and be peaceful, undeclored
For thy destructive charms; then, still untired,
Would not be seen the armed torrents pour’d
Down the deep Alpi; nor would the hostile horde
Of many-nation’d spoilers from the Po
Quaff blood and water; nor the stranger’s sword
Be thy sad weapon of defence, and so,
Victor or vanquish’d, thou the slave of friend or foe.

XLIV.

Wandering in youth, I traced the path of him,
The Roman friend of Rome’s least mortal mind,
The friend of Tully: as my bark did skin
The bright blue waters with a fanning wind,
 Came Megara before me, and behind
Egina lay, Piraeus on the right,
And Corinth on the left; I lay reclined
Along the prow, and saw all these unite
In ruin, even as he had seen the desolate sight;

XLV.

For Time hath not rebuilt them, but uprear’d
Barbaric dwellings on their shatter’d site,
Which only make more mourn’d and more endear’d
The few last rays of their far-scatter’d light,
And the crush’d relics of their vanish’d might.
The Roman saw these tombs in his own age,
These sepulchres of cities, which excite
Sad wonder, and his yet surviving page
The moral lesson bears, drawn from such pilgrimage.

XLVI.

That page is now before me, and on mine
His country’s ruin added to the mass
Of perish’d states he mourn’d in their decline,
And I in desolation: all that was
Of then destruction is; and now, alas!
Rome—Rome imperial, bows her to the storm,
In the same dust and blackness, and we pass
The skeleton of her Titanic form,
Wrecks of another world, whose ashes still are warm.

XLVII.

Yet, Italy! through every other land
Thy wrongs should ring, and shall, from side to side;
Mother of arts! as once of arms; thy hand
Was then our guardian, and is still our guide;
Parent of our Religion! whom the wide
Nations have knelt to for the keys of heaven!
Europe, repentant of her parricide,
Shall yet redeem thee, and, all backward driven,
Roll the barbarian tide, and sue to be forgiven.

XLVIII.

But Arno wins us to the fair white walls,
Where the Etrurian Athens claims and keeps
A softer feeling for her fairy halls.
Girt by her theatre of hills, she reaps
Her corn, and wine, and oil, and Plenty leaps
To laughing life, with her redundant horn.
Along the banks where smiling Arno sweeps,
Was modern Luxury of Commerce born.
And buried Learning rose, redeem’d to a new morn

XLIX.

There, too, the Goddess loves in stone, and fills
The air around with beauty; we inhale
The ambrosial aspect, which beheld, in situ
Part of its immortality; the veil
Of heaven is half undrawn; within the pale
We stand, and in that form and face behold
What mind can make, when Nature’s self would
And to the fond idolaters of old [jail;]
Envy the innate flesh which such a soul could mould:

L.

We gaze and turn away, and know not where,
Dazzled and drunk with beauty, till the heart
Reels with its fulness; there—for ever there—
Chains’d to the chariot of triumphal Art.
We stand as captives, and would not depart.
Away!—there need no words, nor terms precise,
The paltry jargon of the marble mart,
Where Pedantry gulls Folly—we have eyes:
Blood—pulse—and breast, confirm the Dardan Sheep
herd’s prize.

LI.

Appear’st thou not in Paris in this guise?—
Or to more deeply blest Anchises? or,
In all thy perfect goddess-ship, when lies
Before thee thy own vanquish’d Lord of War?
And gazing in thy face as toward a star,
Laid on thy lap, his eyes to thee upturn,
Feeding on thy sweet cheek?—while thy lips are
With lava kisses melting while they burn, Shower’d on his eyelids, brow, and mouth, as from an urn!

LII.

Glowing, and circumfused in speechless love,
Their full divinity inadequate.
That feeling to express, or to improve,
The gods become as mortals, and man’s fate
Ifs moments like their brightest; but the weight
Of earth recoils upon us.—let it go!
We can recall such visions, and create, [grow
From what has been, or might be, things which
Into thy statue’s form, and look like gods below.

LIII.

I leave to learned fingers, and wise hands,
The artist and his ape, to teach and tell
How well his connoisseurship understands
The graceful bend and the voluptuous swell;
Let these describe the undescribable: [stream
I would not their vile breath should crisp the Wherein that image shall for ever dwell;
The unruffled mirror of the loveliest dream
That ever left the sky on the deep soul to beam
LIV.

In Santa Croce's holy precincts lie
Ashes which make it holier, dust which is Even in itself an immortality.
Though there were nothing save the past, and this,
The particle of those sublimities
Which have elapsed to chaos,—here repose
Angelo's, Alfieri's bones, and his,
The starry Galileo, with his woes;
Cure Machiavelli's earth return'd to whence it rose.

These are four minds, which, like the elements,
Might furnish forth creation:—Italy!
Time, which hath wrong'd thee with ten thousand
Of thine imperial garment, shall deny,
And hath denied, to every other sky,
Spirits which soar from ruin:—thy decay
Is still impregnate with divinity,
Which gilds it with revivifying ray;
Such as the great of yore, Canova is to-day.

But where repose all the Etruscan three—
Dante, and Petrarch, and, scarce less than they,
The Bard of Frose, creative spirit! he
Of the Hundred Tales of love—where did they lay
Their bones, distinguish'd from our common clay.
In death as life? Are they resolved to dust,
And have their country's marble sought to say?
Could not her quarries furnish forth one bust?
Did they not to her breast their fillial earth intrust?

Ungrateful Florence! Dante sleeps afar,
Like Scipio, buried by the upbraiding shore;
Thy factions, in their worse than civil war,
Proscribed the bard whose name for evermore
Their children's children would in vain adore
With the remorse of ages; and the crown
Which Petrarch's laureate brow supremely wore,
Upon a far and foreign soil had grown,
His life, his fame, his grave, though rifted—not thine.

Boccaccio to his parent earth bequeath'd
His dust,—and lies it now her Great among,
With many a sweet and solemn requiem breathed
O'er him who form'd the Tuscan's siren tongue?
That music in itself, whose sounds are song,
The poetry of speech? No:—even his tomb
Uptorn, must bear the hyena bigot's wrong,
No more amidst the measer dead find room,
Nor claim a passing sigh, because it told for whom?

And Santa Croce wants their mighty dust,
Yet for this want more noted, as of yore
The Caesar's pageant, shorn of Brutus' bust,
Did but of Rome's best Son remind her more:
Happier Ravenna! on thy hoary shore,
Fortress of falling empire! honor'd sleeps
The immortal exile:—Arqua, too, her store
Of unequal relics proudly claims and keeps,
While Florence vainly begs her banish'd dead and

LX.

What is her pyramid of precious stones
Of phosphory, jasper, agate, and all hues
Of gem and marble, to encrust the bones
Of merchant-dukes? the momentary dews
Which, sparkling to the twilight stars, infuse
Freshness in the green turf that wraps the dead,
Whose names are the mausoleums of the muse,
Are gently prest with far more reverent tread
Than ever paced the slab which paves the princely head.

There be more things to greet the heart and eye,
In Arno's dome of Art's most princely shrine,
Where Sculpture with her rainbow sister vies;
There be more marvells yet—but not for mind;
For I have been accus'tomed to entwine
My thoughts with Nature rather in the fields,
Than Art in galleries: though a work divine
Calls for my spirit's homage, yet it yields
Less than it feels, because the weapon which it wields

LXII.

Is of another temper, and I roam
By Thrasimene's lake, in the deiles
Fatal to Roman rashness, more at home,
For there the Carthaginian's warlike wiles
Come back before me, as his skill beguiles
The host between the mountains and the shore.
Where Courage falls in her despairing files,
And torrents, swim to rivers with their gore,
Reek through the sultry plain, with legions scatter'd o'er

Like to a forest fell'd by mountain winds;
And such the storm of battle on this day,
And such the frenzy, whose convulsion blinds
To all save carnage, that, beneath the fray
An earthquake reel'd unheedingly away;
None felt stern Nature rocking at his feet,
And yawning forth a grave for those who lay
Upon their bucklers for a winding sheet;
Such is the absorbing hate when warring nations meet!

The Earth to them was as a rolling bark
Which bore them to Eternity: they saw
The Ocean round, but had no time to mark
The motions of their vessel; Nature's law,
In them suspended, reek'd not of the awe
[birds Which reigns when mountains tremble, and the Plunge in the clouds for refuge and withdraw
From their down-toppling nests; and bellowing

Stumbling o'er heaving plains, and man's dread hath

LXII.

Far other scene is Thrasimene now;
Her lake a sheet of silver, and her plain
Rent by no ravage save the gentle plough;
Her aged trees rise thick as once the slain
Lay where their roots are; but a brook hath ta'n
A little rill of scanty stream and bed—
A name of blood from that day's sanguine rain.
And Sanguinetto tells ye where the dead
Made the earth wet, and turn'd the unwilling waters red.
LYXVI.

But then Clitumnus! in thy sweetest wave

Of the most living crystal that was ever

The haunt of river nymphs, to gaze and lave

Her limbs where nothing hid them, thou dost rear

Thy grassy banks whereon the milk-white steer

Gazes; the purest god of gentle waters!

And most serene of aspect, and most clear;

Surely that stream was unprofaned by slaughters—

A mirror and a bath for Beauty’s youngest daughters!

LYXVII.

And on thy happy shore a temple still,

Of small and delicate proportion, keeps,

Upon a mild declivity of hill,

Its memory of thee; beneath it sweeps

Thy current’s cleanliness; oft from out it leaps

The finny darter with the glittering scales,

Who dwells and revels in thy grassy deeps;

While, chance, some scatter’d water-lily sails

Down where the shallower wave still tells its bubbling tales.

LYXVIII.

Pass not unblest the Genius of the place!

If through the air a zephyr more serene

Win to the brow, ’tis his; and if ye trace

Along his margin a more eloquent green,

If on the heart the freshness of the scene

Sprinkle its coolness, and from the dry dust

Of weary life a moment love it have clean

With Nature’s baptism,—’tis to him ye must Pay orisons for this suspension of disgust.

LYXIX.

The roar of waters! from the headlong height

Velino cleaves the wave-worn precipice;

The fall of waters! rapid as the light

The flashing mass foams shaking the abyss;

The hell of waters! where they howl and hiss,

And boil in endless torture; while the sweat

Of their great agony, wrung out from this

Their Phlegathon, curls round the rocks of jet

That girds the gulf around, in pitiless horror set,

LXX.

And mounts in spray the skies, and thence again

Returns in an unceasing shower, which round,

With its unempted cloud of gentle rain,

Is an eternal April to the ground,

Making it all one emerald—how profound

The gulf! and how the giant element

From rock to rock leaps with deliberate bound,

Crushing the cliffs, which, downward worn and rent

With his fierce footsteps, yield in chasms a fearful vent

Horribly beautiful! but on the verge,

An Iris sits, amidst the infernal surge,26

Like Hope upon a death-bed, and, unworn

Its steady dyes, while all around is torn

By the distracted waters, bears serene

Its brilliant hues with all its beams unshorn,

Resembling, ’mid the torture of the scene,

Love watching Madness with unalterable mien

Like spirits of the spot, as ’twere for fame.

For still they soar’d unutterably high;

I’ve look’d on Ida with a Trojan’s eye;

Yet such the fix’d inveracity wrought

By the impatience of my early thought,

That, with the freshness wearing out before

My mind could relish what it might have sought

If free to choose, I cannot now restore

Its health; but what it then detested, still abhor.

LXXVII.

Then farewell, Horace; whom I hat’d so,

Not for thy faults, but mine; it is a curse

To understand, to feel thy lyric flow,

To comprehend, but never love thy verse.

Although no deeper moralist rehearse

Our little life, nor Bard prescribe his art,

Nor livelier Satirist the conscience pierce,

Awakening without wounding the touch’d heart.

Yet fare thee well—upon Soracte’s ridge we part.
LXXVII.

Ch Rome! my country! city of the soul!
The orphans of the heart must turn to thee,
Lone mother of dead empires! and control
In their shrat breasts their petty misery.
What are our woes and sufferance? Come and see
The cypress, hear the owl, and plod your way
O'er steps of broken thrones and temples, Ye!
Whose agonies are evils of a day—
A world is at our feet as fragile as our clay.

LXXXIX.

The Niobe of nations! there she stands
Chillless and crownless, in her voiceless wo,
An empty urn, within her wither'd hands,
Whose holy dust was scatter'd long ago;
The Scipio's tomb contains no ashes now; 41
The very sepulchres lie tenantless
Of their heroic dwellers: dost thou flow,
Old Tiber! through a marble wilderness?
Rise, with thy yellow waves, and mantle her distress.

LXXX.

The Goth, the Christian, Time, War, Flood, and Fire,
Have dealt upon the seven-hill'd city's pride;
She saw her glories star by star expire,
And up the steep barbarian monarchs ride,
Where the car clumb'd the capitol; far and wide
Temple and tower went down, nor left a site—
Chaos of ruins! who shall trace the void,
O'er the dim fragments cast a lunar light,
And say, "here was, or is," where all is doubly night?

LXXXI.

The double night of ages, and of her,
Night's daughter, Ignorance, hath wrap't and wrap
All round us; we but feel our way to err:
The ocean hath his chart, the stars their map,
And Knowledge spreads them on her ample lap;
But Rome is as the desert, where we steer
Stumbling o'er recollections; now we clap
Our hands, and cry "Eureka!" it is clear—
When but some false mirage of ruin rises near.

LXXXII.

Alas! the lofty city! and alas!
The trebly hundred triumphs! 43 and the day
When Brutus made the dagger's edge surpass
The conqueror's sword in bearing fame away!
Alas, for Tully's voice, and Virgil's lay,
And Livy's pictured page!—but these shall be
Her resurrection; all beside—decay.
Alas, for Earth, for never shall we see
That brightness in her eye she bore when Rome was free!

LXXXIII.

Oh, thou, whose chariot roll'd on Fortune's wheel, 44
Triumphant Sylva! Thou, who didst subdue
My country's foes ere thou wouldst pause to feel
The wrath of thy own wrongs, or reap the due
Of hoarded vengeance till thine eagles flew
O'er prostrate Asia—thou, who with thyrown
Annihilated senates—Roman, too,
With all thy vices, for thou didst lay down
With an atoning smile a more than earthly crown—

LXXXIV.

The dictatorial wreath,—couldst thou div ne
To what would one day dwindle that which made
Thee more than mortal? and that so supine
By aught than Romans Rome should thus be laid!
She who was named Eternal, and array'd
Her warriors but to conquer—she who veil'd
Earth with her haughty shadow, and display'd,
Until the o'er-crowned horizon fall'd,
Her rushing wings—Oh! she who was Almighty half'd!

LXXXV.

Sylla was first of victors; but our own
The sagist of usurpers, Cromwell; he Too swept off senators while he hew'd the throne
Down to a block—immortal rebel! See
What crimes it costs to be a moment free
And famous through all ages! but beneath
His fate the moral lurks of destiny;
His day of double victory and death
Beheld him win two realms, and, happier, yield breath.

LXXXVI.

The third of the same moon whose former course
Had all but crown'd him, on the selfsame day
Depos'd him gently from his throne of force,
And laid him with the earth's preceding clay; 44
And show'd not Fortune thus how fam'd and away
And all we deem delightful, and consume
Our souls to compass through each arduous way,
Are in her eyes less happy than the tomb?
Were they but so in man's, how different were doom.

LXXXVII.

And thou, dread statue! yet exist in 45
The austerest form of naked majesty,
Thou who beheld'st 'mid the assassins' din,
At thy bathed base the bloody Caesar lie,
Folding his robe in dying dignity,
An offering to thine altar from the queen
Of gods and men, great Nemesis! did he die,
And thou, too, perish, Pompey? have ye been Victors of countless kings, or puppets of a scene?

LXXXVIII.

And thou, the thunder-stricken nurse of Rome, 46
She-wolf! whose brazen-imaged dugs impart
The milk of conquest yet within the dome
Where, as a monument of antique art,
Thou standest—Mother of the mighty heart,
Which the great founder suck'd from thy wild teat,
Searc'h'd by the Roman Jove's ethereal dart,
And thy limbs black with lightning—dost thou yet
Guard thine immortal cubs, nor thy fond charge forget?

LXXXIX.

Thou dost;—but all thy foster babes are dead—
The men of iron; and the world hath rear'd
Cities from out their sepulchres: men bled
In imitation of the things they fear'd, 46
And fought and conquer'd, and the same cours At aprod distance; but as yet none have
Nor could, the same supremacy have near'd,
Save one vain man, who is not in the grave,

Pax, var. quisque, by himself, to his own slaves a slave—
XC.
The foe of false dominion—and a kind
Of bastard Caesar, following him of old
With steps unequal: for the Roman's mind
Was model'd in a less terrestrial mould; 47
With passions fiercer, yet a judgment cold,
And an immortal instinct which redeem'd
The frailties of a heart so soft, yet bold,
Alicies with the dust now he seem'd.
At Cleopatra's feet,—and now himself he beam'd.

XCII.
And came—and saw—and conquer'd! But the man
Who would have tamed his eagles down to flee,
Like a train'd falcon, in the Gallic van,
Which he, in sooth, long led to victory,
With a deaf heart which never seem'd to be
A listener to itself, was strangely framed;
With but one weakest weakness—vanity,
Coquettish in ambition—still he aim'd—
At what? can he avouch—or answer what he claim'd?

XCIV.
And thus they plod in sluggish misery,
Rotting from sire to son, and age to age,
Proud of their trampled nature, and so die,
Bequeathing their hereditary rage
To the new race of inborn slaves, who wage
War for their chains, and rather than be free,
Bleed gladiator-like, and still engage
Withi? the same arena where they see
Their fo'wows fall before, like leaves of the same tree.

XCVI.
Can tyrants but joy tyrants conquer'd be,
And Freedom find no champion and no child
Such as Columbia saw arise when she Sprung forth a Pallas, arm'd and undefiled?
Or must such minds be nourish'd in the wild,
Deep in the unpruned forest, 'midst the roar
Of cataracts, where nursing Nature smiled
On infant Washington? Has Earth no more Such seeds within her breast, or Europe no vast shore?

XCVII.
But France got drunk with blood to vomit crime,
And fatal have her Saturnalia been
To Freedom's cause, in every age and clime:
Because the deadly days which we have seen,
And vile Ambition, that built up between
Man and his hopes an adaminite wall,
And the base pageant last upon the scene,
Are grown the pretext for the eternal thrall
Which nips life's tree, and dooms man's worst—his second fall.

XCVIII.
Yet, Freedom! yet thy banner, torn, but flying,
Screams like the thunder-storm against the wind
The trumpet voice, though broken now and dying
The loudest still the tempest leaves behind;
Thy tree hath lost its blossoms, and the wind,
Chopp'd by the axe, looks rough and little worth,
But the sap lasts,—and still the seed we find
Sown deep, even in the bosom of the North;
So shall a better spring less bitter fruit bring forth

XCIX.
There is a stern round tower of other days, 23
Firm as a fortress, with its fence of stone,
Such as an army's baffled strength delays,
Standing with half its battlements alone,
And with two thousand years of ivy grown,
The garland of eternity, where wave
The green leaves over all thy time o'erthrown—
What was this tower of strength? within its care
What treasure lay so lock'd, so hid?—A woman's grave.

Cl.
But who was she, the lady of the dead,
Tomb'd in a palace? was she chaste and fair?
Worthy a king's—or more—a Roman's bed?
What race of chiefs and heroes did she bear?
What daughter of her beauties was the heir?
How lived—how loved—how did she die? Was she
So honor'd—and conspicious there, [not
Where meaner relics must not dare to rot,
Placed to commemorate a more than mortal k t ?

Cl.
Was she as those who love their lords, or they
Who love the lords of others? such have been
Even in the olden time, Rome's annals say.
On the matron of Cornelia's mien,
Or the light air of Egypt's graceful queen,
Profuse of joy—or 'gainst it did she war,
Inveterate in virtue? did she lean
To the soft side of the heart, or wisely bar
Love from amongst her griefs?—for such the afflictions are.
CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE

CII.
Perchance she died in youth: it may be, bow'd
With woes far heavier than the ponderous tomb
That weigh'd upon her gentle dust, a cloud
Might gather o'er her beauty, and a gloom
In her dark eye, prophetic of the doom
Heaven gives its favorites—early death; yet shed
A sunset charm around her, and illumine
With hectic light, the Hesperus of the dead,
Of her consuming cheek the autumnal leaf-like red.

CIII.
Perchance she died in age—surviving all,
Charms, kindred, children—with the silver gray
On her long tresses, which might yet recall,
It may be, still a somathing of the day
When they were braided, and her proud array
And lovely form were envied, praised, and eyed
By Rome—but whither would Conjecture stray?
Thus much alone we know—Metella died,
The wealthiest Roman's wife; behold his love or pride!

CIV.
I know not why—but standing thus by thee,
It seems as if I had thine inmate known,
Thou tomb! and other days come back on me
With recollection musical, though the tone
Is changed and solemn, like the cloudy groan
Of dying thunder on the distant wind;
Yet could I seat me by this ivied stone
Till I had bodied forth the heated mind forms from the flowing wreck which Ruin leaves behind;

CV.
And from the planks, far shatter'd o'er the rocks,
Built me a little bark of hope, once more
To battle with the ocean and the shocks
Of the loud breakers, and the ceaseless roar
Which rushes on the solitary shore
Where all lies founder'd that was ever dear:
But could I gather from the wave-worn store
Enough for my rude boat, where should I steer?
There wos no home, nor hope, nor life, save what is here.

CVI.
Then let the winds howl on! their harmony
Shall henceforth be my music, and the night
The sound shall temper with the owlets' cry,
As I now hear them, in the fusing light
Dim o'er the bird of darkness' native site,
Answering each other on the Palatine, [bright,
With their large eyes, all glistening gray and
And sailing pinions.—Upon such a shrine
What are our petty griefs?—let me not number mine.

CVII.
Cypress and ivy, weed and wallflower grown
Matted and mass'd together, hilllocks heap'd
On what were chambers, arch crush'd, column
strown [steep'd
In fragments, choked up vaults, and frescoes in subterranean damps, where the owl peep'd,
Deeming it midnight:—Temples, baths, or halls?
Pronounce who can; for all that Learning reap'd
From her research hath been, that these are walls—
Behold the Imperia' Mount! 'tis thus the mighty falls. 81

CVIII.
There is the moral of all human tales; 82
'Tis but the same rehearsal of the past,
First Freedom, and then Glory—when that fails,
Wealth, vice, corruption,—barbarism at last.
And History, with all her volumes vast,
Hath but one page,—'tis better written here,
Where gorgeous Tyranny had thus amass'd
All treasures, all delights, that eye or ear,
Heart, soul could seek, tongue ask—Away with words! draw near,

CIX.
Admire, exult—despise—laugh, weep,—for here
There is such matter for all feeling:—Man,
Thou pendulum betwixt a smile and tear,
Ages and realms are crowded in this span,
This mountain, whose obliterated plan
The pyramid of empires pinnacled,
Of Glory's gewgag shining in the van
Till the sun's rays with added flame were fill'd!
Where are its golden roofs? where those who dared
To build?

CX.
Tully was not so eloquent as thou,
Thou nameless column with the buried base!
What are the laurels of the Caesar's brow?
Crowne me with ivy from his dwelling-place.
Whose arch or pillar meets me in the face,
Titus or Trajan's? No—'tis that of Time:
Triumph, arch, pillar, all he doth displace
Scotting; and apostolic statues climb
To crush the imperial urn, whose ashes slept sub lime, 83

CXI.
Buried in air, the deep blue sky of Rome,
And looking to the stars: they had contain'd
A spirit which with these would find a home
The last of those who o'er the whole earth reign'd,
The Roman globe, for after none sustain'd,
But yielded back his conquests:—he was more
Than a mere Alexander, and, unstain'd,
With household blood and wine, serenely wore
His sovereign virtues—still we Trajan's name adore. 84

CXII.
Where is the rock of Triumph, the high place
Where Rome embraced her heroes? where the Tarpeian? fittest goal of Tresason's race, 85
[steep
The promontory whence the Traitor's leap
Cured all ambition. Did the conquerors heap
Their spoils here? Yes; and in you field below,
A thousand years of silenced factions sleep—
The Forum, where the immortal accents glow,
And still the eloquent air breathes—burns with Cicero!

CXIII.
The field of freedom, faction, fame, and blood:
Here a proud people's passions were exhaled,
From the first hour of empire in the bud
To that when further worlds to conquer fail'd;
But long before had freedom's face been veil'd,
And Anarchy assumed her attributes;
Till every lawless soldier who assail'd
Trod on the trembling senate's slavish mute
Or raised the venal voice of baser prostitutes
CXIV.

Then turn we to her latest tribute’s name,
From her ten thousand tyrants turn to thee,
Redeemer of dark centuries of shame—
The friend of Petrarch—hope of Italy—
Rienzi! last of Romans! While the tree
Of freedom’s withered trunk puts forth a leaf,
Even for thy tomb a garland let it be—
The forum’s champion, and the people’s chief—
Her new-born Numa then—with reign, alas! too brief.

CXV.

Egeria! sweet creation of some heart
Which found no mortal-resting-place so fair
As thine ideal breast; whate’er thou art
Or wet,—a young Aurora of the air,
The nympholepsy of some fond despair;
Or, it might be, a beauty of the earth,
Who found a more than common votary there
Too much adoring; whatso’er thy birth,
Thou wert a beautiful thought, and softly bodied forth.

CXVI.

The mosses of thy fountain still are sprinkled
With thine Elysian water drops; the face
Of thy cave-guarded spring, with years unwrinkled,
Reflects the meek-eyed genius of the place,
Whose green, wild margin now no more erase
Art’s works; nor must the delicate waters sleep,
Prison’d in marble, bubbling from the base
Of the cleft statue, with a gentle leap
The rill runs o’er, and round, fern, flowers, and ivy creep

CXVII.

Fantastically tangled; the green hills
Are clothed with early blossoms, through the grass
The quick-eyed lizard rustles, and the bills
Of summer-birds sing welcome as ye pass;
Flowers fresh in hue, and many in their class
Implore the passing step, and with their dyes
Dance in the soft breeze in a fairy mass;
The sweetness of the violet’s deep blue eyes,
Kiss’d by the breath of heaven, seems color’d by its skies.

CXVIII.

Here didst thou dwell, in this enchanted cover,
Egeria! thy all heavenly bosom beaming
For the far footsteps of thy mortal lover;
The purple Midnight veil’d that mystic meeting
With her most starry canopy, and seating
Thyself by, thine adorer, what befell?
This cave was surely shaped out for the greeting
Of an enamoured Goddess, and the cell
Haunted by holy Love—the earliest oracle!

CXIX.

And didst thou not, thy breast to his replying,
Blend a celestial with a human heart;
And Love, which dies as it was born, in sighing,
Share with immortal transports? could thin’rt art
Make them indeed immortal, and impart
The purity of heaven to earthly joys,
Expel the venom and not blunt the dart—
The dull satiety which all destroy;
And root from out the soul the deadly weed which cloys?

CXXI.

Alas! our young affections run to waste
Or water but the desert; whence arise
But weeds of dark luxuriarice, tares of hate,
Rank at the core, though tempting to the eyes,
Flowers whose wild odors breathe but agonies,
And trees whose guns are poison; such the plan—
Which spring beneath her steps as Passion flies
O’er the world’s wilderness, and vainly pants
For some celestial fruit forbidden to our wants.

CXXII.

Oh Love! no habitant of earth thou art—
An unseen seraph, we believe in thee,
A faith whose martyrs are the broken heart,
But never yet hath seen, nor e’er shall see
The naked eye, thy form, as it should be;
The mind hath made thee, as it peopled heaven,
Even with its own desiring phantasy,
And to a thought such shape and image given,
As haunts the unquench’d soul—parch’d—wearied—wring’d—and riven.

CXXIII.

Of its own beauty is the mind diseased,
And fever into false creation:—where,
Where are the forms the sculptor’s soul hath seized
In him alone. Can Nature show so fair?
Where are the charms and virtues which we dare
Conceive in boyhood and pursue as men.
The unreach’d Paradise of our despair,
Which o’er-informs the pencil and the pen,
And overpowers the page where it would bloom again?

CXXIV.

Who loves, raves,—tis youth’s frenzy—but the cure
Is bitterer still; as charm by charm unwind
Which robid our idols, and we see too sure
Nor worth nor beauty dwells from out the mind’s
Ideal shape of such; yet still it binds
The fatal spell, and still it draws us on,
Reaping the whirlwind from the off-sown winds;
The stubborn heart, its alchemy begun,
Seems ever near the prize—wealthiest when most undone.

CXXV.

We wither from our youth, we gasp away—
Sick—sick; unfound the boon—unslak’d the thirst,
Though to the last, in verge of our decay,
Some phantom lures, such as we sought at first—
But all too late,—so are we doubly curst.
Love, fame, ambition, avarice—tis the same,
Each idle—and all ill—and none the worst—
For all are meteors with a different name,
And Death the sable smoke where vanishes the flame.

CXXVI.

Few—none—find what they love or could have loved,
Though accident, blind contact, and the strong
Necessity of loving, have removed Antipathies—but to recur, ere long,
Envenom’d with irrevocable wrong;
And Circumstance, that unspiritual god
And miscreator, makes and helps along
Our coming evils with a rush-like rod,
Whose touch turns Hope to dust,—the dust we all have trod.
CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE.

CXXVI.
Our life is a false nature—'tis not in
The harmony of things,—this hard decree,
This unedifying taint of sin,
This boundless upas, this all-blasting tree,
Whose root is earth, whose leaves and branches be
The skies which rain their plagues on men like dew—
Disease, death, bondage—all the woes we see—
And worse, the woes we see not—which throb through
The immedicable soul, with heart-aches ever new.

CXXVII.
Yet let us ponder boldly—'tis a base
Abandonment of reason to resign
Our right of thought—our last and only place
Of refuge; this at least, shall still be mine:
Though from our birth the faculty divine
Is chain'd and tortured—cabin'd, cribb'd, confined,
And bred in darkness, lest the truth should shine
Too brightly on the unprepared mind,
The beam pours in, for time and skill will couch the blind.

CXXVIII.
Arches on arches! as it were that Rome,
Collecting the chief trophies of her line,
Would build up all her triumphs in one dome,
Her Coliseum stands; the moonbeams shine
As 'twere its natural torches, for divine
Should be the light which streams here, to illumine
This long-explored but still exhaustless mine
Of contemplation; and the azure gloom
Of an Italian night, where the deep skies assume Hues which have words, and speak to ye of heaven,
Floats o'er this vast and wondrous monument,
And shadows forth its glory. There is given
Unto the things of the earth, which Time hath bent,
A spirit's feeling, and where he hath least
His hand, but broke his sorry, there is a power
And magic in the ruin'd battlement,
For which the palace of the present hour
Must yield its pomp, and wait till ages are its dower.

CXXX.
Oh Time! the beautifier of the dead,
Adornor of the ruin, comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled—
Time! the corrector where our judgments err,
The test of truth, love,—sole philosopher,
For all beside are sophists, from thy thrift,
Which never loses though it doth defer—
Time, the avenger! unto thee I lift
My hands, and eyes, and heart, and crave of thee a gift:

CXXXI.
Amidst this wrek, where thou hast made a shrine
And temple more divinely desolate,
Among thy mightier offerings here are mine,
Ruins of years—though few, yet full of fate:—
If thou hast ever seen me too late,
Hear me not; but if calmly I have borne
Good, and reserved my pride against the hat
Which shall not whelm me, let me not have worn
This iron in my soul in vain—shall they not murn?
CXXXVIII.

The seal is set.—Now welcome, thou dread power! Nameless yet thus omnipotent, which here Walk'st in the shadow of the midnight hour With a deep awe, yet all distinct from fear; Thy haunts are ever where the dead walls rear Their ivy mantles, and the solemn scene Derives from thee a sense so deep and clear That we become a part of what has been, \and\ grow onto the spot, all-seeing but unseen.

CXXXIX.

And here the buzz of eager nations ran, In murmurd pity, or loud-roar'd applause, As man was slaughter'd by his fellow-man. And wherefore slaughter'd? wherefore, but because Such were the bloody Circus' genial laws, And the imperial pleasure.—Wherefore not? What matters where we fall to fill the maws Of worms—on battle-plains or listed spot? \both\ are but theatres where the chief actors rot.

CXI.

I see before me the Gladiator lie: & He leans upon his hand—his manly brow Consents to death, but conquests agony. And his droop'd head sinks gradually low— And through his side the last drops, ebbing slow From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one, Like the first of a thunder-shower; and now The arena swims around him—he is gone, \ere\ ceased the inhuman shout which hail'd the wretch who won.

CXII.

He heard it, but he heeded not—his eyes Were with his heart, and that was far away. He reck'd not of the life he lost nor prize, But where his rudder lay by the Danube lay, \there\ were his young barbarians all at play, \there\ was their Dacian mother,—he, their sire, Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday— & All this rush'd with his blood—Shall he expire And unavenged?—Arise! ye Gothis, and glut your ire!

CXIII.

But here, where Murder breathed her bloody steam, And here, where buzzing nations chocked the ways, And roar'd or murmurd like a mountain stream Dashing or winding as its torrent strays; Here, where the Roman million's blame or praise Was death or life, the playthings of a crowd, & My voice sounds much—and fall the stars' faint rays On the arena void—seats crush'd—walls bow'd— &nd galleries, where my steps seem echoes strangely loud.

CXIII.

A ruin—yet what ruin! from its mass Walls, palaces, half-cities have been rear'd; Yet oft the enormous skeleton ye pass, And marvel where the spoil could have appear'd. Hath it indeed been plunder'd, or but clear'd? Alas! developed, opens the decay, When the colossal fabric's form is near'd; It will not bear the brightness of the day, Which streams too much on all years, man, have \ret\ away.

CXLIV.

But when the rising moon begins to climb Its topmost arch, and gently pauses there; When the stars twinkle through the loops of time And the low night-breeze waves along the air The garland-forest, which the gray walls wear, Like laurels on the bald first Caesar's head; & When the light shines serene but doth not glare Then in this magic circle raise the dead: Heroes have trod this spot—tis on their dust ye tread.

CXLV.

"While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand; & "When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall; & "And when Rome falls—the World." From our \own\ land Thus spake the pilgrims o'er this mighty wall In Saxon times, which we are wont to call Ancient; and these three mortal things are still On their foundations, and unalter'd all; Rome and her Ruin past Redemption's skill, The World, the same wide den—of thieves, or what ye will.

CXLVI.

Simple, erect, severe, austere, sublime— Shrine of all saints and temple of all gods, From Jove to Jesus—spared and blest by time; Looking tranquillity, while falls or nods Arch, empire, each thing round thee, and man plods His way through thorns to ashes—glorious dome! Shalt thou not last? Time's scythe and tyrant's Shiver upon thee—sanctuary and home \rots Of art and Piety—Pantheon!—pride of Rome!

CXLVII.

Relic of nobler days, and noblest arts! Despoil'd yet perfect, with thy circle spreads A holiness appealing to all hearts— To art a model; and to him who treads Rome for the sake of ages, Glory shall Her light through thy sole aperture; to those Who worship, here are altars for their beads; And they who feel for genius may repose Their eyes on honored forms, whose busts \around them close.

CXLVIII.

There is a dungeon, in whose dim drear light & What do I gaze on? Nothing: Look again! Two forms are slowly shadow'd on my sight— Two insuluted phantoms of the brain: It is not so; I see them full and plain— An old man, and a female young and fair, Fresh as a nursing mother, in whose vein The blood is nectar:—but what does she there, With her unman'ted neck, and bosom white & bare?

CXLIX.

Full swells the deep pure fountain of young life, Where on the heart, and \from the heart we took Our first and sweetest nurture, when the wise, Blest into mother, in the innocent look, Or even the piping cry of lips that brook No pain and small suspense, a joy perceives Man knows not, when from out its cradled neck She sees her little bud put forth its leaves— What may the fruit be yet?—I know not—Cain was Eve's.
CHILDE HAROLD’S PILGRIMAGE.

CL.

But her youth offers to old age the food,
The milk of his own gift:—it is her sire
To whom she renders back the debt of blood
Born with her birth. No; he shall not expire
While in those warm and lovely veins the fire
Of health and holy feeling can provide [higher
Great Nature’s Nile, whose deep stream rises
Than Egypt’s river—from that gentle side Drink, drink and live, old man! Heaven’s realm holds no such tide.

CLII.

The starry fable of the milky way
Has not thy story’s purity; it is
A constellation of a sweeter ray,
And sacred Nature triumphs more in this Reverse of her decree, than in the abyss
Where sparkle distant worlds:—Oh, holiest nurse!
No drop of that clear stream its way shall miss
To thy sire’s heart, replenishing its source
With life, as our freed souls reunite the universe.

CLIII.

To turn to the Mole which Hadrian rear’d on high,
Imperial mimic of old Egypt’s piles,
Colossal copyist of deformity,
Whose travell’d phantasy from the far Nile’s
Enormous model, doom’d the artist’s toils
To build for giants, and for his vain earth,
His shrunken ashes, raise this dome: How smiles
The gazer’s eye with philosophic mirth,
To view the huge design which sprung from such a birth!

CLIV.

But lo!—the dome—the vast and wondrous dome,
To which Diana’s marvel was a cell—
Christ’s mighty shrine above his martyr’s tomb!
I have beheld the Ephesian’s miracle—
Its columns strew the wilderness, and dwell
The hyena and the jackall in their shade;
I have beheld Sophia’s bright roofs dwell
Their glittering mass I the sun, and have survey’d
Its sanctuary the while the usurping Moslem pray’d.

CLV.

But thou, of temples old, or altars new,
Standest alone—with nothing like to thee—
Worthiest of God, the holy and the true,
Since Zion’s desolation, when that He
Forsook his former city, what could be,
Of earthly structures, in his honor piled,
Of a sublimer aspect? Majesty,
Power, Glory, Strength, and Beauty, all are aiding
In this eternal arch of worship undefiled.

CLVI.

Enter: its grandeur overwhelms thee not;
And why? it is not lessend; but thy mind,
Expanded by the genius of the spot,
Has grown colossal, and can only find
A fit abode wherein appear enshrined
Thy hopes of immortality; and thou
Shalt one day, if found worthy, so defined,
See thy God face to face, as thou dost now
His Holy of Holies, nor be blasted by his brow.

CLVII.

Thou movest—but increasing with the advance,
Like climbing some great Alp, which still doth rise,
Deceived by its gigantic elegance;
Vastness which grows—but grows to harmonize—
All musical in its immensities;
[flame
Rich marbles—richer painting—shrines where
The lamps of gold—and haughty dcurn which vie
In air with Earth’s chief structure, though their

Sits on the firm-set ground—and this the clouds must claim.

CLVIII.

Thou seest not all; but piecemeal thou must break
To separate contemplation, the great whole;
And as the ocean many bays will make,
That ask the eye—so here condense thy soul
To more immediate objects, and control
Thy thoughts until thy mind hath got by heart
Its eloquent proportions, and unroll
In mighty gradations, part by part,
The glory which at once upon thee did not dart,

CLIX.

Then pause, and be enlightened; there is more
In such a survey than the sating gaze
Of wonder pleased, or awe which would adore
The worship of the place, or the mere praise
Of art and its great masters, who could raise
What former time, nor skil, nor thought could
The fountain of sublimity displays [plan:
Its depth, and thence may draw the mind of man
Its golden sands, and learn what great conceptions can.

CLX.

Or, turning to the Vatican, go see
Laocoön’s torchy dignifying pain—
A father’s love and mortal’s agony
With an immortal’s patience blending:—Vain
The struggle; vain against the coiling strain
And grip, and deepening of the dragon’s grasp,
The old man’s cleft; the long envenomed chain.
Rivets the living links,—the enormous sap
Enforces pang on pang, and stifles gasp on gasp.

CLXI.

Or view the Lord of the unerring bow,
The God of life, and poesy, and light—
The Sun in human limbs array’d, and brow
All radiant from his triumph in the fight;
The shaft hath just been shot—the arrow bright
With an immortal’s vengeance; in his eye
And nostril beautiful disdain, and might,
And majesty, flash their full lightnings by Developing in that one glance the Deity.
CLXII.

But in his delicate form—a dream of Love,
Shaped by some solitary nymph, whose breast
Long'd for a deathless lover from above,
And madden'd in that vision—are express
All that ideal beauty ever bless'd
The mind with in its most unearthly mood,
When each conception was a heavenly guest—
A ray of immortality—and stood;
But like around, until they gather'd to a god.

CLXIII.

And if it be Promethens stole from Heaven
The fire which we endure, it was repaid
By him to whom the energy was given
Which this poetic marble hath array'd
With an eternal glory—which, if made
By human hands, is not of human thought;
And Time himself hath hallow'd it, nor laid
One ringlet in the dust—nor hath it caught
A tinge of years, but breathes the flame with which
'twas wrought.

CLXIV.

But where is he, the Pilgrim of my song,
The being who upheld it through the past?
Methinks he cometh late and tardies long.
He is no more;—these breathings are his last,
His wanderings done, his visions ebbing fast;
And he himself as nothing—if he was
Aught but a phantasy, and could be class'd
With forms which live and suffer—let that pass—
His shadow fades away into Destruction's mass,

CLXV.

Which gathers shadow, substance, life, and all
That we inherit in its mortal shroud,
And spreads the dim and universal pall [cloud
Through which all things grow phantoms; and the Between us sinks and all which ever glowed,
Till Glory's self is twilight, and displays
A melancholy halo scarce allow'd
To hover on the verge of darkness; rays
Sadder than saddest night, for they distract the gaze,

CLXVI.

And send us prying into the abyss
To gather what we shall be when the frame
Shall be resolved to something less than this
Its wretched essence; and to dream of fame,
And to wipe the dust from off the idle name
We never more shall hear,—but never more,
Oh, happier thought! can we be made the same?
It is enough in sooth that once we bore
These fardels of the heart—the heart whose sweat was gore.

CLXVII.

Hark! forth from the abyss a voice proceeds,
A long low distant murmur of dread sound,
Such as arises when a nation bleeds
With some deep and immedicable wound; [ground;
Through storm and darkness yawns the rending
The gulf is thick with phantoms, but the chief
Seems royal still, though with her head discrow'd,
And pale, but lovely, w'th maternal grief
We clasps a babe to whom her breast yields no relief.

CLXVIII.

Scior of chiefs and monarchs, where art thou?
Fond hope of many nations, art thou dead?
Could not the grave forget thee, and lay low
Some less majestic, less beloved head?
In the sad midnight, while thy heart still bled,
The mother of a moment, o'er thy boy,
Death hush'd that pang for ever; with thee fled
The present happiness and promised joy
Which fill'd the imperial isles so full it seem'd to oey

CLXIX.

Peasants bring forth in safety.—Can it be,
Oh thou that wert so happy, so adored!
Those who weep not for kings shall weep for thee,
And Freedom's heart, grown heavy, cease to bear
Her many griefs for One; for she had pour'd
Her orisons for thee, and o'er thy head
Beheld her Iris.—Thou, too, lonely lord,
And desolate consort—vainly wert thou wed!
The husband of a year! the father of the dead!

CLXX.

Of sackcloth was thy wedding garment made;
Thy bridal fruit is ashes: in the dust
The fair-hair'd Daughter of the Isles is laid,
The love of millions! How we did intrust
Futurity to her! and, though it must Darken above our bones, yet fondly deem'd
Our children should obey her child, and bless'd
Her and her hoped-for seat, whose promise seem'd
Like stars to shepherd's eyes:—twas but a meteor beam'd.

CLXXI.

We unto us, not her; for she sleeps well:
The sickle reek of popular breath, the tongue
Of hollow counsel, the false oracle,
Which from the birth of monarchy hath rung
Its knell in princely ears, till the o'erstung
Nations have arm'd in madness, the strange fate
Which stumbles mightiest sovereigns, and hath Against their blind omnipotence a weight [hung
Within the opposing scale, which crushes soon or late,—

CLXXII.

These might have been her destiny; but no,
Our hearts deny it: and so young, so fair,
Good without effort, great without a foe;
But now a bride and mother—and now there!
How many ties did that stern moment tear!
From thy Sire's to his humblest subject's breast
Is link'd the electric chain of that despair,
Whose shock was as an earthquake's, and oppres
The land which loved thee so that none could live thee best

CLXXIII.

To Lo, Nemi! navell'd in the woody hills
So far, that the uprooting wind which tears
The oak from his foundation, and which spills
The ocean o'er its boundary, and bears
Its foam against the skies, reluctant spares
The oval mirror of thy glassy lake;
And, calm as cherish'd hate, its surface wears
A deep cold settled aspect nought can shake,
All coil'd into itself and round. as sleeps the snake
CLXXIV.

And near Albano's scarce divided waves
Chine fro a a sister valley:— and afar
The Tiber winds, and the broad ocean laves
The Latian coast where sprang the Epic war,
"Arms and the Man," whose resounding star
Rose o'er an empire:—but beneath thy right
Tully reprosed from Rome:— and where you bar
Of girdling mountains intercepts the sight,
The Sabine farm was till'd, the weary hards delight.

CLXXV.

But I forget.—My Pilgrim's shrine is won,
And he and I must part,—so let it be,—
His task and mine alike are nearly done;
Yet once more let us look upon the sea;
The midland ocean breaks on him and me,
And from the Alban Mount we now behold
Our friend of youth, that ocean, which when we Beheld it last by Calpe's rock unfold
Those waves, we follow'd on till the dark Euxine roll'd

CLXXVI.

Upon the blue Symplegades: long years—
Long, though not very many, since have done
Their work on both; some suffering and some tears
Have left us nearly where we had begun:
Yet not in vain our moral race hath run,
We have had our reward—and it is here:
That we can yet feel gladdened by the sun,
And reap from earth, sea, joy almost as dear
As if the were no man to trouble what is clear.

CLXXVII.

Oh! that the desert were my dwelling-place
With one fair Spirit for my minister,
That I might all forget the human race,
And, hating no one, love but only her!
Ye Elements!—in whose ennobling stir
I feel myself exalted—Can ye not Accord me such a being? Do I err
In deeming such inhabit many a spot?
Though with them to converse can rarely be our lot.

CLXXVIII.

There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
There is society, where none intrudes,
By the deep S. a, and music in its roar:
I love not Man the less, but Nature more,
From these our interviews, in which I steal
From all I may be, or have been before,
To mingle with the Universe, and feel
What I can never express, yet cannot all conceal.

CLXXIX.

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue ocean—roll!
Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
Stops with the shore;—upon the watery plain
The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
A shadow of man's ravage, save his own,
When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
Without a grave, unknell'd, uncoffin'd, and un

CLXXX.

His steps are not upon thy paths,—thy fields
Are not a spoil for him,—thou dost arise [wields
And shake him from thee: the vile strength be
For earth's destruction thou dost all despise,
Spurn him from thy bosom to the skies,
And send'st him, shivering in thy playful spray
And howling, to his Gods, where haply lies
His petty hope in some near port or bay,
And dashest him again to earth:—there let him stay.

CLXXXI.

The armaments which thunderstrike the walls
Of rock-built cities, bidding nations quake,
And monarchs tremble in their capitals,
The oak leviathans, whose huge ribs make
Their clay creator the vain title take
Of lord of thee, and arbiter of war:
These are thy toys, and, as the snowy flake,
They melt into thy yest of waves, which raw
Alike the Armada's pride, or spoils of Trafalgar.

CLXXXII.

Thy shores are empires, changed in all save thee—
Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthagc, what are they?
Thy waters wasted them while they were free,
And many a tyrant since; their shores obey
The stranger, slave, or savage; their decay
Has dried up realms to deserts:—not so thou,
Unchangeable save to thy wild waves' play—
Time writes no wrinkle on thy azure brow—
Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now.

CLXXXIII.

Thou glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form
Glasses itself in tempests: in all time,
Chill or convulsed—in breeze, or gale, or storm.
Icing the pole, or in the torrid clime
Dark-heaving:—boundless, endless, and sublime—
The image of Eternity—the throne
Of the Invisible; even from out thy elims
The monsters of the deep are made; each zone
Obeyes thee; thou goest forth, dread, fathomless alone.

CLXXXIV.

And I have loved thee, Ocean! and my joy
Of youthful sports was on thy breast to be—
Borne, like thy bubbles, onward: from a boy
I wan'ton'd with thy breakers—they to me.
Were a delight; and if the freshening sea
Made them a terror—twas a pleasing fear,
For I was as it were a child of thee,
And trusted to thy billows far and near,
And laid my hand upon thy mane—s I do here
My task is done—my song hath ceased—my theme has died into an echo; it is fit to
The spell should break of this protracted dream.
The torch shall be extinguish'd which hath lit my midnight lamp—and what is writ, is writ,—
Would it were warmer! but I am not now
That which I have been—and my visions fit
Less palpably before me—and the glow
Which in my spirit dwelt is fluttering, faint, and low.

Yes! sigh'd o'er Delphi's long deserted shrine.

The little village of Castri stands partly on the site of Delphi. Along the path of the mountain, from Chryso, are the remains of sepulchres hewn in and from the rock. "One," said the guide, "of a king who broke his neck hunting." His majesty and certainly chosen the fittest spot for such an achievement.

A little above Castri is a cave, supposed the Pythian, of immense depth; the upper part of it is paved, and now a cow-house.

On the other side of Castri stands a Greek monastery; some way above which is the cleft in the rock, with a range of caverns difficult of ascent, and apparently leading to the interior of the mountain; probably to the Corycian Cavern mentioned by Pausanias. From this part descend the fountain and the "Dews of Castalie."

And rest ye at our "Lady's house of we."

The Convent of "Our Lady of Punishment," Nossa Senora de Pena, on the summit of the rock. Below, at some distance, is the Cork Convent, where St. Honorius dug his den, over which is his epitaph. From the hills, the sea adds to the beauty of the view.

NOTES TO CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE.

CANTO I.

Throughout this purple land, where law secures not life.

It is a well known fact, that in the year 1809 the assassinations in the streets of Lisbon and its vicinity were not confined by the Portuguese to their countrymen; but that Englishmen were daily butchered: and so far from redress being obtained, we were requested not to interfere if we perceived any compatriot defending himself against his allies. I was once stopped in the way to the theatre at eight o'clock in the evening, when the streets were not more empty than they generally are at that hour, opposite to an open shop and in a carriage with a friend; had we not fortunately been armed, I have not the least doubt that we should have adorned a tale instead of telling one. The crime of assassination is not confined to Portugal; in Sicily and Malta we are knocked on the head at a handsome average nightly, and not a Sicilian or Maltese is ever punished!

Behold the hall where chiefs were late convened!

The Convention of Cintra was signed in the palace of the Marchese Marialva. The late exploits of Lord Wellington have effaced the follies of Cintra. He has, indeed, done wonders; he has perhaps changed the character of a nation, reconciled rival superstitions, and baffled an enemy who never retreated before his predecessors.

No! as he speeda; he chants, "Vivat el Rey!"

Stanza xlviii. line 5.

Vivat el Rey Fernando! Long live King Ferdinand! is the chorus of many of the Spanish patriotic songs: they are chiefly in dispraise of the old king Charles, the Queen, and the Prince of Peace. I have heard many of them; some of the airs are beautiful. God, y, the Principe de la Paz, was born at Badajoz, on the frontiers of Portugal, and was originally in the ranks of the Spanish Guards, till his person attracted the queen's eyes, and raised him to the dukedom of Alcudia, &c. &c. It is to this man that the Spaniards universally impute the ruin of their country.

The Honorable J. W of the Guards, who died of a fever at Cippena. I had known him ten years, the better half of his life, and the happiest part of mine.

In the short space of one month I had lost her who gave me being, and most of those who had made that being tolerable. To me the lines of Young are no fiction:

"Insatiate archer! could not one suffice? Thy shaft flew thrice, and thrice my peace was slain, And thrice ere thine moon had filled her horn."

I should have ventured a verse to the memory of the late Charles Skinner Matthews, Fellow of Downing College, Cambridge, were he not too much above all praise of mine. His powers of mind, shown in the attainment of greater honors, against the ablest candidates, than those of any graduate on record at Cambridge, have sufficiently established his fame on the spot where it was acquired: while his softer qualities live in the recollection of friends who loved him too well to envy his superiority.

CANTO II.

---despite of war and wasting fire---

Stanza i. line 1.

Part of the Acropolis was destroyed by the explosion of a magazine during the Venetian siege.
2.
But worse than steel and flame, and ages slow,
Is the dread sceptre and dominion dire
Of men who never felt the sacred gloe
That thoughts of thee and thine on polish'd breasts bestow.

Stanza 1. line 5.

We can all feel, or imagine, the regret with which the ruins of cities, once the capitals of empires, are beheld; the reflections suggested by such objects are too trite to require recapitulation. But never did the littleness of man, and the vanity of his very best virtues of patriotism to exalt, and of valor to defend his country, appear more conspicuous than in the record of what Athens was, and the certainty of what she now is. This theatre of contention between mighty factions, of the struggles of orators, the exaltation and deposition of tyrants, the triumph and punishment of generals, is now become a scene of petty intrigue and per; eternal disturbance, between the bickering agents of certain British nobility and gentry. "The wild foxes, the owls and serpents in the ruins of Babylon," were surely less degrading than such inhabitants. The Turks have the plea of conquest for their tyranny, and the Greeks have only suffered the fortune of war, incidental to the bravest; but how many of the petty fallen, when two painters contest the privilege of plundering the Parthenon, and triumph in turn, according to the tenor of each succeeding firm? Sylla could but punish, Philip subdue, and Xerxes burn Athens; but it remained for the policy antiquarian, and his despotic agents, to render her contemptible as himself and his pursuits.

The Parthenon, before its destruction in part, by fire, during the Venetian siege, had been a temple, a church, and a mosque. In each point of view it is an object of regard: it changed its worshippers; but still it was a place of worship three sacred to devotion; its violation is a triple sacrilege. But

"Man, vain man,
Drest in a little brief authority,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
As make the angels weep."

Far on the solitary shore he sleeps.

Stanza v. line 2.

It was not always the custom of the Greeks to burn their dead; the greater Ajax, in particular, was interred entire. Almost all the chiefs became gods after their decease; and he was indeed neglected, who had not annual games near his tomb, or festivals in honor of his memory by his countrymen, as Achilles, Braxidas, &c., and at last even Antigone, whose death was as heroic as his life was infamous.

To rise what God, and Turk, and Time have spared.

Stanza xii. line 2.

At this moment, (January 3, 1809,) besides what has been already deposited in London, an Hydriot vessel is in the Pyrenees to receive every portable relic. Thus, as I heard a young Greek observe, in common with many of his countrymen—for, lost as they are, they yet feel for this occasion—thus may Lord Elgin boast of laying ruined Athens. An Italian painter of the first eminence, named Lusieri, is the agent of devastation; and like the Greek finder of Verres in Sicily, who followed the same profession, he has proved the able instrument of plunder. Between this artist and the French Consul, I was told, a dispute was prosecuted, during which Elgin has been extremely happy in his choice of Signor Lusieri. During a residence of ten years in Athens, he never had the curiosity to proceed as far as Sanium, till he accompanied us in our second excursion. However, his works, as far as they go, are most beautiful; but they are almost all unfinished. While he and his patrons confine themselves to tanding medals, appreciating cameos, sketching columns, and cheapening gems, their little abode here as more as harmless as fox-hunting, maiden speechifying, baroche-driving, or any such pastime; but when they carry away three or four shiploads of the most valuable and massy relics that time and barbarism have left to the injury of his beloved monument, and of which they destroy, in a vain attempt to tear down, those works which have been the admiration of ages, I know no motive which can excuse, no name which can designate the perpetrators of this dishonorable and discreditable act. It was no little loss of some of the crimes laid to the charge of Verres, that he had plundered Sicily, in the manner since imitated at Athens. The most unblushing impudence could hardly go farther than to affix the name of his plunderer to the walls of the Aeropolis; while the wanton and useless defacement of the whole range of the basso-relievoa, in one compartment of the temple, will never permit that name to be pronounced by an observer without execration, bribery to

* New Cape Colonna. In all Arians, if we except Athens itself, and Marathon, there is no more interesting than Cape Colonna. To the antiquary and artist, sixteen columns are an inexhaustible source of observation and design; to the philosopher, the supposed scene of some of Plato’s conversations will not be unwelcome; and the traveller will be struck with the beauty of the prospect over "Isles that crown the Aegean deep!" but for an Englishman, Colonna has yet an additional interest, as the actual spot of Polomani’s shipwreck. Pallis and Fossati are forgotten in the recollected of Palomani and Cambell.

* Here in the dead of night by Louna’s sleep.

The thunder was heard along the deep."

This temple of Minerva may be seen at some a great distance. In two journeys which I made, and one voyage to Cape Colonna, the view from other side, &c. is, when asked those who, in our second land extension, we had a narrow escape from a party of Mazaris, concealed in the cavern beneath. We were told afterwards, by one of our princesses subsequently acquainted, that they were determined four times to attack the appearance of my two Athenians: contemplating very stupidly, but falsely, that we had a complete garrison of these Amazons at hand, they remained stationary, and thus saved our party, which was too small to have opposed any effectual resistance.

Colonna is no less a resort of pirates than of piracies: there

"The bearded pirate plants his pearly deck,
And makes degraded nature picturesque."

[See Hodgson’s Journal very, &c.]

But these Nature, with the aid of Art, has done thus for heaven. I was fortunate enough to engage a very skilful German artist; and hope to renew my acquaintance with this and many other Levantine scenes, by the scenes of his performances.
the Waywode, mining and countermining, they have done nothing at all. We had such ink-shed, and wine-shed, which almost ended in bloodshed! Lord E.'s "prig"—see Jonathan Wild for the definition of "priggism"—quarreled with another, Gropius* by name, (a very good name too for his business,) and muttered something about satisfaction, in a verbal answer to a note of the poor Prussian: this was stated at table to Gropius, who laughed, but could eat no dinner afterwards. The rivals were not reconciled when I left Greece. I have reason to remember their squabble, for they wanted to make them their arbitrator.

Her sons too weak to guard the sacred shrine to guard, Yet fell some portion of their mother's power.

Stanza xii. lines 7 and 8.

I cannot resist availing myself of the permission of my friend Dr. Clarke, whose name requires no comment with the public, but whose sanction will add tenfold weight to my testimony, to insert the following extract from a very obliging letter of his to me, as a note to the above lines: "When the last of the Metopes was taken from the Parthenon, and in moving of it, great part of the superstructure with one of the triglyphs was thrown down by the workmen whom Lord Elgin employed, the lord himself, who beheld the mishap done to the building, took his pipe from his mouth, dropped a tear, and, in a supplicating tone of voice, said to Lusieri, 'Alas!—I was present.'" The Diodor alluded to was the father of the present Diodor.

Where was thine Eris, Pallia! that appall'd Stern Alaric and Havoce on their way!

Stanza xiv. lines 1 and 2.

According to Zosimus, Minerva and Achilles frightened Alaric from the Acropolis; but others relate that the Gothic king was nearly as mischievous as the Scottish peer. See CHANDLER.

Stanza xxix. line 1.

Goza is said to have been the island of Calypso.

11.

Land of Albania! let me bend mine eyes

On thee, thou rugged nurse of savage men!

Stanza xxxviii. lines 9 and 6.

Albania comprises part of Macedonia, Illyria, Chaonia, and Epirus. Isander is the Turkish word for Alexander; and the celebrated Scanderb (Lord Alexander) is alluded to in the third and fourth lines of the thirty-eighth stanza. I do not know whether I am correct in making Scanderb the countryman of Alexander, who was born at Pella in Macedonia, but Mr. Gibbon terms him so, and adds Pyrrhus to the list, in speaking of his exploits.

Of Albania Gibbon remarks that a country "within sight of Italy is less known than the interior of America." Circumstances, of little consequence to modern Mr. Hobbes and myself, but very interesting to us, who had ever advanced beyond the capital into the interior, are, as the reading politely assured me. Ali Pacha was at that time (October, 1809), carrying on war against Ibrahim Pacha, whom he had driven to Berat, a strong fortress which he was besieging. On our arrival at Joannina we were invited to Tepoleon, his highness's birthplace, and favorite Scali, only one day's distance from Berat; at this juncture the Vizier had made it his head-quarters.

After some stay in the capital, we accordingly followed; but though furnished with every accommodation, and escorted by one of the vizier's secretaries, we were nine days on account of the rains in accomplishing a journey which, on our return barely occupied a few hours. On our route we passed two cities, Argyrocastro and Libochabo, apparently little inferior to Yanina in size; and no pen or pen can ever do justice to the scenery in the vicinity of Zitta and Delvinchi, the frontier villages of the Barbary nation.

On Albania and its inhabitants I am unwilling to descant, because this will be done so much better by my fellow-traveller, in a work which may probably precede this in publication, that I as little wish to follow as I would anticipate it. But some few observations are necessary to the text.

The Armououts, or Albanians, struck me forcibly by their resemblance to the Highlanders of Scotland, in dress, figure, and manner of living. Their very mountains seemed Caledonians, with the same inhabitants. The kilt, though white; the spare, active form; their dialect, Celtic in its sound, and their hardy habits, all carried me back to Morven. No nation are so destitute and dressed by their neighbors as the Albanians; the Greeks hardly regard them as Christians, or the Turks as Moslems; and in fact they are a mixture of both, and sometimes neither. Their habits are predatory—all are armed, and the red-shirted Armououts, imitating the Turks of Turkey which came within my observation; and more faithful in peril, or indefatigable in service, are rarely to be found. The Infield was named Basilius, the Moslem, Dervish Tahiri; the former a man of middle age, and the latter about my own. Basili was strictly charged by Ali Pacha in person to attend us; and Dervish was one of fifty who accompanied us through the forests of Acarmania to the banks of Achemos, and onward to Messalangi in Epirus. They took me into my own service, and never had occasion to repent it till the moment of my departure.

When, in 1810, after the departure of my friend Mr. H. for England, I was seized with a severe fever in the Mores; the Directors, leaving away my physician, whose throat they threatened to cut if I was not cured within a given time. To this consolatory assurance of posthumous retribution, and a resolution refusal of all previsions, I attributed my recovery. I had left my last remaining English servant at Athens; my druggon was as ill as myself, and my poor Armaunts nursed me with an attention that would have done honor to civilization.

They had a variety of adventures: for the Moslem, Dervish, being a remarkably handsome man, was always squabbling with the husbands of Athens.
insomuch that four of the principal Turks paid me a visit of remonstrance at the Convent, on the subject of his having taken a woman from the bath—whom he had lawfully bought, however—a thing quite contrary to etiquette.

He was extremely gallant among his own persuasion, and had the greatest veneration for the church, mixed with the highest contempt of churchmen, whom he cuffed upon occasion in a most heterodox manner. Yet he never passed a church without crossing himself; and I remember the night he ran in entering St. Sophia, in Stamboul, because it had once been a place of his worship. On remonstrating with him on his inconsistent proceedings, he invariably answered, "our church is holy, our priests are thieves," and then he crossed himself as usual, and boxed the ears of the first "papas" who refused to assist in any required operation, as was always found to be necessary where a priest had any influence with the Cogia Bachi of his village. Indeed, a more abandoned race of miscreants cannot exist than the lower order of the Greek clergy.

When preparations were made for my return, my Albanians were summoned to receive their pay. Bussi took his with an awkward show of regret at my intended departure, and marched away to his quarters, with his bag of piastres. I sent for Derwish, but for some time he was not to be found; at last he entered, just as Signor Logothet, father to the well-known mel-o-cous (I mean bis sons, and some other of my Greek acquaintances, paid me a visit. Derwish took the money, but on a sudden dashed it to the ground; and clasping his hands, which he raised to his forehead, rushed out of the room, weeping bitterly. From that moment to the hour of my embarkation, he continued his lamentations, and all our efforts to console him only produced this answer, "Ma papa!," "He leaves me." Signor Logothet, who never wept before for anything less than the loss of a mare, mumbled the pater noster of the convent, my attendants, my visitors—and I verily believe that even Sterne's "foolish fat scullion" would have left her "fish-kettle," to sympathize with the unaffected and unexpected sorrow of this Barbarian.

For my own part, when I remembered that, a short time before my departure from England, a noble and most intimate associate had excused himself from taking leave of me—owing to the necessity he had to attend a relation "to a milliner," I felt no less surprised than humiliated by the present occurrence and the past recollection.

That Derwish would leave me with some regret was to be expected, when masses and men have been scrambling over the mountains of a dozen provinces together, they are unwilling to separate; but his present feelings, contrasted with his native ferocity, improved my opinion of the human heart. I believe this almost feline fidelity is frequent among them. One day, on our journey over Parnassus, an Englishman in my service gave him a push in some dispute about the baggage, which he unluckily mistook for a blow; he spoke not, but sat down, leaning his head upon his hands. Foreseeing the consequences, we endeavored to explain away the affront, which produced the following answer:—I have been a robber; I am a soldier; no captain ever struck me; and, for my master, I have eaten your bread, but by that bread (an usual oath) had it been otherwise, I would have stabbed the dog your servant, and gone to the mountains." So the affair ended, but from that day forward he never roughly forgave the thoughtless fellow who insulted him.

Derwish excelled in the dance of his country, conjectured to be a remnant of the ancient Pyrrhic: be that as it may, it is manly, and requires wonderful agility. It is very distinct from the stupid Homaika, the dull round-about of the Greeks, of which our Athenian party had so many specimens.

The Albanians in general (I do not mean the cultivators of the earth in the provinces, who have also that appellation, but the mountaineers), have a fine cast of countenance; and the most beautiful women I ever beheld, in stature and in features, we saw levelling the road broken down by the torrents between Delvinachi and Lichocho. Their manner of walking is truly theatrical; but this strut is probably the effect of the capote, or cloak, depending from one shoulder. Their long hair reminds you of the Spartans, and their courage in desultory warfare is unquestionable. Though they have some savagery amongst the Gedes, I never saw a good Arnaout horseman; my own preferred the English saddles, which, however, they could never keep But on foot they are never to be subdued by fatigue.

Nicopolis, whose ruins are most extensive, is at some distance from Actium, where the wall of the Hippodrome survives in a few fragments.

According to Pouqueville the lake of Yanina; but Pouqueville is always out.

The celebrated Ali Pacha. Of this extraordinary man there is an incorrect account in Pouqueville's Travels.

19. Yet here and there some daring mountain band Hurl their defiance far, nor yield, unless to gold. Stanza xlvii. lines 7, 8 and 9.

Five thousand Suliotes, among the rocks and in the castle of Suli, withstood thirty thousand Albanians for eighteen years; the castle at last was taken by bribery. In this contest there were several acts performed not unworthy of the better days of Greece.
As a specimen of the Albanian or Arnaout dialect of the Illyric, I here insert two of their most popular choral songs, which are generally chanted in dancing by men or women indiscriminately. The first words are merely a kind of chorus without meaning, like some in our own and all other languages.

1. Bo, Bo, Bo, Bo, Bo, Baciarura, popuso.
2. Baciarura na civin
Ha penderini ti hin
3. Ha pe uderi escrotini
Ti vin ti mar servetini.

4. Caliriote me surme
Ea ha pe sce dua tive.
5. Buo, Bo, Bo, Bo, Bo,
Gi egem spira esimiro.
6. Caliriote vu le funde
Ede vete tande funde.
7. Caliriote me surme
Ti mi put e poi mi le.
8. Se ti puta citi mora
Si mi ri ni vettiudo gia.
9. Va la ni il che cadale
Celio more, more celo.
10. Piu hari ti tiro
gPiu huron cia pra seti.

The last stanza would puzzle a commentator; the men have certainly buskins of the most beautiful texture, but the ladies (to whom the above is supposed to be addressed) have nothing under their little yellow boots and slippers but a well-turned and sometimes very white ankle. The Arnaout girls are much handomer than the Greeks, and their dress is far more picturesque. They preserve their shape much longer also, from being always in the open air. It is to be observed, that the Arnaout is not a written language; the words of this song, therefore, as well as the one which follows, are not according to the pronunciation. They are copied by one who speaks and understands the dialect perfectly, and who is a native of Athens.

1. Lo, Lo, I come, I come;
be thou silent.
2. I come, I run; open the door that I may enter.
3. Open the door: two halves that I may take my turban.
4. Caliriotes with the dark eyes, open the gate that I may enter.
5. Lo, Lo, I hear thee, my soul.
6. An Arnaout girl, in costly garb, walks with graceful pride.
7. Caliriote maid of the dark eyes, give me a kiss.
8. If I have kissed thee, what hast thou gained? My soul is consumed with fire.
9. Dance lightly, more gently, and gently still.
10. Make not so much dust to destroy your embroidered hose.

The last stanza would puzzle a commentator; the men have certainly buskins of the most beautiful texture, but the ladies (to whom the above is supposed to be addressed) have nothing under their little yellow boots and slippers but a well-turned and sometimes very white ankle. The Arnaout girls are much handomer than the Greeks, and their dress is far more picturesque. They preserve their shape much longer also, from being always in the open air. It is to be observed, that the Arnaout is not a written language; the words of this song, therefore, as well as the one which follows, are not according to the pronunciation. They are copied by one who speaks and understands the dialect perfectly, and who is a native of Athens.
7. “Siste Viator—heroa calceis!” was the epitaph on the famous count Merci;—what then must be our feelings when standing on the tumulus of the two hundred (Greeks) who fell on Marathon? The principal barrier has recently been opened by Faure; few or no relics, as vases, &c., were found by the excavator. The plain of Marathon was offered to me for sale at the sum of sixteen thousand piasters, about nine hundred pounds!—Alas!—“Expende,—quot libras in duce summo—invenies!”—was the dust of Miltiades worth no more? It could scarcely have fetched less if sold by weight.

PAPERS REFERRED TO BY NOTE 33.

1. Before I say anything about a city of which every body, traveller or not, has thought it necessary if say something, I will request Miss Owenson, when she next borrows an Athenian heroine for her four volumes, to have the goodness to marry her to somebody more of a gentleman than a “Disdar Aga,” (who by the by is not an Aga,) the most impolite of petty officers, the greatest patron of larceny Athens ever saw, (except Lord E.) and the unworthy occupant of the Aeropolis, on a handsome annual stipend of 150 piasters, (eight pounds sterling,) out of which he has only to pay his garrison, the most ill-regulated corps in the ill-regulated Ottoman Empire. I speak it tenderly, seeing I was once the cause of the husband of “Ida of Athens” nearly suffering the bastinado; and because the said “Disdar” is a turbulent husband and beats his wife; so that I exhort and beseech Miss Owenson to sue for a separate maintenance in behalf of “Ida.” Having premised thus much, on a matter of such import to the readers of romances, I may now leave Ida, to mention her birthplace.

Setting aside the magic of the name, and all those associations which it would be pedantic and superfluous to recapitulate, the very situation of Athens would render it the favorite of all who have eyes for art or nature. The climate, to me at least, appeared a perpetual spring; during eight months I never passed a day without being as many hours on horseback; rain is extremely rare, snow never lies in the plains, and a cloudy day is an agreeable rarity. In Spain, Portugal, and every part of the East which I visited, except Ionia and Attica, I perceived no such superiority of climate to our own; and at Constantinople, where I passed May, June, and part of July, (1810,) you might “damn the climate, and complain of spleen,” five days out of seven.
The air of the Moree is heavy and unwholesome, but the moment you pass the Isthmus in the direction of Megara the change is strikingly perceptible. We fear Hesiod will still be found correct in his description of a Boeotian winter.

We found at Larissa the "fort" in a Greek bishop's residence, all free thinkers! This worthy hypocrite railed against the English religion with great intrepidity, (but not before his flock,) and talked of a mass as a "cognitioner." It was impossible to think better of him for this; but, for a Boeotian, he was brisk with all his austerity. This phenomenon (with the exception indeed of Thess., the remains of Chersones, the plain of Platea, Orchomenus, Livadia, and its natural cave of Trphoponius) was the only remarkable thing we have been able to record.

The fountain of Dirce turns a mill: at least my companion (who resolving to be at once cleanly and classical, bathed in it) pronounced it to be the fountain of Dirce, and any body who thinks it worth while may contradict him. At Castri we drank of half a dozen streams, none of the purest, but we were not to our satisfaction which was the true Castalian, and even that had a Villanovich swamp, probably from his nose, though it did not throw us into a maniacal rage.

From Phylhe of which large remains still exist, the Plain of Athens, Ponticen, Hymettus, the Aegean, and the Acropolis, burst upon the eye at once; in my opinion, a more glorious prospect than even Castria. Not Thebes, however, from the Troad, with Ida, the Hellespont, and the more distant Mount Athos, can equal it, though so superior in extent.

I heard much of the beauty of Arcadia, but excepting the view from the monastery of Mogaspelion, (which is inferior to Zita, in a command of country,) and the descent from the mountains on the way from Tripolitza to Argos, Arcadia has little to recommend it beyond the name.

"Sternitur, et dulces moriens reminiscitur Argos."

Virgil could have put this into the mouth of none but an Argive, and (with reverence be it spoken) it does not deserve the epothe. And if the Polybuses of Statius, "In medias audit duo litora campis," did actually hear both shores in crossing the Isthmus of Corinth, he had better ears than have ever been born in such a journey since.

"A celebrated topographer," he said, "is still the most polished city of Greece." Perhaps it may be of Greece, but not of the Greeks; for Ioanna in Epirus is universally allowed, among themselves, to be superior to it in wealth, refinement, apparent learning, and dialect of its inhabitants. The Athenians are remarkable for their cunning; and the lower orders are not improperly characterized in that proverb, which classes them with "the Jews of Salona, and the Turks of the Negropont."

Among the various foreigners resident in Athens, French, Italians, Germans, Ruggians, &c., there was never a difference of opinion in their estimate of the Greek character, though on all other topics there are many errors. Like poor Chaiderer, Mr. Pauv declared thirty years principally at Athens, and to whose talents as an artist and manners as a gentleman one who has known him can refuse the testimony. He actually declared, that the Greeks do not deserve to be emancipated; reasoning on the grounds of their "national and individual depravity." while he forgot that such depravity is to be attributed to cause which can only be removed by the measure he reproaches.

Mr. Roque, a French merchant of responsibility long settled in Athens, asserted with the most amusing gravity, "Sir they are the same carcaille that existed in the days of Themistocles," an alarming remark to the "Laudator temporis acti." The ancients banished Themistocles, the modern cheat Monsieur Roque: thus great men have ever been treated!

In short, all the Franks who are fixtures, and most of the Englishmen, Germans, Danes, &c., a passage came over by degrees to their opinion, on this much the same lines that as their rulers would condemn the nation by wholesale, because he was wronged by his laquey, and overcharged by his washerwoman.

Certainly it was not a little staggering when the Sieurs Pauv and Chaiderer, the two greatest drunk-gones of the day, who divide between them the power of Pericles and the popularity of Leon, and puzzle the poor Waywoode with perpetual differences, agreed in the utter condemnation, "nulla virtus expunat reprobationem," of the Greeks in general, and of the Athenians in particular.

For my own humble opinion, I am loth to hazard it, knowing, as I do, that these be now in MS. no less than five tours of the first magnitude and of the most threatening aspect, all in typographical array, by persons of wit, and honor, and regular common-place books; but, if I may say this without offence, it seems to me rather to declare so positively and permanently, as almost every body has declared, that the Greeks, because they are very bad, will never be better.

Eaton and Sonnini have led us astray by their panegyrics and projects; but, on the other hand, Dr. Pauw and Thomas have debase the Greeks beyond their demerits.

The Greeks will never be independent; they will never be sovereigns as heretofore, and God forbid they ever should! but they may be subjects without being slaves. Our colonies are not independent, but they are free and industrious, and such may Greece be hereafter.

At present like the Catholics of Ireland and the Jews throughout the world, and such other caged and heterodoxed, they suffer, and they write, with equal and physical ills that can afflict humanity. Their life is a struggle against truth; they are vicious in their own defence. They are so unused to kindness, that when they occasionally meet with it they look upon it as a suspicion, a dog is often beaten, or a snap at your fingers if you attempt to caress him. "They are ungrateful, not only ungrateful, but ungrateful!"—this is a general cry. Now, in the name of Nemesis for what are they to be spared? have the humanists, the most learned and learned, ever conferred a benefit on Greece or Greeks? They are to be grateful to the Turks for their fetters, and to the Franks for their broken promises and lying councils. They are to be grateful to the Turks for their engravings on the walls, and to the antiquary who carries them away; to the traveller whose janissary flogs them, and to the scribbler whose journal abuses them. It is the amount of their obligations to foreigners.

II.

François, Comte, Athens, January 23, 1811.

Among the remnants of the barbarous policy of the earlier ages, are the traces of bondage which yet exist in different countries; whose inhabitants however divided in religion and manner, almost all agree in oppression.

The English have at last compassionated their Negroes, and under a less hard, Turke, they may probably one day release their Catholic brethren; but the interposition of foreigners alone can emancipate the Greeks, who otherwise, appear to have as small a chance of redemption from the Turks, as the Jews have from mankind in general.

Of the ancient Greeks we know more than enough; at least the younger men of Europe devoted much of their time to the study of the Greek writers and history, which would be more usefully spent in mastering their own language, and being less neglectful than they deserve; and while every man of any pretensions to learning is tuning out his youth, and often his age, in the study of the language and of the harangues of the Athenian demagogues in favor of or against, real or supposed, descent from the sturdy republicans are left to the actual tyranny of their masters, although a very slight effort is required to strike off their chains.

To talk, as the Greeks themselves do, of their rights, or of their pristine superiority, would be ridiculous; as the rest of the world must resume its barbarism, after reasserting the sovereignty of Greece: but there seems to be no very great obstacle, except in the apathy of the Franks, to their becoming legitimate dependencies of their conquerors, with a proper guarantee;—under correction, however, it be spoken, for many and well-informed men doubt the practicability even of this.

The Greeks have never lost their hope, though they are now more divided in opinion on the subject of their probable deliverers. Religion recommends the Russians; but they have twice been deceived and abandoned by that power, and the dreadful lesson they received after the Moscovite invasion of the Morea has never been forgotten. The French they dislike; although the subjugation of the rest of Europe will, probably, be attended by the deliverance of continental Greece. The islanders look to England for success, as they have very lately possessed themselves of the Ionian republic, Corfu excepted. But whoever appear with arms in their hands will be welcome; and when that day arrives, Heaven have mercy on the Ottomans, and the Turks on the Greeks.

But instead of considering what they have been, and speculating on what they may be, let us look at them as they are.

And here it is impossible to reconcile the contrary opinions: some, particularly the merchants, deeming the Greeks in the strongest language; others, generally travellers, turning periods in their eloquiy, and publishing very curious speculations grafted on the former suits, which can have no weight on their present lot, than the existence of the Incaus on the future fortunes of Peru.

One very ingenious person terms them the "natural allies of Englishmen;" another, no less ingenious, will not allow them to be the allies of anybody; and denies their very descent from the ancients; a third, more ingenious than either, builds a Greek empire on a Russian foundation, and realizes (on paper) all the chimeras of Catherine II. As to the question of their descent, as it impart whether the Mamotas are the lineal Lacedaemonians or not? or the present Athenians as indigeneous as the bees of Hymettus, or as the grasshoppers, to which they once likened themselves? What Englishman cares if he be of a Danish, Saxon, Norman, or Trojan blood? or who, except a Welshman, is afflicted with a desire of being descended from Caractacus?

The poor Greeks do not so much abound in the good things of this world, as tender even their claims to antiquity an object of envy; it is very cruel, then, in Mr. Thornton to disturb them in the possession of all that time has left them: viz. their pedigree, of which they are the more tenacious, as it is in their power not to call their own. Would it not be wiser to publish together, and compare, the works of Messrs. Thornton and De Pauw, Etion and Sonnini; paradox on one side, and prejudice on the other. Mr. Thornton conveys himself to have claimed that the Ionians confirmed their four and twenty years' residence at Per? perhaps he may on the subject of the Turks, but this can give him no more insight into the real state of Greece and her inhabitants, than as many years spent in Wapping into that of the Highlands.

The Greeks of Constantinople live in Fanal; and Mr. Thornton did not oftener cross the Golden Horn than his brother merchants are accustomed to do. I should have placed great reliance on this information, if I had not heard of these gentlemen boast of their little general intercourse with the city, and sert of himself, with an air of triumph, that he has been but four times at Constantinople in as many years.

As to Mr. Thornton's voyage in the Black Sea with Greek vessels, they gave him the same idea of Greece as a cruise to Berwick in a Scotch smack would on Johnny Grot's house. Upon what grounds, then, does he arrogate the right of condemning by wholesale a body of men, of whom he can know little? It is a rather curious circumstance that Mr. Thornton, who so lavishly disparises Pouqueville, on every occasion of mentioning the Turks, has yet resource to him as authority for the Greeks, and terms him an impartial observer. Now Dr. Ponqueville is as little entitled to that appellation, as Mr. Thornton to confer it on him.

The fact is, we are deplorably in want of information on the subject of the Greeks, and in particular their literature, nor is there any probability of our being better acquainted, till our intercourse becomes more intimate, or their independence confirmed: the relation of passing travellers are as little to be depended on as the invectives of angry factors; but till something more can be attained, we must be content with the little to be acquired from similar sources.*

However defective these may be, they are preferable to the paradoxes of men who have read superficially of the ancients, and seen nothing of the moderns, such as De Pauw; who when he asserts the British breed of horses is ruined at Newmarket, and that the Turks are cowards in the field, he trayz an equal knowledge of English horses and Spartan men. His "philosophical observations" have a much better claim to the title of "poetical." It could not be expected that he who liberally condems some of the most celebrated institutions of the ancient, should have mercy on the modern Greeks: and it fortunately happens, that the absurdity of his hypothesis on their forefathers relates to a subject on which we do not trust, then, that in spite of the prophetic of De Pauw, and the doubts of Mr. Thornton, there is a reasonable hope of the redemption of a race of men, who, whatever may be the errors of their religion and of their policy, have been cruelly punished by three centuries and a half of captivity.

Athena, Francisca, Convict, Mar. 17, 1811.

"I trust we have some talk with this learned Theban."

Some time after my return from Constantinople to this city, I received the thirty-first number of the Edinburgh Review as a great favor, and certainly at this distance an acceptable one, from the captain of an English frigate of Salamis. In that number,

* A word, or prevalent, with Mr. Thornton and Dr. Ponqueville, who have been guilty between them of wildly clipping the Sultan's Turkish.

Dr. Ponqueville tells a long story of a Moslem who swallowed cannon-balls in such quantities that he required the name of "Sublime Yeoman," i.e. quarter the Doctor's ear in outrages sacriligious. "Ah!" fancy Mr. Thornton, (angry with the Doctor for his latitude,) "have I taught you? Do you dare to use the Doctor's words in the Turkish tongue, and his vices in his own?" he observes Mr. Thornton, after mentioning on the tongue proverbial of a Turkish woman, "it seems nothing more than Sublimeyeoman the other," and quite峨er gives the supplementary "sultaneem." Now both are right, and both are wrong. If Mr. Thornton would not make more to<br

NOTES TO CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE. 73

Art. 3. containing the review of a French translation of Strabo, there are introduced some remarks on the modern Greeks and their literature, with a short account of Coray, a grammatician, in a French version. On many remarks I mean to ground a few observations, and the spot where I now write will I hope be sufficient excuse for introducing them in a work in some degree connected with the subject. Coray, who has left at least amongst the Franks, was born at Seio, in the Review Svyzya is stated, I have reason to think, incorrectly, and, besides the translation of Becaria and other works mentioned by the Reviewer, has published a last year a French version of the last, one of a series of publications of some Danish travellers lately arrived from Paris; but the latest we have seen here in French and Greek is that of Gregory Zollihoffou. Coray has recently been involved in an unpleasant controversy with M. Gail, a Parisian, and editor of some translations from the Greek poets, in consequence of the Institute having awarded him the prize for his version of Hippocrates. The Reviewer &c., &c., &c., and consequently dispasure of the said Gail. To his exertions literary and patriotic great praise is undoubtedly due, but a part of that praise ought not to be withheld from the two brothers Zosimado, who have lately received a degree of a college; why, when at Paris, and maintained him for the express purpose of elucidating the ancient, and adding to the modern, researches of his countrymen. Coray, however, is not considered by his countrymen equal to some of the ancients, who, studied in the schools of the particularly Dorotheus of Mitlyene, whose Hellenic writings are so much esteemed by the Greeks that Meletius terms him, "Meta του θεου και Πρωτο-φορας Ελλνων." (P. 251 Ecclesiastical History, 4.)

Panagiotis, Cordrikes, a translator of Pente- nelle, and Kumaresis, who translated Ocellus Lucanus on the Universe into French, Christodoulos, and more particularly Psalida, whom I have conversed with in Joannina, is also in high repute among their literati. The last-mentioned has published in Romaic and Latin a work on "True Happiness," dedicated to Catherine II. But Polyzois, who is rated by the French to be the best, and consequently except Coray who has distinguished himself by a knowledge of Hellenic, if he be the Polyzois Lampanitzies of Yania, who has published a number of editions in Romaic, was neither more nor less than an amanuensis of books. But the contents of which he had no cognizance beyond his name on the title-page, placed there to secure his property in the publication; and he was, moreover, a man utterly destitute of scholastic acquirements. As the name, however, is not uncommon, some other Polyzois may have edited the Epistles of Aristoc- tetus. It is be regretted that the system of continental blockade has closed the few channels through which the Greeks received their publications, particularly Venice and Trieste. Even the common grammars for children are become too dear for the lower orders. Amongst their original works the Geography of Maukis, Archipelago of Athens, and the Atlases of theological quartos and poetical pamphlets, are to be met with; their grammars and lexicons of two, three, and four languages, are numerous and excellent... Their poetry is in rhyme. The most singular piece I have lately seen is a satire in dia-logue between a Russian, English, and French traveller, and the Waywode of Wallachia, (or Blackboy, as they term him,) an archbishop, a mer- chant, and Cogia Buchi, (or Primate,) in succession; to all of whom under the Turks, the writer attributes their present degeneracy. Their songs are sometimes pretty and pathetic, but their tunes generally unpleasing to the ear of a Frank: the Greeks, however, are the first to laugh at the unfortunate Riga. But from a catalogue of more than sixty authors, now before me, only five can be found who have touched on any theme except theology.

I am intrusted with a commission by a Greek of Athens, named Marmarotouri, to make arrangements, if possible, for printing in London a translation of Barthelemy's Anarchus in Romaic, as he has no other opportunity, unless he despatches the MS. to Vienna by the Black Sea and Danube.

The Reviewer mentions a school established at Hecatonies, and suppressed at the instigation of Sebastianian; he means Codiones, or, in Turkish, Halvai; a town, he says, in which something was instituted for a hundred students and three professors still exists. It is true that this establishment was disturbed by the Porto, under the ridiculous pretext that the Greeks were constructing a fortress instead of an investigating college. The account of some pursers to the Divan, it has been permitted to continue. The principal professor, named Unemian, (i.e. Benjumin,) is stated to be a man of talent, but a free thinker. He was born in Les- ban, is master of Hellenic, Latin, and some Frank languages; besides a smar- tering of the sciences.

Though it is not my intention to enter farther on this topic than may allude to the article in question. I cannot but advert to the truth that the transition over the fall of the Greeks appears singular, when he closes it with these words: "The change is to be attributed to their misfortunes rather than to any "physical degradation." It may be true that the Greeks are not physically degenerated, and that Constantinople contained, on the day it changed masters, as many men of six feet and upwards as in the hour of prosperity; but ancient history and modern politics on the one hand, that something short of physical perfection is necessary to preserve a state in vigor and independence; and the Greeks, in particular, are a melancholy example of the near connection between moral degradation and national decay.

The Reviewer mentions a plan "we believe" by Potemkin for the purification of the Romaic, and I have endeavored in vain to procure any tidings or traces of its existence. There was an academy in St. Petersburg for the Greeks; but it was suppressed by Paul, and has not been revived by his successor.

There is a slip of the pen, and it can only be a slip of the pen, in p. 68, No. 9, of the Edinburgh Review, where these three words occur: "We are told that when the capital of the East yielded to Nol- manus"—it may be presumed that this last word was, in a future edition, to be altered to Mahomet II. —

In a former number of the Edinburgh Review, 1806, it is observed: "Lord Byron passed some of his early years in Scotland, where he might have learned that porter does not mean a beggar, any more than dust means a fiddle." Query—"Was it in Scotland that the young gentleman of the Edinburgh Review learned this?..." It may mean "Mahomet II.," but that it is not..."Caesarism is a vice; provincial errors are apt.

The mistake seems so completely a lapse of the pen (from the great similarity of the two words, and the total absence of error from the former phrase of the Review) that I should hardly write about it next, had I not perceived in the Edinburgh Review much forcible evidence on all such detections, particularly a recent one, where words and syllables are the subject of juxtaposition and transposition; and the above-mentioned parallel passage to make those former errors habitual in the mind of the writer, it is to be corrected than not. The gentlemen, having enjoyed many a triumph on each occasion, will hardly begrudge me a slight correction for the present.
the "ladies of Constantinople," it seems, at that period spoke a dialect, "which would not have disgraced the lips of an Athenian." I do not know how that might be, but am sorry to say the ladies in general, and the Athenians in particular, are much altered; being far from choice either in their dialect or expressions, as the whole Attic race are barbarous to a proverb:

"Ω Αλβα πραγμα χρων Τι γαϊδαρος τροφεις τωνα."

nourable, friendly, and high spirited character than the true Turkish provincial Aga, or Moslem counsellor, who, for example, to designate the governors of towns, but those Agas who, by a kind of feudal tenure, possess lands and houses, of more or less extent in Greece and Asia Minor.

The lower orders are in as tolerable discipline as the civil and military cities with greater advantage to civilization. A Moslem, in walking the streets of our country-towns, would be more incommunicated in England than a Frank in a similar situation in Turkey. Regimentals are the best travelling dress.

The best accounts of the religion, and different sects of Islam are, may be found in D'Ollisson's French; of their manners, &c., perhaps in Thornton's English. The Ottomans, with all their defects, are not a people to be despised. Equal, at least, to the Spaniards, they are superior to the Portuguese. If it be difficult to pronounce what they are, we can at least say what they are not: they are not treacherous, they are not cowardly, they do not burn heretics, they are not assassins, nor has an enemy advanced to their capital. They are faithful to their sultan till he becomes unfit to govern, and devout to their God without an inquisition. Were they driven from St. Sophia to-morrow, and the French or Russians entrained in their stead, it would become a question, whether Europe would gain by the exchange? English would certainly be the loser.

With regard to that ignorance of which they are so generally, and sometimes justly accused, it may be doubted, always excepting France and England, in what uncivilized points of knowledge they are excelled by other nations. Is it in the common arts of life? In their manufactures? Is a Turkish sahib inferior to a Toledo? or is a Turk worse clothed or lodged, or fed and taught, than a Spaniard? Are the Turks worse educated than the Grandee? or anEffendi than a Knight of St. Jago? I think not.

I remember Mahfouz, the grandson of Ali Pacha, asking whether my fellow-traveller and myself were in the upper or lower Houses of Parliament. Now this question from a boy of ten years old proved that his education had not been neglected. It may be doubted if an English boy at that age knows the difference of the Divan from a College of Derivatives; but I am sure a Spaniard does. The little Mahfouz, surrounded, as he had been entirely by his Turkish tutors, has learned that there was such a thing as a Parliament it were useless to conjecture, unless we suppose that his instructors did not confine his studies to the Koran.

In all the mosques there are schools established, which are very regularly attended; and the poor are taught without the church of Turkey being put into peril. I believe the system is not yet printed; (though there is such a thing as a Turkish press, and books printed on the late military institution of the Nizam Jedid;) nor have I heard whether the Mufti and the Mullah have subscribed, or the Caimas and the Teftedar taken the alarm, for fear the ingenuous youth of the turban should be taught not to "pray to God their way." The Greeks also—a kind of Eastern Irish papists—have a college of their own at Maynooth;—no, at Haarwick; where the heterodox receive much the same kind of countenance from the Ottoman as the Catholic college from the English legislature. Who shall then affirm that the Turks are ignorant bigots, when they thus enunciate the exact proportion of Christian charity which is tolerated in the most prosperous and orthodox of all modern kingdoms? To which they allow all this, they will not suffer the Greeks to participate in their privileges; no, let them fight their battles, and pay their haireth, (taxes,) be debauched in this world, and damned in the next. And shall we then emancipate our Irish Hebrists? Macaroni forbid! We should then be bad Mussulans, and worse Christians; at present we unite the best of both—Jesuitical faith, and something not much inferior to Turkish toleration.

APPENDIX.

Amon, an enslaved people, obliged to have recourse to foreign presses even for their books of religion, it is less to be wondered at that we find so few publications on general subjects than that we find any at all. The whole number of the Greeks, scattered up and down the Turkish empire and elsewhere, may amount, at most, to three hundred; and yet, for so scanty a number, it is impossible to discover any nation with so great a proportion of books and their authors, as the Greeks of the present century. "Ay," but say the generous advocates of oppression, do they not write and publish? it is pleasant enough to hear a Frank, particularly an Englishman, who may abuse the government of his own country; or a Frenchman, who may abuse every government except his own, and who may range at will over every philosophical, religious, scientific, or miscellaneous object, succeeding at the Greek legends. A Greek must not write on politics, and cannot touch on science for want of instruction; if he doubts, he is excommunicated and damned: therefore his countrymen are not poisoned with modern philosophy; and as to morals, thanks to the Turks! there are no such things. What then is left him, if he has a turn for scribbling? Religion, and holy biography: and it is natural enough that those who have but little in the glorious, to the next. It is no great wonder then that in a catalogue now before me of fifty-five Greek writers, many of whom were lately living, not above fifteen should have touched on any thing but religion. The catalogue at all events is contained in the two hundred and sixty-sixth chapter of the fourth volume of Metelli's Ecclesiastical History. From this I subjoin an extract of those who have written on general subjects; which will be followed by some specimens of the Romanie.

LIST OF ROMANIE AUTHORS.†

Neophitus Diakonos (the deacon of the Morea), has published an extensive grammar, and also some political regulations, which last were left unfinished at his death.

Prokopius of Moscopolis, (a town in Epirus,) has written and published a catalogue of the learned Greeks.

Seraphin, of Perieia, is the author of many works in the Turkish language, but Greek character; for the Cyprians of Cypriote, who do not speak Romanie, but read the character.

Eustathius Paulidas, of Bucharest, a physician, made the tour of England for the purpose of study (1729) but though his name is enumerated here, it is not stated that he has written any thing.

Kallinikos Torgeraus, Patriarch of Constantinople: many poems of his are extant, and also protractures, and a catalogue of patriarchs since the last taking of Constantinople.

Anastasius Macdonald of Naxos, member of the royal academy of Warsaw. A church biographer.

* It is to be observed, that the names given are not in chronological order, but amount of some relating to a work or works on topics who scramble the giving of the title of Cypriotic, people to the name of Moscopole.

Demetrius Pamperes, a Moscopolite, has written many works, particularly "A Commentary on Herodot’s Shield of Heracleus," and two hundred tales, (of what kind is not specified,) and has published his correspondence with the celebrated George of Trebizond, his contemporary.

Meletius, a celebrated geographer; and author of the book from whence these notices are taken.

Dorotheus of Mitylene, an Aristotelian philosopher: his Hellenic works are in great repute, and, he is esteemed by the moderns (I quote the words of Meletius) metà ton Θεοκρήτου kai Ξενοφώντος ἀριστεύει "Ελλήνων. I add further, on the authority of a well-informed Greek, that he was so famous among his countrymen, that they were accustomed to say, if Thucydides and Xenophon were wanting, he was capable of repairing the loss.

Marinus Count Thurboures, of Cephalonia, professor of chemistry in the academy of Padua, and member of that academy, and those of Stockholm and Upsal. He has published, at Venice an account of some marine animal, and a treatise on the properties of iron.

Marcus, brother to the former, famous in mechanics. He has removed to St. Petersburg the immense rock on which the statue of Peter the Great was fixed in 1769. See the dissertation which he published in Paris, 1777.

George Constantin has published a four-tongued lexicon.

George Ventot: a lexicon in French, Italian, and Romaic.

There exist several other dictionaries in Latin and Romaic, French, &, besides grammars in every modern language, except English.

Among the living authors the following are most celebrated:—

Athanassius Parios has written a treatise on rhetoric in Hellenic.

Christodoulos, an Acarnanian, has published, in Vienna, some physical treatises in Hellenic.

Panigotes Kodrikas, an Athenian, the Romaic translator of Fontenelle’s "Phallicity of Worlds," (a favorite work amongst the Greeks,) is stated to be a teacher of the Hellenic and Arabic languages in Paris; in both of which he is an adept.

Athanassius, the Persian, a gentleman of a treatise on rhetoric.

Vicenzo Damodos, of Cephalonia, has written "εἰς τὸ μεσοδιάστηρον," on logic and physics.

John Kamaras, a Byzantine, has translated into French Ocelius in the "Phallicity of Worlds," and is said to be an excellent Hellenist, and Latin scholar.

Gregorio Demetrius published, in Vienna, a geographical work: he has also translated several Italian authors, and printed his versions at Venice.

Of Corey and Psalida some account has been already given.

The above is the commencement of a long dramatic satire on the Greek priesthood, princes, and poesy: it is contemptible as a composition, but perhaps curious as a specimen of their rhyme; I have the whole in MS., but this extract will be found sufficient. The Romics in this composition is so easy as to render a version an insult to a scholar; but those who do not understand the original will excuse the following bad translation of what is in itself indifferent.

TRANSLATION.

A Russian, an Englishman, and a Frenchman making the tour of Greece, and observing the miserable state of the country, interrogate, in turn, a Greek Patriot, to learn the cause; afterwards an Archbishop, then a Vlackboy,* a Merchant, and Cogia Bahi or Primate.

Thou friend of thy country! to strangers record Why b'ar ye the yoke of the Ottoman Lord? Why bear ye these fetters thus tamely display'd, The wrongs of the matron, the stripping, and maid? The descendants of Helinia's race are not ye! The patriot sons of the sage and the free, Thus sprung from the blood of the noble and brave, To vily exist as the Musulman slave! Not such were the fathers your annals can boast, Who conquer'd and died for the freedom you lost! Not such was your land in her earlier hour, The day-star of nations in wisdom and power! And still will you thus unresisting increase, Oh shamful dishonor! the darkness of Greece? Then tell us, beloved Achan! reveal The cause of the woes which you cannot conceal.

The reply of the Philellenist I have not translated, as it is no better than the question of the travelling triumvirate; and the above will sufficiently show what kind of composition the Greeks are now satisfied. I trust I have not much injured the original in the few lines given as faithfully, and as near the measure of the Romics, as I could make them. Almost all their pieces, above a song, which aspire to the name of poetry, contain exactly the quantity of feet of

"A sardon bold of Hellas, who lived in country quarnes," which is in fact the present heroic couplet of the Romics.

ΠΛΑΤΤΣΙΑ ΕΙΣ ΤΗΝ ΠΟΡΕΙΑΝ ΤΟΥ ΚΑΝΟΝΟΥ, ΚΑΙ ΟΙ ΔΙΩΝΕΝ.

* Vlackboy, Prince of Wallishead.

"Oh, Miss Bailey! unfortunate Miss Bailey!"

* A guardsman bold of Hellas, who lived in country quarnes.

Pl. Oh God! from the window I seemed that I heard my husband's voice. If he is here, I have arrived in time to make him ashamed. [A Servant enters from the Room.] Boy, tell me, pray, who are in those chambers.

Serv. Three gentlemen: one, Signor Eugenio; the other, Signor Martio, the Neapolitan; and the third, my Lord, the Count Leander Ardentis.

Pl. Flaminio is not among these, unless he has changed his name.

Leander. [Within, drinking.] Long live t.e. good fortune of Signor Eugenio.

[The whole Company. Long live, &c.] (Literally, Na, na, si che viva il vivo.)

Pl. Without doubt that is my husband. [To the Servt.] My good man, do me the favor to a company me above to those gentlemen; I have some business.

Serv. At your command. [Aside.] The old office of us waiters. [He goes out of the Gaming-House.]

Ridolphi. [To Victoria on another part of the stage.] Courage, courage, be of good cheer, it is nothing.

Victoria. I feel as if about to die. [Leaning on him as if fainting.]

[From the windows above all within are seen rising from table in confusion: Leander starts] at the sight of Platidia, and appears by his gestures to threaten her life.]
Eugenio. No, stop——
Martin Den fit attempt——
Leander. Away, fly from hence!
Pla. Help! Help! [flies down the stairs, Leander attempting to follow with his sword, Eugenio kinders him.]

[Travolta with a plate of meat leaps over the balcony from the window, and runs into the Coffee-
House.]

[Platidia runs out of the Gaming-House, and takes shelter in the Hotel.]

[Martin steals softly out of the Gaming-House, and goes off, exclaiming "Rumores fuge." The Servants from the Gaming-House enter the Hotel, and shut the door.]

[Victoria remains in the Coffee-House assisted by Ridolpho.]

[Leander sword in hand opposite Eugenio, ex-claims, Give way——I will enter that hotel.
Eugenio. No, that shall never be. You are a soundrel to your wife, and I will defend her to the last drop of my blood.
Leander. I will give you cause to repeat this.
[Menacing with his sword.]
Eugenio. I fear you not. [He attacks Leander, and makes him retire back so much, that finding the doors of the dancing girl's house open, Leander escapes through, and so finishes.]

NOTES TO CHILDE HAROLD’S PILGRIMAGE.

1. Pride of place "here last the eagle flew." Stanza xviii. line 5.

Pride of place" is a term of falconry, and means the highest pitch of flight. See Macbeth, &c.

"An Eagle towering in his pride of place
Was by a moaning Owl hawked at and killed." 2.

Succ as Harmodius drew on Athens’ tyrant lord.

Stanza xx. line 9.

See the famous song on Harmodius and Aristogiton.—The best English translation is in Bland’s Anthology, by Mr. Dunman.

"With myrtle my sword will I wrestle," &c.

3. And all went merry as a marriage-bell.

Stanza xxii. line 8.

On the night previous to the action, it is said that a ball was given at Brussels.

4. And Evan’s, Donald’s fame rings in each clansman’s ears.

Stanza xxvi. line 9.

Sir Evan Cameron, and his descendant Donald, the "gentle Lochiel" of the "forty-five."

The castledCraig of Drachenfels.

Page 41, verse 1.

The castle of Drachenfels stands on the highest summit of "the seven Mountains," over the Rhine banks: it is in ruins, and connected with some singular traditions: it is the first in view on the road from Bonn, but on the opposite side of the river: on this bank, nearly facing it, are the remains of another, called the Jew's castle, and a large cross commemorative of the murder of a chief by his brother; the number of castles and cities along the course of the Rhine on both sides is very great, and their situations remarkably beautiful.

12.

The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o'er him wept.

Stanza Ivii. line last.

The monument of the young and lamented General Marceau (killed by a rifle ball at Altekirchen on the last day of the fourth year of the French republic) still remains as described.

The inscriptions on his monument are rather too long, and not required: his name was enough; France adored, and her enemies admired; both wept over him.—His funeral was attended by the generals and detachments from both armies. In the same grandiose General Hoche hovered, a gallant man also in every sense of the word; but though he distinguished himself greatly in battle, he had not the good fortune to die there: his death was attended by suspicions of poison.

A separate monument is not over his body, which is buried by Marceau's is raised for him near Andernach, opposite to which one of his most memorable exploits was performed, in throwing a bridge to an island on the Rhine. The shape and size are different from that of Marceau's, and the inscription more simple and pleasing.

"The Army of the Sambre and Meuse to its Commander in Chief Hoche."

This is all, and as it should be. Hoche was esteemed among the first of France's earlier generals as Bonaparte monopolized her triumphs. He was the de-tined commander of the invading army of Ireland.

13.

Her Ehrenbreitstein, with her shatter'd wall.

Stanza Iviii. line 1.

Ehrenbreitstein, i.e. "the broad stone of Honor," one of the strongest-fortresses in Europe, was dismantled and blown up by the French at the truce of Lecob.—It had been and could only be reduced by famine or treachery. It yielded to the former, aided by surprise. After having seen the fortifications of Gibraltar and Malta, it did not much strike by comparison, but the situation is commanding. General Marceau besieged it in vain for some time, and I slept in a room where I was shown a window at which he said to have beard standing observing the progress of the siege by moonlight, when a ball struck immediately below it.

14.

Unspanchert hey roam'd, and shriek'd each wandering ghost.

Stanza Iviii. line last.

The chapel is destroyed, and the pyramid of bones diminished to a small number by the Burgundian legion in the service of France, who anxiously enforced this record of the ancestors' less successful invasions. A few still remain, notwithstanding the pains taken by the Burgundians for ages, (all who passed that way removing a bone to their own country,) and the less justifiable larcenies of the Swiss postilions, who carried them off to sell for knife-handles, a purpose for which the whiteness imbibed by the bleaching of years has rendered them in great request. Of these, relics I ventured to bring away as much as may have made a quarter of a pound, for which the reason is, that if I had not, the next passer by might have perverted them to worse uses than the careful preservation for which I intend for them.

15.

Lesvell'd Aventicum hath strew'd her subject lands.

Stanza lxv. line last.

Aventicum (near Morat) was the Roman capital of Helvetia, where Avenches now stands.

16.

And held within their urn one mind, one heart, one dust.

Stanza lxvi. line last.

Julia Alpinula, a young Aventian priestess, died soon after a vain endeavor to save her father, condemned to death as a traitor by Aulus Cecina. Her epitaph was discovered many years ago;—it is thus—

Julia Alpinula
Hie jacet
Infelcis patris, infelix proles
Deo Aventiae Sacerdos;
Exorare patria necom non potui
Male mori in fatis ille erat.
Vixi annos xxxii.

I know of no human composition so effecting as this, nor a history of deeper interest. These are the names and actions which ought not to perish, and to which we turn with a true and healthy tenderness, from the wretched and glittering detail of a confused mass of conquests and battles, with which the mind is roused for a time to a false and feverish sympathy, from whence it recours at length, with all the nausea consequent on such intoxication.

17.

In the sun's face, like yonder Alpine snow.

Stanza lxvii. line 8.

This is written in the eye of Mont Blanc, (June 3. 1816,) which even at this distance dazzles mine.

(July 20th.) I this day observed for some time the distinct reflection of Mont Blanc and Mont Argentière in the calm of the lake, which I was crossing in my boat; the distance of these mountains from their mirror is sixty miles.

18.

By the blue rushing of the arroyo Rhone.

Stanza lxxi. line 8.

The color of the Rhone at Geneva is blue, to a depth of tint which I have never seen equalled in water, salt or fresh, except in the Mediterranean and Archipelago.

19.

Than vulgar minds may be with all they seek possess.

Stanza lxxix. line last.

This refers to the account in his "Confessions" of his passion for the Countess d'Oundetot, (the mistress of St. Lambert,) and his long walk one morning for the sake of the single kiss which was the common salutation of French acquaintance.—Rousseau's description of his feelings on this occasion may be considered as the most passionate, yet not impure description and expression of love that ever kindled into words; which after all must be felt, from their very force, to be inadequate to the delineation—a painting can give no sufficient idea of the ocean.

20.

Of earth-c'erasing mountains.

Stanza xci. line 3.

It is to be recollected, that the most beautiful and impressive doctrines of the divine Founder of Christianity were delivered, not in the Temple, but on the Mount.

To waive the question of devotion, and turn to human eloquence,—the most effectual and splendid specimens were not pronounced within walls. Demosthenes addressed the public and popular assemblies. Cicero spoke in the forum. That this added to their effect on the mind of both orator and hearers, may be conceived from the difference between the sound of the voice then and that produced, and those we ourselves experience in the perusal in the closet. It is one thing to read the Iliad at Sigeum and on the tumuli, or by the springs with Mount Ida above, and the plain and river and Archipelago around you; and another to trim your taper over it in a snug library—this I know.

Were the early and rapid progress of what is called Methodism to be attributed to any cause beyond the enthusiasm excited by its vehement faith and doctrines (the truth or error of which I presume neither to canvass nor to question) I should venture to ascribe it to the practice of preaching in the fields, and the unstudied and extemporaneous compositions of its leaders.

The Mussulmans, whose erroneous devotion (at least in the lower orders) is most sincere, and therefore impressive, are accustomd to repeat their prescribed oisons and prayers wherever they may be. It is to the story—of course, entertained in the open air, kneeling upon a light mat, (which they carry for the purpose of a bed or cushion as required:) the ceremony lasts some minutes, during which they are totally absorbed, and only living in their own supposition: nothing can disturb them. On me the same and entire sincerity of those men, and the spirit which appeared to be within and upon them, made a far greater impression than any I have ever witnessed in places of public worship, of which I have seen those of almost every persuasion under the sun; impeding most of our own sectaries, and the Greek, the Catholic, the Armenian, the Lutheran, and the Mahometanism, as these are numerous in the Turkish empire, are idolaters, and have free exercise of their belief and its rites: some of these I had a distant view at Patras, and from what I could make out of them, they appeared to be of a truly pagan description, and not very agreeable to a spectator.

Rousseau's Heloise, Lettre 17, part 4, note.

"Cosmontagnes sont si hautes qu'une demi-heure après le soleil couche, leurs sommets sont encore velureis de ses rayons; dont le rouge forme sur ces cimes blanches une belle couleur de rose qu'on apperçoit de fort loin."

This applies more particularly to the heights over Meillerie.

"J'allai à Veray loger à la Cléf, et pendant deux jours que j'y restai sans voir personne, je pris pour cette ville une amour qui m'a suivi dans tous mes voyages, et qui m'y a fait établir enfin les héros de mon roman. Je disois volontiers à ceux qui out du goût et qui sont équilibrés; allez visiter le pays, examinez les sites, promenez-vous sur le lac, et dites si la Nature n'a pas fait ce beau pays pour une Julie, pour une Claire et pour un St. Preux;"

In July, 1816, I made a voyage round the Lake of Geneva; and as far as my own observations have led me, in a not uninterested nor inattentive survey of all the scenes most celebrated by Rousseau in this "Heloise," I may say, that in this there is no exaggeration. It would be difficult to see Clares, (with the scenes around it, Vevey, Chillon, Boveret, St. Gingo, Meillerie, Elvan, and the entrances of the Rhône,) without being forcibly struck with its peculiar associations. It has been a scene of such events and with which it has been peopled. But this is not all: the feeling with which all around Clares, and the opposite rocks of Meillerie, is invested, is of a still higher and more comprehensive order than the mere sympathy with individual passion; it is a sense of the existence of love in its most extended and sublime capacity, and of our own participation of its good and of its glory; it is the great principle of the universe, which is there more condensed, but not less manifested; and of which, though knowing ourselves a part, we lose our individuality, and mingle in the beauty of the whole.

If Rousseau had never written, nor lived, the same associations would not less have belonged to such scenes. He has added to the interest of his works by their adoption; he has shown his sense of their beauty by the selection; he has done that for him which no human being could do for them.

I had the fortune (good or evil as it might be) to sail from Meillerie (where we landed for some time) to St. Gingo during a lake storm, which added to the magnificence of all around, although occasionally accompanied by danger to the boat, which was small and overloaded. It was over this very part of the lake that Rousseau has driven the boat of Freux in his "Pensees," and Wulmar to Meillerie for shelter during a tempest.

On gaining the shore at St. Gingo, I found that the wind had been sufficiently strong to blow down some fine old chestnut trees on the lower part of the mountains.

On the opposite height of Clares is a chateau. The hills are covered with vineyards, and interspersed with some small but beautiful woods; one of these was the "bosquet de Julle," and it is remarkable that, though long ago cut down by the brutal selfishness of the monks of St. Bernard, (to whom the land appertained,) that the ground might be enclosed into a vineyard for the miserable drones of an exiled superstition, the inhabitants of Clares still point out the spot where its trees stood, calling it by the name which consecrated and survived them.

Rousseau has not been particularly fortunate in the preservation of the "local habitations" he has given to "airy nothings." The Prior of Great St. Bernard has cut down some of his woods for the sake of a few casks of wine, and Bonaparte has levied a tax on the vineyards of Meillerie in improving the road to Simplon. The road is an excellent one, but I cannot quite agree with a remark which I heard made, that "La route vaut mieux que les souvenirs."

CANTO IV.

1. I stood in Venice on the Bridge of Sighs; A palace and a prison on each hand.

Stanza i. lines 1 and 2.

The communication between the ducal palace and the prisons of Venice is by a gloomy bridge, or covered gallery, high above the water, and divided by a stone wall into a passage and a cell. The state dungeons, called "pozzi," or wells, were sunk in the thick walls of the palace; and the prisoner when taken out to die was conducted across the gallery. The bridge, and being then led back into the other compartment, or cell, upon the bridge, was there strangled. The low portal through which the criminal was taken into this cell is now walled up; but the passage is still open, and is still known by the name of the Bridge of Sighs. The pozzi are under the flooring of the chamber at the foot of the bridge. They were formerly twelve, but on the first arrival of the French, the Venetians hastily blocked or broke up the deeper of these dungeons. You may still, however, descend by a trap-door, and crawl down through holes, half choked by rubbish, to the depth of two stories below the first range. If you are in want of consolation for the extinction of patrician power, perhaps you may find it there; scarcely a ray of light glimmers into the narrow gallery which leads to the cells, and the places of confinement themselves are totally dark. A small hole in the wall admitted the damp air of the passages, and served for the introduction of the prisoner's food. A wooden pallet, raised a foot from the ground, was the only furniture. The conductors tell you that a light was not allowed. The cells are about five paces in length, two and a half in width, and seven feet in height. They are directly beneath one another, and respiration is somewhat difficult in the lower holes. Only one prisoner was found when the republicans descended into these hideous recesses, and he is said to have been confined sixteen years. But the inmates of the dungeons beneath had left traces of their repentence, or of their despair, which are still visible, and may perhaps owed something to recent ingenuity. Some of the detained appear to have offended against, and others to have belonged to, the sacred body, not only from their signatures, but from the churches and bellfies which they have scratched upon the walls. The reader may not object to see a specimen of the records prompted by so terrific a solitude. As nearly as they could be copied by more than one pencil, three of them are as follows:—

1. NON TI FIDAR AD ALCUNO PENSA O TACI SE FUORI VEUOI DI SPIONI INSIDE E LACCI IL PENITIBI PENITIRI NULLA OIOVA MA BEN DI VALOR TUG LA VERA PROVA 1807. ADI 2. GENARO. FULBE TEMPO P' LA BESTIEMMA P' AVER DATO DA MANZAR A UN MORTO IACOMO. GRITTI. SCRIBENS.

2. UN PARLAR POCO ET NEGARE PRONTO ET UN PENSAR AL FINE PUO DARE LA VITA A NOI ALTRI MESCHIN.

ECCLESIA BAPTIST A AD ECCLESIA MORTALIUS.

The copyist has followed, not corrected the solemnis; some of which are however not quite so decided, since the letters were evidently scratched in the dark. It only need be observed, benevemus et magniar may be read in the first inscription, which was probably written by a prisoner confined for some act of impuity committed at a funeral; that Cortellarius is the name of a parish on terra firma, near the sea; and that the last initials evidently are put for "Viva la santa Chiesa Kattolica Romana."

"Quo fit ut qui superbe urbem contemplantur, turritam telluris imaginem medio Oceano figuratum in petat inspicere."

3. In Venice Tasso's echoes are no more.

Stanza iii. line 1.

The well-known song of the gondoliers, of alternate stanzas from Tasso's Jerusalem, has died with the independence of Venice. Editions of the poem, with the original on one column, and the Venetian variations on the other, as sung by the boatmen, were once common, and are still to be found. The following extract will serve to show the difference between the Tuscan epic and the "Canta alla Barcariola."

ORIGINAL.

Canto l'arme pietose, e 'l capitano Che 'l gran Sepolcro libero di Cristo, Molto egli opòi cui sonno, e con la mano Molto soffi nel glorioso acquisto; E in van l' Inferno a lui s' oppone, e in vane S' armò d' Asia, e di Libia il popul misto, Che il Ciel gli die favore, e sotto a i Santi Segni ritusse i suoi compagni erranti.

Some of the elder gondoliers will, however, take up and continue a stanza of their once familiar bard.

On the 7th of last January, the author of Child Harold, and another Englishman, the writer of this notice, rowed to the Lido with two singer, one of whom was a carpenter, and the other a gondoller. The former placed himself at the prow, the latter at the stern of the boat. A little after leaving the quay of the Piazzetta, they began to sing, and continued their exercise until we arrived at the island. They gave us, amongst other things, the death of Clorinda, and the palace of Arminia; and did not sing the Venetian, but the Tuscan verses. The carpenter, however, who was the cleverer of the two, and was frequently obliged to prompt his companion, told us that he could translate the original. He added, that he could sing almost three hundred stanzas, but had not the patience (or words to) learn any more, or to sing what he already knew: a man must have idle time on his hands to acquire, or to repeat, and, said the "poor fellow," "look at my clothes and at me: I am staring at the river; there are no iterations of music during the performance, which habit alone can make attractive. The recitative was shrill, scrumming, and monotonous, and the gondolier behind assisted his voice by holding his hand to one side of his mouth. The carpenter used a quiet action, which he evidently endeavored to restrain; but was too much interested in his subject altogether to repress. From these men we learnt that singing is not confined to the gondoliers, and that, although the casta is seldom, if ever, voluntary, there are still several amongst the lower classes who are acquainted with a few stanzas.

It does not appear that it is usual for the performers to row and sing at the same time. At the thought of this, the Jerseymen are no longer casually heard, there is yet much music upon the Venetian canals; and upon holydays, those strangers who are not near or informed enough to distinguish properly, hear the gondolas still resound with the strains of Tasso. The writer of some remarks which appeared in the Curiosities of Literature, must excuse his being twice quoted; for, with the exception of some phrases a little too ambitious and extravagant, he has furnished a very exact, as well as agreeable, description.

In Venice, the gondoliers know by heart long passages from Ariosto and Tasso, and often chant them, unsought, as they leisurely glides. It seems at present on the decline:—at least, after taking some pains, I could find no more than two persons who delivered to me in this way a passage from Tasso. I must add, that the late Mr. Berry once chanted to me a passage from Tasso, in the manner, as he assured me, of the gondoliers.

"There are always two concerned, who alternately sing the strophes. We know the melody essentially, but our voices, not being united, has properly no melodic movement, and is a sort of medium between the canto fermo and the canto furtivo; it approaches to the former by recitativic declamation, and to the latter by passages and course, by the gondoliers, who sing as they work."

"I entered a gondola by moonlight: one singer placed himself forwards and the other aft, and thus proceeded to St. Georgio. One began the song, when he had ended his strophe, the other took up the lay, and so continued the song alternately. Throughout the whole of it, the same notes invariably returned, but, according to the subject matter of the strophe, they had a greater or a smaller stress, sometimes an one or another. After another note, and indeed changed the pronunciation of the whole strophe as the object of the poem altered."

On the whole, however, the sounds were houset and screeching; they seemed, in the manner of all rude songs, to make the advantage of their singing in the force of their voice: one seemed desirous of conquering the other by the strength of his lungs; and so far from receiving delight from this contest, it was in vain; for, on the gondola, I found myself in a very unpleasant situation.

"My companion, to whom I communicated this circumstance, being very desirous to keep up the credit of his countrymen, assured me that this singing was very agreeable when heard at a distance. Accordingly we got out upon the shore, leaving one of the singers in the gondola, while the other went to the distance of some hundred paces. They now began to sing against one another, and I kept walking up and down between them both, so as always to leave him who was to begin his part. I frequently stood still and hearkened to the one and to the other.

"Here the scene was properly introduced. The strong declamatory, and, as it were, strident sound, met the ear from far, and called forth the attention; the quickly succeeding transitions which necessarily required to be sung in a lower tone, seemed like plaintive strains succeeding the voice of the gondoliers. The other, who had listened attentively, immediately began where the former left off, answering him in milder or more vehement notes, according as the purport of the strophe required. The sleepy canals, the lofty buildings, the spire of the moon, the deep shad-ows of the few gondolas that moved like spirits hither and thither, increased the striking peculiar-ity of the scene; and amidst all these circum-stances, it was easy to confess the character of this wonderful harmony.

"It suits perfectly well with an idle, solitary mariner, living at length in his vessel at rest on one of these canals, waiting for his company, or for a fare, and there is nothing more sublime than the threepsophies of which situation is somewhat alleviated by the songs and poetical stories he has in memory. He often raises his voice as loud as he can, which extends itself to a vast distance over the tranquil mirror, and as still is around, he, as it were, in his own gondola, is the greater and more populous town. Here is no rattling of carriages, nor noise of foot passengers; a silent gondola glides now and then by him, of which the splashes of the oars are scarcely to be heard."

"At a distance he hears another, perhaps utterly unknown to him. Melody and verse immediately attach the two strangers: he becomes the responsive echo to the former, and exerts himself to be heard as he had heard the other. By tacit convention the gondolier makes his reply, and he sings with a simple and graceful melodic rest, and the song should last the whole night through, they en-tertain themselves without fatigue: the hearers, who are passing between the two, take part in the amusement."

"This vocal performance sounds best at a great distance, and is then inexpressibly charming, as it only fulfils its design in the sentiment of remoteness. It is plaintive but not dismal in its sound, and at times it is very advective and pathetic, and tins of tears. My companion, who otherwise was not a very delicately organized person, said quite unexpectedly: 't'is singolare come quel canto intonersce, e molto piu quando lo cantano meglio.'"

"I was in the gondola, when it glides, the long row of islands that divides the Adriatic from the Lagoon, particularly the women of the extreme districts of Malmocco and Palestrina, sing in like manner the works of Tasso to these and similar tunes.

"They have the custom, when their husbands are fishing out at sea, to sit along the shore in the evenings; and voice these songs, and continue to do so with great applause and amusement. I could not distinguish the responses of her own husband at a distance."

The love of music and of poetry distinguishes all classes of Venetians, even amongst the tuneful sons of Italy. The city itself can occasionally furnish respectable audiences for two and even three opera-houses at a time; and there are few events in private life that do not call forth a printed and circu-lated sonnet. Does a physician or a lawyer meditate his degree, or a clergyman preach his weekly sermon, has a surgeon performed an operation, would a harlequin announce his departure or his benefit, are you to be congratulated on a marriage, or a..."

St. Mark yet sees his lion where he stood.

Stanza xi. line 5.

The lion has lost nothing by his journey to the Invalides but the gospel which supported the paw that is now on a level with the other foot. The horses also are returned to the ill-chosen spot whence they set out, and are, as before, half hidden under the porch of St. Mark's church.

Their history, after a desperate struggle, has been satisfactorily explored. The decisions and doubts of Erizzo and Zappetti, and, lastly, of the Count Lepoldo Cioegnara, would have given them a Roman extraction, and a pedigree not more ancient than the reign of Nero. But M. de Schlegel stepped in to teach the Venetians the value of their own areas, and a Greek vindicated, at last and for ever, the pretension of his countrymen to this noble production.* Mr. Mustozidi has not been left without a reply; but, as yet, he has received no answer. It should seem that the horses were provocatively Caesar, and were transferred to Constantinople by Theodosius. Lapidary writing is a favorite play of the Italians, and has conferred reputation on more than one of their literary characters. One of the best specimens of Bodoni's typography is a respectable volume of inscriptions, all written by his friend Pacchioni. Several were prepared for the recovered horses. It is to be hoped the best was not selected, when the following words were ranged in gold letters above the central porch.

Nothing shall be said of the Latin, but it may be permitted to observe that the injustice of the Venetians in transporting the horses from Constantinople was at least equal to that of the French in carrying them to Paris, and that it would have been more prudent to have avoided all allusions to either country. The Venetian prince, however, refused to object to affixing over the principal entrance of a metropolitan church an inscription having a reference to any other triumphs than those of religion. Nothing less than the pacification of the world can excuse such a solecism.

The Suabian sued, and now the Austrian reigns—

An Emperor tramples where an Emperor knelt.

Stanza xii. lines 1 and 2.

After many vain attempts on the part of the Italians entirely to throw off the yoke of Frederic Barberossa, and as fruitless attempts of the emperor to make the Venetian people understand the principle of his Cisalpine dominions, the bloody struggles of four and twenty years were happily brought to a close in the city of Venice. The articles of a treaty, previously agreed upon between the Pope Alexander III. and Barberossa, and the former having received a safe conduct, had already arrived at Venice from Ferrara, in company with the ambassadors of the king of Sicily and the consuls of the Lombard league. There still remained, however, many points to adjust, and for several days the peace was believed to be impracticable. At this juncture it was suddenly reported that the Emperor had arrived at Chioggia, a town fifteen miles from the capital. The Venetians rose tumultuously, and insisted upon immediately conducting him to the city. The Lombards took the alarm, and departed towards Triviso. The Pope himself was apprehensive of some disaster if Frederic should suddenly advance upon him, but was reassured by the prudent and address of Sebastian Ziani, the Doge. Several embassies passed between Chioggia and the capital, until, at last, the Emperor relaxing somewhat of his pride, consented to reside in his native city; and put on the mildness of the lamb.

On Saturday, the 23d of July, in the year 1177, six Venetian galleys transferred Frederic, in great pomp from Chioggia to the lagoon of Lido, a mile from Venice. Early the next morning the Pope, accompanied by the Sicilian ambassadors, and by the envoys of Lombardy, whom he had recalled from the main land, together with a great concourse of people, repaired, from the patriarchal palace to St. Mark's church, and solemnly absolved the Emperor and his partisans from the excommunication pronounced against him. The Chancellor of the Empire, on the part of his master, renounced the anti-popes and their schismatic adherents. Immediately the Doge, with a great suite both of the clergy and laity, got on board the galleys, and writing on Frederic, rowed him to the mighty state from the capital to the Lido. The Emperor descended from the galley at the quay of the Piazzetta. The Doge, the patriarch, his bishops and clergy, and the people of Venice with their crosses and processions followed him in solemn procession before him to the church of St. Mark. Alexander was seated before the vestibule of the basilica, attended by his bishops and cardinals, by the patriarch of Aquileia, by the archbishops and bishops of Lombardy, all of them in state, andclothéd in their church robes. Frederic approached, and the by the Bolognese. Frederic, the Almighty in the person of Alexander, laying made his imperial dignity, and throwing off his mantle, re Prostrated himself at full length at the feet of the Pope. Alexander, with tears in his eyes, quickly accepted the generosity, he grandson kissed him, blessed him; and immediately the Germans of the train sang, with a loud voice, 'We praise thee, O Lord.' The Emperor then taking the Pope by the right hand, led him to the church, and this benediction, returned to the ducal palace." * The ceremony of humiliation was repeated the next day. The Pope himself, at the request of Frederic, said mass at St. Mark's. The Emperor again laid aside his imperial mantle, and, taking a wand in his hand, officiated as egerius, driving the laity from the choir, and preceding the ponttiff to the altar. Alexander, after reciting the gospel, preached to the people. The Emperor put himself close to the pulpit in the attitude of listen;ing; and the pontiff, touched by this mark of his attention, for he knew that Frederic did not understand a word he said, commanded the patriarch of Aquileia to translate the Latin discourse into the German tongue, for the credulity of the chaste.
Frederic made his oblation and kissed the Pope's feet, and, mass being over, led him by the hand to his white horse. He held the stirrup, and would have put his own foot in to the stirrup, had not the Pope accepted of the inclination for the performance and affectionately dismissed him with his benediction. Such is the substance of the account left by the archbishop of Salerno, wha was present at the scene, in whose story are confirmed in every subsequent narration. It would be not worth 50 minute a record, were it not the triumph of liberty as well as of superstition. The states of Lombardy owed to it the confirmation of their privileges; and Alexander had reason to thank the Almighty, who had enabled an infirm, unarmed old man, to subdue a terrible and potent sovereign.†

7.

Oh, for one hour of blind old Dandolo!
The octogenarian chief, Byzantium's conqueror.
Stanza xiii. lines 3 and 4.

The reader will recollect the exclamation of the Highlander, Oh, for one hour of Dandolo! Henry Dandolo, when elected Doge, in 1192, was eighty-years of age. When he commanded the Venetians at the taking of Constantinople, he was considered a very old man. At this age he annexed the fourth and a half of the whole empire of Roman;† for so the Roman empire was then called, to the title and to the territories of the Venetian Doge. The three-eighths of this empire were reserved in the diplomas until the dukedom of Gi-vanni Dolfino, who made use of the above designation in the year 1357.‡

Dandolo led the attack on Constantinople in per-cen: two ships, the Paradise and the Pilgrim, were tied together, and a drawbridge or ladder let down from their higher yards to the walls. The Doge was one of the first to rush into the city. Then was the compliment, said the Venetians, a triumphant Erythraean sily. "A gathering together of the powerful shall be made amid the waves of the Adriatic, under a blind leader; they shall beat the foes—their sunshine—Byzantium's shame blains thebuildings—her spoils shall be dispersed; new goat shall bealt, until they have measured out and run over fifty-four feet, nine inches, and a half. †

Dandolo died on the first day of June, 1235, naring reigned thirteen years, six months, and five days, and was buried in the church of St. Sphisie, at Constantinople. Strangely enough it must sound that the name of the rebel apothecary who received the Doge's sword, and annullned the ancient government, in 1736-7, was Dandolo.

But is not Doria's menace come to pass?
Are they not bridled?
Stanza xiiii. lines 3 and 4.

After the loss of the battle of Pola, and the taking of Chioza on the 16th of August, 1379, by the united armament of the Genoese and Francesco d Cararra, Signor of Padua, the Venetians were reduced to the utmost despair. An embassy was sent to the Genoese, with a blank sheet of paper, praying them to prescribe what terms they pleased, and leave to Venice only her independence. The Prince of Padua was inclined to listen to these pro-sals, but the Genoese, who had taken Pola, had shunted "to Venice, to Venice, and long live St. George," determined to annihilate their rival, and Peter Doria, their commander in chief, returned this answer to the suppliants: "On God's spirit, gentlemen of Genoa, Venice, ye shall have from the Signor of Padua, nor from our commune of Genoa, until we have first put a rein upon those unbridled horses of yours, that are upon the porch of your evangelist St. Mark. When we have bridled them, we shall keep you quiet. And this is the pleaure of us and of your commune. As for these my bro-er[s] of Genoa, that you have brought with you to give up to us, I will not have them: take them back; for,
for a few days, I shall consider myself the prison of myself, both these and all the others."†
In fact, the Genoese did advance as far as Maltemoccio, within five miles of the capital; but their own danger and the pride of their enemies gave courage to the Venetians, who learned from la-

dors, and many individual sacrifices, all of them carefully recorded by their historians. Vettor Pisani was put at the head of thirty-four galleys. The Genoese broke up from Malamocco, and retired to Chioza in October; but they again threatened Ven-icce, which was reduced to extremities. At this time, the 1st of January, 1380, arrived Carlo Zeno, who had been cruising on the Genoese coast with fourteen galleys. The Venetians were now strong enough to besiege the Genoese. Doria was killed on the 22d of January by a stone bullet one hundred and ninety-five pounds weight, discharged from a bombard called the Trevisan. Chioza was then closely invested: five thousand auxiliaries, among whom were some English Condottieri, commanded by one Captain Ceccheo, joined the Ven-

The Genoese in their turn, prayed for conditions, but none were granted, until, at last, they surrendered at discretion: and, on the 5th of June, 1520, the Doge Contarini made his triumphal entry into Chiozza. Four thousand prisoners, nineteen galleys, many smaller vessels and barks, with all the ammunition and arms, and outfit of the expedition, fell into the hands of the conquerors, who, had it not been for the inexorable answer of Donato, would have gladly reduced their dominion to the city of Venice. An account of these transactions is found in a work called the War of Chiozza, written by Daniel Chilnazzò, who was in Venice at the time.

Thin streets, and foreign aspects, such as must Too oft remind her who and what enthralled.
Stanza xv. lines 7 and 8.

The population of Venice at the end of the seventeenth century amounted to nearly two hundred thousand souls. At the last census, taken two years ago, it was no more than about one hundred and three thousand, and it diminishes daily. The commerce and the official employments, which were to be the unpolluted source of Venetian grandeur, have both expired. Most of the patrician mansions are deserted, and would gradually disappear, had not the government, alarmed by the desolation of seventy-two, during the last two years, expressly forbidden this sad resource of poverty. Many remnants of the Venetian nobility are now scattered and confounded with the wealthier Jews upon the banks of the Brenta, whose paladian palaces have sunk, or are sinking in the general decay. Of the "gentiluomo Veneto," the name is still known, and that is all. He is but the shadow of his former self, but he is polite and kind. It surely may be pardoned to him if he is querulous. Whatever may have been the vices of the republic, and although the natural term of its existence may be thought by forgers to have arrived in the due course of mortality, only one sentiment can be expected from the Venetians themselves. At no time were the subjects of the republic so unanimous in their resolution to rally round the standard of St. Mark, as when it was for the last time unfurled; and the cowardice and the treachery of the few patriots who recommended the fatal neutrality were confined to the persons of the traitors themselves. The present race cannot be thought to regret the loss of their aristocratical forms, and too despotic government; they think only on their vanished independence. They pine away at the remembrance, and on this subject suspend for a moment their gay good humor. Venice may be said in the words of the Scripture, "to die daily; and so general and so apparent is the decline, as to become painful to a stranger, not reconciled to the sight of a whole nation expiring as it were before his eyes. So artificial a creation, having lost that principle which called it into life and supported its existence, must fall to pieces at once, and sink more rapidly than it rose. The abhorrence of slavery which drove the Venetians to the sea, has, since their disaster, forced them to the land, where they may be at least overlooked amongst the crowd of dependants, and not present the humiliating spectacle of a whole nation loaded with recent chains. Their liveliness, their affability, and that happy indulgence which constitution alone can give, for philosophy aspires to it in vain, have not sunk under circumstances: but many peculiarities of costume and manner have by degrees been lost, and the nobles, with a pride common to all Italians who have been masters, have not been persuaded to purify their insignificance. That splendid scene which was a proof and a portion of their power, they would not degrade into the trappings of their subtraction. They retired from the space which they had occupied in the eyes of their fellow-citizens; their commonwealth of which would have been a symptom of acquiescence, and an insult to those who suffered by the common misfortune. Those who remained in the degraded capital might be said to haunt the scenes of their departed power, than to live in them. The reflection, "who and what enthralled," will hardly bear a comment from one who is, nationally, the friend and the ally of the conqueror. It may, however, be allowed to say thus much, that to those who wish to recover their independence, any masters must be an object of detestation; and it may be safely foretold that this unhappy aversion will not have been corrected before Venice shall have sunk into the slime of her chopped canals.

Thanks to the critical acumen of a Scotchman, we now know as little of Laura as ever. The discoveries of the Abbe de Sade, his triumphs, his sneers can no longer instruct or amuse. We must not, however, think that these memoirs are as much a romance as Belisarius or the Incas, although and perversive, that it absorbed him, and mastered his heart.

In this case, however, he was perhaps alarmed for the culpability of his wishes; for the Abbé de Sade himself, who certainly would not have been a scrupulous or deliberate lover and have proved his descent from Petrarch, as well as the memory of mother, that, when arrived at his fortieth year, he not only had in horror, but had lost all recollection and image of any 'irregularity.' But the birth of his natural daughter cannot be assigned earlier than his thirty-ninth year; and either the modesty or the morality of the poet must have failed him, when he forgot or was guilty of this slip. The weakest argument for the purity of this love has been drawn from the permanence of effects, which sustained the object of his passion. The reflection of Mr. de la Bastie, that virtue alone is capable of making impressions which death cannot efface, is one of those which everybody applauds, and every poet of his own breast or the record of human feeling. Such apothegms can do nothing for Petrarch or for the cause of morality, except with the very weak and the very young. He that has made even a little progress has no right to demand of the child, or of the pupil, not to be edified with anything but truth. What is called vindicating the honor of an individual or a nation, is the most futile, tedious, and unconstructive of all writing; although it will always meet with more applause than that sober criticism, which is attributed to the malicious desire of reducing a great man to the common standard of humanity. It is, after all, not unlikely, that our historian was guilty in showing his favorite hypochondriacal notions which secures the architect, although it scarcely saves the honor of the still unknown mistress of Petrarch.

16. They keep his dust in Arqua, where he died.

Stanza xxvi. line 1.

Petrarch retired to Arqua immediately on his return from the unsuccessful attempt to visit Urban V. at Rome, in the year 1370, and, with the exception of his celebrated visit to Venice, in company with Francesco Novello da Carrara, he appears to have passed the great part of his lifetime in that charming solitude and Padua. For four months previous to his death he was in a state of continual languor, and in the morning of July the 19th, in the year 1374, was found dead in his library chair, with his head resting upon a book. The chair is still shown among the precious relics of Arqua, which, from the uninterrupted veneration that has been attached to every thing relative to this great man from the moment of his death to the present hour, have been preserved, a better chance of authenticity than the Shaksperean memorials of Stratford upon Avon.

The biographer Serass*, out of tenderness to the reputation either of the Italian or the French poet, is eager to observe that the satire recut or explained away this censure, and subsequently allowed the author of the Jerusalem to be a "genius, sublime, vast, and happily born from the higher flights of poetry." To this we may add that the recantation is far from satisfactory, when we examine the whole anecdote as reported by Olivet. The sentence pronounced against him by Bohours is recorded only to the confusion of the critics, whose opinions the Italian makes no effort to discover, and would not perhaps accept. As to the opposition which the Jerusalem encountered from the Cruasan academy, who degraded Tasso from all competition with Ariosto, below Boilieu and Pulci, the disgrace of such opposition must also in some measure be laid to the charge of Alfonso, and the court of Ferrara. For Leonard Svaliazi, the principal and nearly the sole origin of this attack, was...
NOTES TO CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE.

There can be no doubt, influenced by a hope to acquire the favor of the House of Este; an object which he thought attainable by exalting the reputation of a native poet at the expense of a rival, then a prisoner of state. The hopes and efforts of Salviati must serve to show the contemporary opinion as to the nature of the poet's imprisonment; and will preserve of our indignation towards the tyrant jailer. In fact, the antagonist of Tasso was not disappointed in the reception given to his criticism; he was called to the court of Ferrara, where having endeavored to heighten with exaggerated claims to favor by panegyrics on the family of his sovereign, he was in turn abandoned, and expired in neglected poverty.

The opposition of the Cruscans was brought to a close in six years after the commence-ment of the controversy; and if the academy own its first renown to having opened with such a paradox, it is probable that, on the other hand, the care of his reputation alleviated rather than aggravated the imprisonment of the injured poet. The defence of his father and himself, for both were involved in the censure of Salviati, found employment for many of his solitary hours, and the captive could have been but little embarrased to reply to accusations, where, amongst other delin- quencies, he was imputed with omission in his comparison between France and Italy, to make any mention of the cupola of St. Maria del Fiore at Florence. The late biographer of Ariosto seems as if willing to renew the controversy by• doubting the poet's genuineness of the inscription related in Scaramelli's life of the poet. But Tiraboschi had before laid that rivalry at rest, by showing, that between Ariosto and Tasso it is not a question of comparison, but of preference.

Stanza xli. lines 1 and 2.

Before the remains of Ariosto were removed from the Benedictine church to the library of Ferrara, his bust, which surmounted the tomb, was struck by lightning, and a crown of iron laurels melted away. The event has been recorded by a writer of the last century.†

The transfer of these sacred ashes on the 6th of June, 1851, was one of the most brilliant spectacles of the Toscan Republic; to consecrate the memory of the ceremony, the once famous fallen Intrepidi were revived and reformed into the Ariostean academy. The celebrated letter of Servius Sulpicius to Cicero on the death of his daughter describes it as it then was, and now is, a path which I often traced in Greece, both by sea and land, in different journeys and voyages.

"On my return from Asia, as I was sailing from Ægina towards Megara, I began to contemplate the prospect of the countries around me: Ægina was behind, Megara before me; Piræus on the right, Corinth on the left; all which towns, once famous and flourishing, now lie overturned and buried in their ruins. Upon this sight, I could not but think presently within myself, Alas! how do we pour mortals fret and vex ourselves, if any of our friends happen to die or to be killed, while life is yet so short, when the carcasses of so many noble cities lie here exposed before me in one view."

25. There, too, the Goddess loves in stone.
Stanza xlix. line 1.

The view of the Venus of Medecis instantly suggests the lines in the Seasons, and the comparison of the object with the description proves not only the correctness of the portrait, but the peculiar turn of thought, and, if the term may be used, the sexual imaginatn of the descriptive poet. The same conclusion may be deduced from another hint in the same episode of Musidora; for Thomson's notion of the privileges of favored love must have been either very primitive, or rather deficient in delicacy, when he made his grateful nymph inform her discreet Duncun that in some happier moment he might, perhaps, be the companion of her bath:

"The time may come you need not fly."

The reader will recollect the anecdote told in the Life of Dr. Johnson. We will not leave the Florentine gallery without a word on the Wetter. It seems strange that the character of that dispute statue should not be entirely decided, at least in the mind of any one who has seen a sarcophagus in the vestibule of the Basilica of St. Paul without the walls, at Rome, where the whole group of the table with the two capitals has been in tolerable preservation; and the Scythian slave when the knife is represented exactly in the same position as the celebrated master-piece. The slave is not naked; but it is easier to get rid of this difficulty than to suppose the knife in the hand of the Florentine statue an instrument for shaving, which it must be, if, as Lanzi supposes, the man is no other than the barber of Julius Cæsar. Winkelmann, illustrating a bas relief of the same subject, follows the opinion of Leonard Agostini, and his authority might have been thought conclusive, even if the resemblance did not strike the most careless observer.

"Among the bronzes of the same princely collection is still to be seen the inscribed tablet copied and commented upon by Mr. Gibbon. Our historian found some difficulties, but did not dissent from his illustration: he might be vexed to hear that his criticism has been thrown away on an inscription now generally recognized to be a forgery.

This name will recall the memory, not only of those whose tombs have raised the Santa Croce into the centre of pilgrimage, the Mecca of Italy, but of her whose eloquence was poured over the illustrious ashes, and whose voice is now mute as those she sung. Corinna is no more; and with her should expire the fear, the flattery, and the envy, which threw too dazzling or too dark a cloud round the march of genius, and forbade the steady gaze of disinterested criticism. We have her picture embellished or distorted, as friendship or destruction has held the pencil: the impartial portrait was hardly to be expected from a contemporary. The immediate voice of her survivors will, it is probable, be far from affording a just estimate of her singular capacity. The gallantry, the love of wonder, and the hope of associated fame, which blunted the edge of censure, must cease to exist.—The dead have no sex; they can surprise by no new miracles; they can confer no privilege; Corinna has ceased to be a woman—she is only an author: and it may be foreseen that many will repay themselves for former complaisance, by a severity to which the extravagance of previous praises may perhaps give the color. Yet, in the latest posterity they will assuredly descend, will have to pronounce upon her various productions and the longer the vista through which they are seen, the more accurately will be the object, the more certain the justice, of the decision. She will enter into that existence in which the great writers of all ages and nations are, as it were, associated in a world of their own, and, from that superior sphere, shed their eternal influence for the control and consolation of mankind. But the individual will gradually disappear as the author is more distinctly seen: some one, therefore, of all those whom the charms of involuntary wit, and of easy..."
The affection of simplicity in sepulchral inscriptions, which so often leaves us uncertain whether the structure before us is an actual repository, or a cenotaph, or a simple memorial not of death but life, has given lieu to many a speculation as to the place or time of the birth or death, the age or parentage, of the historian.

There seems at least no reason why the name should not have been put above the sentence which alludes to it.

It will readily be imagined that the prejudices which have passed the name of Machiavelli into an epithet proverbial of iniquity, exist no longer at Florence. His memory was persecuted as his life had been, for an attachment to liberty incompatible with the new system of despotism, which succeeded the fall of the free governments of Italy. He was put to the torture for being a "libertine," that is, for wishing to restore the republic of Florence; and events, which are the direct result of the love of Liberty, proved, that he was interested in the perversions not only of the nature of actions, but the meaning of words, that what was once patriotism, has by degrees come to signify de bauch. We have ourselves outlined the old meaning of "libertine," which is now another word for treason in one country and for infatuation in all. It seems to have been a strange mistake to accuse the author of the Prince, as being a pandar to tyranny; and to think that the Inquisition could condemn his work for such a delinquency. The fact is that Machiavelli, as is usual with those against whom no crime can be proved, was suspected of, and charged with, atheism; and the first and last most violent opposers of the Prince were both Jesuits, one of whom persuaded the Inquisition "benché fosse tardo," to prohibit the treatise, and the other qualified the secretary of the Florentine republic as no better than a fool. The father Possevin was proved never to have read the book, and the father Lucchesini not to have understood it. It is clear, however, that such critics must have objected not to the slavery of the doctrines, but to the supposed tendency of the book, which shows how distinct are the interests of a monarch from the happiness of mankind. The Jesuits are re-established in Italy, and the last chapter of the Prince may again call forth a particular refutation, from those who are employed on its defence in modern times in rising generation, so as to receive the impressions of despotism. The chapter bears for title, "Essi tazione a liberare l'Italia dai Barbari," and concludes with:"Ma a' Artino eattimento al futuro de impotuione d'Italia. "Non si deve adunque lasciare passare questa occasione, dirci che la Italia vegga dopo tanto tempo appaio un suo redentore. of having patronized him, and the jealous skepticism of one writer would not allow Ravenna the undoubted possession of his bones. Even the critical Tiraboschi was inclined to believe that the poet had foreseen and foretold one of the discoveries of his Galilei. The Galilei, as a last step in the reign of the order of other nations, his popularity has not always maintained the same level. The last age seemed inclined to undervalue him as a model and a study; and Bettinelli one day rebuked his pupil Mouti, for pering over the hard and obscure parts of his Commedia. In the present generation, having recovered from the Galilei idolatries of Cesarotti, has returned to the ancient worship, and the Danteologia of the northern Italians, is thought even indiscreet by the more moderate Tuscanists.

There is still much curious information relative to the life and writings of this great poet which has not as yet been collected even by the Italians; but the celebrated Ugo Poscollo meditates to supply this defect, and it is not to be regretted that this national work has been reserved for one so devoted to his country and the cause of truth.

The elder Scipio Africanus had a tomb if he was not buried at Livernum, whither he had retired to volunteer his own sequestration. This command was near the sea-shore, and the story of an inscription upon it, Ingrata Patria, having given a name to a modern tower, is, if not true, an agreeable fiction. If he was not buried, he certainly lived there.†

Ingratitude is generally supposed the vice peculiar to republics; and it seems to be forgotten that for one instance of popular inconstancy, we have a hundred examples of the fall of courtly favorites. Besides, a people have often repented—a monarch schism or never. Leaving apart many familiar instances of this fact, a short story may show the difference between even an aristocracy and the multitude.

Vettor Pisani, having been defeated in 1384 at Potolongo, and many years afterwards in the more decisive action of 1401, was recalled by the Venetian government, and thrown into chains. The Avrogadore proposed to behead him, but the supreme tribunal was content with the sentence of imprisonment. Whilst Pisani was suffering this unmerited disgrace, Chioga, in the vicinity of the capital, was, by the assistance of the Signor of Padua, delivered into the hands of Pietro Doria. At the intelligence of that disaster the great bell of St. Mark's tower tolled to arms, and the people and the soldiery of the galleys were summoned to the repulse of the approaching enemy; but they protested they would not move a step, unless Pisani were liberated and placed at their head. The great council of Venice, when it was at last caused to deliberate on this question, determined to release him; and the Doge, Andrea Contarini, informed him of the demands of the people and the necessities of the state, whose only hope of safety was the great Pisani. Like the great orators of the East, and who implored him to forget the indignities he had endured in his service. "I have submitted," replied the magnanimous republican, "I have submitted to your delib-
ments without complaint; I have supported patiently the pains of imprisonment, for they were inflicted at your command: this is no time to inquire whether the liberty of the republic may have seemed to require it, and which the republic resolves is always resolved wisely. Behold me ready to lay down my life for the preservation of my country.

To crown his exertions, in conjunction with those of Carlo Zeno, the Venetians soon recovered the ascendancy over their maritime rivals.

The Italian communities were no less unjust to the Florentines than the Florentines were to the Greeks. Literature, both with the one and the other, seems to have been a national, not an individual object: and, notwithstanding the boasted equality before the laws, which an ancient Greek writer considered the great distinctive mark between his countrymen and the barbarians, the mutual rights of fellow-citizens seem never to have been the principal scope of the old democracies. The world may have not yet seen an essay by the author of the Italian Republics, in which the distinction between the liberty of former states, and the signification attached to that word by the happier constitution of England, is ingeniously developed. The Italians, however, when they had ceased to be free, still looked back with a sigh upon those times of turbulence, when every citizen might rise to a share of sovereign power, and have never been taught fully to appreciate the reposes of a monarchy. Sperone Speroni, when Francis Maria II. Duke of Etruria proposed the question, "which was preferable, the republic or the principality—the perfect and not durable, or the less perfect and not so liable to change," replied, "that our happiness is to be measured by its quality, not by its duration; and that he preferred to live for one day like a man, than for a hundred years like a brute, a stock, or a stone." This was thought, and called, a magnificent answer down to the last days of Italian servitude.

32. And the crown which Petrarch's laureate brow supremely wore, Upon a far and foreign soil had grown.

Stanza lvi. lines 6, 7, and 8.

The Florentines did not take the opportunity of Petrarch's short visit to their city to recover the decree which constituted the property of his father, who had been banished shortly after the exile of Dante. His crown did not dazzle them; but when in the next year they were in want of his protection of his university, as they repented of their injustice, and Boccaccio was sent to Padua to entreat the laureate to correct his wanderings in the bosom of his native country, where he might finish his immortal Africa, and enjoy with his recovered possessions, the esteem of all classes of his fellow-citizens. They gave him the option of the book and the science he might condescend to expound: they called him the glory of their country, who was dear, and would be dearer to them, if he could add, that there was nothing impeding in their letter, he ought to return among them: it was only to correct their style. Petrarch seemed at first to listen to their flattery and to the entreaties of his friend, but he did not return to Florence, and preferred a pilgrimage to the tomb of Laura and the shades of Vaucluse.

Boccaccio was buried in the church of St. Michele and St. James, at Certaldo, a small town in the Valdelsa, which was by some supposed the place of his birth. There he passed the latter part of his life in a course of laborious study, which shortened his existence; and there might his ashes have been secure, if not of honor, at least of repose. But the tyrranical Bayzana bought the body of Boccaccio, and ejected it from the holy precincts of St. Michael and St. James. The occasion, and, it may be hoped, the excuse, of this ejectment was the making of a new floor for the church; but the fact is, that the monks were weary of it, and thrown aside at the bottom of the building. Ignorance may share the sin with bigotry. It would be unfair to relate such an exception to the devotion of the Italians for their great names, could it not be accompanied by a trait more honorably conformable to the general character of the nation. The principal person of the district, the last branch of the house of Medici, afforded that protection to the memory of the insulted dead which her best ancestors had dispensed upon all contemporary merit. The eloquence Lenzoni rescued the tombstone of Boccaccio from the neglect in which it had sometime lain, and found it for an honorable elevation in her own churchyard.

This house she has taken measure to purchase, and proposes to devote to it that care and consideration which are attached to the cradle and to the tomb of genius.

This is the proper place to undertake the defence of Boccaccio; but the man who exhausted his little patrimony in the acquirement of learning, who was among the first, if not the first, to allure the science and the poetry of Greece to the bosom of Italy—wielder only invented a new style, but founded, or certainly fixed, a new language; who, besides the esteem of every polite court of Europe, was thought worthy of employment by the predominant republic of his own country, and, what is more, of the friendship of the Pope;—this man, in the full vigour of his life, a philosopher and a freeman, and who died in the pursuit of knowledge,—such a man might have found more consideration than he has met with from the people of his native land, and from a late English traveller, who strikes off his person as contemptible, licentious writer, whose impure remains should be suffered to rot without a record. That English traveller, unfortunately for those who have to deplore the loss of a very amiable person, is beyond all criticism; but the mortality which did not protect Boccaccio from Mr. Eustace, must not defend Mr. Eustace from the impartial judgment of his successors. Death can manumit his virtues, not his errors; and it may be modestly pronounced that he transgressed, not only as an author, but as a man, when he evoked the shade of Boccaccio in company with that of Arete, amidst the sepulchres of Santa Croce, merely to dismiss it with indignity.

"Il degno de' Pritetti,‖ Il Divo Pietro Ardino."

"Classical Tongue, esp. 1o. vol. V, p. 355, edit. 8to.‖ Of Boccaccio, the modern Periplus, we say nothing; the name of graces is more odious and more contemptible than its absence; and it impairs little where the happy occasion of a famous bone is there conceived. But mere compassion of the invention reason the traveller may pass unseen the tomb of the maligned Ardino.

This durable phantasm is barely enough to save the tombstone from the scrutiny of another blindness respecting the basilica of Arezzo, whose tomb was in the church of St. Luke at Venice, and gave rise to the famous controversy of which some nodes is taken in Church. Now the words of Mr. Eustace would have been unnecessary; for as to this, Florence, that venerable city, is well recognized. Whether the inscription so much diseste was ever written on the tomb cannot now be decided, for of momentous this author had been preserved from the church of St. Luke.
it is of little import what censure is passed upon a romancier who owes his present existence to the above burlesque character given to him by the poet whose anecdotage has preserved many other grubs and worms; but to classify Boccaccio with such a Pater

Il Palazzo, etc., torn. v. II. lib. iii. pag. 542, ed. Vol. 1756.

The tenor of the above extract is somewhat different from the text of Boccaccio, but it is not long before the whole of Europe had but one opinion of the author-the absolution of the sovereign of Italy, and the absolution of the author of Sir Walter Scott. He was succeeded at Rome by his son James, who continued to hold the office until his death.
An earthquake reek'd unheedly away.

Stanza liii, line 5.

"And such was their mutual animosity, so intent were they upon the battle, that the earthquake, which overthrew in great part many of the cities of Italy, which turned the course of rapid streams, poured benediction upon the Roman banner, and left the base of the mountains, was not felt by one of the combatants."  ♦

Such is the description of Livy. It may be doubted whether modern tactics would admit of such an abridgment.

The site of the battle of Thrasimene is not to be mistaken. The traveller from the village under Cortona to Casa di Piano, the next stage on the road to Rome, has for the first two or three miles, around him, but more particularly to the right, that flat land which Iramnillai laid waste in order to induce the Consul Flaminio to move from Arezzo. On his left, and in front of him, is a ridge of hills bending down towards the lake of Thrasimene, called the lake of Pyrgi, and here, I believe, the Gualandra. These hills he approaches at Ossaja, a village which the itineraries pretend to have been near, but which I believe to be farther from the battle-ground than Iramnillai moved from his post on the hill. From Ossaja the road begins to rise a little, but does not pass into the roots of the mountains until the sixty-seventh milestone from Florence. The ascent is long, but perpetual, and continues for twenty minutes. The lake is soon seen below on the right, with Borghetto, a round tower close upon the water, and the undulating hills partially covered with wood, among which the road winds, sink by degrees into the marshes near to this tower. Lower than the road down to the right amidst these woody hillocks, Hannibal placed his horse, in the jaws of or rather above the pass, which was between the lake and the present road, and most probably close to Borghetto, just under the lowest of the "summit." ♦

On a summit to the left, above the road, is an old circular ruin, which may be a part of the fortification of Hannibal the Carthaginian. Arrived at the highest point of the road, the traveller has a partial view of the fatal plain, which opens fully upon him as he descends the Gualandra. He soon finds himself in a vast plain, leading to that city, could, in a few hours, by the sound of a bell, bring together, 135,000 well-armed men; whereas now that city, with all the others in that province, are brought to such desperate weakness, emptiness, poverty, and baseness, that they can neither resist the oppressions of their own prince, nor defend him or themselves if they were assaulted by a foreign enemy. The people are dispersed and destroyed, and the best families sent to seek habitations in Venice, Genoa, and Naples; and his is not far effect of war or pestilence; they enjoy a perfect peace, and suffer no other plague than the government they are under." ♦ From the usurper Cosmo do not return to Gaeta, in vain for any of those unmixed qualities which should raise a patriot to the command of his fellow-citizens. The Grand Dukes, and particularly the third Cosmo, had operated so entire a change in the Tuscan character, that the Grand Duke, and his tool, nervou"s and weak, is let, and in front of him, the Gualandra hills, bending round in a segment larger than a semicircle, and running down at each end to the lake, which obliges to the right and form the chord of this mountain arc. The position cannot be guessed at from the plains of Cortona, nor appears to be so completely enclosed unless to one who is fairly within the hills. Then it, indeed, appears "a place made as it were on purpose for a snare," tunc quasi nactus natus. ♦ Borghetto is then four miles from the summit of the road, and is about a mile close to the hill and to the lake, whilst there is no other outlet at the opposite turn of the mountains than through the little town of Passignano, which is here lost in the vale, watered by the foot of a high rocky acclivity." ♦ There a wood descends from the mountains into the upper end of the plain nearer to the side of Passignano, and on this stands a white village called Torre. Polybius seems to allude to this elevation as the one on which Hannibal encamped and drew out his heavy-armed African and Spaniards in a conspicuous position. ♦ From this spot he despatched his Balearic and light armed troops round through the Gualandra heights to the right and left of the road, to prevent the wants and wishes, not of the people, of the enemy.

BYRON'S WORKS.

No book of travels has omitted to expatiate on the temple of the Clitumnus, between Foligno and Spoleto, and no site, or scenery even in Italy, is more worthy a description. For an account of the dissipation of this temple, the reader is referred to the Historical Illustrations of the Fourth Canto of Childe Harold.

37. Charming the eye with dread,—a matchless cat-dread. Stanza lxxi. line 9.

I saw the ‘Cascata del marmore’ of Terni, it is a great waterfall, and is not far from the summit of the precipice, and again from the valley below. The lower view is far to be preferred, if the traveller has time for one only; but in any point of view, either from above or below, it is worth all, the cascades and torrents of Switzerland put together.

38. An Iris sets amidst the infernal surge.

Stanza lxxiii. line 3.

Of the time, place, and qualities of this kind of iris, the reader may have seen a short account in a note to Manfred. The fall looks so much like “the hell of waters,” that Addison thought the descent adumbrated to the gulph in which Alcino plunged fitted to the infernal regions. It is singular enough that two of the finest cascades in Europe should be as-

39. The thundering launus.

Stanza lxxiii. line 5.

In the greater part of Switzerland the avalanches are known by the name of launus.

40. I abhorred

Too much, to conquer for the poet’s sake,
The drill’d dull lesson, forced down word by word.

Stanza lxxv. lines 6, 7, and 8.

These stanzas may probably remind the reader of Ennius’s line, ‘Ab horribus laenas, ut minititem et consilio, but the reasons for our dislike are not exactly the same. I wish to express that we became tired of the task before we can comprehend the beauty; that we learn by rote before we can get by heart; that the freshness is worn away, and the future pleasure and advantage deadened and destroyed, by the didactic anticipation, at an age when we can neither feel nor understand the power of compositions which it required an acquaintance with life, as well as Latin and Greek, to relish, or to reason upon. For the same reason we cannot aware of the fulness of some of the finest passages of Shakspeare, (‘To be, or not to be,’ for instance,) or the ‘sign of Noah,’ ‘spoken in the name of the President Deputee, saw Thrasimone in the lake of Bolsena, which lay conveniently on his way from Sienna to Rome.

36. But thou, Clitumnus.

Stanza lxvi. line 1.

whom, on every side, and before they could fall into their ranks, or draw their swords, or see by whom they were attacked, fell at once that they were surrounding and lost.

There are two little rivulets which run from the Guandalia into the lake. The traveller crosses the first of them without a mile without coming into the plain, and this divides the Tuscan from the papal territories. The second, about a quarter of a mile further on, is called “the bloody rivulet,” and the peasants point out an open spot to the left between the rivulet and the road, which, they say, was the principal scene of slaughter. The other part of the plain is covered with thick set olive-trees in corn grounds, and is nowhere quite level except near the edge of the lake. It is, in deal, most probable, that the battle was fought near this end of the valley, for the six thousand Romans, who, at the beginning of the action, broke through the enemy, escaped to the summit of an eminence which must have been in this quarter, otherwise they would have had to traverse the whole plain and to pierce through the main army of Hamil-

The Romans fought desperately for three hours, but Flaminius was the signal for a general dispersion. The Carthaginian horse then burst in upon the fugitives, and the lake, the marsh about Borghetto, but chiefly the plain of the Sanguinette and the passages of the Guandalia, were strewn with dead and wounded. The old walls on this ridge to the left above the rivulet, many human bones have been repeatedly found, and this has confirmed the pretensions and the name of the “stream of blood.”

Every district of Italy has its hero. In the north some painter is the usual genius of the place, and the foreign Julio Romano more than divides Mantua with her native Virgil. * To the south we hear of Roman names. Near Thrasimone, tradition is still faithful to the fame of an enemy, and Hamilbal the Carthaginian is the only ancient name re-

The antiquary, the horror, the poet, of the posthouse at Spoleto, tells you that his town repulsed the victorious enemy, and shows you the gate still called Porta di Annibale. It was hardly worth while to remark that a French travel writer, well known to the name of the President Deputy, saw Thrasimone in the lake of Bolsena, which lay conveniently on his way from Sienna to Rome.

42. The troubad hundred triumphs.
Stanza lxxxi. line 2.
Orosius gives three hundred and twenty for the number of triumphs. He is followed by Panvinius; and Panvinius by Mr. Gibbon and the modern writers.

43. Oh thou, whose chariot roll’d on Fortune’s wheel, &c.
Stanza lxxxii. line 1.
Certainly were it not for these two traits in the aje of Sylla, alluded to in this stanza, we should regard him as a monarch redeemed by any admirable quality. The atonement of his voluntary resignation of empire may perhaps be accepted by us, as it seems to have satisfied the Romans, who, if they had not respected must have destroyed him. There could be no mean, no division of opinion, must have all thought, like Ercutates, that what had appeared ambition was a love of glory, and that what had been mistimed for pride was a real grandeur of soul.*

44. And laid him with the earth’s preceding clay.
Stanza lxxxvi. line 4.
On the third of September, Cromwell gained the victory of Dunbar; a year afterwards he obtained “his crowning mercy” of Worcester; and a few years after, on the same day, which he had ever esteemed the most fortunate for him, died.

45. And thou, dread statue! still existent in
The austere form of naked majesty.
Stanza lxxxvii. lines 1 and 2.
The projected division of the Spada Pompey has already been recorded by the historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Mr. Gibbon found it in the memorials of Flaminian Vaece,† and it may be added to his mention of it that Pope Julius III. gave the contending owners five hundred crowns of silver for a statue; and presented it to Cardinal Capo di Ferro, who had prevented the judgment of Solomon from being executed upon the image. In a more civilized age this statue was exposed to an actual operation: for the French who acted the Brutus of Voltaire in the Coliseum, re- solved that their Caesar should fall at the base of that Pompey, which was supposed to have been sprinkled with the blood of the original dictator. The nine-foot hero was therefore removed to the arena of the amphitheatre, and to facilitate its transport suffered the temporary amputation of its right arm. The republican tragedians had to plead that the arm was a restoration: but their accusers do not believe that the integrity of the statue would have protected it. The love of finding a coincidence has discovered the true Caesarian iehor in a stain near the right knee: but colder criticism has rejected not only the blood but the portrait, and assigned the globe of power rather to the first of the emperors than to the last of the republican masters.

of Rome. Winkelmann is leath to allow an heroic statue of a Roman citizen— but the Griman Agrippa, a contemporary almost, is heroic; and naked Roman figures were only very rare, not absolutely forbidden. The face accords much better with the “hominem integrum et caustum et gracium” than with any of the busts of Augustus, and is too stern for him who was beautiful, says Suetonius, at all periods of his life. The pretended likeness to Alexander the Great cannot be lessened, but the traits resemble a military medal of Pompey. The objectionable globe may not have been an ill-applied flat-tery to him who found Asia Minor the boundary, and left it in the centre of the Roman empire. It seems that Winkelmann has made a mistake in thinking down; he has no proper right to identify this statue, with that which received the bloody sacrifice, can be derived from the spot where it was discovered. § Flaminian Vaece says soto usus calule, and this can- tina is known to have been in the Vicolo de’ Leutarii near the Cancellaria, a position corresponding ex- actly to that of the Janus before the basilica of Pompey’s theatre, to which Augustus transferred the statue after the curia was either burnt or taken down. ¶ For the pomps, &c. of the theatre, see Storie del teatro. And the porti- co, existing in the first century, of the XVth century, and the atrium was still called Saturo. So says Blondus.  At all events, so imposing is the stern majesty of the statue, and so memorable is the poetry, that we cannot but give it a room for the exercise of the judgment, and the fiction, if a fiction it is, operates on the spectator with an ef- fect not less powerful than truth.

46. And thou, the thunder-striken nurse of Rome:
Stanza lxxxviii. line 1.
Ancient Rome, like modern Sienna, abounded most probably with images of the foster-mother of her founders, but there were two she-wolves of whom history makes particular mention. One of these, of brass in ancient work, was seen by Dionysius at the temple of Eubulus, under the Palatine, and is universally believed to be that mentioned by the Latin historian, as having been made from the money collected by a fine on usurers, and as standing under the Roman fig-tree.†† The other was that which Cicero showed celebrated in prose and verse, and which the historian Dion also records as having suffered the same accident as is alluded to by the orator. || The question agitated by the antiquaries is, whether the wolf now in the conservators’ palace is that of Livy and Dionysius, or that of Cicer-0, or whether it is neither one nor the other. The earlier writers were more or less mistaken; Lucius Faunus says, that it is the one alluded to by both, which is impossible, and also by Virgil, which may be. Fulvius Ursinus calls it the wolf of Dionysius, and Marzialius talks of it as the one mentioned by Cicero. To him Rycuquis trebblingly assents. Nardini is inclined to suppose it may be one of the many wolves preserved in Ancient Rome; but of the two rather bends to the Ciceronian version. Rycuquis and Marzialius talk of it without doubt. Of the latter writers the decisive Winkelmann proclaims it as having been found at the church of Saint Theodore, where, or near where, was the temple at Romulus, and consequently makes it the wolf of Dionysius. His authority is Lucius Faunus, who, however, only says that it was placed, not found, at the Ficus Rœminialis, by the Comitium, by which he does not seem to allude to the church of Saint Theodore. Rycuquis was the first to make the mistake, and Winkelmann followed Rycuquis.

Flaminius Vaca tells quite a different story, and says he had heard the wolf with the twins was found in an arch of Sutumpa, a hermit commentator on Winkelmann is of the same opinion with that learned person, and is incensed at Nardini for not having remarked that Cicero, in speaking of the wolf struck with lightning in the Church of Saint Theodore, makes use of the past tense. But, with the Abate’s leave, Nardini does not positively assert the statue to be that mentioned by Cicero, and, if he had, the assumption would not perhaps have been so exceedingly indirect. The Abate himself is obliged to own that there are marks very like the scathing of lightning in the hinder legs of the present wolf; and, to get rid of this, adds, that the wolf seen by Dionysius might have been also struck by lightning.

Let us examine the subject by a reference to the words of Cicero. The orator in two places seems to particularize the Romulus and the Remus, especially the first, which his audience remembered to have been in the Capitol, as being struck with lightning. In his verses he records that the twins towards the east: no mention is afterwards made of the wolf. This happened in 250 B.C. 689. The Abate Foa, in noticing this passage of Dion (Storni lib. vii. cap. 129, note e) has given the name of Dionysius, which is false, and he has been generally adopted. If the temple of Dion was not destroyed, according to Cicero, that of Romulus, whom Rycuquis has wrongly been made, to the force of the blow, or the firmness with which it had been fixed. The whole strength, therefore, of the Abate’s argument hangs upon the doubt of the past tense, may be somewhat diminished by remarking that it is possible only that the statue was not then standing in its former position. Winkelmann has observed, that the present twins are modern; and it is equally clear that the statue of Romulus & Remus was not put up without doubt. Of the latter writers the decisive Winkelmann proclaims it as having been found at the church of Saint Theodore, where, or near where, was the temple at Romulus, and consequently makes it the wolf of Dionysius. Rienzi, last of Romans.
Stanza exiv. line 5.

The name and exploits of Rienzi must be familiar to the reader of Gibbon. Some details and omitted manuscripts relative to this unhappy hero will be seen in the Illustrations of the IVth Canto.

Stanza exiv. lines 1, 2, and 3.

The respectable authority of Flaminius Vacco would induce us to believe in the claims of the Egerian groto.† He assures us that he saw an inscription in the cavern, stating that the fountain was that of Egeria, dedicated to the nymphs. The inscription is not there at this day: but Montfaucon quotes two lines of Ovid from a stone in the Villa Justiniana, which he seems to think had been brought from the same groto.

This groto and valley were formerly frequented in summer, and particularly the first Sunday in May, by the modern Romans, who attached a salubrious quality to the fountain which trickles from an orifice at the bottom of the vault, and, overflowing the little pools, creeps down the matted grass into the brook below. The brook is the Ovidian Almo, whose name and qualities are lost in the modern Aqua敕。io. The valley itself is called Vallet di Caffarelli, from the dukes of that name who made over their fountain to the Pallavicini, with sixty rubbia of adjoining land.

There is little doubt that this long dell is the Egerian valley of Justinian, and the passing place of Umbritus, notwithstanding the generality of his commentators have supposed the descent of the satirist and his friend to have been into the Arician grove, when those nymphs met Umbritus, and where she was more peculiarly worshipped.

The step from the Porta Capena to the Alban hill, fifteen miles distant, would be too considerable, unless we were to believe in the wild conjecture of Vossius, who makes that gate travel from its present station, where he pretends it was during the reign of the kings, as far as the Arician grove, and then makes it reede to its old site within the shrinking city.† The tufa, or pavement, which the poet prefers to marble, is the substance composing the bank in which the grotto is sunk.

The modern topographers† find in the grotto the statue of the nymph and nine niches for the Muses, and a late traveller‡ has discovered that the cave is restored to that simplicity which the poet regretted had been exchanged for magnificent ornament. But the headless statue is palpably rather a male than a female, and has none of the attributes ascribed to it at present visible. The nine Muses could hardly have stood in six niches; and Justinian certainly does not allude to any individual cave.†

NOTES TO CHILDE HAROLD'S PILGRIMAGE.

Nothing can be collected from the satirist but that some valley near the Porta Capena was a spot in which it was supposed Numa held nightly consultations with his nymph, and where there was a grove and a sacred fountain, and fane once consecrated to the Muses; and that from this spot there was a descent into the valley of Egeria, where several artificial caves. It is clear that the statues of the Muses made no part of the decoration which the satirist thought misplaced in these caves; for he expressly assigns other fane (delubra) to these divinities, above the valley, and moreover tells us that they had been ejected to make room for the Jews. In fact, the little temple, now called that of Bacchus, was formerly thought to belong to the Muses; and places them in a popular grove, which was in his time above the valley.

It is probable, from the inscription and position, that the cave now shown may be one of the "artificial caverns," of which, indeed, there is another a little way higher up the valley under outclefts; but a single grotto of Egeria is a mere modern invention, grafted upon the application of the epithet Egerian to these nymphs in general, and which might send us to look for the haunts of Numa upon the banks of the Thames.

Our English Juvenal was not seduced into mistranslation by his acquaintance with Pope; he carefully preserves the correct plural—

"Thence slowly winding down the vale, we view The Egerian grove; oh, how unlike the true.

The valley abounds with springs, and over these springs, which the Muses might haunt from their neighboring groves, Egeria presided; hence she was said to supply them with water; and she was the nymph of the grotto through which the fountains were taught to flow.

The whole of the monuments in the vicinity of the Egerian valley have received names at will, which have been changed at will. Veyti, owning he can see no traces of the temples of Jove, Saturn, Juno, Venus, and Diana, which Nardini found, or hoped to find. The mutilator of Caracalla's circus, the temple of Honour and Virtue, the temple of Bacchus, and, above all, the temple of the god Redculus, are the antiquaries' despair.

The circus of Caracalla depends on a medal of that emperor cited by Fulvius Ursinus, of which the reverse reverses the preceding to represent the Circus Maximus. It gives a very good idea of that place of exercise. The soil has been but little raised, if we may judge from the small cellular structure at the end of the Spina, which was probably the place of Caracalla. This cell is half beneath the soil, as it must have been in the circus itself, for Dionysius could not be persuaded to believe that this divinity was the Roman Neptune, because his altar was underground.

57. Yet let us ponder boldly.

Stanza cxxvii. line 1.

"At all events," says the author of the Academic Questions, "I trust, whatever may be the fate of my own speculations, that philosophy will regain that estimation which it ought to possess. The free and philosophic spirit of our nation has been the theme of admiration to the world. This was the proud distinction of Englishmen, and the luminous source of all their glory. Shall we then forget the many and dignified sentiments of our ancestors, to prate in the language of the mother or the nurse about our old good prejudices? This is not the way to defend the cause of truth. It was not thus that our fathers maintained it in the brilliant periods of our history. He who may be trusted to guard the outworks for a short space of time while reason slumbers in the citadel; but if the latter sink into a lethargy, the former will quickly erect a standard for herself. Philosophy, wisdom and the arts, under which we understand: he who will not reason is a bigot; he who cannot, is a fool; and he who dares not, is a slave." Preface, p. xiv. vol. I. 1805.

58. Great Nemesis!

Here, where the ancient paid the homage long.

Stanza cxxviii. lines 2 and 3.

We read in Suetonius, that Augustus, from a warping received in a dream, counterfeited, once a year, the beggar, sitting before the gate of his palace with his hand hollowed and stretched out for charity. A statue formerly in the Villa Borghese, and which should be now at Paris, represents the Emperor in that posture of supplication. The object of this self-degradation was the appeasement of Nemesis, the perpetual attendant on good fortune, of whose power the Roman conquerors were so often reminded by certain symbols attached to their ears of triumph. These symbols were the crocalo, which were discovered in the Nemesis of the Vatican. The attitude of beggary made the above statue pass for that of Belisarius: and until the criticism of Winkelman had rectified the mistake, one of the Medici was called in to support another. It was the same fear of the sudden termination of prosperity that made Amasis, king of Egypt, warn his friend Polycrates of Samos, that the gods loved those whose lives were checkered with good and evil fortunes. Nemesis was supposed to lie in wait particularly for the prudent; that is, for those whose caution rendered them accessible only to mere accidents: and her first altar was raised on the banks of the Pyræus by Archelaus, the prince of that name who killed the son of Cresus by mistake. Hence the goddess was called Adrastea.

The Roman Nemesis was sacred and august; there was a temple to her in the Palatine under the name of Rhammasia; so great indeed was the propensit of the ancients to trust to the revolution of events, and to believe in the divinity of Fortune, that this was symbolized by some who was a temple to the Fortune of the day. This is the last superstition which retains its hold over the human heart; and from concentrating in one object the credulity so natural to man, has always appeared strongest in those unenlightened ages, as by other articles of belief. The antiquaries have supposed this goddess to be synonymous with Fortune and with Fate; but it was in her vindictive quality that she was worshiped under the name of Nemesis.

* Sueton. in Vit. Aug. cap. 91. Caesamnon, in the notes, refers to Plutarch's Lives of Cæcilius and Mummius Paulus, and also to his apologium for the character of this deity. The hollowed hand was circumscribed the tax degree of degradation; and when the dead body of the proficient Romans was borne about in triumph by the people, the indignity was increased by putting his hand in that position, and thus in history.

69. I see before me the Gladiator die.
Stanza cxll. line 1.

Whether the wonderful statue which suggested this image be a laucarian gladiator, which, in spite of Winkelmann's criticism has been stoutly maintained,* or whether it be a Greek herald, as that great antiquary positively asserted,† or whether it is to be thought a Spartan or barbarian shield-bearer, according to the opinion of his Italian editor,‡ it must assuredly seem a copy of that masterpiece of Ctesiolas which represented "a wounded man dying who perfectly expressed what there remained of him." § Montfaucon ‡ and Maffei ‡ thought it the identical statue; but that statue was of bronze. The gladiator was once in the villa Ludovizi, and was bought by Clement XII. The right arm is an entire restoration of Michael Angelo.

60. He, their sire, Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday.
Stanza cxli. lines 6 and 7.

Gladiators were of two kinds, compelled and voluntary. They were supplied from several conditions; from slaves sold for that purpose; from culprits; from barbarian captives either taken in war, and, after being led in triumph, set apart for the games, or those seized and condemned as rebels; also from free citizens, some fighting for hire (auctorati) others from a debased ambition: at last even knights and senators were exhibited, a disgrace of which the first tyrant was naturally the first inventor.¶ In the end, dwarfs, and even women fought for cruelty prohibited. By Severus, of these the most to be pitied, undoubtedly, were the barbarian captives; and to this species a Christian writer §§ justly applies the epithet "innocent," to distinguish them from the professional gladiators. Aurelian and Claudius supplied great numbers of these unfortunate victims; one after his triumph, and the other on the pretext of a rebellion.¶ No wars, says Lipsius,¶¶ was ever so destructive to the human race as these sports. In spite of the laws of Constantine and Constans, gladiatorial shows sur-lived the old established religion more than seven years; but they owed their final extinction to the courage of a Christian. In the Caracallas' time, on the kalends of January, they were exhibiting the shows in the Flavian amphitheatre before the usual immense concourse of people. Byron's works.

Senza flows, and is almost absorbed in a wide sandy bed before it reaches the Anio. Nothing can be more fortunate for the lines of the poet, whether in a metaphorical or direct sense:

"Me quandum veliris quidam Digesta rerum, Queen Mandula biit regnum figere popum."

The stream is clear high up the valley, but before it reaches the hill of Bardela looks green and yellow like a stream in the Pyrenees. Roccio Giovanni, a ruined village in the hills, half an hour's walk from the vineyard where the pavement is shown, does seem to be the site of the fane of Vacauna, and an inscription found there tells that the Sabines and the Sabine goddess was repeated by Vespasian. With these helps, and a position corresponding exactly to everything which the poet has told us of his retreat, we may feel tolerably secure of our site.

The hill which should be Lucretius is called Campanelle, and by following up the rivulet to the pretended Bandusa, you come to the roots of the higher mountain Gennaro. Singularly enough, the only spot on the hill in whole valley is on the knoll where this Bandusa rises.

"... a suiguis annalide Pansia vornere turris Praebet, at poerii vago."

The peasants show another spring near the mosaic pavement, which they call "Oradina," and which flows down the hills into a tank, or mill-dam, and then it trickles over into the Digesta.

But we must not hope.

"To trace the Muses upward to their spring,"

by exploring the windings of the romantic valley in search of the Bandusa fountain. It seems strange that any one should have thought Bandusa a fountain of the Digesta--Horace has not let drop a word of it; and this immortal spring has in fact been discovered in possession of the holders of many good things in Italy, the monks. It was attached to the church of St. Gervais and Protas near Venaia, where it is most likely to be found.

We shall not be so lucky as a late traveller in finding the occasional pine still pendant on the poetic villa. There is not a pine in the whole valley, but there are two or three pines evidently took, or mistook, for the tree in the ode. The truth is, that the pine is now, as it was in the days of Virgil, a garden tree, and it was not at all likely to be found in the cragginess and clefts of the valley of Rustica. Horace probably had one of these pines, which closed above his farm, immediately overshadowing his villa, not on the rocky heights at some distance from his abode. The tourist may have easily supposed himself to have seen this pine figured in the above cypress, for the orange and lemon trees which throw such a blossom over his description of the royal gardens at Naples, unless they have been since displaced, were assuredly only orange and common garden shrubs. The extreme disappointment experienced by choosing the Classical Tourist as a guide in Italy must be allowed to find vent in a few observations, which, it is asserted without fear of contradiction, will be confirmed by every one who has reviewed the excursion of experience and revenge, made louder by the borrowed trumpet of Mr. Burke. Now Bolonga is at this moment, and has been for some years, notorious among the states of Italy for its attachment to the Bourbon revolution, and its sedition, and has been the only city which made any demonstrations in favor of the unfortunate Murat. This change may, however... have been made since Mr. Eustace visited this country; but the traveller whom he has thrilled with horror at the projected stripping of the copper from the cupola of St. Peter's, must be much relieved to find that sacrilege out-of the power of the French, or any other plunderers, the cupola being covered with lead.*

If the conspiring voice of otherwise rival critics had not given considerable currency to the Classical Tour, it would have been unnecessary to warn the reader, that however it may adorn his library, it will be of little or no service to him in his carriage; and if the judgment of those critics had hitherto been suspended, no attempt would have been made to anticipate their decision. As it is, those who stand in the relation of posterity to Mr. Eustace may be permitted to appeal from cotemporary praises, and are perhaps more likely to be just in proportion as the causes of love and hatred are the farther removed. This appeal had, in some measure, been made before the above remarks were written; for one of the most respectable of the Florentine publishers, who had been persuaded by the repeated inquiries of those on their journey southwards to reprint a cheap edition of the Classical Tour, was, by the concurring advice of returning travellers, induced to abandon his design, although he had already arranged his types and paper, and had struck off one or two of the first sheets.

The writer of these notes would wish to part (like Mr. Gibbon) on good terms with the Pope and the Cardinals, but he does not think it necessary to extend the same discreet silence to their humble partisans.

* What, then, will be the astonishment, or rather the horror of my reader, when I inform him . . . . . . . that the French committee spared its attention to St. Peter’s, and employed a company of Jews to estimate and purchase the gold, silver, and brought that adorn the inside of the edifice, as well as the copper that covers the vaults and dome on the outside.”——Chas. br. p. 158 vol. ii. The story about the Jews is positively denied at Rome.
THE GIAOUR;
A FRAGMENT OF A TURKISH TALE

Our fatal remembrance—one sorrow that throws
Its black shade alike o'er our joys and our woes—
To which life nothing darker nor brighter can bring,
For which joy hath no balm, and affliction no sting.

MOORE

TO SAMUEL ROGERS, ESQ.

AN ADVERTISEMENT.

The Tale which these disjointed fragments present, is founded upon circumstances now less common in the East than formerly; either because the ladies are more circumspect than in the "olden time," or because the Christians have better fortune, or less enterprise. The story, when entire, contained the adventures of a female slave, who was thrown, in the Mussulman manner, into the sea for infidelity, and avenged by a young Venetian, her lover, at the time the Seven Islands were possessed by the Republic of Venice, and soon after the Aragouts were beaten back from the Morea, which they had ravaged for some time subsequent to the Russian invasion. The desertion of the Mainotes, on being refused the plunder of Misitra, led to the abandonment of that enterprise, and to the desolation of the Morea, during which the cruelty exercised on all sides was unparalleled even in the annals of the faithful.

THE GIAOUR.

No breath of air to break the wave
That rolls below the Athenian's grave,
That tomb which, gleaming o'er the cliff,
First greets the homeward-veering skiff,
High o'er the land he saved in vain:
When shall such hero live again?

Fair clime! where every season smiles
Benignant o'er those blessed isles,
Which, seen from far Colonna's height,
Make glad the heart that hails the sight,
And lend to loneliness delight.
There, mildly dimpling, Ocean's cheek
Reflects the tints of many a peak
Caught by the laughing tides that love
These Edens of the Eastern wave;
And if, at times, a transient breeze
Break the blue crystal of the seas,
Or sweep one blossom from the trees,
How welcome is each gentle air
That wakes and wafts the odors there,
For there—the rose o'er crag or vale,
Sultana of the nightingales,

The maid for whom his melody,
His thousand songs are heard on high,
Blooms blushing to her lover's tale:
His queen, the garden queen, his rose,
Unbent by winds, unchilled by snows,
Far from the winters of the west,
By every breeze and season blest,
Returns the sweets by Nature given,
In softest incense back to heaven;
And grateful yields that smiling sky
Her fairest hue and fragrant sigh.
And many a summer flower is there,
And many a shade that love might share,
And many a grotto, meant for rest,
That holds the pirate for a guest;
Whose bark in sheltering cove below
Larks for the passing peaceful prow
Till the gay mariner's guitar
Is heard, and seen the evening star
Then stealing with the evening's roar,
Far shaded by the rocky shore,
Rush the night-provlers on the prey,
And turn to groans his roundelay.
Strange—that where Nature lov'd to trace
As if for gods, a dwelling place,
And every charm and grace hath mix'd,
Within the paradise she fix'd,
There man, enamor'd of distress,
Should mar it into wilderness,
And trample, brute-like, o'er each flower
That tasks not one laborious hour;
Nor claims the culture of his hand
To bloom along the fairy land,
But springs as to prelude his care,
And sweetly woo's him—but to spare!
Strange—that where all is peace beside
There passion riots in her pride,
And lust and rapine wildly reign
To darken o'er the fair domain.
It is as though the fiends prevail'd
Against the seraphs they assail'd,
And, fixed on heavenly thrones, should dwell,
The freed inheritors of hell;
So soft the scene, so form'd for joy,
So curst the tyrants that destroy!

He who hath bent him o'er the dead,
Ere the first day of death is fied,
The first dark day of nothingness,
The last of danger and distress,
(Before decay's effacing fingers
Have swept the lines where beauty lingers,)
And mark'd the mild angelic air,
The rapture of repose that's there,
The fix'd, yet tender traits that streak
The languor of the placid cheek,
And—but for that shrouded eye
That fires not, vixn not, weeps not, now,
And for that chill, changeless brow,
Where cold obstruction's apathy
Appals the gazing mourner's heart,
As if to him it could impart
The dooms that dread, yet dwells upon;
Yes, but for these, and these alone,
Some, moments, ay, one treacherous hour
He still might doubt the tyrant's power;
So fair, so calm, so softly seal'd,
The first, last look by death reveal'd!
Such is the aspect of this shore;
'Tis Greece, but living Greece no more!
No coldy sweet, so deadly fair,
We start, for soul is wanting there.
Hers is the loveliness in death,
That parts not quite with parting breath;
But beauty with that fearful bloom,
That hue which haunts it to the tomb,
Expression's last receding ray,
A gilded halo hovering round decay,
The farewell beam of feeling past away!

Cline of the unforgotten brave!
Whose land from plain to mountain-cave
Was freedom's home or glory's grave!
Shrine of the mighty! can it be,
That this is all remains of thee?
Approach, thou craven crouching slave:
Say, is not this Thermopylas?
These waters blue that round you lave,
Oh servile offspring of the free—
Pronounce what sea, what shore is this?
The gulf, the rock of Salamis!
These scenes, their story not unknown
Arise, and make again your own;
Snatch from the ashes of your sires
The ember of their former fires;
And he who in the strife expires
Will add to theirs a name of fear
That tyranny shall quake to hear,
And leave his sons a hope, a fame
They too will rather die than shame.
For freedom's battle once begun,
Bequeath'd by bleeding sire to son,
Though baffled oft, is ever won.
Bear witness, Greece, thy living page,
Attest it many a deathless age!
While kings, in dusty darkness hid,
Have left a nameless pyramid,
Thy heroes, though the general doom
Hath swept the column from their tomb
A mightier monument command,
The mountains of their native land!
There points thy muse to stranger's eye
The graves of those that cannot die!
'Twere long to tell, and sad to trace,
Each step from splendor to disgrace;
Enough—no foreign foe could quell
Thy soul, till from itself it fell;
Yes! self-abasement paved the way
To villain-bonds and despot sway.

What can he tell who treads thy shore?
No legend of thine olden time,
No theme on which the muse might soar
High, as that ever in days of ore,
When man was worthy of thy clime;
The hearts within thy valleys bred,
The fiery souls that might have led
Thy sons to deeds sublime,
Now crawl from cradle to the grave,
Slaves—nay, the bondsmen of a slave
And callous, save to crime;
Stain'd with each evil that pollutes
Mankind, where least above the brutes;
Without even savage virtue blest,
Without one free or valiant breast,
Still to the neighboring ports they waft
Proverbial wiles, and ancient craft;
In this the subtle Greek is found,
For this, and this alone, renown'd.
In vain might liberty invoke
The spirit to its bondage broke,
Or raise the neck that courts the yoke.
No more her sires a newan,
Yet this will be a mournful tale,
And they who listen may believe,
Who heard it first had cause to grieve
• • • • • •
On her fair cheek's unkind ing hue
The young pomegranate's blossoms grew.
Their bloom in blushes ever new;
Her hair in hyacinthine flow,
When left to roll its folds below,
As 'midst her handmaids in the hall
She stood superior to them all,
Bath swept the marble where her feet
Gleam'd whiter than the mountain sleet,
Ere from the cloud that gave it birth
It fell and caught one stain of earth.
The cygnet nobly walks the water;
So moved on earth Circe's daughter,
The loveliest bird of Franguestan!
As rears her crest the ruffled swan,
And spurs the wave with wings of pride
When pass the steps of stronger man
Along the banks that bound her tide.
Thus rose fair Leila's whiter neck;
Thus armed with beauty would she check
Intrusion's glance, till folly's gaze
Shrank from the charms it meant to praise.
Thus high and graceful was her gait;
Her heart as tender to her mate:
Her mate—stern Hassan, who was he?
Alas! that name was not for thee.

Stern Hassan hath a journey ta'en
With twenty vassals in his train,
Each arm'd, as best becomes a man,
With arquebuss and ataghan;
The chief before as deck'd for war,
Bears in his belt the scimitar
Stained with the best of Arnaut blood
When in the pass the rebels stood,
And few return'd to tell the tale
Of what befell in Parne's vale.
The pistols which his girdle bore
Were those that once a pasha wore,
Which still, though gemm'd and boss'd with gold,
Even robbers tremble to behold.
'Tis said he goes to woo a bride
More true than her who left his side;
The faithless slave that broke her bow'rs,
And worse than faithless, for a Giaour!
Beneath, a river's wintry stream
Has shrunk before the summer beam,
And left a channel bleak and bare,
Save shrubs that spring to perish there:
Each side the midway path there lay
Small broken crags of granite gray,
By time, or mountain lightning riven
From summits clad in mists of heaven;
For where is he that hath beheld
The peak of Lakura unvail'd?

They reach the grove of pine at last:
"Bismullah!" now the peril's past;
For yonder view the opening plain,
And there we'll prick our steeds amain.""The Chausa spake, and as he said,
A bullet whistled o'er his head;
The foremost Tartar bites the ground!
Scarse had they time to check the rein,
Swift from their steeds the riders bound;
But three shall never mount again;
Unseen the foes that gave the wound,
The dying ask revenge in vain.

With steel unsheathed, and carbine bent,
Some o'er their courser's harness leant,
Half shelter'd by the steed;
Some fly behind the nearest rock,
And there await the coming shock,
Nor tamely stand to bleed
Beneath the shaft of foes unseen,
Who dare not quit their craggy screen.
Stern Hassan only from his horse
Disdains to light, and keeps his course.
Till fiery dashes in the van
Proclaim too sure the robber- clan
Have well secured the only way
Could now avail the promised prey;
Then curl'd his very beard with ire,
And glared his eye with fiercer fire:
"Though far and near the bullets hiss,
I've scaped a bloodier hour than this."
And now the foe their covert quit,
And call his vassals to submit;
But Hassan's frown and furious word
Are dreaded more than hostile sword,
Nor of his little band a man
Resign'd carbine or staghain,
Nor raised the craven cry, Amaun! in fullest sight, more near and near,
The lately ambush'd foes appear,
And, issuing from the grove, advance
Some who on battle-charger prance.
Who leads them on with foreign brand,
Far flashing in his red right hand?
"'Tis he! 'tis he! I know him now;
I know him by his pallid brow;
I know him by the evil eye
That aids his envious treachery;
I know him by his jet-black barb:
Though now array'd in Arnaut garb,
Adorn't from his own vile faith,
It shall not save him from the death:
'Tis he! well met, in any hour!
Lost Leila's love, accursed Giaour!"

As rolls the river into the ocean,
In sable torrent wildly streaming;
As the sea-tide's opposing motion,
In azure column proudly gleaming,

Beats back the current many a rood,
In curling foam and mingling flood,
While eddying whirl, and breaking wave
Roused by the blast of winter, rave;
Through sparkling spray, in thundering clash
The lightnings of the waters flash
In awful whiteness o'er the shore,
That shines and shakes beneath the roar;
Thus—as the stream and ocean greet,
With waves thatadden as they meet—
Thus join the bands, whom mutual wrong
And fate, and fury, drive along.
The bickering sabres' shivering jar;
And pealing wide or ringing near
Its echoes on the throbbing ear,
The death-shot hissing from afar;
The shock, the shout, the groan of war,
Reverberate along that vale,
More suited to the shepherd's tale:
Though few the numbers—thiers the strife,
That neither spares nor speaks for life!
Ah! fondly youthful hearts can press,
To seize and share the dear caress;
But love itself could never pant
For all that beauty sighs to grant
With half the fervor hate bestows
Upon the last embrace of foes,
When grappling in the fight they fold
Those arms that ne'er shall lose their hold
Friends meet to part; love laughs at fate!
True foes, once met, are join'd to till death!

With sabre shiver'd to the hilt,
Yet dripping with the blood he spilt:
Yet strain'd within the sever'd hand
Which quivers round that faithless brand;
His turban far behind him roll'd,
And clcft in twain its firmest fold;
His flowing robe by fialchion torn,
And crimson as those clouds of morn
That, streak'd with dusky red, portend
The day shall have a stormy end;
A stain on every bush that bore
A fragment of his palamore, in full sight, more near and near,
The lately ambush'd foes appear,
And, issuing from the grove, advance
Some who on battle-charger prance.
Who leads them on with foreign brand,
Far flashing in his red right hand?
"'Tis he! 'tis he! I know him now;
I know him by his pallid brow;
I know him by the evil eye
That aids his envious treachery;
I know him by his jet-black barb:
Though now array'd in Arnaut garb,
Adorn't from his own vile faith,
It shall not save him from the death:
'Tis he! well met, in any hour!
Lost Leila's love, accursed Giaour!"

"Yes, Leila sleeps beneath the wave,
But his shall be a redder grave;
Her spirit pointed well the steel
Which taught that felon heart to feel.
He call'd the Prophet, but his power
Was vain against thevengeful Giaour.
He call'd on Allah—but the word
Arose unheeded or unheard.
Thou Paynum fool! could Leila's prayer
Be pass'd, and thine accorded there?
I watched my time, I leagued with these,
The traitor in his turn to seize;
My wrath is wrack'd, the deed is done,
And now I go—but go alone."
One sad and sole relief she knows,
The sting she nourish’d for her foes,
Whose venom never yet was vain,
Gives but one pang, and cures all pain,
And darts into her desperate brain:
So do the dark in soul expire,
Or live like scorpion girl by fire;
So writhes the mind remorse hath riven,
Unit for earth, undoom’d for heaven,
Darkness above, despair beneath,
Around it flame, within it death!

Black Hassan from the haram flies,
Nor bends on woman’s form his eye;
The unvonted chase each hour employs,
Yet shares he not the hunter’s joys.
Not thus was Hassan wont to fly
When Leila dwelt in her Serai.
Doth Leila where no longer dwell?
That tale can only Hassan tell:
Strange rumors in our city say
Upon that eve she fled away,
When Hassan’s last sun was set,
And dashed from each minaret,
Millions of lamps proclaim’d the feast
Of Bairam through the boundless east.
‘Twas then she went as to the bath,
Which Hassan vainly search’d in wrath;
For she was flown her master’s rage,
In likeness of a Georgian page,
And far beyond the Moslem’s power
Had wrong’d him with the faithless Giaour.
Somewhat of this had Hassan deem’d;
But still so fond, so fair she seem’d,
Too well he trusted to the slave
Whose treachery deserv’d a grave;
And on that eve he gone to mosque,
And thence to feast in his kiosk.
Such is the tales his Nubians tell,
Who did not watch their charge too well;
And others say that on that night,
By pale Phingari’s trembling light
The Giaour upon his jet-black steed
Was seen, but seen alone to speed
With bloody spur along the shore,
Nor maid nor page behind him bore.

Her eye’s dark charm ’twere vain to tell,
But gaze on that of the gazelle,
It will assist thy fancy well;
As large, as languishingly dark,
But soul beam’d forth in every spark
That darted from beneath the lid,
Bright as the jewel of Gianschid,
Yea, and, and, and should our prophet say
That form was nought but breathing clay,
By Alla! I would answer nay;
Though on Al-Sira’s arch I stood
Which totters o’er the fiery flood,
With paradise within my view,
And all his hours becomeng through.
Oh! who young Leila’s glance could read
And keep that portion of his creed
Which saith that woman is but dust,
A soulless toy for tyrant’s lust?
On her might Muftis gaze, and own
That through her eye the Immortal shone;

On her fair cheek’s unit’d hue
The young pomegranate’s blossoms shrew
Their bloom in blushes ever new;
Her hair in hyacinthine flow,
When left to roll its folds below,
As ’midst her handmaids in the hall
She stood superior to them all,
Hath swept the marble where her feet
Gleam’d whiter than the mountain sleet,
Ere from the cloud that gave it birth
It fed and caught one stain of earth.
The eygael nobly walks the water;
So moved on earth Circassia’s daughter,
The loveliest bird of Franguestan!
As rears her crest the ruffled swan,
And spurns the wave with wings of pride
When pass the steps of stranger man
Along the banks that bound her tide.

The sun’s last rays are on the hill,
And sparkle in the fountain rill,
Whose welcome waters, cool and clear,
Draw blessings from the mountaineer;
Here may the loitering merchant Greek
Find that repose ’twere vain to seek
In cities lodged too near his lord,
And trembling for his secret hoard—
Here may he rest where none can see,
In crowds a slave, in deserts free;
And with forbidden wine may stain
The bowl a Moslem must not drain.

The foremost Tartar’s in the gap,
Conspicuous by his yellow cap;
The rest in lengthening line the while
Wind slowly through the long sile;
Above the mountain rears a peak,
Where vultures whet the thirsty beak,
And theirs may be a feast to-night.
Shall tempt them down ere morrow’s light.

As if the hour when seal'd his fate
Surviving left his quenchless hate;
And o'er him bends that foe with brow
As dark as his that bled below.

"Yes, Leila sleeps beneath the wave,

...
The browsing 'Camels' bells are tinkling:
His mother lo. k from her lattice high,
She saw the dews of eve besprinkling
The pasture green beneath her eye,
She saw the planets faintly twinkling:
"'Tis twilight—sure his train is nigh."
She could not rest in the garden bower,
But gazèd through the grate of his steapest tower:
"Why comes he not? his steeds are fleet,
Nor shrank they from the summer heat;
Why sends not the bridgroom his promised gift?
Is his heart more cold, or his barb less swift?
Oh, false reproach! yon Tartar now
Has gain'd our nearest mountain's brow,
And warily the steep descends,
And now within the valley bends;
And he bears the gift at his saddle-bow—
How could I deem his courser slow?
Right well my largess shall repay
His welcome speed, and weary way."

The Tartar lighted at the gate,
But scarce uphold his fainting weight;
His swarthy visage spake distress,
But this might be from weariness;
His garb with sanguine spots was dyed,
But these might be from his courser's side;
He drew the token, from his vest—
Angel of Death! 'tis Hassan's cloven crest—
His calpach rent—his caftan red—
"Lady, a fearful bride thy son hath wed;
Me, not for nectar, did they spare,
But this empurpled pledge to bear.
Peace to the Brave! whose blood is spilt;
We to the Giaour! for his the guilt."

A turban 33 carved in coarsest stone,
A pillar with rank weeds o'ergrown,
Whereon can now be scarcely read
The Koran verse that mourns the dead,
Point out the spot where Hassan fell
A victim in that lonely dell.
There sleeps as true an Osmanlie
As e'er at Mecca bent the knee;
As ever scorn'd forbidden wine,
Or prayed with face towards the shrine,
In orisons resumed anew
At solemn sound of "Alla Hu!" 33
Yet died he by a stranger's hand,
And stranger in his native land;
Yet died he as in arms he stood,
And unavenged, at least in blood.
But him the maids of paradise
Impatient to their halls invite,
And the dark heaven of Houri's eyes
On him shall glance for ever bright,
They come—their kerchiefs green they wave, 34
And welcome with a kiss the brave!
Who falls in battle 'gainst a Giaour
Is worthiest an immortal bower.

But thou, false infidel! shalt write
Beneath avenging Monkr's 35 scythe;
And from its torment 'scape alone
To wander round lost Eblis' 36 throne;
A fire unquench'd, unquenchable,
Around, within, thy heart shall dwell;
Nor ear can hear nor tongue can toll
The tortures of that inward hell!
But first, on earth as vampire 37 sent,
Thy corse shall from its tomb be rent.
Then ghastly haunt thy native place,
And suck the blood of all thy race;
There from thy daughter, sister, wife,
At midnight drain the stream of life;
Yet loathe the banquet which perfors
Must feed thy livid living corse:
Thy victims ere they yet expire
Shall know the demon for their sire,
As cursing then, then cursing them,
Thy bowels are wither'd on the stem.
But one that for thy crime must fall,
The youngest, most beloved of all,
Shall bless thee with a father's name—
That word shall wrap thy heart in flame
Yet must thou end thy task, and mark
Her cheek's last tinge, her eye's last spark.
And the last glassy glance must view
Which freezes o'er its lifeless blue:
Then with unhallow'd hand shalt tear
The tresses of her yellow hair,
Of which in life a lock when shorn
Affection's fondest pledge was worn;
But now is borne away by thee,
Memorial of thine agony!
Wet with thine own last blood shall drip
Thy gnashing tooth and haggard lip;
Then stalking to thy sullen grave,
Go—and with Gouls and Afrits rave;
Till these in horror shrink away
From spectre more accursed than they!

"How name ye won lone Caloyer!
His features I have scan'd before
In mine own land: 'tis many a year,
Since, dashing by the lonely shore,
I saw him urge as fleet a steed
As ever served a horseman's need.
But once I saw that face, yet then
It was so mark'd with inward pain,
I could not pass it by again;
It breathes the same dark spirit now,
As death was stamp'd upon his brow."

"'Tis twice three years at summer-tide
Since first among our freres he came;
And here it soothes him to abide
For some dark deed he will not name,
But never at our vesper prayer,
Nor e'er before confession chair
Kneels he, nor recoys he when arise
Incense or anthem to the skies,
But broods within his cell alone,
His faith and race alike unknown.
The sea from Paynim land he crost,
And here ascended from the coast;
Yet seems he not of Othman race,
But only Christian in his face:
I'd judge him some stray renegade,
Repetant of the change he made,
Save that he shuns our holy shrine,
Nor tastes the sacred bread and wine.
Great largesses to these walls he brought,
And thus our abbot's favor bought;
But were I prior, not a day
Should brook such stranger's further stay.
With dread beheld, with gloom beholding
The rights that sanctify the pile.
But when the anthem shakes the choir
And kneel the monks, his steps retire;
By yonder lone and wavering torch
His aspect glares within the porch;
There will he pause till all is done—
And hear the prayer, but utter none.
See—by the half-illumined wall
His head fly back, his dark hair fall,
That pale brow widely wreathing round,
As if the Gorgon there had bound
The sablest of the serpent-braid
That o'er her fearful forehead stray'd:
For he declines the convent oath,
And leaves those locks unhallow'd growth,
But wears our garb in all beside:
And, not from piety but pride,
Gives wealth to walls that never heard
Of his one holy vow nor word.
Lo!—mark ye, as the harmony
Peals louder praises to the sky,
That livid cheek, that stony air
Of mix'd defiance and despair!
Saint Francis, keep him from the shrine
Else may we dread the wrath divine
Made manifest by awful sign.
If ever evil angel bore
The form of mortal, such he wore:
By all my hope of sins forgiven,
Such looks are not of earth nor heaven!

To love the softest hearts are prone,
But such can ne'er be all his own;
Too timid in his woes to share,
Too meek to meet, or brave despair;
And sterner hearts alone may feel
The wound that time can never heal
The rugged metal of the mine
Must burn before its surface shine,
But plunged within the furnace-flame,
It bends and melts—though still the same;
Then temper'd to thy want, or will,
'Twill serve thee to defend or kill;
A breastplate for thine hour of need,
Or blade to bid thy foemen bleed;
But if a dagger's form it bear,
Let those who shape its edge beware!
Thus passion's fire, and woman's art,
Can turn and tame the sterner heart;
From those its form and tone are taken,
And what they make it, must remain,
But break—before it bend again.

If solitude succeed to grief,
Release from pain is slight relief;
The vacant bosom's wilderness
Might thank the pang that made it less.
We loathe what none are left to share;
Even bliss—'twere wo alone to bear;
The heart once left thus desolate
Must fly at last for ease—to hate
It is as if the dead could feel
The icy worm around them steel,
And shudder, as the reptiles creep
To revel o'er their rotting sleep,
Without the power to scare away
The cold consumers of their clay
It is as if the desert-bird, 30
Whose beak unlocks her bosom's stream
To still her famish'd nestlings' scream,
Nor mourns a life to them transferr'd,
Should rend her rash devoted breast,
And find them down her empty nest.
The keenest pangs the wretched find
Are rapture to the dreary void,
The leafless desert of the mind,
The waste of feelings unemploy'd.
Who would be doom'd to gaze upon
A sky without a cloud or sun?
Loss hideous far the tempest's roar
Than ne'er to brave the billows more—
Thrown, when the war of winds is o'er,
A lonely wreck on fortune's shore,
'Mid sullen calm, and silent bay,
Unseen to drop by dull decay;
Better to sink beneath the shock
Than moulder piecemeal on the rock!

"Father! thy days have pass'd in peace,
'Mid counted beads, and countless prayer;
To bid the sins of others cease,
Thyself without a crime or care,
Save transient ills that all must bear,
Has been thy lot from youth to age;
And thou wilt bless thee from the rage
Of passions fierce and uncontroll'd,
Such as thy penitents unfold,
Whose secret sins and sorrows rest
Within thy pure and pitying breast.
My days, though few, have pass'd below
In much of joy, but more of wo;
Yet still in hours of love or strife,
I've 'scaped the weariness of life;
Now leagued with friends, now girt by foes,
I loathed the languor of repose.
Now nothing left to love or hate,
Now more with hope or pride elate,
I'd rather be the thing that crawls
Most noxious o'er a dungeon's walls,
Than pass my dull, unvarying days,
Condemn'd to meditate and gaze.
Yet, lurks a wish within my breast
For rest—but not to feel 'tis rest.
Soon shall my fate that wish fulfil;
And I shall sleep without the dream
Of what I was, and would be still,
Dark as to thee my deeds may seem;
My memory now is but the tomb
Of joys long dead; my hope, their doom:
Though better to have died with those
Than bear a life of lingering woes.
My spirits shrunk not to sustain
The searching throes of ceaseless pain
Nor sought the self-acquitt'd grave
Of ancient fool and modern knave:
Yet death I have not fear'd to meet;
And in the field it had been sweet,
Had danger wou'd me on to move
The slave of glory, not of love,
I've braved it—not for honor's boast;
I smile at laurels won or lost;
To such let others carve their way,
For high renown, or hireling pay:
But place again before my eyes
Aught that I deem a worthy prize,

The maid I love, the man I hate;
And I will hunt the steps of fate,
To save or slay, as these require,
Through rending steel, and rolling fire;
Nor need'st thou doubt this speech from me
Who would but do—what he hath done.
Death is but what the haughty brave,
The weak must bear, the wretch must crave;
Then let life go to him who gave;
I have not quail'd to danger's brow
When high and happy—need I now?

"I loved her, friar! nay adored—
But these are words that all can use—
I proved it more in deed than word:
There's blood upon that dinted sword,
A stain its steel can never lose;
'Twas shed for her, who died for me,
It warm'd the heart of one abhor'd:
Nay, start not—nor bend thy knee,
Nor midst my sins such act record;
Thou wilt absolve me from the deed,
For he was hostile to thy creed!
The very name of Nazarene
Was wormwood to his Paynim spleen.
Ungrateful fool! since but for brands
Well welded in some hardy hands,
And wounds by Gailleans given,
The surest pass to Turkish heaven,
For him his Houris still might wait
Impatient at the prophet's gate:
I loved her—love will find its way
Through paths where wolves would fear to prey
And if it dares enough, 'twere hard
If passion met not some reward—
No matter how, or where, or why
I did not vainly seek, nor sigh;
Yet sometimes, with remorse, in vain
I wish she had not loved again.
She died—I dare not tell thee how;
But look—'tis written on my brow;
There read of Cain the curse and crime,
In characters unworn by time:
Still, ere thou dost condemn me, pause;
Not mine the act, though I the cause
Yet did he but what I had done
Had she been false to more than one.
Faithless to him, he gave the blow;
But true to me, I laid him low:
How'er deserved her doom might be,
Her treachery was truth to me;
To me she gave her heart, that all
Which tyrannv can ne'er enthrall;
And I, alas! too late to save!
Yet all I then could give, I gave,
'Twas some relief, our foes a grave.
His death sits lightly; but her fate
Has made me—what thou well may'st do.
His doom was seal'd—he knew it well,
Wear'd by the voice of stern Taheer,
Deep in whose darkly boding ear
The death-shot seal'd of murder near,
As filed the troop to where they fell
He died too in the battle broil,
A time that heeds nor pain nor toil;
One cry to Mahomet for aid,
One prayer to Alla al' he made
THE GIAOUR.

He knew and cross'd me in the fray—
I gazed upon him where he lay.
And watch'd his spirit ebb away;
Though pierc'd like pardy by hunters' steel,
He felt not half that now I feel.
I search'd, but vainly search'd, to find
The workings of a wounded mind;
Each feature of that sullen corse
Betray'd his rage, but no remorse.
Oh, what had vengeance given to trace
Despair upon his dying face?
The late repentance of that hour,
With a penitence he lost her power
To tear one terror from the grave,
And will not soothe, and cannot save.

"The cold in clime are cold in blood,
Their love can scarce deserve the name;
But mine was like the lava flood.
That boils in Ætna's breast of flame.
I cannot prate in puling strain
Of ladye-love, and beauty's chain;
If changing cheek, and scorching vein,
Lips taught to writhe, but not complain,
If bursting heart, and madd'nig brain,
And daring deed, and vengeful steel,
And all that I have felt, and feel,
Detoken love—that love was mine,
And shown by many a bitter sign.
'Tis true, I could not whine nor sigh,
I knew but to obtain or die.
I die—but first I have possess'd,
And, come what may, I have been blest.
Shall I the doom I sought upbraid?
No—reft of all, yet undismay'd
But for the thought of Leila slain,
Give me the pleasure with the pain,
So would I live and love again.
I grieve, but not, my holy guide!
For him who dies, but her who died:
She sleeps beneath the wandering wave—
Ah! had she but an earthly grave,
This breaking heart and throbbing head
Should seek and share her narrow bed.
She was a form of life and light,
That seen, became a part of sight;
And rose, where'er I turned mine eye,
The morning-star of memory!

"Yes, love indeed is light from heaven;
A spark of that immortal fire
With angels shared, by Alia given,
To lift from earth her low desire.
Devotion wafts the mind above,
But heaven itself descends in love;
A feeling from the Godhead caught,
To wean from self each sordid thought;
A ray of him who form'd the whole;
A glory circling round the soul!
I grant my love imperfect, all
That mortals by the name miscall;
Then deem it evil, what thou wilt;
But say, oh say, hers was not guilt!
She was my life's unerring light:
That quench'd, what beam shall break my night?
Oh! would it shine to lead me still,
Although to death! or dead!—no ill!

Why marvel ye, if they who lose
This present joy, this future hope,
No more with sorrow meekly cope;
In frenzy then their fate accuse:
In madness do those fearful deeds
That seem to add but guilt to wo?
Alas! the breast that inly bleeds
Hath nought to dread from outward blow
Who falls from all he knows of bliss,
Cares little into what abyss.
Fierce as the gloomy vulture's now
To thee, old man, my deeds appear:
I read abhorrence on thy brow,
And this too was I born to bear!
'Tis true that, like that bird of prey,
With havoc have I mark'd the way:
But this was taught me by the dove,
To die—and know no second love.
This lesson yet hath man to learn,
Taught by the thing he dares to spurn:
The bird that sings within the brake,
The swan that swims upon the lake
One mate, and one alone, will take.
And let the fool still prone to range,
And sneer on all who cannot change.
Partake his jest with boasting boys.
I envy not his varied joys,
But deem such feeble, heartless man,
Less than yon solitary swan;
Far, far beneath the shallow maid
He left believing and betray'd:
Such shame at least was never mine—
Leila! each thought was only thine!
My good, my guilt, my weal, my wo,
My hope on high—my all below.
Earth holds no other like to thee,
Or, if it doth, in vain for me:
For worlds I dare not view the dame
Resembling thee, yet not the same.
The very crimes that mar my youth,
This bed of death—attest my truth!
'Tis all too late—thou wert, thou art
The cherish'd madness of my heart!

"And she was lost—and yet I breathed
But not the breath of human life;
A serpent round my heart was wreathed,
And stung my every thought to strife.
Alas all time, abhor'd all place,
Shuddering I shrunk from nature's face,
Where every hue that charm'd before
The blackness of my bosom wore.
The rest thou dost already know,
And all my sins, and half my wo,
But talk no more of penitence;
Thou see'st I soon shall part from hence,
And if thy holy tale were true,
The deed that's done can't thou undo?
Think me not thankless—but this grief
Looks not to priesthood for relief. 41
My soul's estate in secret guess:
But wouldst thou pity more, say less,
When thou canst bid my Leila live,
Then will I sue thee to forgive:
Then plead my cause in that high place
Where purchased masses proffer grace.
Go, when the hunter's hand hath wrung
From forest-cave her shrieking young,
And calm the lonely lioness:
But sooth not—mock not my distress.

"In earlier days, and calmer hours,
When heart with heart delights to blend,
Where bloom my native valley's bowers,
I had—ah! have I now—a friend?
To him this pledge I charge thee send,
Memorial of a youthful vow;
I would remind him of my end:
Though souls absorbed like mine allow Brief thought to distant friendship's claim,
Yet dear to him my blighted name.
'Tis strange—he prophesied my doom,
And I have smiled—I then could smile—
When prudence would his voice assume,
And warn—I reck'd not what—the while:
But now remembrance whispers o'er
Those accents scarcely mark'd before.
Say—that his bodings came to pass,
And he will start to hear their truth,
And wish his words had not been sooth:
Tell him, unchecked as I was,
Through many a busy bitter scene
Of all our golden youth had been,
In vain, my faltering tongue had tried
To bless his memory ere I died;
But Heaven in wrath would turn away,
If guilt should for the guiltless pray.
I do not ask him not to blame,
Too gentle he to wound my name;
And what have I to do with fame?
I do not ask him not to mourn,
Such cold request might sound like scorn;
And what than friendship's manly tear
May better grace a brother's bier?
But bear this ring, his own of old,
And tell him—what thou dost behold:
The wither'd frame, the ruin'd mind,
The wreck by passion left behind,
A shrivell'd scorl, a scatter'd leaf,
Sear'd by the autumn blast of grief!

"Tell me no more of fancy's gleam,
No, father, no, 'twas not a dream;
Alas! the dreamer first must sleep,
I only watch'd, and wish'd I weep;
But could not, for my burning brow
Throbb'd to the very brain as now:
I wish'd but for a single tear,
As something welcome, now, and dear
I wish'd it then, I wish'd it still;
Despair is stronger than my will,
Waste not thine orison, despair
Is mightier than thy pious prayer
I would not, if I might, be blest;
I want no paradise, but rest.
'Twas then, I tell thee, father! then
I saw her; yes, she lived again;
And shining in her white symar,
As through you pale gray cloud the star

Which now I gaze on, as on her,
Who look'd and looks far lovelier;
Dimly I view its trembling spark,
To-morrow's night shall be more dark
And I, before its rays appear,
That lifeless thing the living fear.
I wander, father! for my soul
Is fleeting towards the final goal.
I saw her, friar! and I rose
Forgetful of our former woes;
And rushing from my couch, I dart,
And clasp her to my desperate heart;
I clasp—what is it that I clasp?
No breathing form within my grasp,
No heart that beats reply to mine,
Yet, Leila! yet the form is thine!
And art thou, dearest, changed so much,
As meet my eye, yet mock my touch?
Ah! were thy beauties o'er so cold,
I care not; so my arms enfold
The all they ever wish to hold.
Alas! around a shadow prest,
They shrink upon my lonely breast;
Yet still 'tis there! in silence stands,
And beckons with beseeching hands!
With braided hair, and bright-black eye—
I knew 'twas false—she could not die!
But he is dead! within the dell
I saw him buried where he fell;
He comes not, for he cannot break
From earth; why then art thou awake?
They told me wild waves roll'd above
The face I view, the form I love;
They told me—'twas a hideous tale!
I'd tell it, but my tongue would fail:
If true, and from thine ocean-cave
Thou com'st to claim a calmer grave,
Oh! pass thy dewy fingers o'er
This brow that then will burn no more;
Or place them on my hopeless heart:
But, shape or shade! whate'er thou art,
In mercy, o'er again depart!
Or farther with thee bear my soul,
Than winds can waft or waters roll!

"Such is my name, and such my tale.
Confessor! to thy secret ear
I breathe the sorrows I bewail,
And thank thee for the generous tear
This glazing eye could never shed.
Then lay me with the humliest dead,
And, save the cross above my head,
Be neither name nor emblem spread,
By prying stranger to be read,
Or stay the passing pilgrim's tread.'

He pass'd—nor of his name and race
Hath left a token or a trace,
Save what the father must not say
Who shrivell him on his dying day.
This broken tale was all we knew
Of her he loved, or him he slew.
NOTES TO THE GLAOUR

1. That tomb, which, gleaming o'er the cliff.
   Page 108, line 3.
   A tomb above the rocks on the promontory, by some supposed the sepulchre of Themistocles.

2. Sultana of the nightingale.
   Page 108, line 16.
   The attachment of the nightingale to the rose is a well known Persian fable. If I mistake not, the 'Bulbul of a thousand tales' is one of his appeals.

3. Till the gay mariner's guitar.
   Page 109, line 3.
   The guitar is the constant amusement of the Greek sailor by night; with a steady fair wind, and during a calm, it is accompanied always by the voice, and often by dancing.

4. Where cold obstruction's apathy.
   Page 109, line 44.
   "Ay, but to die and go we know not where,
   To lie in cold obstruction." Measure for Measure, Act III. 130, Sc. 2.

5. The first, last look by death reveal'd.
   Page 109, line 52.
   I trust that few of my readers have ever had an opportunity of witnessing what is here attempted in description, but those who have, will probably retain a painful remembrance of that singular beauty which pervades, with few exceptions, the features of the dead, a few hours, and but for a few hours,
   "after the spirit is not there." It is to be remarked, in cases of violent death by gunshot wounds, the expression is always that of languor, whatever the natural energy of the sufferer's character:
   but in death from a stab, the countenance preserves its traits of feeling or ferocity, and the mind its bias to the last.

6. Slaves—nay, the bondmen of a slave.
   Page 109, line 114.
   Athens is the property of the Kislar Aga, (the slave of the seraglio and guardian of the women,) who appoints the Waywode. A pandar and eu-nuch—these are not polite, yet true appellations—
   now govern the governor of Athens!

7. 'Tis palmer than thy heart, young Glaour.
   Page 109, line 24.
   Infidel.

8. In echoes of the far tophaike.
   Page 110, line 59.
   "Tophaike," musket.—The Baimam is announced by the cannon at sunset; the illumination of the mosques, and the firing of all kinds of small arms, vaded with ball, proclaim it during the night.

9. Scraft as the hurt'd on high, jerrred.
   Page 110, line 82.
   Jerrred, or Djerrid, a blunted Turkish javelin, which is darted from horseback with great force and precision. It is a favorite exercise of the Mussulman; but I know not if it can be called a manly one, since the most expert in the art are the Black Eunuchs of Constantinople. I think, next to these, a Mamlouk at Smyrna was the most skilful that came within my observation.

10. He came, he went, like the sunroom.
    Page 110, line 116.
    The blast of the desert, fatal to everything living,
    and often alluded to in eastern poetry.

11. To bless the sacred "broad and salt."
    Page 111, line 143.
    To partake of food, to break bread and salt with your host, insures the safety of the guest; even though an enemy, his person from that moment is sacred.

12. Since his turban was clift by the infidel's sabre.
    Page 111, line 57.
    I need hardly observe, that Charity and Hositality are the first duties enjoined by Mahomet, and, to say truth, very generally practised by his disciples. The first praise that can be bestowed on a chief is a panegyric on his bounty; the next, on his valor.

13. And silver-sheathed ataghan.
    Page 111, line 56.
    The ataghan, a long dagger worn with pistols in the belt, in a metal scabbard, generally of silver;
    and, among the wealthier, gilt, or of gold.

14. An emir by his garb of green.
    Page 111, line 58.
    Green is the privileged color of the prophet's numerous pretended descendants; with them, as here, faith (the family inheritance) is supposed to supersede the necessity of good works: they are the worst of a very indifferent brood.

15. Ho! who art thou?—this low salam.
    Page 111, line 59.
    Salam aleikoun salam! peace be with you; be with you peace—the salutation reserved for the faithful:—to a Christian, 'Uurlara,' a good journey; or saba hiesam, saba serula; good morn, good even; and sometimes, 'may your end be happy!'
    are the usual salutes.

16. The insect-queen of eastern spring.
    Page 111 line 92.
    The blue-winged butterfly of Kashmir, the most rare and beautiful of the species.
17.

Or live like scorpiorn girl by fire.

Alluding to the dubious suicide of the scorpion, so placed for experiment by gentle philosophers. Some maintain that the position of the sting, when turned towards the head, is merely a convulsive movement; but others have actually brought in the verdict, "Felo do se." The scorpions are surely interested in a speedy decision of the question; as if once fairly established as insect Catos, they will probably be allowed to live as long as they think proper; without being martyred for the sake of an hypothesis.

20.

Bright as the jewel of Giamshid.

Page 112, line 54.

The celebrated fabulous ruby of Sultan Giamshid, the embellisher of Istakhar; from its splendor, named Schebgerag, "the torch of night;" also, "the cup of the sun," &c. — In the first edition, "Giamshid" was written as a word of three syllables, so D'Herbelot has it; but I am told Richardson reduces it to a dissyllable, and writes "Jamsish." I have left in the text the orthography of the one with the pronunciation of the other.

21.

Though on Al-Sirat's arch I stood.

Page 112, line 58.

Al-Sirat, the bridge of breadth less than the thread of a famished spider, over which the Mussulmans must slide into paradise, to which it is the only entrance; but this is not the worst, the river beneath being hell itself, into which, as may be expected, the unskilful and tender of foot contrive to tumble with a "facilis descensus Averni," not very pleasing in prospect to the next passengers. There is a shorter cut downwards for the Jews and Christians.

22.

And keep that portion of his crest.

Page 112, line 63.

A vulgar error: the Koran allots at least a third paradise to well-behaved women; but by far the greater number of Mussulmans interpret the text their own way, and exclude their moloties from heaven. Being enemies to Platonics, they cannot discern "any fitness of things" in the souls of the other sex, conceiving them to be superseded by the Houris.

23.

The young pomegranate's blossoms strewn.

Page 112, line 71.

Hyacinthine, in Arabie, "Sunbul;" as common a thought in the eastern poets, as it was among the Greeks.

Bismullah—"In the name of God;" the commencement of all the chapters of the Koran but one, and of prayer and thanksgiving.

27.

Then would his very heart with ire.

Page 113, line 37.

A phenomenon not uncommon with an angry Mussulman. In 1809, the Capitan Pacha's whiskers, at a diplomatic audience, were no less lively with indignation than a tiger cat's, to the horror of all the dragomans; the portentous mustachios twisted, they stood erect of their own accord, and were expected every moment to change their color, but at last condescended to subside, which, probably, saved more heads than they contained hairs.

28.

Nob raised the crane's cry, Amanu.

Page 113, line 47.

"Amanu," quarter, pardon.

29.

I know him by the evil eye.

Page 113, line 56.

The "evil eye," a common superstition in the Levant, and of which the imaginary effects are yet very singular, on those who conceive themselves affected.

30.

A fragment of his paipamore.

Page 113, line 111.

The flowered shawls, generally worn by persons of rank.

31.

His canpae rent—his eoffan red.

Page 114, line 29.

The "canpae" is the solid cap or centre part of the head-dress; the shawl is wound round it, and forms the turban.

32.

A turban carred in coarsest stone.

Page 114, line 36.

The turban, pillar, and inscriptive verse, decorate the tombs of the Osmanlies, whether in the cemetery or the wilderness. In the mountains you frequently pass similar mementos; and, on inquiry, you are informed, that they record some victim of rebellion, plunder, or revenge.

33.

Page 114, line 47.

"Alla Hu!" the concluding words of the Muezzin's call to prayer from the highest gallery on the exterior of the minaret. On a still evening, when the Muezzin has a fine voice, which is frequently the case, the effect is solemn and beautiful beyond all the bells in Christendom.

34.

They come—their kерchiens green they wave.

Page 114, line 56.

The following is part of a battle-song of the Turks:—"I see—I see a dark-eyed girl op paradise, and she waves a handkerchief, a kerchief of green; and cries aloud, Come, kiss me, 'or I love thee' etc.

35.

Beneath avenging Monkur's scythe.

Page 114, line 62.

Monik and Nekir are the inquisitors of the dead, before whom the corpse undergoes a slight novitiate and preparatory training for damnation. If the answers are none of the clearest, he is hauled up with a scythe and thumped down with a red-hot mace till properly seasoned, with a variety of subsidiary provations. The office of these angels is no sinecure; there are but two, and the number of orthodox deceased being in a small proportion to the remainder their hands are always full.
NOTES TO THE GIAOUR

121

33. To wander round lost Eblis' throne. Page 114, line 64. Eblis, the Oriental Prince of Darkness.

37. But first, on earth, as vampire sent. Page 114, line 69.

The Vampire superstition is still general in the Levant. Honest Tournefort tells a similar story, which Mr. Southey, in the notes on Thalaba, quotes, about these "Vroucolochas," as he calls them. The Romanic term is "Vardoufacha." I recollect a whole family being terrified by the scream of a child, which they imagined must proceed from such a visitation. The Greeks never mention the word without horror. I find that "Brucoholkas" is an old legitimate Hellenic appellation—at least so is applied to Arsenius, who, according to the Greeks, was after his own death possessed by the Devil. The moderns, however, use the word I mention.

38. Wet with thine own best blood shall drip. Page 114, line 95.

The freshness of the face, and the wetness of the up with blood, are the never-failing signs of a Vampire. The stories told in Hungary and Greece of these foul feeders are singular, and some of them most incredibly attested.

39. It is as if the desert-bird. Page 116, line 7.

The pelican is, I believe, the bird so libelled, by the impatience of feeding her chickens with her blood.

This superstition of a second-hearing (for I never met with downright second-sight in the east) once fell upon my own observation. On my third journey to Cape Colonna early in 1811, as we passed through the defile that leads from the hamlet of seen Keratlar and Colonna, I observed Dervish Tahiri riding rather out of the path, and leaning his head upon his hand, as if in pain. I rode up and inquired. "We are in peril," he answered. "What peril? we are not now in Albania, nor in the passes to Ephesus, Messalunghi, or Lepanto; there are plenty of us, well armed, and the Choriatists have not courage to be thieves."—"True, Affendi, but nevertheless the shot is ringing in my ears." "The shot! not a tolphuke has been fired this morning."—"I hear it notwithstanding,—Bomb—Bomb—as plainly as I hear your voice."—"Phew! "—"As you please, Affendi; if it is written, so will it be."—I left this quick-eared predestinarian, and rode up to Bussil, his Christian compatriot, whose ears, though not at all prophetic, by no means relished the intelligence. We all arrived at Colonna, remained some hours, and returned leisurely, saying a variety of brilliant things, in more languages than spoiled the building of Babel, upon the mistaken belief; Romanic, Armaout, Turkish, Italian, and English were all exercised, in various conceptions, upon the unfortunate Mussulman. While we were contemplating the beautiful prospect, Dervish was occupied about the columns. I thought he was descended into an antiquarian, and asked him if he had become a 'Pavonastro' man: "No," said he, "but these pillars will be useful in making a stand;" and added other remarks, which at least equivoed his own belief, of the future utility of the antiquities. On our return to Athens, we heard from Leone (a prisoner set ashore some days after) of the intended attack of the Mainnotes, mentioned, with the cause of its not taking place, in the notes to Childe Harold, Canto 2d. I was at some pains to question the man, and he described the dresses, arms, and marks of the horses of our party so accurately, that with other circumstances, we could not doubt of their having been in "villainous company," and ourselves in a hard-sight difficulty. In believing the soothsayer for life, and I dare say is bowing more musketry than ever will be fired, to the great refreshment of the Arnaouts of Berat, and his native mountains.—I shall mention one trait more of this singular race. In March, 1811, a remarkably stout and active Arnaout came (I believe the tenth on the same errand) to offer himself as an attendant, which was declined: "Well, Affendi," quoth he, "may you live!—you would have found me useful. I shall leave the town for the hills to-morrow, in the winter I return, perhaps you will then receive me."—Dervish, who was present, remarked, as a thing of course, and of no consequence, "In the mean time, I'll go to the Klephues (rocks,) which was true to the letter.—If not cut off, they come down in the winter, and pass it unmanned in some town, where they are often as well known as their exploits.

41. Looks not to priesthood for relief. Page 117, line 125.

The monk's sermon is omitted. It seems to have had so little effect upon the patient, that it could have no hopes from the reader. It may be sufficient to say, that it was of a customary length (as may be perceived) from the interruptions and unnessiness of the penitent,) and was delivered in the nasal tone of all orthodox preachers.

42. And shining in her white symar. Page 118, line 59

"Symar"—shroud.

43. Page 118, line 121.

The circumstance to which the above story relates was not very uncommon in Turkey. A few years ago the wife of Muehtar Pacha complained to his father of his son's supposed infidelity; he asked with whom, and she had the barbarity to give in a list of the twelve handsomest women in Yanya. They were seized, fastened up in sacks, and drown ed in the lake the same night! One of the guards who was present informed me, that not one of the victims uttered a cry, or showed a symptom of terror at so sudden a "wrench from all we know, from the date we love." The object of the sacrifice, is the subject of many a Romanic and Armaout ditty. The story in the text is one told of a young Venetian many years ago, and now nearly forgotten. I heard it by accident recited by one of the coffee-house-story-tellers who abode in the Levant, and sing or recite their narratives. The additions and interpolations by the translator will be easily distinguished from the rest by the want of Eastern imagery; and I regret that my memory has retained so few fragments of the original.

For the contents of some the notes I am indebted partly to D'Herbelot, and partly to that most eastern, and at once the most judicious, and "sublime, tale," the "Caliph Vathek." I do not know from what source the author of that singular volume may have drawn his materials; some of his incidents are to be found in the Bibliothèque Orien tale;" and fearlessness, and power of imagination, it far surpasses all European imitations; and bears such marks of originality, that those who have visited the East, will have some difficulty in believing it to be more than a translation. As an Eastern tale, even Rasselas must bow before it; his "Happy Valley" will not bear a comparison with the "Hall of Eblis."
THE BRIDE OF ABYDOS:
A TURKISH TALE.

Had we never loved so blindly,
Had we never loved so blindly,
Never met or never parted,
We had never been broken-hearted.

THE RIGHT HONORABLE LORD HOLLAND,
THIS TALE IS INSCRIBED,
WITH EVERY SENTIMENT OF REGARD AND RESPECT, BY HIS GRATITUDE OBLIGED AND SINCERE FRIEND, BYRON.

CANTO I.

I.
Know ye the land where the cypress and myrtle
Are emblems of deeds that are done in their clime,
Where the rage of the vulture, the love of the turtle,
Now melt into sorrow, now madden to crime?
Know ye the land of the cedar and vine,
Where the flowers ever blossom, the beams ever shine;
Where the light wings of Zephyr, oppress'd with perfume,
Wax faint o'er the gardens of Gül 1 in her bloom;
Where the citron and olive are fairest of fruit,
And the voice of the nightingale never is mute;
Where the tints of the earth, and the hues of the sky,
In color though varied, in beauty may vie,
And the purple of ocean is deepest in dye;
Where the virgins are soft as the roses they twine,
And all, save the spirit of man, is divine?
'Tis the clime of the East; 'tis the land of the sun—
Can he smile on such deeds as his children have done? 2
Ch ild as the accents of lovers' farewell
Are the hearts which they bear, and the tales which they tell.

II.
Begirt with many a gallant slave,
Apparel'd as becomes the brave,
Awaiting each his lord's behest
To guide his steps or guard his rest,

Old Giaffir sat in his Divan:
Deep thought was in his aged eye;
And though the face of Mussulman
Not oft betrays to standers by
The mind within, well skill'd to hide
All but unconquerable pride,
His pensive cheek and pondering brow
Did more than he was wont avow.

III.
"Let the chamber be clear'd."—The train dismissed—
"Now call me the chief of the Haram guard."
With Giaffir is none but his only son,
And the Nubian awaiting the sire's award.
"Haroun—when all the crowd that wait
Are pass'd beyond the outer gate,
(Who to the head whose eye beheld
My child Zuleika's face unveil'd!)
Hence, lead my daughter from her tower;
Her fate is fix'd this very h. ur:
Yet not to her repeat my thought;
By me alone be duty taught!"

"Pacha! to hear is to obey."
No more must slave to despot say—
Then to the tower had ta'en his way
But here young Selim silence brake,
First lowly rendering reverence meet
And downcast look’d and gently spake,
Still standing at the Pacha’s feet:
For son of Moslem must expire,
Ere dare to sit before his sire!

"Father! for fear that thou shouldst chide
My sister, or her sable guide,
Know—for the fault, if fault there be,
Was mine, then fall thy frowns on me—
So lovelly the morning shone,
That—let the old and weary sleep—I could not; and to view alone.

The fairest scenes of land and deep,
With none to listen and reply
To thoughts with which my heart beat high
Were irksome—for what’er my mood,
In sooth I love not solitude;

I on Zuleika’s slumber broke,
And, as thou knowest that for me
Soon turns the Haram’s grating key,
Before the guardian slaves awoke
We to the eypress groves had flown,
And made earth, main, and heaven our own.
There linger’d we, beguiled too long
With Mejnoun’s tale, or Sadi’s song; 3
Till I, who heard the deep tambour
Beat thy Divan’s approaching hour,
To thee, and to my duty true,
Warn’d by the sound, to greet thee flew:
But there Zuleika wanders yet—
Nay, father, rage not—nor forget
That none can pierce that secret bower
But those who watch the women’s tower."

IV.

Son of a slave!"—the Pacha said—
"From unbelieving mother bred,
Vain were a father’s hope to see
Aught that beseeches a man in thee.
Thou, when thine arm should bend the bow,
And hurl the dart, and curb the steed,
Thou, Greek in soul if not in creed,
Must pore where babbling waters flow,
And watch unfolding roses blow.
Would that ye orb, whose matin glow
Thy listless eyes so much admire,
Wilt lend thee something of his fire
Thou, who wouldst see this battle
By Christian cannon piecemeal rent;
Nay, tamely view old Stambol’s wall
Before the dogs of Moscow fall,
Nor strike one stroke for life and death
Against the curs of Nazareth!
Go—let thy less than woman’s hand
Assume the distaff—not the brand.
But, Haroun!—to my daughter speed—
And hark—of thine own head take heed—
If thus Zuleika oft takes wing—
Thou seest yon bow—it hath a string!"

V.

No sound from Selim’s lip was heard
At least that met old Giaffir’s ear,
But every frown and every word
Pierced keener than a Christian’s sword.

"Son of a slave!—reproach’d with fear!
Those gibes ha I cost another dear.
Son of a slave!—and who my sire?"
Thus held his thoughts their dark career;

And glances even of more than ire
Flash forth, then faintly dispear.
Old Giaffir gazed upon his son
And started; for within his eye
He read how much his wrath hath done;
He saw rebellion there begun:
"Come hither, boy—what, no reply?
I mark thee—and I know thee too;
But there be deeds thou dar’st not do
But if thy hand had manlier length,
And if thy hand had skill and strength,
I’d joy to see thee break a lance,
Albeit against my own perchance"

As sneeringly these accents fell,
On Selim’s eye he fiercely gazed:
That eye return’d him glance for glance,
And proudly to his sire’s was raised,
Till Giaffir’s qual’d and shrunk askance
And why—he felt, but durst not tell.
"Much I misdoubt this wayward boy
Will one day work me more annoy:
I never loved him from his birth,
And—but his arm is little worth,
And scarcely in the chase could cope
With timid fawn or antelope.
Far less would venture into strife
Where man contends for fame and life
I would not trust that look or tone;
No—not the blood so near my own.
That blood—he hath not heard—no more
I’ll watch him closer than before.
He is an Arab b to my sight,
Or Christian crouching in the fight—
But hark!—I hear Zuleika’s voice:
Like Houris’ hymn it meets mine ear:
She is the offspring of my choice;
Oh! more than ev’n her mother dear,
With all to hope, and nought to fear
My Peri! ever welcome here!
Sweet as the desert-fountain’s wave
To lips just cool’d in time to save—
Such to my longing sight art thou;
Nor can they waft to Mecca’s shrine
More thanks for life, than I for thine,
Who blest thy birth, and bless thee now:

VI.

Fair, as the first that fell of womankind,
When on that dread yet lovely serpent smiling,
Whose image then was stamp’d upon her mind—
But once beguiled—and ever more beguiling;
Dazzling, as that, oh! too transcendent vision
To sorrow’s phantom-peopled slumber given.
When heart meets heart again in dreams Elysian
And paints the lost on earth revived in heaven;
Soft, as the memory of buried love;
Pure, as the prayer which childhood wafts above;
Was she—the daughter of this rude old chief,
Who met the maid with tears—but not of grief.

Who hath not proved how feebly words essay
To fix one spark of beauty’s heavenly ray?
Who doth not feel, until his failing sight
Paints into dimness with its own delight,
His changing cheek, his sinking heart confesses
The might—the majesty of loveliness!
Such was Zuleika—such around her shone
The nameless charms unmark’d by her tone;
The light of love, the purity of grace,
The mind, the music breathing from her face,
The heart: whose softness harmonized the whole—
And, oh! that eye was in itself a soul!

Her graceful arms in meekness bending
Across her gently budding breast;
To clasp the neck of him who blest
His child caressing and caress,
Zuleika came—and Giaffir felt
His purpose half within him melt:
Not that against her fancied weal
His heart though stern could ever feel;
Affection chain’d her to that heart;
Ambition tore the links apart.

VII.

"Zuleika! child of gentleness!
How dear this very day must tell,
When I forget my own distress,
To bid thee with another dwell:
Another! and a braver man
Was never seen in battle’s van.
We Moslem reck not much of blood;
But yet the line of Carasman
Unchanged, unchangeable hath stood
First of the bold Timariot bands
That won and well can keep their lands.
Enough that he who comes to woo
Is kinsman of the Bey Oglou:
His years need scarce a thought employ;
I would not have thee wed a boy.
And thou shalt have a noble dower:
And his and my united power
Will laugh to scorn the death-firman,
Which others tremble but to scan.
And teach the messenger what fate
The bearer of such boun may wait.
And now thou know’st thy father’s will;
All that thy sex hath need to know:
’Twas mine to teach obedience still—
The way to love thy lord may show."

VIII.

In silence bow’d the virgin’s head;
And if her eye was fill’d with tears,
That stifled feeling dare not shed,
And changed her cheek from pale to red,
And red to pale, as through her ears
Those winged words like arrows sped,
What could such be but maiden fears?
So bright the tear in beauty’s eye,
Love half regrets to kiss it dry;
So sweet the blush of bashfulness,
Even pity scarce can wish it less.
What’er it was the sire forgot;
Or if remember’d, mark’d it not:
Thrice clapp’d his hands, and call’d his steed,
Resign’d his gem-adorn’d Chibouke,
And mounting fealty for the mead,
With Maugrabee and Mamaluke,
His way amid his Delis took,
To witness many an active deed
With sabre keen, and blunt jereed.
The Kes’ar only and his Mors
Watch’d well the Haram’s massy doors.

IX.

His head was lean: upon his hand,
His eye look’d o’er the dark-blue water
That swiftly glides and gently swells
Between the winding Dardanelles;
But yet he saw nor sea nor strand,
Nor even his Pacha’s turban’d band
Mix in the game of minic slaughter,
Careering cleave the folded felt
With sabre stroke right sharply dealt;
Nor mark’d the javelin-darting crowd,
Nor heard their Ollahs’ wild and loud—
He thought but of old Giaffir’s daughter.

X.

No word from Selim’s bosom broke;
One sigh Zuleika’s thought bespoke:
Still gazed he through the lattice grate
Pale, mute, and mournfully sedate.
To him Zuleika’s eye was turn’d,
But little from his aspect learn’d:
Equal her grief, yet not the same;
Her heart confess’d a gentler flame,
But yet that heart alarm’d or weak,
She knew not why, forbade to speak
Yet speak she must—but when essay?
"How strange he thus should turn away!
Not thus we e’er before have met;
Not thus shall be our parting yet."
Thrice paced she slowly through the room,
And watch’d his eye—it still was fix’d;
She snatch’d the urn wherein was mix’d
The Persian Atar-gul’s perfume,
And sprinkled all its odors o’er
The pictured roof and marble floor:
The drops, that through his glittering rest
The playful girl’s appeal address,
Unheed’d o’er his bosom flew,
As if that breast were marble too.
"What, sullen yet? it must not be—Oh! gentle Selim, this from thee!"
She saw in curious order set
The fairest flowers of Eastern land—
"He loved them once; may touch them yet,
If offer’d by Zuleika’s hand."
The childish thought was hardly breath’d
Before the rose was pluck’d and wreath’d:
The next fond moment saw her seat
Her fairy form at Selim’s feet:
"This rose to calm my brother’s cares
A message from the Bulbul bears;
It says to-night he will prolong
For Selim’s ear his sweetest song;
And though his note is somewhat sad,
He’ll try for once a strain more glad,
With some faint hope his alter’d lay
May sing these gloomy thoughts away."

XI.

"What! not receive my foolish flower?
Nay then I am indeed unblest:
On me can thus thy forehead lower?
And know’st thou not who loves thee best?
Oh, Selim dear! oh, more than dearest!
Say, is it me thou hast or fearest?
Come, lay thy head upon my breast,
And I will kiss thee into rest,
Since words of mine, and songs must fail,
Even from my fabled nighingale.
I knew our sire at times was stern,
But this from thee had yet to learn:
Too well I know he loves thee not;
But is Zuleika's love forgot?
Ah! deem I right? the 'Pacha's plan—
This kinsman of Carasman
Perhaps may prove some foe of thine.
If so, I swear by Mecca's shrine,
If shrines that ne'er approach allow
To woman's step admit her vow,
Without thy free consent, command,
The Sultan should not have my hand!
Thin'st thou that I could bear to part
With thee, and learn to halve my heart?
Ah! were I sever'd from thy side,
Where were thy friend—and who my guide?
Years have not seen, time shall not see
The hour that tears my soul from thee:
Even Azrael from his deadly shaft
When flies that shaft, and fly it must,
That parts all else, shall doom for ever
Our hearts to undivided dust!"

XII.
He lived—he breathed—he moved—he felt;
He raised the maid from where she knelt;
His trance was gone—his keen eye shone
With thoughts that long in darkness dwelt;
With thoughts that burn—in rays that melt.
As the stream late conceal'd
By the fringes of its willows,
When it rushes reveal'd
In the light of its willows;
As the bolt bursts on high
From the black cloud that bound it,
Flash'd the soul of that eye
Through the long lashes round it.
A war-horse at the trumpet's sound,
A lion roused by heedless hound,
A tyrant waked to sudden strife
By graze of ill-directed knife,
Starts not to more convulsive life
Than he, who heard that vow, display'd,
And all, before repud.'d, betray'd:
"Now thou art mine, for ever mine,
With life to keep, and scarce with life resign;
Now thou art mine, that sacred oath,
Though sworn by one, hath bound us both.
Yes, fondly, wisely hast thou done;
That vow hath saved more heads than one:
But bleech not thou—thy simplest tears
Claims more from me than tenderness;
I would not wrong the slenderest hair
That cluster round thy forehead fair,
For all the treasures buried far
Within the caves of Istarak.
This morning clouds upon me lower'd,
Reproaches on my head were shower'd,
And Giafiff almost called me coward!
Now I have motive to be brave;
The son of his neglected slave,
Nay, start not 'twas the term he gave,
May show, though little apt to vaunt,
A heart his words nor deeds can daunt.
His son, indeed!—yet, thanks to thee,
Perchance I am, at least shall be;
But let our plighted secret vow
Be only known to us as now

I know the wretch who dares demand
From Giafiff thy reluctant hand;
More ill-got wealth, a meaner soul
Holds not a Musselmen's control:
Was he not bred in Egripo? a
A viler race let Israel show!
But let that pass—to none be told
Our oath; the rest shall time unfold.
To me and mine leave Osman Bey;
I've partisans for peril's day:
Think not I am what I appear;
I've arms, and friends, and vengeance near

XIII.
"Think not thou art what thou appare'st,
My Selim, thou art sadly changed:
This morn I saw thee gentlest, dearest;
But now thou'rt from thyself estranged.
My love thou'st surely knew'st before,
It ne'er was less, nor can be more.
To see thee, hear thee, near thee stay,
And hate the night I know not why,
Save that we meet not but by day;
With thee to live, with thee to die,
I dare not to my hope deny:
Thy cheek, thine eyes, thy lips to kiss,
Like this—and this—no more than this;
For, Alla! sure thy lips are flame:
What fever in thy veins is flushing?
My own—have nearly caught the same,
At least I feel my cheek too blushing.
To soothe thy sickness, watch thy health.
Partake, but never waste thy wealth;
Or stand with smiles unmurmuring by,
And lighten half thy poverty;
Do all but close thy dying eye,
For that I could not live to try;
To these alone my thoughts aspire:
More can I do? or thou require?
But, Selim, thou must answer why
We see so much of mystery?
The cause I cannot dream nor tell,
But be it, since thou say'st 'tis well;
Yet what thou mean'st by 'arms' and 'friends'
Beyond my weaker sense extends.
I meant that Giafiff should have heard
The very vow I plighted thee;
His wrath would not revoke my word:
But surely he would leave me free.
Can this fond wish seem strange in me,
To be what I have ever been?
What other hath Zuleika seen
From simple childhood's earliest hour?
What other can she seek to see
Than thee, companion of her bower,
The partner of her infancy?
These cherished thoughts with life begur,
Say, why must I no more own?
What change is wrought to make me shun
The truth; my pride, and thine till now?
To meet the gaze of stranger's eyes
Our law, our creed, our God denies;
Nor shall one wandering thought of mine
At such, our Prophet's will repine:
No! happier made by that decree!
He left me all in leaving thee.
Deep were my anguish, thus compell'd
To wed with one I ne'er beheld:
This wherefore should I not reveal?
Why wilt thou urge me to conceal?
I know the Pacha's haughty mood
To thee hath never boded good:
And he so often storms at nought,
Allah! forbid that e'er he ought!
And why, I know not, but within
My heart concealment weighs like sin.
If then such secrecy be crime,
And such it feels while lurking here;
Oh, Selim! tell me yet in time,
Nor leave me thus to thoughts of fear.
Ah! yonder see the Tchoccadar,
My father leaves the mimic war;
I tremble now to meet his eye—
Say, Selim, canst thou tell me why?"

XIV.
"Zuleika! to thy tower's retreat
Betake thee—Giafr I can greet;
And now with him I fain must prate
Of firmans, imposts, levies, state.
There's fearful news from Damuzi's bank,
Our Vizier nobly thins his ranks,
For which the Girour may give him thanks!
Our Sultan bath a shorter way
Such costly triumph to repay.
But, mark me, when the twilight drum
Hath warn'd the troops to food and sleep,
Unto thy cell will Selim come;
Then softly from the Haram creep
Where we may wander by the deep:
Our garden-battlements are steep;
Nor these will rash intruder climb
To list our words, or stint our time;
And if he doth, I want not steel
Which some have felt, and more may feel.
Then shalt thou learn of Selim more
Than thou hast heard or thought before:
Trust me, Zuleika—fear not me!
Thou know'st I hold a Haram key."

"Fear thee, my Selim! ne'er till now Did word like this—"
"Delay not thou;
I keep the key—and Haroun's guard
Have some, and hope of more reward.
To-night, Zuleika, thou shalt hear
My tale, my purpose, and my fear:
I am not, love! what I appear"

CANTO II.

I.
The winds are high on Helles' wave,
As on that night of stormy water,
When Love, who sent, forgot to save
The young, the beautiful, the brave,
The lonely hope of Sestos' daughter.
Oh! when alone along the sky
Her turret-torch was blazing high,
Though rising gale, and breaking foam,
And shrieking sea-birds warn'd him home;
And clouds aloft and tides below,
With signs and sounds, forbade to go,
He could not see, he would not hear
Or sound or sign foreboding fear;
His eye but saw that light of love,
The only star it hail'd above;
His ear but rang with Hero's song,
"Ye waves, divide not lovers long!"—
That tale is old, but love anew
May nerve young hearts to prove as true

II.
The winds are high, and Helles' tide
Rolls darkly heaving to the main;
And night's descending shadows hide
That field with blood bedew'd in vain,
The desert of old Priam's pride
The tombs, sole relics of his reign,
All—save immortal dreams that could beguile
The blind old man of Scio's rocky isle.

III.
Oh! yet—for there my steps have been;
These feet have press'd the sacred shore;
These limbs that buoyant wave hath borne—
Minstrel! with thee to muse, to mourn,
To trace again those fields of yore,
Believing every hillock green
Contains no fabled hero's ashes,
And that around the undoubted scene
Thine own "broad Hellespont" estil dauces.
Be long my lot! and cold were he
Who there could gaze denying thee!

IV.
The night hath closed on Helles' stream,
Nor yet hath risen on Ida's hill
That moon, which shone on his high theme
No warrior chides her peaceful beam,
But conscious shepherds bless it still.
Their flocks are grazing on the mound
Of him who felt the Dardan's arrow:
That mighty heap of gather'd ground
Which Ammon's son ran proudly round
By nations raised, by monarchs crown'd,
Is now a lone and nameless bower!
Within—thy dwelling-place how narrow,
Without—can only strangers breathe
The name of him that was beneath:
Dust long outlasts the storied stone;
But thou—thy very dust is gone!

V.
Late, late to-night will Dian cheer
The swain, and chase the boatman's fear;
Till then no beacon on the cliff
May shape the course of struggling skiff;
The scatter'd lights that skirt the bay.
All, one by one, have died away;
The lamp of this lone hour
Is glimmering in Zuleika's tower:
Yes! there is light in that lone chamber,
And o'er her silken ottoman
Are thrown the fragrant beads of amber,
O'er which her fairy fingers ran;
Near these, with emerald rays beset,
(How could she thus that gem forget?)
Her mother's sainted amulet,
Whereon engraved the Koorsen text,
Could smooth this life, and win the next;
And by her comboloio lies
A Koran of illumined eyes.
And many a bright emblazon'd rhyme
By Persian scribes redeem'd from time;
And o'er those scrolls, not oft so mute,
Reclines her now neglected lute;
And round her lamp of fretted gold
Bloom flowers in urns of China's mould;
The richest work of Iran's loom,
And Sheeraz' tribute of perfume;
All that can eye or sense delight
Are gather'd in that gorgeous room:
But yet it hath an air of gloom.
She, of this Peri cell the sprite,
What doth she hence, and on so rude a night?

VI.
Wrupt in the darkest sable vest,
Which none save noblest Moslem wear,
To guard from winds of heaven the breast
As heaven itself to Selim dear,
With cautious steps the thicket threading,
And starting oft, as through the glade
The gust its hollow moanings made,
Till on the smoother pathway treading,
More free her timid bosom beat,
The wail pursued her silent guide;
And though her terror urged retreat,
How could she quit her Selim's side?
How teach her tender lips to chide?

VII.
They reach'd at length a grotto, hewn
By nature but enlarged by art,
Where oft her lute she wont to tune,
And oft her Koran com'd apart;
And oft in youthful reverie
She dream'd what Paradise might be:
Where woman's parted soul shall go
Her prophet had disdained to show;
But Selim's mansion was secure,
Nor deem'd she, could he long endure
His bow'er in other worlds of bliss,
Without her, most beloved in this!
Oh! who so dear with him could dwell?
What Hourli sooth him half so well?

VIII.
Since last she visited the spot
Some change seem'd wrought within the grot:
It might be only that the night
Disguised things seen by better light:
That brazen lamp but dimly threw
A ray of no celestial hue;
But in a nook within the cell
Her eye on stranger objects fell.
There arms were piled, not such as wield
The turban'd Devis in the field;
But brands of foreign blade and hilt,
And one was red—perchance with guilt!
Ah! how without can blood be split?
A cup too on the board was set
That did not seem to hold sherbet.
What may this mean? she turn'd to see
Her Selim—"Oh. can this be he?"

IX.
His robe of pride was thrown aside,
His brow no high-crown'd turban bore,
But in its stead a shawl of red.
Wreathed lightly round his temples wore:

That dagger, on whose hilt the gem
Were worthy of a diadem,
No longer glitter'd at his waist,
Where pistols undorn'd were braced;
And from his belt a sabre swung,
And from his shoulder loosely hung
The cloak of white, the thin capote
That decks the wandering Candidote.
Beneath—his golden-plated vest
Chung like a cuirass to his breast;
The greaves below his knee that wound
With silvery scales were sheathed and bound
But were it not that high command
Spake in his eye, and tone, and hand,
All that a careless eye could see
In him was some young Galianjoté. 28

X.
"I said I was not what I seem'd:
And now thou seest my words were true
I have a tale thou hast not dream'd,
If sooth—its truth must others rue
My story now 'twere vain to hide;
I must not see thee Osman's bride;
But had not thine own lips declared
How much of that young heart I shared,
I could not, must not, yet have shown
The darker secret of my own.
In this I speak not now of love;
That, let time, truth, and peril prove.
But first—Oh! never wed another—
Zuleika! I am not thy brother!"

XI.
"Oh! not my brother!—yet unsay—
God! am I left alone on earth
To mourn—I dare not curse—the day
That saw my solitary birth?
Oh! thou wilt love me now no more!
My sinking heart forebode ill;
But know me all I was before,
Thy sister—friend—Zuleika still.
Thou led'st me here perchance to kill;
If thou hast cause for vengeance, see
My breast is offer'd—take thy fill!
Far better with the dead to be
Than live thus nothing now to thee:
Perhaps far worse, for now I know
Why Giaffir always seem'd thine foe;
And I alas! am Giaffir's child,
For whom thou wert contemn'd, revil'd.
If not thy sister—wouldst thou save
My life? Oh! bid me be thy slave"

XII.
"My slave, Zuleika!—nay, I'm thine;
But, gentle love, this transport calm:
Thy lot shall yet be link'd with mine;
I swear it by our Prophet's shrine,
And be that thought thy sorrow's balm.
So may the Koran 29 verse display'd
Upon its steel direct my blade,
In danger's hour to guard us both,
As I preserve that awful oath!
The name in which thy heart hath prided
Must change; but, my Zuleika, know,
That tie is widen'd, not divided,
Although thv Sire's my deadliest foe.
BYRON'S WORKS.

My father was to Giaffir all
That Selim late was deem'd to thee;
That brother wrought a brother's fall,
But spared, at least, my infancy;
And lull'd me with a vain deceit
That yet a like return may meet.
He rear'd me, not with tender help,
But like the nephew of a Cain; 30
He watched me like a lion's whelp,
That guaws and yet may break his chain.
My father's blood in every vein
Is boiling; but for thy dear sake
No present vengeance will I take:
Though here I must no more remain.
But first, belov'd Zuleika! hear
How Giaffir wrought this deed of fear.

XIII.
"How fast their strife to rancor grew,
If love or envy made them foes,
It matters little if I knew;
In fiery spirits, slights, though few
And thoughtless, will disturb repose.
In war Abdallah's arm was strong,
Remember'd yet in Bosnian song,
And Paswan's 31 rebel hordes attest
How little love they bore such guest;
His death is all I need relate,
The stern effect of Giaffir's hate;
And how my birth disclosed to me,
Whate'er beside it makes, hath made me free.

XIV.
"When Paswan, after years of strife,
At last for power, but first for life,
In Widin's walls too proudly sate,
Our Pachas rallied round the state;
Nor last nor least in high command
Each brother led a separate band;
They gave their horsetails 32 to the wind,
And, muttering in Sophin's plain,
Their tents were pitch'd, their post assign'd:
To one, alas! assign'd in vain!
What need of words? the deadly bowl,
By Giaffir's order drugg'd and given,
With venom subtle as his soul,
Dismiss'd Abdallah's hence to heaven.
Reclined and feverish in the bath,
He, when the hunter's sport was up,
But little deem'd a brother's wrath
To quench his thirst had such a cup:
The bowl a bribed attendant bore;
He drank one draught, 33 nor needed more!
If thou my tale, Zuleika, doubt,
Call Haroun—he can tell it out.

XV.
"The deed once done, and Paswan's feud
In part suppress'd, though ne'er subdued,
Abdallah's Pachalick was gain'd:—
Thou know'st not what in our Divan
Can wealth procure for worse than man—
Abdallah's honors were obtain'd
By him a brother's murder stain'd;
'Tis true, the purchase nearly drain'd
His ill-got treasure, soon replaced.
Would'st question whence? Survey the waste.
And ask the squallid peasant how
His gains repay his broiling brow!—

Why me the stern usurper spared,
Why thus with me his palace shared,
I know not. Shame, regret, remorse
And little fear from infant's force;
Besides, adoption as a son
By him whom Heaven accorded none
Or some unknown cabal, caprice,
Preserved me thus; but not in peace
He cannot curb his haughty mood,
Nor I forgive a father's blood.

XVI.
"Within thy father's house are foes;
Not all who break his bread are true.
To these should I my birth disclose,
His days, his very hours were few:
They only want a heart to lead,
A hand to point them to the deed.
But Haroun only knows, or knew
This tale, whose close is almost nigh:
Hein Abdallah's palace grew,
And held that post in his Serai
Which holds he here—he saw him die:
But what could single slavery do?
Avenge his lord? alas! too late;
Or save his son from such a fate?
He chose the last, and when elate
With foes subdued, or friends betray'd,
Proud Giaffir in high triumph sate,
He led me helpless to his gate,
And not in vain it seems essay'd
To save the life for which he pray'd.
The knowledge of my birth secured
From all and each, but most from me;
Thus Giaffir's safety was insured.
Removed he too from Roumelie
To this our Asiatic side,
Far from our seats by Danube's tide,
With none but Haroun, who retains Such knowledge—and that Nubian feels
A tyrant's secrets are but chains,
From which the captive gladly steals,
And this and more to me reveals:
Such still to guilt just Alla sends—
Slaves, tools, accomplices—no friends!

XVII.
"All this, Zuleika, harshly sound;
But harsher still my tale must be:
How'er, my tongue thy softness wounds,
Yet I must prove all truth to thee.
I saw thee start this garb to see,
Yet is it one I oft have worn,
And long must wear: this Galligée,
To whom thy plighted vow is sworn,
Is leader of those pirate hordes,
Whose laws and lives are on their swords,
To hear whose desolating tale
Would make thy waning cheek more pale,
Those arms thou see'st my hand have brought:
The hands that wield are not remote
This cup too for the rugged knaves.
Is fill'd—once quaff'd, they ne'er repose;
Our Prophet might forgive the slaves;
They're only infidels in wine.

XVIII.
"What could I be? Prescribed at home,
And taunted to a wiser to roam;
And listless left— for Giaffir’s fear
Denied the courser and the spear—
Though oft— Oh, Mahomet! how oft!—
In full Divan the despot scoff’d,
As if my weak unwilling hand
Refused the bridle or the brand:
He ever went to war alone,
And pent me here untired; unknown;
To Haroun’s care with women left,
By hope unblest, of fame bereft,
While thou— whose softness long endeav’d,
Though it unmann’d me, still had cheer’d—
To Brusa’s walls for safety sent,
Await’d there the field’s event.
Haroun, who saw my spirit pining
Beneath inaction’s sluggish yoke,
His captive, though with dread resigning,
My thraldom for a season broke,
On promise to return before
The day when Giaffir’s charge was o’er.
’Tis vain— my tongue cannot impart
My almost drunkenness of heart,
The last first this liberated eye
Survey’d Earth, Ocean, Sun, and Sky,
As if my spirit pierced them through,
And all their inmost wonders knew!
One word alone can paint to thee
That more than feeling— I was Free!—
E’en for thy presence ceased to pine;
The World— nay— Heaven itself was mine!

XIX.

’Tis true, they are a lawless brood,
But rough in form, nor mild in mood;
And every creed, and every race,
With them hath found— may find a place.
But open speech, and ready hand,
Obedience to their chief’s command;
A soul for every enterprise,
That never sees with terror’s eyes;
Friendship for each, and faith to all,
And vengeance vow’d for those who fall,
Have made them fitting instruments
For more than even my own intents.
And some— and I have studied all
Distinguish’d from the vulgar rake,
But chiefly to my counsel and
The wisdom of the cautious Frank—
And some to higher thoughts aspire,
The last of Lambro’s patriot’s there
Anticipated facts with shah;
And oft around the cavern fire
On visionary schemes debate,
To snatch the Rayahs
from their fate.
So let them ease their hearts with prate
Of equal rights, which men ne’er knew:
I have a love for freedom too.

Ah! let me like the ocean patriarch roam,
Or only know on land the Tartar’s home!—
My tent on shore, my ghilley on the sea,
Are more than cities and serais to me:
Borne by my steed, or wafted by my sail,
Across the desert, or before the gale.
Bound where thou wilt, my barb! or glide, my prow
But be the star that guides the wanderer, Thou!
Thou, my Zuleika, shine with wonder in my bark.
The dove of peace and promise to mine ark!
Or, since that hope denied in worlds of strife,
Be thou the rainbow to the storms of life!
The evening beam that smiles the clouds away,
And hints to-morrow with prophetic ray!
Blest— as the Muez’zinn’s strain from Mecca’s wall
To pilgrim’s pure and prostrate at his call
Soft— as the melody of youthful days,
That steals the trembling tear of speechless praise.
Dear— as his native song to exile’s ears,
Shall sound each tone thy long-loved voice endears.
For thee in those bright isles is built a bower,
Blovining as Aden
its earliest shore.
A thousand swords, with Selim’s heart and hand
Wait— wave— defend— destroy— at thy command.
Girt by my hand, Zuleika at my side,
The spoil of nations shall bedeck my pride.
The Haram’s languid years of listless ease
Are well resign’d for cares— for joys like these:
Not blind to fate, I see, where’er I rove,
Unnumber’d perils— but one only love!
Yet well my toils shall that fond breast repay,
Though fortune frowns, or false friends betray.
How dear the dream in darkest hours of ill,
Should all be changed, to find thee faithful still
Be but thy soul like Selim’s, firmly shown;
To thee be Selim’s tender as thine own;
To sooth each sorrow, share in each delight,
Blend every thought, do all— but disdain!
Once free, ‘tis mine our horde again to guide;
Friends to each other, foes to aught beside:
Yet there we follow but the bent assign’d
By fatal nature to man’s warring kind:
Mark! where his carnage and his conquest cease
He makes a solitude, and calls it— peace!
I, like the rest, must use my skill or strength,
But ask no land beyond my sabre’s length.
Power sways but by division— her resource
The blest alternative of fraud or force;
Ours be the last; in time deceit may come,
When cities crape us in a social home;
There even thy soul might err— how oft the heart
Corruption shakes which peril could not part.
And woman, more than man, when death or wo,
Or even disgrace would lay her lover low.
Sunk in the lap of luxury will shame—
Away suspicion! not Zuleika’s name;
But life is hazard at the best; and here
No more remains to win, and much to fear;
Yes, fear!— the doubt, the dread of losing thee,
By Osman’s power and Giaffir’s stern decree.
That dread shall vanish with the favoring gale,
Which love to-night hath promised to my sail:
No longer dance the pair his smile hath blest,
Their steps still roving, but their hearts at rest.
With thee all toils are sweet, each clime hath charms,
Earth— sea alike— our world within our arms!
Ay— let the loud winds whistle o’er the deck,
So that those arms cling closer round my neck.
The deepest murmur of this lip shall be
No sigh for safety, but a prayer for thee!
The war of elements no fears impart
To love, whose deadliest bane is human art:
There lie the only rocks our course can check;
Here moments menace—there are years of wreck!
But hence ye thoughts that rise in Horror's shape!
This hour bestows, or ever bars escape.
 Few words remain of mine tale to close:
Of thine but que to waft us from our foes;
Yea—foes—to me will Giaffir's hate decline?
And is not Osman, who would part us, thine

FORTH TO THE CAVERN MOUTH HE STEPT,
His pistol's echo rang on high;
Zuleika started not, nor wept,
Despair benumb'd her breast and eye—
"They hear me not, or if they ply
Their ears, 'tis but to see me die;
That sound hath drawn my foes more nigh
Then forth my father's scimitar;
Thou ne'er hast seen less equal war!
Farewell, Zuleika!—Sweet! retire:
Yet stay within—here linger safe,
At thee his rage will only chafe.
Stir not—lest even to thee perchance
Some erring blade or ball should glance.
Fear'st thou for him?—may I expire,
If in this strife I seek thy sire!
No—though by him that poison pour'd;
No—though again he call me coward!
But tamely shall I meet their steel?
No—as each crest save his may feel!

XXI.

"His head and faith from doubt and death
Return'd in time my guard to save;
Few heard, none told, that o'er the wave
From isle to isle I roved the while:
And since, though parted from my band,
Too seldom now I leave the land,
No deed they've done, nor deed shall do,
Fare I have heard and doom'd it too:
I form the plan, decree the spoil,
'Tis fit I oftener share the toil.
But now too long I've held thine ear;
Time presses, floats my bark, and here
We leave behind but hate and fear.
To-morrow Osman with his train
Arrives—to-night must break thy chain;
And wouldst thou save that haughty Bey,
Perchance his life who gave thee thine,
With me this hour away—away!
But yet, though thou art plighted mine,
Wouldst thou recall thy willing vow,
Appall'd by truths imparted now,
Here rest—I—not to see thee wed:
But be that peril on my head!"

XXII.

Zuleika, mute and motionless,
Stood like that statue of distress,
When, her last hope for ever gone,
The mother harden'd into stone;
All in the maid that eye could see
Was but a younger Niobe.
But ere her lip, or even her eye,
Essay'd to speak, or look reply,
Beneath the garden's wicket porch
Far flashed on high a blazing torch!
Another—and another—and another—
"Oh! sir—no more—yet now my more than brother!"
Far, wide, through every thickets spread,
The fearful lights are gleaming red;
Nor these alone—for each right hand
Is ready with a sheathless brand.
They part, pursue, return, and wheel
With searching flambeau, shining steel;
And last of all, his sabre waving,
Stern Giaffir in his fury raving:
And now almost they touch the cave—
Oh! must that grot be Selim's grave?

XXIII.

Dauntless he stood—"tis come—soon past—
One kiss, Zuleika—'tis my last:
But yet my band not far from shore
May hear this signal, see the flash:
Yet now too few—the attempt were rash:
No matter—yet one effort more."

XXIV.

One bound he made, and gain'd the sand.
Already at his feet hath sunk
The foremost of the prying band,
A gasping head, a quivering trunk:
Another falls—but round him close
A swarming circle of his foes;
From right to left his path he left,
And almost met the meeting wave:
His boat appears—not five oars' length—
His comrades strain with desperate strength
Oh! are they yet in time to save?
His feet the foremost breakers lave;
His band are plunging in the bay,
Their sabres glitter through the spray
Wet—wild—unwearied to the strand
They struggle—now they touch the land!
They come!—'tis but to add to slaughter—
His heart's best blood is on the water.

XXV.

Escaped from shot, unhar'm'd by steel,
Or scarcely grazed its force to feel,
Had Selim won, betray'd, beset.
To where the strand and billows met:
There as his last step left the land,
And the last death-blow dealt his hand—
Ah! wherefore did he turn to look
For her his eye but sought in vain?
That pause, that fatal gape he took,
Hath doom'd his death, or fix'd his chain
Sad proof, in peril and in pain,
How late will lover's hope remain!
His back was to the dashing spray:
Behind, but close, his comrades lay,
When, at the instant, hiss'd the ball—
"So may the foes of Giaffir fall!"
Whose voice is heard? whose carbine rang?
Whose bullet through the night-air sang,
Too nearly, deadly aim'd to err?
"Tis thine—Abdallah's murderer!
The father slowly rued thy hate,
The son hath found a quicker fate:
Past from his breast the blood is bubbling,
The whiteness of the sea-foam troubling—
If aught his lips essay'd to groan
The rushing billows choked the tone.
XXVI.
Morn slowly rolls the clouds away;
Few trophies of the fight are there:
The shouts that shook the midnight bay
Are silent; but some signs of fray
That strand of strife may bear,
And fragments of each shiver'd brand;
Steps stamp'd; and dash'd into the sand
The print of many a struggling hand
May there be mark'd; nor far remote
A broken torch, an oarless boat;
And tangled on the weeds that heap
The beach where shelving to the deep
There lies a white capote!
'Tis rent in twain—one dark red stain
The wave yet ripples o'er in vain:
But where is he who wore?
Ye! who would o'er his relics weep,
Go, seek them where the surges sweep
Their burden round Sigeon's steep,
And cast en Lemnos' shore:
The sea-birds shriek above the prey,
O'er which their hungry beaks delay,
As shaken on his restless pillow;
His head heaves with the heaving hillow;
That hand, whose motion is not life,
Yet feebly seems to menace strife,
Flung by the tossing tide on high,
Then levell'd with the wave—
What recks it, though that corse shall lie
Within a living grave?
The bird that teares that prostrate form
Hath only robb'd the meane worm;
The only heart, the only eye
Had bled or wept to see him die,
Had seen those scatter'd limbs composed,
And mourn'd above his turban-stone,
That heart hath burst—that eye was closed—
Yea—closed before his own!

XXVII.
By Helle's stream there is a voice of wail
And woman's eye is wet—man's cheek is pale:
Zuleika! last of Giaffir's race,
Thy destined lord is come too late;
He sees not—not she shall see thy face,
Can he not hear
The loud Wu-lu-walle! 41 warn his distant ear?
Thy handmaids weeping at the gate,
The Koran-chanters of the hymn of fate,
The silent slaves with folded arms that wait,
Signs in the hall, and shrieks upon the gate,
Tell him thy tale!
Thou didst not view thy Selim fall!
That fearful moment when he left the cave
Thy heart grew chill:
He was thy hope—thy joy—thy love—thy all—
And that last thought on him thou couldst not save
Sufficed to kill;
Euryst forth in one wild cry—and all was still.
Peace to thy broken heart, and virgin grave!
Ah! happy! but of life to lose the worst!
That grief—though deep—though fatal—was thy first!
Thrice happy! ne'er to feel nor fear the force
Of absence, shame, pride, hate, revenge, remorse!
And, oh! that pang where more than madness lies!
The worm that will not sleep—and never dies;

Thought of the gloomy day and ghastly night,
That dreads the darkness, and yet loathes the light
That winds around and tears the quivering heart!
Ah! wherefore not consume it—and depart?
Woe to thee, rash and unrelenting chief!
Vainly thou heap'st the dust upon thy head,
Vainly the sackcloth o'er thy limbs doth spread
By that same hand Abdallah—Selim bled.
Now let it tear thy beard in idle grief;
Thy pride of heart, thy bride for Osman's bed.
She, whom thy sultan had but seen to wed,
Thy daughter's dead!
Hope of thine age, thy twilight's lonely beam,
The star hath set that shone on Helle's stream.
What quench'd its ray?—the blood that thou hast shed!

Hark! to the hurried question of despair:
"Where is my child?"—an echo answers—
"Where?"42

XXVIII.
Within the place of thousand tombs
That shine beneath, while dark above
The sad but living eypress glooms,
And withers not, though branch and leaf
Are stamp'd with an eternal grief,
Like early unrequited love,
One spot exists, which ever blooms,
Even in that deadly grove—
A single rose is shedding there
Its lonely lustre, meek and pale
It looks as planted by despair—
So white—so faint—the slightest gale
Might whirl the leaves on high;
And yet, though storms and blight assat,
And hands more rude than winter sky
May wring it from the stem—in vain—
To-morrow sees it bloom again!
The stalk some spirit gently rears,
And waters with celestial tears;
For well may maids of Helle deem
That this can be no earthly flower,
Which mocks the tempest's withering hour
And buds unshelter'd by a bower,
Nor droops, though spring refuse her shower,
Not woos the summer beam;
To it the livelong night there sings
A bird unseen—but not remote:
Invisible his sily wings,
But soft as harp that Houri strings
His long entrancing note!
It were the bullbul; but his throat,
Though mournful, pours not such a strain.
For they who listen cannot leave
The spot, but linger there and grieve,
As if they loved in vain!
And yet so sweet the tears they shed,
'Tis sorrow so unmix'd with dread,
They scarce can bear the morn to break
That melancholy spell,
And longer yet would weep and wake,
He sings so wild and well!
But when the day-birth bursts from high
Expires that magic melody.
And some have been who could believe
(So fondly youthful dreams deceive,
And harsh be they that blame)
That note so piercing and profound
Will shape and syllable its sound
Into Zuleika's name.43
'Tis from her cypress' summit heard,
That melts in air the liquid word;
'Tis from her lovely virgin earth
That white rose takes its tender birth.
There late was laid a marble stone;
Eve saw it placed—the morrow gone!
It was no mortal arm that bore
That deep-fix'd pillar to the shore:
For there, as Helle's legends tell,
Next morn 'twas found where Selim fell,

Lash'd by the tumbling tide, whose wave
Denied his bones a holier grave:
And there by night, reclined, 'tis said,
Is seen a ghastly turban'd head:
And hence extended by the billow,
'Tis named the "Pirate phantom's pillow"
Where first it lay that mourning flower
Hath flourish'd; flourisheth this hour,
Alone and dewy, coldly pure and pale;
As weeping beauty's check at sorrow's tale!

   Tambour, Turkish drum, which sounds at sunrise, noon, and twilight.

5. He is an Arab to my sight. Page 123, line 95.
   The Turks abhor the Arabs (who return the compliment a hundred fold) even more than they hate the Christians.

6. The mind, the music breathing from her face. Page 124, line 2.
   This expression has met with objections. I will not refer to "him who hath not music in his soul," but merely request the reader to recollect, for ten seconds, the features of the woman whom he believes to be the most beautiful; and if he then does not comprehend fully what is feebly expressed in the above line, I shall be sorry for us both. For an eloquent passage in the latest report of the first English writer of this, perhaps of any age, on the analogy (and the immediate comparison excited by that analogy), between "painting and music," see vol. iii. cap. 10. De l'ALLEMAGNE. And is not this connexion still stronger with the original than the copy? With the coloring of nature than of art?

After all, this is rather to be felt than described; still I think there are some who will understand it, at least they would have done, had they beheld the countenance whose speaking harmony suggested the idea; for this passage is not drawn from imagination, but memory, that mirror which affliction dashes to the earth, and looking down upon the fragments, only beholds the reflection multiplied.

   Carasman Oglou, or Cara Osman Oglou, is the principal landholder in Turkey: he governs Magnesia; those who, by a kind of feudal tenure, possess land on condition of service, are called Tiamroits: they serve as Spahis, according to the extent of territory, and bring a certain number into the field, generally cavalry.

8. And teach the messenger what fate. Page 124, line 36.
   When a Pacha is sufficiently strong to resist, the single messenger, who is always the first bearer of the order for his death, is strangling instead, and sometimes five or six, one after the other, on the same errand, by command of the refractory patient; if, on the contrary, he is weak or loyal, he bows, kisses the Sultan's respectable signature, and is bowstrung with great complacency. In 1810, several of these presents were exhibited in the niche of the Scraglio gate; among others, the head of the Pacha of Bagdat, a brave young man, cut off by treachery, after a desperate resistance.

9. Thrice clapp'd his hands, and call'd his steed. Page 124, line 55.
   Clapping of the hands calls the servants. The Turks hate a superfluous expenditure of voice, and they have no bells.

Deli, bravos who form the forlorn hope of the cavalry, and always begin the action.

A twisted fold of felt is used for seclusion practice by the Turks, and few but Mussulman arms can cut through it at a single stroke: sometimes a tough turban is used for the same purpose. The jereed is a game of blunt javelins, animated and graceful.

Ollaha, Alla il Allah, the "Leilies," as the Spanish poets call them, the sound is Ollah; a cry of which the Turks, for a silent people, are somewhat profuse, particularly during the jereed, or in the chase, but mostly in battle. Their animation in the field, and gravity in the chamber, with their pipes and combolios form an amusing contrast.

"Atar-gul," ottar of roses. The Persian is the finest.

The ceiling and wainscots, or rather walls, of the Mussulman apartments are generally painted, in great houses, with one eternal and highly colored view of Constantinople, wherein the principal feature is a noble contempt of perspective; below, arms, scimitars, &c., are in general fancifully and not inedly disposed.

17. A message from the Bulbul bears. Page 124, line 111.
It has been much doubted whether the notes of this "Lover of the rose," are sad or merry; and Mr. Fox's remarks on the subject have provoked some learned controversy as to the opinions of the ancients on the subject. I dare not venture a conjecture on the point, though a little inclined to the "errare mallem," &c., if Mr. Fox was mistaken.

"Tchocadar"—one of the attendants who precedes a man of authority.

23. Thine own "broad Hellespont" still dashes. Page 126, line 83.
The wrangling about this epithet "the broad Hellespont" or the "boundless Hellespont," whether it means one or the other, or what it means at all, has been beyond all possibility of detail. I have even heard it disputed on the spot; and, not foreseeing a speedy conclusion to the controversy, amused myself with swimming across it in the mean time, and probably may again before the point is settled. Indeed, the question as to the truth of the tale of Troy divine, still continues, much of it resting upon the talismanic word "artepes"; probably Homer had the same notion of distance that a coquette has of time, and when he talks of boundless, means half a mile; as the latter, by a like figure, when she says eternal attachment, simply signifies three weeks.

Before his Persian invasion, and crowned the altar with laurel, &c. He was afterwards imitated by Caracalla in his race. It is believed that the last also poisoned a friend, named Festus, for the sake of new Petrolean games. I have seen the sheep feeding on the tombs of Esieetes and Antiochus the first is in the centre of the plain.

The belief in amulets engraved on gems, or closed in gold boxes, containing scraps from the Koran worn round the neck, wrist, or arm, is still universal in the East. The Korosee (throne) verse in the second chapter of the Koran describes the attributes of the Most High, and is engraved in this manner, and worn by the pious, as the most esteemed and sublime of all sentences.

So may the Koran verse display'd.

The characters on all Turkish scimitars contain sometimes the name of the place of their manufacture, but more generally a text from the Koran, in letters of gold. Among those in my possession, is one with a blade of singular construction; it is very broad, and the edge notched into serpentine curves like the ripple of water, or the waving of flame. I asked the Armenian who sold it, what possible use such a figure could add; he said, in Italian, that he did not know; but the Mussulmans had an idea that those of this form gave a severed wound; and liked it because it was "pin ferroce." I did not much admire the reason, but bought it for its peculiarity.

30.
But-like the nephew of a Cain.
Page 128, line 8.

It is to be observed, that every allusion to anything or personage in the Old Testament, such as the Ark, or Cain, is equally the privilege of Mussulman and Jew: indeed, the former profess to be much better acquainted with the lives, true and fabulous, of the patriarchs, than is warranted by our own sacred writ, and not content with Adam, they have a biography of Pre-Adamites. Solomon is the monarch of all necromancy, and Moses a prophet inferior only to Christ and Mahomet. Zuleika is the Persian name of Potiphur's wife, and her amanuens Joseph constitutes one of the finest poems in the language. It is therefore no violation of costume to put the names of Cain, or Noah, into the mouth of a Moslem.

31.
And Passano's rebel horses attest.
Page 128, line 24.

Peswan Oglou, the rebel of Widin, who for the last years of his life, set the whole power of the Porte at defiance.

32.
They gave their horsetails to the wind.
Page 128, line 36.

Horsetail, the standard of a Pacha.

33. * He drank one draught, nor needed more.
Page 128, line 49.

Giaffir, Pacha of Argyro Castro, or Scutari, I am not sure which, was actually taken off by the Albanian Ali, in the manner described in the text. Ali Pacha, while I was in the country, married the daughter of his victim, some years after the event had taken place, at a bath in Sophia, or Adrianople. The poison was mixed in the cup of coffee, which is presented before the sherbet by the bath-keeper, after dressing.

34. I sought by turns and saw them all.
Page 129, line 35.

The Turkish notions of almost all islands are conveyed to the Archipelago, the sea alluded to.

35. The last of Lambro's patriots there.

Lambro Cansani, a Greek, famous for his efforts in 1789-90 for the independence of his country, abandoned by the Russians, he became a pirate, and the Archipelago was the scene of his enterprises. He is said to be still alive at Petersburg. He and Riga are the two most celebrated of the Greek revolutionists.

36. To match the Rayahs from their fate.

"Rayahs" all who pay the capitation tax, called the 'Haratch.'

37. Ay, let me like the ocean-patriarch roam.
Page 129, line 66.

The first of voyages is one of the few with which the Mussulmans profess much acquaintance.

38. Or only know on land the Tartar's home.
Page 129, line 67.

The wandering life of the Arabs, Tartars, and Turkomans, will be found well detailed in any book of Eastern travels. That it possesses a charm peculiar to itself cannot be denied. A young French renegade confesses to Chatemour, that he never found himself alone, galloping in a desert, without a sensation approaching to rapture, which was indescribable.

39. Blooming as Aden in its earliest hour.
Page 129, line 57.

"Jannat al Aden," the perpetual abode, the Mussulman Paradise.

40. And mourn'd above his turban-stone.
Page 131, line 38.

A turban is carved in stone above the graves of men only.

41. The loud Wul-wulich warm his distant ear.
Page 131, line 45.

The death-song of the Turkish women. The silent slaves are the men whose notions of decorum forbid complaint in public.

42. Where is my child?"—an echo answers—"Where?"
Page 131, line 31.

"I came to the place of my birth and cried, 'the friends of my youth, where are they?' and an echo answered, 'Where are they?'"—From an Arab MS.

The above quotation (from which the idea in the text is taken) must be already familiar to every reader—it is given in the first annotation, page 67, of "The Pleasures of Memory" a poem so well known as to render a reference almost superfluous: but to whose pages all will be delighted to recur.

43. Into Zuleika's name.

"And airy touchez that visible man's name." Milton.

For a belief that the souls of the dead inhabit the form of birds, we need not travel to the east. Lord Lyttleton's ghost story, the belief of the Dutchess of Kendal that George I. flew into her window in the shape of a raven, (see Orford's Reminiscences,) and many other instances, bring this superstition nearer home. The most singular was the whim of a Worcestershire lady, who, believing her daughter to exist in the shape of a singing bird, literally furnished her pew in the Cathedral with cages-full of the kind; and as she was rich, her graces in beautifying the church, no objection was made to her harmless folly. For this anecdote see Orford's Letters.

TO

THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

MY DEAR MOORE,—

I dedicate to you the last production with which I shall trespass on public patience, and your indulgence, for some years; and I own that I feel anxious to avail myself of this latest and only opportunity of adorning my pages with a name, consecrated by unshaken public principle, and the most undoubted and various talents. While Ireland ranks you among the finest of her patriots; while you stand alone the first of her bards in her estimation, and Britain repeats and ratifies the decree, permit one, whose only regret, since our first acquaintance, has been the years he had lost before it commenced, to add the humble but sincere suffrage of friendship, to the voice of more than one nation. It will at least prove to you, that I have neither forgotten the gratification derived from your society, nor abandoned the prospect of its renewal, whenever your leisure or inclination allows you to atone to your friends for too long an absence. It is said, among those friends, I trust truly, that you are engaged in the composition of a poem whose scene will be laid in the East; none can do those scenes so much justice. The wrongs of your own country, the magnificent and fiery spirit of her sons, the beauty and feeling of her daughters, may there be found; and Collins, when he denominated his Oriental his Irish Exigues, was not aware how true, at least, was a part of his parallel. Your imagination will create a warmer sun, and less clouded sky; but wildness, tenderness, and originality are part of your national claim of oriental descent, to which you have already thus far proved your title more clearly than the most zealous of your country’s antiquarians.

May I add a few words on a subject on which all men are supposed to be fluent, and none agreeable? —Self. I have written, much, and published more than enough to demand a longer silence than I now meditate; but for some years to come, it is my intention to tempt no further the award of “gods, men, or columns.” In the present composition I have attempted not the most difficult, but, perhaps, the best adapted measure to our language, the good old and now neglected heroic couplet. The stanza of Spenser is, perhaps, too slow and dignified for narrative; though, I confess, it is the measure most after my own heart; Scott alone, of the present generation, has hitherto completely triumphed over the fatal facility of the octo-syllabic verse; and this is not the least victory of his fertile and mighty genius: in blank verse, Milton, Thomson, and our dramatists, are the beacons that shine along the deep, but warn us from the rough and barren rock on which they are kindled. The heroic couplet is not the most popular measure certainly; but as I did not deviate into the other from a wish to flatter what is called public opinion, I shall quit it without further apology, and take my chance once more with that versification, in which I have hitherto published nothing but compositions whose former circulation is part of my present, and will be of my future regret.

With regard to my story, and stories in general, I should have been glad to have rendered my personages more perfect and amiable, if possible, inasmuch as I have been sometimes criticised, and considered no less responsible for their deeds and qualities than if all had been personal. Be it so—if I have deviated into the gloomy vanity of “drawing from self,” the pictures are probably like, since they are unfavorable; and if not, those who know me are undeceived, and those who do not, I have little interest in undeceiving. I have no particular desire that any but my acquaintance should think the author better than the beings of his imagining; but I cannot help a little surprise, and perhaps amusement, at some odd critical exceptions in the present instance, when I see certain bards, (far more deserving, I allow,) in very reputable plight, and quite exempted from all participation in the faults of those heroes, who, nevertheless, might be found with little more morality than “The Glaour,” and perhaps—but no—I must admit Childe Harold to be a very repulsive personage; and as to his identity, those who like it must give him whatever "alias" they please.

If, however, it were worth while to remove the impression, it might be of some service to me, that the man who is alike the delight of his readers and his friends, the poet of all circles, and the idol of his own, permits me here and elsewhere to subscribe myself,

Most truly,
And affectionately,
His obedient servant,

January 2, 1814.

BYRON.

CANTO I.

"O'er the glad waters of the dark blue sea,
Our thoughts as boundless, and our souls as free,
Far as the breeze can bear, the billows foam,
Survey our empire, and behold our home!
These are our realms, no limits to their sway—
Our flag the sceptre all who meet obey.
Ours the wild life in tumult still to range,
From toil to rest, and joy in every change.
Oh, whose can tell! not thou, luxurious slave!
Whose soul would sicken o'er the soothing wave:
Not thou, vain lord of wantonness and ease!
Whom slumber soothes not, pleasure cannot please—
Oh, who can tell, save he whose heart hath tried,
And danced in triumph o'er the waters wide.
The exulting sense—the pulse's maddening play,
That thrills the wanderer of that trackless way?
That for itself can woo the approaching fight,
And turn what some deem danger to delight;
Not seeks what cravens shun with more than zeal,
And where the feebler faith—can only feel—
Feel—to the rising bosom's inmost core,
Its hope awakened and its spirits soar?
No dread of death—if with us die our foes—
Save that it seems even duller than repose:
Come when it will—we snatch the life of life—
When lost—what recks it—by disease or strife?
Let him who crawls enans'm o'decay
Cling to his couch, and sicken years away;
Heave his thick breath, and shake his palsied head;
Ours—the fresh turf, and not the feverish bed.
While gasp by gasp he falters forth his soul,
Ours with one pang—one bound—escapes control.
His corse may boast its urn and narrow cave,
And they who loathed his life may gild his grave:
Ours are the tears, though few, sincerely shed,
When ocean shrouds and sepulchres our dead.
For us, even banquets fond regret supply
In the red cup that crowns our memory;
And the brief epitaph in danger's day,
When those who win at length divide the prey,
And cry, remembrance saddening o'er each brow,
How had the brave who fell exulted now!"

II.

Such were the notes that from the pirate's isle
Around the kindling watch-fire rang the while;
Such were the sounds that thrill'd the rocks along;
And unto ears as rugg'd seem'd a song!
In scatter'd groups upon the golden sand,
They game—carouse—converse—or what the brand
Select the arms—to each his blade assign,
And careless eye the blood that dims its shine;
Repair the boat, replace the helm or oar,
While others straggling muse along the shore.

For the wild bird the busy spriggis set,
Or spread beneath the sun the dripping net;
Gaze where some distant sail a speck supplies,
With all the thristing eye of enterprize;
Tell o'er the tales of many a night of toll,
And marvel where they next shall seize a spoil:
No matter where—their chief's allotment this;
Theirs, to believe no prey nor plan amiss.

But who that Chief?—his name on every shore
Is famed and fear'd—th' they ask and know no more.
With these he mingles not but to command;
Few are his words, but keen his eye and hand.
Ne'er seasons he with mirth their jovial mess,
But they forgive his silence for success.
Ne'er for his lip the purpling cup of fay fell,
That goblet passes him untasted still—
And for his face—the rudest of his crew
Would that, in turn, have pass'd untasted too.
Earth's coarsest bread, the garden's homeliest roots
And scarce the summer luxury of fruits,
His short repast in humbliness supply
With all a hermit's board would scarce deny.
But while he shuns the grosser joys of sense,
His mind seems nourish'd by that abstinence.

"Steer to that shore!"—they say. "Do thus!—"
'tis done:
"Now form and follow me!"—the spell is won
Thus prompt his accents and his act no still
And all obey and few inquire his will;
To such, brief answer and contemplous eye
Convey reproof, nor further deign reply.

III.

"A sail!—a sail!"—a promised prize to hope;
Her nation—flag—how speaks the telescope?
No prize, alas!—but yet a welcome sail;
The blood-red signal glitters in the gale.
Yes—she is ours—a home-returning bark
Blow fair, thou breeze!—she anchors ere the dark
Already doubled is the cape—our bay
Receives that prow which proudly spurns the spray
How gloriously her gallant course she goes!
Her white wings flying—never from her foes—
She walks the waters like a thing of life,
And seems to dare the elements to strike.
Who would not brave the battle-fire—the wreck—
To move the monarch of her peopled deck?

IV.

Hoarse o'er her side the rustling cable rings;
The sails are furl'd; and anchoring round she swings
And gathering loiterers on the land discern
Her boat descending from the latticed stern.
"Tis man's!—the oars keep concert to the strand
Till grates her keel upon the shallow sand.
Hail to the welcome shout!—the friendly speech!
When hand grasps hand uniting on the beach;
The smile, the question, and the quick reply,
And the heart's promise of festivity!
THE CORSAIR.

V.
The tidings spread, and gathering grows the crowd;
The hum of voices, and the laughter loud,
And woman's gentler anxious tone is heard—
Friends,—husbands,—lovers' names in each dear word:
"Oh! are they safe? we ask not of success—
But shall we see them? will their accents bless?
From where the battle roars—"the bilows chase—
They doubtless boldly did—but who are safe?
Here let them haste to gladden and surprise,
And kiss the doubt from these delighted eyes."

VI.
"Where is our chief? for him we bear report—
And doubt that joy—which hails our coming—short;
Yet thus sincere—'tis cheering, though so brief;
But, Juan! instant guide us to our chief:
Our greeting paid, we'll feast on our return,
And all shall hear what each may wish to learn."
Ascending slowly by the rock-hewn way,
To where his watch-tower beetles o'er the bay,
Bushy brake, and wild flowers blossoming,
And freshness breathing from each silver spring,
Whose scatter'd streams from granite basins burst,
Leap into life, and sparkling woo your thirst;
From crash to cliff they mount—Near yonder cave,
What lonely straggler looks along the wave?
In pensive posture leaning on the brand,
Not oft a resting-staff to that red hand?
'Tis he—'tis Conrad—here—as wont—alone;
On—Juan!—and make our purpose known.
The bark he views—and tell him we would greet
His ear with tidings he must quickly meet:
We dare not yet approach—thou knowest his mood,
When strange or uninvited steps intrude."

VII.
Him Juan sought, and told of their intent—
He spake not—but a sign express'd assent.
These Juan calls—they come—to their salute
He bends him slightly, but his lips are mute.
"These letters, Chief, are from the Greek—
The spy
Who still proclaims our spoil or peril nigh:
What'er his tidings we can well report,
Much that—'Peace, peace!'—he cuts their prating short.
Wondering they turn, abashed, while each to each
Confide whispers in his muttering speech:
They watch his glance with many a stealing look,
To gather how that eye the tidings took;
But, this as if he guess'd, with head aside,
Perchance from some emotion, doubt, or pride,
He read the scroll—"My tablets, Juan, hark—
Where is Gonsalvo?"

"In the anchor'd bark."

"There let him stay—to him this order bear—
Back to your duty—for my course prepare:
Myself this enterprise to-night will share."

"To night, Lord Conrad?"

"Ay! at set of sun:
The breeze will freshen when the day is done.
My cloak—cloak—one hour—and we are gone.
Sling on thy haggle—see that free from rust
My carbine—lock springs worthy of my trust;
Be the edge sharpen'd of my boarding brand,
And give its guard more room to fit my hand.

This let the Arm'er with speed dispose;
Last time, it more fatigued my arm than foes.
Mark that the signal-gun be duly fired,
To tell us when the hour of stay's expired."

VIII.
They make obeisance, and retire in haste,
Too soon to seek again the watery waste:
Yet they repine—not—so that Conrad guides,
And who dare question aught that he decides?
That man of loneliness and mystery,
Scarce seen to smile, and seldom heard to sign;
Whose name appals the fiercest of his crew,
And tints each swarthy cheek with sallow hue;
Still sways their souls with that commanding art
That dazzles, leads, yet chills the vulgar heart.
What is that spell, that thus his lawless train
Confess and envy, yet oppose in vain?
What should it be, that thus their fate can bind?
The power of Thought—the magic of the Mind!
Link'd with success, assumed and kept with skill,
That moulds another's weakness to its will;
Wields with their hands, but, still to these unknown
Makes even their mightiest deeds appear his own.
Such hath it been—shall be—beneath the sun,
The many still must labor for the one!
'Tis Nature's doom—but let the wretch who toils
Accuse not, hate not him who wears the spoils.
Oh! if he knew the weight of splendid chains,
How light the balance of his humbler pains!

IX.
Unlike the heroes of each ancient race,
Demons in act, but Gods at least in face,
In Conrad's form seems little to admire,
Though his dark eyebrow shades a glance of fire:
Robust but not Herenclean—to the sight
No giant frame sets forth his common height;
Yet, in the whole, who paused to look again,
Saw more than marks the crowd of vulgar men:
They gaze and marvel how—and still they gaze
That thus it is, but why they cannot guess.
Sunburnt his cheek, his forehead high and pale
The sable curls in wild profusion veil;
And oft perform his rising lip reveals
The haughtier thought it curbs, but scarce conceals
Though smooth his voice, and calm his general mien.
Still seems there something he would not have seen
His features' deepening lines and varying hue.
At times attracted, yet perplex'd the view,
As if within that munkiness of mind
Work'd feelings fearful, and yet undefined;
Such might it be—that none could truly tell—
Too close inquiry his stern glance would quell.
There breathe but few whose aspect might defy
The full encounter of his searching eye:
He had the skill, when Cunning's gaze would seem
To probe his heart and watch his changing cheek.
At once the observer's purpose to espy,
And on himself roll back his scrutiny,
Lest he to Conrad rather should betray
Some secret thought, than drag that chief's to day
There was a laughing Devil in his sner.
That raised emotions both of rage and tear;
And where his frown of hatred darkly fell,
Hope withering fled—and Mercy sigh'd farewell.

X.
Slight are the outward signs of evil thought,
Within—with-in—'twas there the spirit wrought:
Love shows all changes—Rage, Ambition, Guile,
Betray no further than the bitter smile;
The lip's least curl, the lightest paleness thrown
Along the govern'd aspect, speak alone
Of devoir passions; and to judge their mien,
He who would know must himself unseen.
Then—with the hurried tread, the upward eye,
The clenched hand, the pause of agony,
That listens, starting, lest the step too near Approach intrusive on that mood of fear:
Then—with each feature working from the heart,
With feelings loosed to strengthen—not depart:
That rise—converse—content—that freeze, or glow,
Flush in the check, or damp upon the brow;
Then—Stranger! if thou canst, and tremblest not,
Behold his soul—the rest that soothes his lot!
Mark—how that lone and blighted boomsears
The scathing thought of excrated years!
Behold—but who hath seen, or c'er shall see,
Man as himself—the secret spirit free?

XII.

None are all evil—quickening round his heart,
One softer feeling would not yet depart;
Oft could he sneer at others as beguiled
By passions—thirty of a fool or child;
Yet 'gainst this passion vainly still he strove,
And even in it asks the name of Love!
Yes, it was love—unchangeable—unchanged,
Felt but for one from whom he never ranged;
Though fairest captives daily met his eye,
He shunn'd nor sought, but coldly pass'd them by;

Though many a beauty droop'd in prison'd bowers
None ever soothed his most unguarded hour.
Yes—it was Love—if thoughts of tenderness,
Tried in temptation, strengthened by distress,
Unmoved by absence, firm in every clime,
And yet—Oh more than all—I—untired by time;
Which nor defeated hope, nor baffled will,
Could render sullen were she near to smile,
Nor rage could fire, nor sickness fret to vent
On her one murmur of his discontent;
Which still would meet with joy, with calmness part
Lest that his look of grief should reach her heart;
Which nought removed, nor menaced to remove—
If there be love in mortals—this was love!
He was a villain—ay—reproaches shower
On him—but not the passion, nor its power,
Which only proved, all other virtues gone,
Not guilt itself could quench this love, best one!

XIII.

He paused a moment—till his hastening men
Pass'd the first winding downward to the glen.
"Strange tidings!—many a peril have I past,
Nor know I why this next appears the last!
Yet so my heart forebodes, but must not fear,
Nor shall my followers find me falter here.
'Tis rash to meet, but surer death to wait
Till here they hunt us to unthought fate;
And, if my plan but hold, and Fortune smile,
We'll furnish mourners for our funeral-plie.
Ay—let them shudder—peaceful be their dreams!
Morn ne'er awoke them with such brilliant beams
As kindle high to-night (but low, thou breeze!) To warm these slow avengers of the seas.
Now to Medora—Oh! my sinking heart,
Long may her own be lighter than thou art!
Yet was I brave—mean boast where all are brave! Ev'n insects sting for aught they seek to save.
This common courage which with brutes we share
That owes its deadliest efforts to despair,
Small merit claims—but 'twas my nobler hope
To teach my few with numbers still to copse;
Long have I led them—not to vainly bleed:
No medium now—we perish or succeed!
So let me—let it irks not me to die,
But thus to urge them whence they cannot fly.
My lot hath long had little of my care
But chases my pride thus baffled in the snare.
Is this my skill? my craft? to set at last
Hope, power, and life upon a single cast? Oh, Fate!—accuse thy folly, not thy fate—
She may redeem thee still—nor yet too late."

XIV.

Thus with himself communion held he till
He reach'd the summit of his tower-crown'd hill
There at the portal paused—for wild and soft
He heard those accents never heard too oft;
Through the high lattice far yet sweet they rang
And these the notes his bird of beauty sung:

1.

"Deep in my soul that tender secret dwells,
Lonely and lost to light for evermore,
Save when to thine my heart responsive swells,
Then trembles into silence as before.
THE CORSAR.

2.
"There in its centre, a sepulchral lamp
Burns the slow flame, eternal—but unseen;
Which not the darkness of despair can damp,
Though vain its ray as it had never been.

3.
"Remember me—Oh! pass not thy grave
Without one thought whose relics there recline.
The only pang my bosom dare not brave
Must be to find forgetfulness in thine.

4.
"My fondest—faintest—lATEST accents near—
Grief for the dead not Virtue can reprove.
Then give me all I ever ask'd—a tear.
The first—last—sole reward of so much love!"

He pass'd the portal—cross'd the corridor,
And reach'd the chamber as the strain gave o'er;
"My own Medora! sure thy song is sad—"

In Conrad's absence wouldst thou have it glad?
Without thine ear to listen to my lay,
Still must my song my thoughts, my soul betray:
Still must each accent to my bosom suit.
My heart unhush'd—although my lips were mute!
Oh! many a night on this lone couch reclined,
My dreaming fear with storms hath wing'd the wind,
And deem'd the breath that faintly seem'd thy sail
The murmuring prattle of the ruder gale;
Though soft, it seem'd the low prophetic dirge,
That morn'd thee floating on the savage surge;
Still would I rise to rouse the beacon fire,
Lest spies less true should let the blaze expire;
And many a restless hour outwatch'd each star,
And morning came—still thou wert afar.
Oh! how the chill blast on my bosom blew,
And day broke dreary on my troubled view,
And still I gazed and gazed—and not a prow
Was granted to my tears—my truth—my vow!
At length—'twas noon—I hail'd and bless the mast
That met my sight—it near'd—Alas! it past!
Another came—Oh God! 'twas thine at last!
Would that those days were over! wilt thou ne'er, my Conrad! learn the joys of peace to share?
Sure thou hast more than wealth, and many a home
As bright as this invites us not to roam;
Thou know'st it is not peril that I fear,
I only tremble when thou art not here;
Then not for mine, but that far dearer life,
Which flows from love and languishes for strife—
How strange that heart, to me so tender still,
Should war with nature and its better will!"

Yea, strange indeed—that heart hath long been changed;
Worm-like 'twas trembling—adder-like avenged,
Without one hope on earth beyond thy love,
And scarce a glimpse of mercy from above.
Yet the same feeling which thou dost condemn,
My very love to thee is hate to them,
So closely mingling here, that disentwined
I cease to love thee when I love mankind:
Yet dread not this—the proof of all the past
Assures the future that my love will last;
But—Oh, Medora! nerve thy gentle heart,
This hour again—but not for long—we part."

She rose—she sprung—she clung to his embrace.
To his heart heaved beneath her hidden face.
He dared not raise to his that deep-blue eye,
Which downcast droop'd in tearless agony.
Her long fair hair lay floating o'er his bosom,
In all the wildness of dishevell'd charms;
Scarce beat that bosom where his image dwelt
So full—that feeling seem'd almost unfelt!
Hark—peals the thunder of the signal-gun!

It told 'twas sunset—and he cursed that sun.
Again—again—that form he madly press'd,
Which mutually clasp'd, imploringly caress'd;
And tottering to the couch his bride he bore,
One moment gazed—as if to gaze no more;
Felt—that for him eath held but her alone,
Kiss'd her cold forehead—turn'd—is Conrad gone?

XV.

"And is he gone?"—on sudden solitude
How oft that fearful question will intrude!
"Twas but an instant past—and here he stood!
And now"—without the portal's porch she rush'd,
And then at length her tears in freedom gush'd;
Big—bright—and fast, unknown to her they fell;
But still her lips refused to send—"Farewell!"
For in that word—that fatal word—how'er
We promise—hope—believe—there breathes despair.
O'er every feature of that still, pale face,
Had sorrow fix'd what time can never erase:
The tender blue of that large loving eye
Grew frozen with its gaze on vacancy,
Till—Oh, how far!—it caught a glimpse of him,
And then it flow'd—and frenzied seem'd to swim
Through those long, dark, and glistening lashes dews'd
With drops of sadness oft to be renew'd.
"He's gone!"—against her heart that hand is driven,
Convulsed and quick—then gently raised to heaven;
She look'd and saw the heaving of the main;
The white sail set—the dared not look again;
But turn'd with sickening soul within the gate—
"It is no dream—and I am desolate!"

XVI.

From crag to crag descending—swiftly sped
Stern Conrad down, nor once he turn'd his head;
But shrunk where'er the windings of his way
 Forced on his eye what he would not survey,
His lone, but lovely dwelling on the steep,
That hail'd him first when homeward from the deep:
And she—the dim and melancholy star,
Whose ray of beauty reach'd him from afar,
On her he must not gaze, he must not think,
There he might rest—but on Destruction's brink;
Yet, once almost he stopp'd—and nearly gave
His fate to chance, his projects to the wave;
But no—it must not be—a worthy chief
May melt, but not betray to woman's grief.
He sees his bark, he notes how fair the wind,
And sternly gathers all his might of mind;
Again he hurries on—and as he hears
The clang of tumult vibrate on his ears,
The busy sounds, the bustle of the shore,
The shout, the signal, and the dashing car,
As marks his eye the seaboys on the mast,
The anchors rise, the sails unfurling fast,
The waving kerciefs of the crowd that urge
That mute adieu to those who stem the surge;
And more than all, his blood-red flag aloft,
He marvells how his heart could seem so soft.
Fire in his glance, and wildness in his breast,
He feels of all his former self posses't.
He bounds—he flies—until his footsteps reach
The rock, which, win'd by the cliff, borer the beach,
There checks his speed; but pauses less to breathe
The breezy freshness of the deep beneath,

Then there his wonted statelier step renew;
Nor rush, disturb'd by haste, to vulgar view:
For well had Conrad learn'd to curb the crowd,
By arts that veil, and oft preserve the proud;
His was the lofty port, the distant mien,
That seems to shun the sight—and awes if seen
The solemn aspect, and the high-born eye,
That checks low mirth, but lacks not courtesy;
All these he wielded to command assent:
But where he wish'd to win, so well unbent,
That kindness cancel'll fear in those who hears.
And others' gifts show'd men mean beside his word,
When echo'd to the heart as from his own
His deep yet tender melody of tone:
But such was foreign to his wonted mood,
He cared not what he soft'en'd, but subdued;
The evil passions of his youth had made
Him value less who loved—than what obey'd.

XVII.

Around him mustering ranged his ready guard,
Before him Juan stands—"Are all prepared?
"They are—nay more—embark'd: the latest boat Waits but my chief—"

"My sword, and my capote
Soon firmly girded on, and lightly slung,
His belt and cloak were o'er his shoulders flung:
"Call Pedro here! He comes—and Conrad bends
With all the courtesy he deign'd his friends;
Receive these tablets, and peruse with care,
Words of high trust and truth are graven there;
Double the guard, and when Anselmo's bark
Arrives, let him alike these orders mark:
In three days (serve the breeze) the sun shall shine
On our return—till then all peace be thine!"
This said, his brother Pirate's hand he wrung.
Then to his boat with haughty gesture spurg,
 Flash'd the dipt ears, and sparkling with the stroke,
 Around the waves' phosphoric brightness broke;
 They gain the vessel—on the deck he stands,
 Shrieks the shrill whistle—ply the busy hands—
 He marks how well the ship her helm obeys,
 How gallant all her crew—and deigns to praise.
His eyes of pride to young Gonsalvo turn—
 Why doth he start, and inly seem to mourn?
Ah! those eyes beheld his rocky tower,
And live a moment o'er the parting hour;
She—his Medora—did she mark the prow?
Ah! never loved he half so much as now!
But much must yet be done ere dawn of day—
Again he mans himself and turns away;
Down to the cabin with Gonsalvo bends,
And there unrolls his plan—his means—and ends;
Before them burns the lamp, and spreads the chart
And all that speaks and aids the naval art;
They to the midnight watch protract debate;
To anxious eyes what hour is ever late?
Meantime, the steady breeze serenely blew,
And fast and falcon-like the vessel flew;
Pass'd the high headlands of each clustering isle,
To gain their port—long—long ere morning smile:
And soon the night-glass through the narrow bay
Discovers where the Pacha's galleys lay.
Count they each sail—and mark how they supine
The lights in vain after endless Moslem shine.
Secure, unnoted, Conrad's prov'd by,
And anci-ord where his ambush meant to lie;
Bows his bent head—his hand salutes the floor
Ere yet his tongue the trusted tidings bore:
"A captive Dervise, from the pirate's nest
Escaped, is here—himself would tell the rest"
He took the sign from Seyd's asserning eye,
And led the holy man in silence nigh.
His arms were folded on his dark-green vest,
His step was feeble, and his look deprest;
Yet worn he seemed'd of hardship more than years,
And pale his cheek with penance, not from fears.
Vow'd to his God—his sable locks he wore,
And these his lofty cap rose proudly o'er:
Around his form his loose long robe was thrown,
And wrapt a breast bestow'd on heaven alone;
Submitive, yet with self-possession mann'd;
He calmly met the curious eyes that scan'd; And question of his coming fain would seek,
Before the Pacha's will allow'd to speak.

IV.
"Whence com'st thou, Dervise?"
"From the outlaw's den,
A fugitive—"
"Thy capture where and when?"
"From Scalanovo's port to Scio's isle,
The Saïck was bound; but Alla did not smile
Upon our course—the Moslem merchant's gains
The Rovers won: our limbs have worn their chains.
I had no death to fear, nor wealth to boast,
Beyond the wandering freedom which I lost:
At length a fisher's humble boat by night
Afforded hope, and offer'd chance of flight:
I seized the hour and find my safety here—
With thee—most mighty Pacha! who can fear?"
"How speed the outlaws? stand they well prepared
Their plunder'd wealth, and robber's rock, to guard?
Dream they of this our preparation, doom'd
To view with fire their scorpion nest consumed?
"Pacha! the fetter'd captive's mourning eye,
That weeps for flight, but ill can play the spy;
I only heard the reckless waters roar,
Those waves that would not bear me from the shore
I only mark'd the glorious sun and sky,
Too bright—too blue—for my captivity;
And felt—that all which Freedom's bosom cheers
Must break my chain before it dried my tears.
This may'st thou judge, at least, from my escape,
They little deem of aught in peril's shape;
Else vainly had I pray'd or sought the chance
That leads me here—if eyed with vigilance:
The careless guard that did not see me fly
May watch as idly when thy power is nigh.
Pacha!—my limbs are faint—and nature craves
Food for my hunger, rest from toasting waves:
Permit my absence—peace be with thee! Peace
With all around!—now grant repose—release."
"Stay, Dervise! I have more to question—stay,
I do command thee—sit—dost hear?—obey!
More I must ask, and food the slaves shall bring:
Thou shalt not pine where all are banqueting:
The supper done—prepare thee to reply,
Clearly and full—I love not mystery."
"Twere vain to guess what shook the pious man,
Who look'd not lovingly on that Divan;
Nor show'd high relish for the banquet's feast
And less respect for every fellow guest.
Twas but a moment's peevish hectic past
Along his cheek, and tranquilized as fast:
He sate him down in silence, and his look
Resumed the calmness which before forsook:
The feast was usher'd in—but sumptuous fare
He shunn'd as if some poison mingled there.
For one so long condemn'd to toil and fast,
Methinks he strangely spares the rich repast.

"What ails thee, Dervise? eat—dost thou suppose
This feast a Christian's? of my friends thy foes?
Why dost thou shun the salt? that sacred pledge,
Which, once partaken, blunts the saber's edge,
Makes even contending tribes in peace unite,
And hated hosts seem brethren to the sight!"

"Salt seasons daunties—and my food is still
The humblest root, my drink the simplest rill;
And my stern vow and order's laws oppose
To break or mingle bread with friends or foes;
It may seem strange—'tis true I might dread,
That peril rests upon my single head;
But for thy sway—nay more—thy Sultan's throne,
I taste nor bread nor banquet—save alone;
Infringed our order's rule, the Prophet's rage
To Mecca's dome might bar my pilgrimage."

"Well—as thou wilt—ascetic as thou art—
One question answer; then in peace depart.
How many?—Ha! it cannot sure be day?
What star—what sun is bursting on the bay?
It shines a lake of fire!—away—away!
Ho! treachery! my guards! my scimitar!
The galleys feed the flames—and I afar!
Accursed Dervise! these thy tidings—thou
Some villain spy—seize—seize him—slay him now!"

Up rose the Dervise with that burst of light,
Nor less his change of form appall'd the sight:
Up rose the Dervise—not in saintly garb,
But like a warrior bounding on his Barb,
Dash'd his high cap, and tore his robe away—
Shone his mail'd breast, and flash'd his saber's ray!
His close but glittering casque, and sable plume,
Mcre glittering eye, and black brow's sabler gloom.
Glared on the Moslems' eyes some Afris sprite,
Whose demon death-blow left no hope for flight.
The wild confusion, and the swarthy glow
Of flames on high and torches from below;
The shriek of terror, and the mingling yel—
For swords began to clash, and shouts to swell,
Plung o'er that spot of earth the air of hell!
Distracted, to and fro, the flying slaves
Behold but bloody shore and fiery waves;
Neath heeded they the Pacha's angry cry,
They seize that Dervise!—seize on Zatana! &
He saw their terror—check'd the first despair
That urged him but to stand and perish there,
Since far too early and too well they'd
The flame was kindled ere the signal made;
He saw their terror—from his baldric drew
His bugle—brie the blast—but shrilly blow;
'Tis answer'd—"well ye speed, my gallant crew!"
Why did I doubt their quickness of career?
And deem design b'hv left me single here?"

Sweeps his long arm—that saber's whirling sway
Sheds fast atonement for its first delay;
Completes his fury, what their fear begun,
And makes the many basely quail to one.

The cloven turbans o'er the chamber spread,
And scarce an arm dare raise to guard its head:
Even Seyd, convulsed, o'erwhelm'd, with rage, sur prise,
Retreats before him, though he still defies.
No craven he—and yet he dreads the blow,
So much Confusion magnifies his foe!
His blazing galleys still distract his sight,
He tore his beard, and foaming fled the fight;
For now the pirates pass'd the Haram gate,
And burst within—and it were death to wait;
Where wild Amazement shrieking—kneeling throws
The sword aside—in vain—the blood overflows;
The Corsairs pouring, haste to where within.
Invited Conrad's bugle, and the din
Of groaning victims, and wild cries for life,
Proclaim'd how well he did the work of strife.
They shout to find him grim and lonely there,
A glutted tiger mangling in his hair!
But short their greeting—shorter his reply—
"Tis well—but Seyd escapes—and he must die;
Much hath been done—but more remains to do—
Their galleys blaze—why not their city too?"
And flame for flame and blood for blood must tell
The tide of triumphs ebb that flow'd too well—
When wrath returns to renovated strife,
And those who fought for conquest strike for life.
Conrad beheld the danger—he beheld
His followers faint by freshening foes repell'd:
"One effort—one—to break the circling host!"
"They form—unite—charge—waver—all is lost!"
Within a narrower ring compress'd, beset,
Hopeless, not heartless, strive and struggle yet—
Ah! now they fight in earnest file no more,
Hemm'd to—cut off—left down—and trampled o'er;
But each strikes singly, silently, and home,
And sinks outwielded rather than o'ercome,
His last faint quittance rendering with his breath,
Till the blade glimmers in the grasp of death!

VII.

But first, ere came the rallying host to blows,
And rank to rank, and hand to hand oppose,
Guincar and all her Harem handmaids freed,
Safe in the dome of one who held their creed,
By Conrad's mandate safely were bestow'd,
And dried those tears for life and fame that flow'd:
And when that dark-eyed lady, young Guinair,
Recall'd those thoughts late wandering in despair,
Much did she marvel o'er the courtesy
That smooth'd his accents; soften'd in his eye:
'Twas strange—that robber thus with gore bedew'd,
Seem'd gentler then than Seyd in fondest mood.
The Pacha would as if he deem'd the slave
Must seem delighted with the heart he gave;
The Corsair vow'd protection, soothed a while,
As if his homage were a woman's right.
"The wish is wrong—nay, worse for female—vain:
Yet much I long to view that chief again;
If but to thank for, what my fear forgot,
The life—my loving lord remember'd not!"

VIII.

And him she saw, where thickest carnage spread,
Eat gather'd breathing from the happier dead.
Far from his band, and battling with a host
That deem right dearly won the field he lost,
Fell—bleeding—baffled of the death he sought,
And snatch'd to expiate all the ills he wrought;
Preserved to linger and to live in vain,
While Vengeance ponder'd o'er new plans of pain,
And stalk'd the blood she saves to shed again—
But stop by stop, for Seyd's unglutted eye
Would doom him ever dying—ne'er to die!
Can this be he? triumphant late she saw,
When his red hand's wild gesture waved, a law!
Tis he indeed—disarm'd but underpress'd,
His sole regret the life he still possess'd;
His wounds too slight, though taken with that will,
Which would have kiss'd the hand that then could kill.
Or were there none, of all the many given,
To send his soul—he scarcely ask'd to heaven?
Must he alone of all retain his breath,
Who more than all had striven and stricken for death?
He deeply felt—what mortal hearts must feel,
When thus reversed on faithless fortune's wheel,
Vor crimes committed, and the victor's threat
Of lingering tortures to repay the debt—
He deeply, darkly felt; but evil pride
That led to perpetrate—now serves to hide.

Still in his stern and self-collected mien
A conqueror's more than captive's is seen,
Though faint with wasting toil and stiffening wound
But few that saw—so calmly gazed around:
Though the far shouting of the distant crowd.
Their tremors o'er, rose insolently loud,
The better warriors who beheld him near,
Insulted not the foe who taught them fear;
And the grim guards that to his durance led,
In silence eyed him with a secret dread.

IX.

The Leech was sent—but not in mercy—there.
To note how much the life yet left could bear.
He found enough to load with heaviest chain,
And promise feeling for the wrench of pain:
To-morrow—yea—to-morrow's evening sun
Will sinking see impalement's pangs begun,
And rising with the wonted blush of morn.
Behold how well or ill those pangs are borne.
Of torments this the longest and the worst,
Which adds all other agony to thirst.
That day by day death still forbears to speak,
While famished vultures flit around the stake.
"Oh! water—water!"—smiling Hafe denies
The victim's prayer—for if he drinks—he dies.
This was his doom—the Leech, the guard, were gone,
And left proud Conrad fetter'd and alone.

X.

'Twere vain to paint to what his feelings grew—
It even were doubtful if their victim knew.
There is a war, a chaos of the mind,
When all its elements convuls'd—combined—
Lie dark and jarring with perturbed force,
And gnashing with impetuous Remorse;
That juggling fiend—who never spake before—
But cries "I warn'd thee!" when the deed is o'er.
Vain voice! the spirit burning but unbent,
May writhes—rebel—the weak alone repent!
Even in that lonely hour whenmost it feels, And, to itself, all—all that self reveals,
No single passion, and no ruling thought
That leaves the rest at once unseen, unsought;
But the wild prospect when the soul reviews—
All rushing through their thousand avenues,
Ambition's dreams expiring, love's regret,
Endanger'd glory, life itself beset;
The joy untasted, the contempt or hate
'Gainst those who fain would triumph in our fate,
The hopeless past, the hasting future driven
Too quickly on to guess if hell or heaven;
Deeds, thoughts, and words, perhaps remember'd not So keenly till that hour, but ne'er forgot;
Things light or lovely in their actued time,
But now to stern refection each a crime;
The withering sense of evil unreveald,
Not cankering less because the more conceal'd
All, in a word, from which all eyes must start,
That opening sepulchre—the naked heart
Bares with its buried woes, till Pride awake,
To snatch the mirror from the soul—and break
Ay—Pride can veil, and Courage brave it all,
All—all—before—beyond—the deadliest fall.
Each hath some fear, and he who least betrays,
The only hypocrite deserving praise:
Not the loud recreant wretch who boasts and sings
But he who looks on death—and silent dies
So steel'd by pondering o'er his far career,
He half-way meets him should he menace near!

IXI.

In the high chamber of his highest tower
Sate Conrad, fetter'd in the Pacha's power.
His palace perish'd in the flame—this fort
Contain'd at once his captive and his court.
Not much could Conrad of his sentence blame,
His foe, if vanquish'd, had but shared the same—
Alone he was—in solitude had scannd him
His guilty bosom, but that breast he mannd:
One thought alone he could not—dared not meet—
"Oh, how these tidings will Medora greet?"
Then—only then—his clanking hands he raised,
And strain'd with rage the chain on which he gazed;
But soon he found—or feign'd—of dream'd relief,
And smiled in self-derision of his grief,
"And now come torture when it will—r may,
More need of rest to nerve me for the day!"
This said, with languor to his mat he slept,
And, whatsoever his visions, quickly slept.
'Twas hardly midnight when that fray begun,
For Conrad's plans matured, at one wrest were done;
And Havoc loathes so much the waste of time,
She scarce had left an uncommitted crime.
One hour beheld him since the tide he stemnd—
Digniz'd—discover'd—conquering—isaen—condemnd—
A chief on land—an outlaw on the deep—
Destroying—saving—prison'd—andsleep!

XII.

He slept in calmest seeming—for his breath
Was hush'd so deep—Ah! happy if in death!
He slept—Who o'er his placid slumber bends?
His foes are gone—and here he hath no friends:
Is it some seraph sent to grant him grace?
No, 'tis an earthly form with heavenly face!
Its white arm raised a lamp—yet gently hid,
Lost the ray flash abruptly on the lid.
Of that closed eye, which opens but to pain,
And once unclos'd—but once may close again.
That form, with eye so dark, and cheek so fair,
And aurubn wavy of gem'd and braided hair;
With shape of fairy lightness—naked foot,
That shines like snow, and falls on earth as mute—
Through guards and dunnest night how came it there?
Ah! rather ask what will not woman dare?
Whom youth and pity lead like thee, Gulnare!
She could not sleep—and while the Pacha's rest
In muttering dreams yet saw his pirate-guest,
She left his side—his signet-ring she bore,
Which oft in sport adorn'd her hand before—
And with it, scarcely question'd, won her way
Through drowsy guards that must that sign obey.
Worn out with toil, and tired with charging blows,
Their eyes had envied Conrad his repose;
And chill and nodding at the turret door,
They stretch their listless limbs, and watch no more:
Just raised their heads to hall the signet-ring,
Nor ask or what or who the sign may bring.

XIII.

She gazed in wonder, "Can he calmly sleep,
While other eyes his fall or ravage weep?
And mine in restlessness are wandering here—
What sudden spell hath made this man so dear?
True—tis to him my life, and more, I owe,
And me and mine he spared from worse than wo
'Tis late to think—but soft—his slumber breaks—
How heavily he sighs!—he starts—awakes!"
He raised his head—and dazzled with the light,
His eye seem'd dubious if it saw aright:
He moved his hand—the grating of his chain
Too harshly told him that he lived again.
"What is that form? if not a shape of air,
Methinks, my jailor's face shows wondrous fair!"
"Pirate! thou know'st me not—but I am one,
Grateful for deeds thou hast too rarely done,
Look on me—and remember her, thy hand
Snatch'd from the flames, and thy more fearful hand
I come through darkness—and I scarce know why
Yet not to hurt—would not see thee die.
"If so kind lady! thine the only eye
That would not here in that gay hope delight;
Thiers is the chance—and let them use their right.
But still I thank their courtesy or shine,
That would confess me at so fair a shrine!
Strange though it seem—yet with extremest grief
Is link'd a mirth—it doth not bring relief—
That playfulness of Sorrow ne'er beguiles,
And smiles in bitterness—yet still it smiles;
And sometimes with the wisest and the best,
Till even the scaffold he echoes with their jest!
Yet not the joy to which it seems akin—
It may deceive all hearts, save that within.
What'er it was that flash'd on Conrad, now
A laughing wildness half unbent his brow:
And these his accents had a sound of mirth,
As if the last he could enjoy on earth;
Yet 'gainst his nature—for through that short life,
Few thoughts had he to spare from gloom and strife.

XIV.

"Corsair! thy name is doomed—but I have power
To sooth the Pacha in his weaker hour.
Thee would I spare—nay more—would save thee now,
But this—time—hope—nor even thy strength allow
But all I can, I will: at least delay
The sentence that remits thee scarce a day.
More now were ruin—even thyself were lost
The vain attempt should bring but doom to both."
"Yes!—loth indeed:—my soul is nerved to all,
Or fall'n too low to fear a further fall:
Tempt not thyself with peril; me with hope
Of flight from foes with whom I could not cope:
Unfit to vanquish—shall I meanly fly,
The one of all my band that would not die?
Yet there is one—to whom my memory clings,
Till to these eyes her own wild softness sprays.
My sole resources in the path I trod
Were these—my bark—my sword—my love—my God!
The last I left in youth—he leaves me now—
And man but works his will to lay me low,
I have no thought to mock his throne with prayer;
Wrung from the coward crouching of despair;
It is enough—I breathe—and I can bear.
My sword is shaken from the worthless hand
That might have better kept so true a brand.
"THE QUEEN OF NIGHT ASSERTS HER SOLEMN REIGN." — Page 145.
THE CORSAIR.

My bark is sunk or captive—but my love—
For her in sooth my voice would mount above:
Oh! she is all that still to earth can bind—
And this will break a heart so more than kind,
And blight a form—till thine, appear’d, Guhnam!
Mine eye ne’er ask’d if others were as fair."

"Thou lovest another then?—but what to me
Is this—’tis nothing—nothing e’er can be:
But yest—thou lovest—and Oh! I envy those:
Whose hearts on hearts as faithful can repose
Who never feel the void—the wandering thought
That sighs o’er visions such as mine hath wrought."

"Lady—methought thy love was his, for whom
This arm redeem’d thee from a fiery tomb."

"My love stern Seyd’s! Oh—No—No—not my love—
Yet much this heart, that strives no more, once strove
To meet his passion—but it would not be.
I felt—I feel—love dwells with—with the free.
I am a slave, a favor’d slave at best,
To share his splendor, and seem very blest!
Oft must my soul the question undergo,
Of—Dost thou love?—and burn to answer, ‘No!’
Oh! hard it is that fondness to sustain,
And struggle not to feel averse in vain;
But harder still the heart’s recoil to bear,
And hide from one—perhaps another there.
He takes the hand I give not—nor withhold—
Its pulse—’tis check’d—nor quicken’d—calmly cold.
And when resign’d, it drops a lifeless weight
From one I never loved enough to hate.
No warmth these lips return by his impress’d,
And chill’d remembrance shudders o’er the rest.
Yes—had I ever proved that passion’s zeal,
The change to hatred were at least to feel:
But still—he goes unmourn’d—returns unsought—
And oft when present—absent from my thought.
Or when reflection comes—and come it must—
I fear that hencefor’d ‘twill but bring disgust;
I am his slave—but, in despite of pride,
’Twere worse than bondage to become his bride.
Oh! that this doteage of his breast would cease!
Or seek another and give mine release,
But yesterday—I could have said, to peace!
Yes—if unwanted fondness now I feign,
Remember—captivate! ‘tis to break thy chain;
Repay the life that to thy hand I owe;
To give thee back to all endear’d below,
Who share such love as I can never know.
Farewell—morn breaks—and I must now away:
‘Twill cost me dear—but dread no death to-day!”

XV.

She press’d his fetter’d fingers to her heart,
And bow’d her head, and turn’d her to depart,
And noiseless as a lovely dream is gone.
And was she here? and is he now alone?—
What gem hath dropp’d and sparkles o’er his chain?
The tear most sacred, shed for others’ pain,
That starts at once—bright—pure—from Pity’s mine,
Already polish’d by the hand divine!

Oh! too convincing—dangerously dear—
In woman’s eye the unanswerable tear

That weapon of her weakness she can wield,
To save, subdue—at once her spear and shield.
Avoid it—Virtue e’er and Wisdom err,
Too fondly gazing on that grief of hers!
What lost a world, and bade a hero fly?
The timid tear in Cleopatra’s eye,
Yet be the soft triumvir’s fault forgiven,
By this—how many lose not earth—but heaven;
Consign their souls to man’s eternal foe,
And seal their own to spare some wanton’s wo

XVI.

’Tis morn—and o’er his alter’d features play
The beams—without the hope of yesterday.
What shall he be ere night? perchance a thing
O’er which the raven flaps her funeral wing:
By his closed eye, unheeded and unfelt,
While sets that sun, and dews of evening melt,
Chill—wet—and misty round each sti’en’d limb
Refeshing earth—reviving all but him—

CANTO III.

"Come well—enкор non m’abandon.

I.

SLOW sinks, more lovely ere his race be run,
Along Morea’s hills the setting sun;
Not, as in Northern climes, obscurely bright,
But one unclouded blaze of living light!
O’er the hush’d deep the yellow beam he throws
Gilds the green wave, that trembles as it glows
On old Agina’s rock, and Idra’s isle,
The god of gladness sheds his parting smile;
O’er his own regions lingering, loves to shine,
Though there his altars are no more divine;
Descending fast, the mountain shadows kiss
Thy glorious gulf, unconquer’d Salamis!
Their azure arches through the long expanse
More deeply purpled meet his mellowing glance,
And tenderest tints, along their summits driven,
Mark his gay course, and own the hues of heaven;
Till, darkly shaded from the land and deep,
Behind his Delphian cliff he sinks to sleep.
On such an eve, his palest beam he cast,
When—Athens! here thy Wisest look’d his last
How watch’d thy better sons his farewell ray,
That closed their murder’d sage’s latest day!
Not yet—not yet—Sol pauses on the hill—
The precious hour of parting lingers still;
But sad his light to agonizing eyes,
And dark the mountain’s once delightful eyes:
Gloom o’er the lovely land he seem’d to pour,
The land, where Phebus never drown’d before;
But ere he sank below Citheron’s head,
The cup of wo was quaff’d—the spirit fled;
The soul of him who scorn’d to fear or fly—
Who liv’d and died, as none can live or die!

Patro! from high Hymettus to the plain,
The queen of night asserts her silent reign.
No murky vapor, herald of the storm,
Hides her fair face, nor girds her glowing form;
With cornice glimmering as the moonbeams play,
There the white column crests her grateful ray,
And, bright around with quivering beams beset,
Her emblem sparkles o’er the minaret:
The groves of olive scatter’d dark and wide
Where meek Cephisus pours his scanty tide,
The opress saddening by the sacred mosque,
The gleaming turret of the gay Kiosk,
And, even and sombre ‘mid the holy calm,
Near Theseus’ fane you solitary palm,
All tinged with varied hues, arrest the eye—
And dull were his that pass’d them heedless by.
Again the Egeean, heard no more afar,
Lulls his chafed breast from elemental war:
Again his waves in milder tints unfold
Their long array of sapphire and of gold,
Might with the shades of many a distant isle,
That brown,—where gentler ocean seems to smile.

II.
Not now my theme—why turn my thoughts to thee?
Oh! who can look along thy native sea,
Nor dwell upon thy name, whate’er the tale,
So much its magic must o’er all prevail?
Who that beheld that Sun upon thee set,
Fair Athens! could thine evening face forget?
Not he—whose heart nor time nor distance frees,
Spell-bound within the clustering Cyclades!
Nor seems this homage foreign to his strain,
His Corsair’s isle was once thine own domain—
Would that with freedom it were thine again!

III.
The Sun hath sunk—and, darker than the night,
Sinks with its beam upon the beacon height,
Medora’s heart—the third day’s come and gone—
With it he comes not—sends not—faithless one!
The wind was fair though light; and storms were none.
Last eve Anselmo’s bark return’d, and yet—
His only tidings that they had not met!
Though wild, as how, far different were the tale,
Had Conrad waited for that single sail.
The night-breeze freshens—she that day had past
In watching all that Hope proclaim’d a mast;
Sadly she sat—on high—Impatience bore
At last her footsteps to the midnight shore,
And there she wander’d heedless of the spray
That dash’d her garments oft, and warn’d away;
She saw not—felt not this—nor dared depart,
Nor deem’d it cold—her chill was at her heart,
Till grew such certainty from that suspension—
His very Sight had shock’d from life or sense!
It came at last—a sad and shatter’d boat,
Whose inmates first beheld whom first they sought;
Some bleeding—all most wretched—those the few—
Scurse knew they how escaped—this all they knew.
In silence, darkling, each appear’d to wait
His fellow’s mournful guess at Conrad’s fate:
Something they would have said; but seem’d to fear
To trust their accents to Medora’s ear.
She saw at once, yet sunk not—trembled not—
Beneath that grief, that loneliness of lot;
Within that meek fair form, were feelings high,
That deem’d not till they found their energy.

While yet was Hope—they soften’d—flutter’d—
All lost—that softness died not—but it slept;
And o’er its slumber rose that Strength which said,
“With nothing left to love—there’s nought to dread.”
“Tis more than nature’s; like the burning mist
Delirium gathers from the fever’s height.
“Silent you stand—nor would I hear you tell
What—speak not—breathe not—for I know it well!
Yet would I ask—almost my lip denies
The—quick your answer—tell me where he lies”
“Lady! we know not—scarce with life we fled;
But here’s one denies that he is dead:
He saw him bound; and bleeding—but alive.”
She heard no further—‘twas in vain to strive—
So throb’d each vein—each thought—till then with stood;
Her own dark soul—these words at once subdued:
She totters—falls—and senseless had the wave
Perchance but snatch’d her from another grave;
But that with hands though rude, yet weeping eyes.
They yield such aid as Pity’s haste supplies:
Dash o’er her death-like cheek the ocean dew,
Raise—fan—sustain—till life returns anew;
A wake her handmaids, with the matrons leave
That fainting form o’er which they gaze and grieve
Then seek Anselmo’s cavern, to report
The tale too tedious—when the triumph short

IV.
In that wild council words wax’d warm and strange
With thoughts of ransom, rescue, and revenge;
All, save repose or flight: still lingering there
Breathed Conrad’s spirit, and forbade despair;
Whate’er his fate—the breasts he form’d and led
Will save him living, or appease him dead;
Wo to his foes! there yet survive a few
Whose deeds are daring, as their hearts are true.

V.
Within the Haram’s secret chamber sat
Stern Seyd, still pondering o’er his Captive’s fate;
His thoughts on love and hate alternate dwell,
Now with Gulnare, and now in Conrad’s cell;
Here at his feet the lovely slave reclined
Surveys his brow—would sooth his gloom of mind
While many an anxious glance her large dark eye
Sends in its idle search for sympathy,
His only beld in seeming o’er his beads;
But inly views his victim as he bleeds.

“Pacha! the day is thine; and on thy crest
Sits triumph—Conrad taken—fall’n the rest!
His doom is fix’d—he dies: and well his fate
Was earn’d—yet much too worthless for thy heart
Methinks, a short release, for ransom told
With all his treasure, not unwisely sold;
Report speaks largel of his pirate-board
Would that of this my Pacha were the lord!
While baffled, weaken’d by this fatal fray
Wattof’d—follow’d—he were then an easier prey
But once cut off—the remnant of his band
Embark their wealth, and seek a safer strand

“Gulnare!—if for each drop of blood a gem
Were offer’d rich as Stamboul’s diadem;
Twas worn—perhaps decay'd—yet silent bore
That conflict deadlier far than all before:
The heat of flight, the hurry of the gale,
Leave scarce the fleeting petal to bewail;
But bound and fix'd in fetter'd solitude,
To pine, the prey of every changing mood;
To gaze on thine own heart; and meditate
Irrevocable faults, and coming fate—
Too late the last to shun—the first to mend—
To count the hours that struggle to thine end,
With not a friend to animate, and tell
To other ears that death became thee well.
Around thee foes to forge the ready lie,
And blot life's latest scene with calumny:
Before, the tortures, which the soul can dare,
Yet doubts how well the shrinking flesh may bear;
But deeply feels a single cry would shame,
To valor's praise thy last and dearest claim;
The life thou leave'st below, denied above
By kind monopolists of heavenly love;
And more than doubtful paradise—thy heaven
Of earthly hope—thy loved one from thee riven.
Such were the thoughts that outlaw must sustain,
And govern pangs surpassing mortal pain:
And those sustain'd he—boots it well or ill?
Since not to sink beneath, is something still!

VII.

The first day pass'd—he saw not her—Gulnare—
The second—thrice and still she came not there;
But what her words avouch'd, her charms had done
Or else he had not seen another sun.
The fourth day roll'd along and with the night,
Came storm and darkness in their mingling might.
Oh! how he listen'd to the rushing deep,
That ne'er till now so broke upon his sleep.
And his wild spirit wilder wishes sent,
Roused by the roar of his own element!
Oft had he ridden on that winged wave,
And loved its roughness for the speed it gave,
And now its dashing echo'd on his ear,
A long known voice—slas! too vainly near!
Loud sung the wind above; and, doubly loud,
Shook o'er his turret cell the thunder-cloud;
And flashing the lightning by the lattic'd bar,
To him more genial than the midnight star:
Close to the glimmering grate he dragg'd his chain
And hoped that peril might not prove in vain.
He raised his iron hand to Heaven, and pray'd
One pitying flash to mar the form it made:
His steel and impious prayer attract alike—
The storm roll'd onward, and disdain'd to strike
Its peal wax'd fainter—ceas'd—he felt alone,
As if some faithless friend had spurn'd his groan.

VIII.

The midnight pass'd—and to the massy door
Leave scarce the shadow of the footsteps bore.
Slow turns the grating bolt and sullen key:
'Tis as his heart forebode—that fair she
Whate'er her sins, to him a guardian saint,
And beauteous still as hermit's hope can paint;
Yet changed since last within that cell she came.
More pale her cheek, more tremulous her frame:
On him she cast her dark and hurried eye,
Which spoke before her accents—'thou must die
Yes, thou must die—there is but one resource,
The last—the worst—if torture were not worse
BYRON'S WORKS.

"Lady! I look to none—my lips proclaim
What last proclaim'd they—Conrad still the same:
Why shouldst thou seek an outlaw's life to spare,
And change the sentence I deserve to bear?
Well have I earn'd—nor here alone—the need
Of Scyd's revenge, by many a lawless deed."

"Why should I seek? because—Oh! didst thou not Redeem my life from worse than slavery's lot?
Why should I seek?—hath misery made thee blind
To the fond workings of a woman's mind?
And must I say—albeit my heart rebel
With all that woman feels, but should not tell—
Because—despite thy crimes—that heart is moved:
It fear I thee—thanked thee—pitted—madden'd—loved:
Reply not, tell not now thy tale again,
Thou lov'st another—and I love in vain;
Though fond as mine her bosom, form more fair,
I rush through peril which she would not dare.
If that thy heart to hers were truly dear,
Were I thine own—thou wert not lonely here:
An outlaw's spouse—and leave her lord to roam!
What hath such gentle dame to do with home?
But speak not now—o'er thine and o'er my head
Hangs the keen sabre by a single thread;
If thou hast courage still, and wouldst be free,
Receive this pawniard—rise—and follow me!"

"Ay—in my chains! my steps will gently tread,
With these adornments, o'er each slumbering head!
Thou hast forgot—is this a garb for flight?
Or is that instrument more fit, for flight?"

"Misdoubting Corsair! I have gain'd the guard,
Ripe for revolt, and greedy for reward.
A single word of mine removes that chain:
Without some aid how here could I remain?
Well, since we met, hath sped my busy time,
If in aught evil, for thy sake the crime:
The crime—'tis none to punish those of Seyd.
That hated tyrant, Conrad—he must bleed!
I see thee shudder—but my soul is changed—
Wrong'd, spurn'd, revil'd, and it shall be avenged—
Accused of what till now my heart disdain'd—
Too faithful, though to bitter bondage chain'd.
Yes, smil'd—but he had little cause to sneer,
I was not treacherous then—nor thou too dear;
But he has said it—and the jealous well,
These tyrants, teasing, tempting to rebel,
Deserve the fate their fretting lips foretell.
I never loved—he bought me—somewhat high—
Since with me came a heart he could not buy.
I was a slave unmurmuring: he hath said,
But for his rescue I with thee had fle'd.
'Twas false thou knew'st—but let such anguish rue,
Their words are omens Insult renders true.
Nor was thy repulse granted to my prayer;
This fleeting grace was only to prepare
New tortures for thy life, and my despair.
Mine too he threatens; but his dotage still
Would fain reserve me for his lordly will;
When weariest of these fleeting charms and me,
There yawns the sack—and yonder rolls the sea!
What, am I then a toy for dotard's play,
To wear but till the gilding frets away?
I saw thee—loved thee—owe thee all—would save,
If but to show how grateful is a slave.

But had he not thus menaced fame and life,
(And well he keeps his oaths pronounced in stile)
I still had saved thee—but the Pacena spared.
Now I am all thine own—for all prepared:
Thou lov'st me not—nor know'st or but the worst.
Alas! this love—that hatred are the first—
Oh! could'st thou prove my truth, thou would'st not start,
Nor fear the fire that lights an Eastern heart;
'Tis now the beacon of thy safety—now
It points within the port a Maniote prow;
But in one chamber, where our path must lead,
There sleeps—he must not wake—the oppressor Seyd!"

"Gulnare—Gulnare—I never felt till now
My abject fortune, wither'd fame so low.
Seyd is mine enemy: had swept my band
From earth with ruthless but with open hand,
And therefore came I, in my bark of war,
To smite the smiter with the semiliter;
Such is my weapon—not the secret knife—
Who spares a woman's seeks not shimer's life.
Thine saved I gladly, Lady, not for this—
Let me not deem that mercy shown amiss.
Now fare thee well—more peace be with thy breast!
Night wears apace—my last of earthly rest!"

"Rest! rest! by sunrise must thy sinews shake,
And thy limbs writhe around the ready stake.
I heard the order—saw—I will not see—
If thou wilt perish, I will fall with thee.
My life—my love—my hatred—all below
Are on this cast—Corsair! 'tis but a blow!
Without it flight were idle—how evade
His sure pursuit? my wrongs too unrepaid,
My youth disgraced—the long, long wasted year,
One blow shall cancel with our future fears;
But since the dagger suits thee less than brand,
I'll try the firmness of a female hand;
The guards are gain'd—one moment all were o'er—
Corsair! we meet in safety or no more;
If errs my feeble hand, the morning cloud
Will hower o'er thy scaffold, and my shroud."

IX.

She turn'd, and vanish'd ere he could reply,
But his glance follow'd far with eager eye;
And gathering, as he could, the links that bound
His form, to curl their length, and curb their sound
Since bar and bolt no more his steps preclude
He, fast as fetter'd limbs allow, pursued.
'Twas dark and winding, and he knew not where
That passage led; nor lamp nor guard were there:
He sees a dusky glimmering—shall he seek
Or shun that ray so indistinct and weak?
Chance guides his steps—a freshness seems to bear
Full on his brow, as if from morning air—
He reach'd an open gallery—on his eye
Gleamed the last star of night, the clearing sky;
Yet scarcely heeded these—another light
From a lone chamber struck upon his sight.
Towards it he moved; a scarcely closing door
Reveald the ray within, but nothing more.
With hasty step a figure onward past,
Then paused—and turn'd—and paused—'tis She at last!

No poniard in that hand—nor sign of ill—kill!"

"Thanks to that softening heart—she could not
Again he look'd, the wildness of her eye
Starts from the day abrupt and fearfully.
She stopp'd—threw back her dark far-floating hair,
That nearly veil'd her face and bosom fair:
As if she late had bent her leaning head
Above some object of her doubt or dread.
They met—upon her brow—unknown—forgot—
Her hurrying hand had left—'twas but a spot—
Its hue was all she saw, and scarce withstood—
Oh! slight but certain pledge of crime—'tis blood!

X.
He had seen battle—he had brooded lone
O'er promised pangs to sentenced guilt foreseen;
He had been tempted—chastened—and the chain
Yet on his arms might ever there remain:
But ne'er from strife to captivity—remorse—
From all his feelings in their inmost force—
So thrill'd—so shudder'd every creeping vein,
As now they froze before that purple stain.
That spot of blood, that light but guilty streak,
Had banish'd all the beauty from her cheek!
Blood he had view'd—could view unmoved—but then
It flow'd in combat, or was shed by men.

XI.
"'Tis done—he nearly waked—but it is done.
Corsair! he perish'd—thou art dearly won.
All words would now be vain—away—away!
Our bark is tossing—'tis already day.
The few gain'd over, now are wholly mine,
And these thy yet surviving band shall join:
Anon my voice shall vindicate my hand,
When once our sail forsakes this hated strand."

XII.
She clapp'd her hands—and through the gallery pour,
Equipp'd for flight, her vassals—Greek and Moor;
Silent but quick they stoop, his chains unbind;
Once more his limbs are free as mountain wind;
But on his heavy heart such sadness sate,
As if they there transferr'd that iron weight.
No words are utter'd—at her sign, a door
Reveals the secret passage to the shore;
The city lies behind—they speed, they reach
The glad waves dancing on the yellow beach;
And Conrad following, at her beck, obey'd,
Nor cared he now if rescued or betray'd;
Resistance were as useless as if Seyd
Yet lived to view the doom his ire decreed.

XIII.
Embark'd, the sail unfurl'd, the light breeze blew—
How much had Conrad's memory to review!
Sunk he in Contemplation, till the cape
Where last he anchor'd rear'd its giant shape.
Ah!—since that fatal night, though brief the time,
Had swept an age of terror, grief, and crime.
As its far shadow frowned above the mast,
He veil'd his face, and sorrow'd as he past;
He thought of all—Gonsalvo and his band,
His fleeting triumph, and his falling hand;
He thought on her afar, his lonely bride:
He turn'd and saw—Gulnare, the homicide!

XIV.
She watch'd his features till she could not bear
Their freezing aspect and averted air,
And that strange fierceness foreign to her eye,
Fell quench'd in tears, too late to shed or dry.

She knelt beside him, and his hand she prest—
"Thou may'st forgive though Alla's self detest;
But for that deed of darkness, what wert thou thou
Reproach me—but not yet—Oh! spare me now.
I am not what I seem—this fearful night
My brain bewilder'd—do not madden quite!
If I had never loved—though less my guilt,
Thou hast not lived to—hate me—if thou wilt;"

XV.
She wrongs his thoughts, they more himself upbraiding
Than her, though undesign'd, the wretch he made:
But speechless all, deep, dark, and unexpressed,
They bleed within that silent cell—his breast
Still onward, fair the breeze, nor rough the surge
The blue waves sport around the stern they urge;
Far on the horizon's verge appears a speck,
A spout—a mast—a sail—an armed deck!
Their little bark her men of watch descry,
And ampler canvas wos the wind from high;
She bears her down majestically near,
Speed on her prow, and terror in her tier.
A flash is seen—the ball beyond their bow
Booms harmless, hissing to the deep below.
Up rose keen Conrad from his silent trance,
A long, long absent gladness in his glance:
"'Tis mine—my blood-red flag! again—again
I am not all deserted on the main!"
They own the signal, answer to the hull,
Hoist out the boat at once, and slacken sail.
"'Tis Conrad! Conrad!" shouting from the deck,
Command nor duty could their transport check!
With light alacrity and gaze of pride,
They view him here on once more his vessels' side.
A smile relaxing in each rugged face,
Their arms can scarce forbear a rough embrace.
He, half forgetting danger and defeat,
Returns their greeting as a chief may greet,
Wings with a cordial grasp Anselmo's hand,
And feels he yet can conquer and command!

XVI.
These greetings o'er, the feelings that o'erflow,
Yet grieve to win him back without a blow;
They sail'd prepared for vengeance—had they known
A woman's hand secured that deed her own,
She were their queen—less scrupulous are they
Than haughty Conrad how they win their way
With many an asking smile, and wondering stare.
They whisper round, and gaze upon Gulnare:
And her, at once above—beneath her sex,
Whom blood appall'd not, their regal perquisites
To Conrad turns her faint imploring eye,
She drops her veil, and stands in silence by;
Her arms are meekly folded on that breast,
Which—Conrad safe—to fate resign'd the rest.
Though worse than frenzy could that bosom fill
Extreme in love or hate, in good or ill,
The worst of crimes had left her woman still!

XVII.
This Conrad mark'd, and felt—ah! could he less
Hate of that deed—but grief for her distress;
What she has done no tears can wash away,
And Heaven must punish on its angry day.
But it was done: he know, whatever guilt,
For him that poniard smote, that blood was spilt
And he was free—and she for him had given
Her all on earth, and more than all in heaven!
And now he turn'd him to that dark-ey'd slave
Whose brow was bow'd beneath the glance he gave,
Who now seem'd changed and humbled—faint and meek,
But varying oft the color of her cheek
To deeper shades of paleness—all its red
That fearful spot which stain'd it from the dead!
He took that hand—it trembled—now too late—
So soft in love—so wildly nerve'd in hate;
He clasp'd that hand—it trembled—and his own
Had lost its firmness, and his voice its tone.
"Gulnare!"—"but she replied not—"dear Gulnare!"
She rais'd her eye—her only answer there—
At once she sought and sunk in his embracce:
If he had driven her from that resting-place,
His heart had been more or less than mortal heart,
But—good or ill—it bade her not depart.
Nor chance, but for the bedings of his breast,
His latest virtue then had join'd the rest.
Yet even Medora might forget the kiss
That ask'd from form so fair no more than this,
The first, the last that Frailty stole from Faith—
To lips where Love had lavish'd all his breath,
To lips—whose broken sighs such fragrance dung,
As he had fam'd them freshily with his wing!

XVIII.
They gain by twilight's hour their lonely isle:
To them the very rocks appear to smile;
The haven hums with many a cheering sound,
The beacons blaze their wonted stations round,
The boats are darting o'er the early bay,
And sportive dolphins bend them through the spray;
Even the hoarse sea-bird's shrill, discordant shriek,
Greets like the welcome of his timeless beak!
Beneath each lamp that through its lattice gleams,
Their fancy paints the friends that trim the beams.
Oh! what can sanctify the joys of home,
Like Hope's gay glance from Ocean's troubled foam?

XIX.
The lights are high on beacon and from bower,
And midst them Conrad seeks Medora's tower:
He looks in vain—'tis strange—and all remark,
Amid so many, her's alone is dark.
'Tis strange—of yore its welcome never fail'd,
Nor now, perchance, extinguish'd, only veil'd.
With the first boat descends he for the shore,
And looks impatient on the lingering oar.
Oh! for a wing beyond the falcon's flight,
To bear him like an arrow to that height!
With the first pause the resting rowers gave,
He faintly with not—looks not—leaps into the wave,
Strives through the surge, bestrides the beach, and high
Ascends the path familiar to his eye.
He reach'd his turret door—he paused—no sound
Breke from within; and all was night around.
He knock'd, and loudly—footstep nor reply
Announced that any heard or deem'd him nigh;
He knock'd—but faintly—for his trembling hand
Refused to aid his heavy heart's demand.
The portal open—'tis a well-known face—
But not the form he pant'd to embrace,
Its lips are silent—twice his own essay'd,
And fail'd to frame the question they delay'd;
He snatch'd the lamp—its light will answer all
It quits his grasp, expiring in the fall.
He would not wait for that reviving ray—
As soon could he have linger'd there for day;
But, glimmering through the dusky corridor,
Another checkers o'er the shadow'd floor;
His steps the chamber gain—his eyes behold
All that his heart believed not—yet foretold!

XX.
He turn'd not—spoke not—sunk not—fix'd his look,
And set the anxious frame that lately shook:
He gazed—how long we gaze despite of pain,
And know, but dare not own, we gaze in vain.
In life itself it was so still and fair,
That death with gentler aspect wither'd there;
And the cold flowers 2 her colder hand contain'd,
In the last grasp as tenderly were strain'd
As if she scarcely felt, but feign'd a sleep,
And made it almost mockery yet to weep:
The long dark lashes fringed her lids of snow,
And veil'd—thought shrinks from all that lurk'd below—
Oh! o'er the eye Death most exerts his might,
And hurls the spirit from her throne of light!
Sink those blue orbs in that long last eclipse,
But spares, as yet, the charm around her lips—
Yet, yet they seem as they forbore to smile,
And wish'd repose—but only for a while;
But the white shroud, and each extended tress,
Long—fair—but spread in utter lifeless love,
Which, late the sport of every summer win, Escape the baf'fed wraith that strove to bind Those—and the pale pure cheek, became the bier—
But she is nothing—wherefore is he here?

XXI.
He ask'd no question—all were answer'd now
By the first glance on that still marble brow.
It was enough—she died—What rock'd it low?
The love of youth, the hope of better years,
The source of softest wishes, tenderest fears,
The only living thing he could not hate,
Was rest at once—and he deserved his fate,
But did not feel it less—t' the good explore,
For peace, those realms where guilt can never soar
The proud—t' the wayward—who have fix'd below
Their joy, and find this earth enough for wo,
Lose in that one their all—perchance a mate—
But who in patience parts with all delight?
Full many a stoic eye and aspect stern
Mask hearts where grief hath little left to learn
And many a withering thought lies hid, not lost
In smiles that least beft who wear them most.

XXII.
By those, that deepest feel, is ill exprest
The indistinctness of the suffering breast;
Where thousand thoughts begin to end in one,
Which seeks for all the refuge found in none;
No words suffice the secret soul to show,
For Truth denies all eloquence to Wo.
On Conrad's stricken soul exhaustion prest,
And stupor almost bled it into rest:
So feeble now—his mother's softness crept
To those wild eyes, which like an infant's wept:
NOTES TO THE CORSAIR.

The time in this poem may seem too short for the occurrences, but the whole of the Egean isles are within a few hours' sail of the continent, and the reader must be kind enough to take the wind as I have often found it.

It has been objected that Conrad's entering disguised as a spy is out of nature.—Perhaps so. I find something not unlike it in history.

"Anxious to explore with his own eyes the state of the Vandals, Majorian ventured, after disguising the color of his hair, to visit Carthage in the character of his own ambassador; and Genseric was afterwards mortified by the discovery, that he had entertained and dismissed the Emperor of the Romans. Such an anecdote may be rejected as an improbable fiction, but it is a fact that he would not have been imagined unless in the life of a hero."—Gibbon, D. and F., vol. vi. p. 180.
That Conrad is a character not altogether out of nature I shall attempt to prove by some historical coincidences which I have met with since writing "The Corsair."
"Eccelin prisonnier," dit Rolandini. "s'enfo..."
moit dans un silence menaçant, il fixeait sur la terre son visage serein, et ne donnait point d'essor à sa profonde indignation.—De toutes parts cependant les soldats et les peuples accouraient; ils voulaient voir cet homme, jadis si puissant, et la joie universelle celtait de toutes parts.

"Et voilà étoit d'une petite taille; mais tout l'aspect de sa personne, tous ses mouvements, indiquaient un soldat.—Son langage était amer, son département superbe—et par son seul égard, il faisait trembler les plus hardis." Siocis, tome III. page 215, 220.

"Gizierius (Genseric, king of the Vandals, the conqueror of both Carthage and Rome) staturi medociris, et equi casu clandestans, animo profundus, venmine rarus, luxurio contemptum, ira turbidus, habendi cupidus, ad solicitandas gentes providentissimus," &c., &c. Jornandes de Rebus Geticiis, c. 33.

I beg leave to quote these gloomy realities to keep in countenance my Gisour and Corsair.

In Sir Thomas More, for instance, on the scaffold, and A. Boleyn in the Tower, with grasping his neck, she remarked that it "was too slender to trouble the headman much." During one part of the French Revolution, it became a fashion to leave some "not" as a legacy; and the quantity of facetious last words spoken during that period would form a melancholy jest-book of a considerable size.

The twilight in Greece is much shorter than in our own country; the days in winter are longer, but in summer of shorter duration.

The Kiosk is a Turkish summer-house: the palm is without the present walls of Athens, not far from the temple to Theseus, between the temple and the tree, the wall intervenes.—Cephisus' stream is indeed scanty, and Ilissus has no stream at all.

The opening lines as far as Section II. have, perhaps, little business here, and were annexed to an unpublished (though printed) poem; but they were written on the spot in the spring of 1811, and—I scarce know why—the reader must excuse their appearance here if he can.

In the Levant it is the custom to strew flowers on the bodies of the dead, and in the hands of young persons to place a nosegay.

Link'd with one virtue, and a thousand crimes

That the point of honor which is represented in one instance of Conrad's character has not been carried beyond the bounds of probability may perhaps be in some degree confirmed by the following anecdote of a brother Bucaneer in the year 1814.

Our readers have all seen the account of the enterprise against the pirates of Barratara; but few, we believe, were informed of the situation, history, or nature of that establishment. For the information of such as were unacquainted with it, we have procured from a friend the following interesting narrative of the main facts, of which he has personal knowledge, and which cannot fail to interest some of our readers.

Barratara is a bay, or a narrow arm of the Gulf of Mexico: it runs through a rich but very flat country until it reaches within a mile of the Mississippi River fifteen miles below the city of New Orleans. The bay has branches almost innumerable, in which persons can lie concealed from the severest scrutiny. It communicates with three lakes which lie on the southwest side, and these, with the lake of the same name, and which lies contiguous to the sea, where there is an island formed by the two arms of this lake and the sea. The east and west points of this island were fortified, in the year 1811, by a band of pirates under the command of one Monsieur La Fitte. A large majority of these outlaws are of that class of the population of the State of Louisiana who fled from the Island of St. Domingo during the troubles there, and took refuge in the Island of Cuba: and when the last war between France and Spain commenced, they were compelled to leave that island with the short notice of a few days. Without ceremony, they entered the United States, the most of them the State of Louisiana, with all the negroes they had possessed in Cuba. They were notified by the Governor of that State of the clause in the constitution which forbade the importation of slaves; but, at the same time, received the assurance of the Governor that he would obtain, if possible, the approbation of the General Government for their retaining this property.

The Island of Barratara is situated about lat
NOTES TO THE CORSAIR.

There is something mysterious in the history and character of Dr. Blackbourne. The former is but imperfectly known; and report has even asserted he was a buccanneer; and that one of his predecessors in that profession having asked, on his arrival in England, what had become of his old chum, Blackbourne, was answered, he is archbishop of York. We are informed, that Blackbourne was installed sub-dean of Exeter, in 1694, where he resided till 1702; but after his successor, Lewis Barneet's death, in 1704, he regained it. In the following year he became dean: and, in 1714, held it the archdeanry of Cornwall. He was consecrated bishop of Exeter, February 24, 1717, and translated to York, November 28, 1722; as a reward, according to court scandal, for aiding George I. to the Duchy of Munster. This, however, appears to have been an unfounded calumny. As archbishop he behaved with great prudence, and was equally respectable as the guardian of the revenues of the see. Rumor whispered he retained the vices of his youth. and that a passion for the fair sex formed an item in the list of his weaknesses; but so far from being convicted by seventy witnesses, he does not appear to have been directly criminated by one. In short, I look upon these aspersions as the effects of mere malice. How is it possible a buccanneer should have been so good a scholar as Blackbourne certainly was? He had some perfect knowledge of the classics, (particularly of the Greek tragedians,) as to be able to read them with the same ease as he could Shakespeare, must have taken great pains to acquire the learned languages; and have had both leisure and good masters. But he was undoubtedly educated at Christchurch College, Oxford. He is allowed to have been a pleasant man; this, however, was turned against him, by its being said, "he gained more hearts than souls.""
LARA:
A TALE.

CANTO I.

I.
The Serfs are glad through Lara's wide domain,
And Slavery half forgets her feudal chain:
He, their unhoped, but unforgotten lord,
The long self-exiled chieftain is restored;
There be bright faces in the busy hall,
Bowls on the board, and banners on the wall;
Far checkering 'er the pictured window, plays
The unwonted faggots' hospitable blaze;
And gay retainers gather round the hearth,
With tongues all loudness, and with eyes all mirth.

II.
The chief of Lara is return'd again;
And why had Lara cross'd the bounding main?
Left by his sire, too young such loss to know,
Lord of himself;—that heritage of wo,
That fearful empire which the human breast
But holds to rob the heart within of rest!—
With none to check, and few to point in time
His thousand paths that slope the way to crime;
Then, when he most required commandment, then
Had Lara's daring boyhood govern'd men.
It skills not, boots not step by step to trace
His youth through all the mazes of its race;
Short was the course his restlessness had run,
But long enough to leave him half undone.

III.
And Lara left in youth his father-land;
But from the hour he waved his parting hand
Each trace wax'd fainter of his course, till all
Had nearly ceased his memory to recall.
His sire was dust, his vassals could declare,
'Twas all they knew, that Lara was not there;
Nor sent, nor came he, till conjecture grew
Cold in the many, anxious in the few.
His hall scarce echoed with his wonted name,
His portrait darkens in its fading frame,
Another chief consoled his destined bride,
The young forgot him, and the old had died;
"Yet doth he live!" exclaims the impatient heir,
And sighs for satires which he must not wear.

A hundred scutcheons deck with gloomy grace,
The Lara's last and longest dwelling-place:
But one is absent from the mouldering pile
That now were welcome in that Gothic pile

IV.
He comes at last in sudden loneliness,
And whence they know not, why they need not guess
They more might marvel, when the greeting's o'er
Not that he came, but came not long before:
No train is his beyond a single page,
Of foreign aspect, and of tender age.
Years had roll'd on, and fast they speed away
To those that wander as to those that stay;
But lack of tidings from another clime
Had lent a flagging wing to weary Time.
They see, they recognize, yet almost deem
The present dubious, or the past a dream

He lives, nor yet is past his manhood's prime,
Though see'd by toil, and something touch'd by time;
His faults, whate'er they were, if scarce forgot,
Might be untaught him by his varied lot;
Nor good nor ill of late were known, his name
Might yet uphold his patrimonial fame;
His soul in youth was haughty, but his sins
No more than pleasure from the stripling wins,
And such, if not yet harden'd in their course,
Might be redeem'd, nor ask a long remorse.

V.
And they indeed were changed—'tis quickly seen
Whate'er he be, 'twas not what he had been:
That brow in surrow'd lines had fix'd at last,
And spoke of passions, but of passion past:
The pride, but not the fire, of early days,
Coldness of mind, and carelessness of praise:
A high demeanor, and a glance that took
Their thoughts from others by a single look;
And that sarcastic levity of tongue,
The stinging of a heart the world hath stung.
LARA. 153

That darts in seeming playfulness around,
And makes those feel that will not own the wound;
All these seem'd his, and something more beneath,
Than glance could well reveal, or accent breathe.
Ambition, glory, love, the common aim,
That some can conquer, and that all would claim,
Within his breast appear'd no more to strive,
Yet seem'd as lately they had been alive;
And some deep feeling it was vain to grace
At moments lighten'd o'er his livid face.

VI.
N: much he loved long question of the past
Nor told of wondrous wilds, and deserts vast,
In those far lands where he had wander'd lone,
And—as himself would have it seem—unknown:
Yet these in vain his eye could scarcely scan,
Nor glean experience from his fellow man:
But what he had beheld he shunn'd to show,
As hardly worth a stranger's care to know:
If still more prying such inquiry grew,
His brow fell darker, and his words more few.

VII.
Not unregretted to see him once again,
Warm was his welcome to the haunts of men;
Born of high lineage, link'd in wander'st tone,
He mingled with the Magnates of his land,
John's the carousals of the great and gay,
And saw them smile or sigh their hours away;
But still he only saw, and did not share
The common pleasure or the general care;
He did not follow what they all pursued
With hope still baff'd still to be renew'd:
Nor shadowy honor, nor substantial gain,
Nor beauty's preference, and t'io rival's pain:
Around him some mysterious circle threw
Replied'd approach, and shew'd him still alone;
Upon his eye sate something of reproof,
That kept at least frivolity aloof;
And things more timid that beheld him near,
In silence gaze'd, or whisper'd mutual fear;
And they the wiser, friendlier few confest
They deem'd him better than his air express.

VIII.
'Twas strange—in youth all action and all life,
Burning for pleasure, not averse from strife,
Woman—the field—the ocean—all that gave
Promise of gladness, peril of a grave,
In turn he tried—he ransack'd all below,
And found his recompense in joy or wo,
No tame, trite medium; for his feelings sought
In that intenseness an escape from thought:
The tempest of his heart in scorn had gaz'd
On that the feebler elements had rais'd;
The rapture of his heart hath look'd on high,
And ask'd if greater dwell beyond the sky:
Chain'd to excess, the slave of each extreme,
How woke he from the wildness of that dream?
Alas! he told not—but he did awake
To curse the wither'd heart & at would not break.

IX.
Books, for his volume heretofore was Man,
With eye more curious he appear'd to scan,
And oft, in sudden mood, for many a day
From all commune in he would start away;
And then, his rarely call'd attendants said,
Through night's long hours would sound his hurried tread
O'er the dark gallery, where his fathers srown'd
In rude but antique portraiture around:
They heard, but whisper'd—"that must not be known—"
The sound of words less earthly than his own.
Yes, they who chose might smile, but some had seen
They scarce knew what, but more than should have been.
Why gaz'd he so upon the ghastly head
Which hands profane had gather'd from the dead.
That still beside his open'd volume lay,
As if to startling all save him away?
Why slept he not when others were at rest
Why heard no music, and receive no guest?
All was not well, they deem'd—but where the wrong?
Some knew perchance—out 'twere a tale too long:
And such besides were too discreetly wise,
To more than hint their knowledge in sunrise,
But if they would—they could "—round the board
Thus Lara's vassals prattled to their Lord.

X.
It was the night—and Lara's glassy stream
The stars are studding, each with imaged beam;
So calm, the waters scarcely seem to stray,
And yet they glide like happiness away;
Reflecting far and fairy-like from high
The immortal lights that live along the sky,
Its banks are fringed with many a goodly tree,
And flowers the fairest that may feast the bee;
Such in her charplet infant Dian wave,
And Innocence would offer to her love:
These deck the shore; the waves their channel make
In windings bright and mazy like the snake.
All was so still, so soft in earth and air,
You scarce would start to meet a spirit there;
Secure that nought of evil could delight
To walk in such a scene, on such a night!
It was a moment only for the good:
So Lara deem'd, nor longer there he stood,
But turn'd in silence to his castle-gate;
Such scene his soul no more could contemplate:
Such scene reminded him of other days,
Of skies more cloudless, moons of purer blaze,
Of nights more soft and frequent, hearts that now—
No—no—the storm may beat upon his brow,
Uneft—unsparing—but a night like this,
A night of beauty, mock'd such breast as his

XI.
He turn'd within his solitary hall,
And his high shadow shot along the wall;
There were the painted forms of other times,
'Twas all they left of virtues or of crimes,
Save vague tradition; and the gloomy vaults
That hid their dust, their foilodes, and their faults.
And half a column of the pompous page,
That speeding the specious tale from age to age,
Where history's pen its praise or blame supplies
And lies like truth, and still more truly lies.
He wandering mused, and as the moonbeam shone
Through the dim lattice o'er the floor of stone,
And the high fretted roof, and saints, that there
O'er Gothic windows knelt in pictured prayer,
Reflected in fantastic figures grew.
Like life, but not like mortal life, to view;
His bris'ling locks of sable, brow of gloom,
And the wide waving of his shaken plume,
Blanc'd like a spectre's attributes, and gave
His aspect all that terror gives the grave.

XII.
'Twas midnight—all was slumber; the lone light
Dim'd in the lamp, as loth to break the night.
Hark! there be murmurs heard in Lara's hall—
A sound—a voice—a shriek—a fearful call!
A long, loud shriek—and silence—did they hear
That frantic echo burst the sleeping ear?
They heard and rose, and tremulously brave,
Rush where the sound invoked their aid to save;
The some with half-lit tapers in their hands,
And snatch'd in startled haste unbelted brands.

XIII.
Cold as the marble where his length was laid,
Pale as the beam that o'er his features play'd,
Was Lara stretch'd: his half-drawn sable near,
Droop'd as it should seem in more than nature's fear;
Yet he was firm, or had been firm till now,
And still defiance knelt his gather'd brow;
Though mix'd with terror, senseless as he lay,
There lived upon his lip the wish to slay;
Some half-form'd threat in utterance there had die'd,
Some imprecation of despairing pride;
His eye was almost seal'd, but not forsook,
Even in its trance the gladiator's look,
That oft awake his aspect could disclose,
And now was fixed in horrible repose.
They raise him—bear him;—hush! he breathes, he speaks,
The swarth'ry blush recolours in his cheeks,
His lip resumes its red, his eye, though dim,
Rolls wide and wild, each slowly quivering limb
Recalls its function, but his words are strong
In terms that seem not of his native tongue;
Distinct but strange, enough for them to understand
To deem them accents of another land,
And such they were, and meant to meet an ear
That hears him not—alas! that cannot hear!

XIV.
His page approach'd, and he alone appear'd
To know the import of the words they heard;
And, by the changes of his cheek and brow,
They were not such as Lara should awow,
Nor he interpret, yet with less surprise
Than those around their chief'stai'state he eyes.
But Lara's prostrate form he bent beside,
And in that tongue that seem'd his own replied,
And Lara heeds those tones that gently seem
To soothe away the horrors of his dream;
If dream it were, that thus could overthrow
A breast that needed not ideal wo.

XV.
What'er his frenzy dream'd or eye beheld,
Yet remember'd ne'er to be reveal'd,
Re-quits at his heart: the custom'd morning came,
And breathed new vigor in his shaken frame;
And solace sought he none from priest nor leech,
And soon the same in movement and in speech
As herebefore he fill'd the passing hours,
Nor less he smiles, nor more his forehead lowers,
Than these were wont—and if the coming night
Appear'd less w.'com' now to Lara's sight,
He to his marvelling vassals show'd it not,
Whose shuddering proved their fear was less forgot
In trembling pairs (alone they dared not) crawl
The astonished's slaves, and shun the fated hall
The waving banner, and the clapping door,
The rustling tapestry, and the echoing floor;
The long dim shadows of surrounding trees,
The flapping bat, the night song of the breeze,
Aught they behold or hear their thought appals,
As evening saddens o'er the dark gray walls.

XVI.
Vain thought! that hour of ne'er unravell'd gloom
Came not again, or Lara could assume
A seeming of forgetfulness, that made
His vassals more amazed nor less afraid—
Had memory vanish'd then with sense restored?
Since word, nor look, nor gesture of their lord
Betray'd a feeling that recall'd to these
That fever'd moment of his mind's disease.
Was it a dream? was his the voice that spoke
Those strange wild accents: his the cry that broke
Their slumber? his the oppress'd, o'erbur'd heart
That ceased to beat, the look that made them start?
Could he who thus had suffer'd, so forget,
When such as saw that suffering shudder yet?
Or did that silence prove his memory fix'd
Too deep for words, indelible, unmix'd?
In that corroding secrecy which gnaws
The heart to show the effect, but not the cause?
Not so in him; his breast had buried both,
Nor common gars could discern the growth
Of thoughts that mortal lips must leave half told:
They choke the feeble words that would unfold

XVII.
In him inexplicably mix'd appear'd
Much to be loved and hated, sought and fear'd;
Opinion varying o'er his hidden lot,
In praise or railing o'er his name forgot.
His silence form'd a theme for others' past—
They guess'd—they gazed—they fain would know his fate.
What had he been? what was he, thus unknown,
Who walk'd their world, his lineage only known?
A hater of his kind? yet some would say,
With them he could seem gay amidst the gay;
But own'd, that smile if oft observed and near,
W'an'd in its mirth, and wither'd to a sneer;
That smile might reach his lip, but pass'd not by None o'er could trace its laughter to his eye:
Yet there was softness too in his regard,
At times, a heart as not by nature hard,
But once perceived, his spirit seemed to chide
Such weakness, as unworthy of its pride,
And steel'd itself, as scornful to redeem
One doubt from others' half withheld esteem.
In self-inflicted penance of a breast
Which tenderness might once have wrung from rest
In vigilance of grief that would compel
The soul to hate for having loved too well.

XVIII.
There was in him a vital scorn of all,
As if the worst had fall'n a which could befall,
He stood a stranger in this breathing world,
An erring spirit from another hurl'd;
A thing of dark imagin'gs, that shaped
By choice the perils he b.' chance escaped, out 'scape in vain, for in their memory yet
His mind would half exult and half regret:
With more capacity for love than earth
Bestows on most of mortal mould and birth,
His early dreams of good outstripp'd the truth,
And troubled manhood follow'd baffled youth;
With thought of years in phantom chase mispent,
And wasted powers for better purpose lent;
And fiery passions that had pour'd their wrath
In hurried desolation o'er his path,
And left the better feelings all at strife
In wild reflection o'er his stormy life;
But haughtily still, and loth himself to blame,
He call'd on Nature's self to share the shame,
And charged all faults upon the fleshly form
She gave to clog the soul, and feast the worm;
Till he at last contended good and ill,
And half mistook for fate the acts of will:
Too high for common selfishness, he could
At times resign his own for others' good,
But not in pity, not because he ought,
But in some strange perversity of thought,
That sway'd him onward with a secret pride
To do what few or none would do beside;
And this same impulse would, in tempting time,
Mislead his spirit equally to crime;
So much he soar'd beyond, or sunk beneath
The men with whom he felt condemn'd to breathe;
And long'd by good or ill to separate
Himself from all who shared his mortal state;
His mind abhorring this had fix'd her throne
Far from the world, in regions of her own:
Thus coldly passing all that pass'd below,
His blood in temperate seeming now would flow:
Ah! happier if it never with guilt had glow'd,
But ever in that icy smoothness flowed!
'Tis true, with other men their path he walk'd,
And like the rest in seeming did aid call'd,
Nor outraged Reason's rules by flaw nor start,
His madness was not of the head, but heart;
And rarely wander'd in his speech, or drew
His thoughts so forth as to offend the view.

XIX.
With all that chilling mystery of mien,
And seeming gladness to remain unseen,
He had (if 'twere not nature's boon) an art
Of fixing memory on another's heart:
It was not love perchance—nor hate—nor aught
That words can image to express the thought;
But they who saw him did not see in vain,
And once beheld, would ask of him again;
And those to whom he spake remember'd well,
And on the words, however slight, would dwell:
None knew nor how, nor why, but he entwined
 Himself perforce around the hearer's mind;
There he was stamp'd, in liking, or in hate,
If grovet'once; however brief the date
That friendship, pity, or aversion knew,
Still there within the inmost thought he grew,
You could not penetrate his soul, but found,
Despite your wonder, to your own he wound;
His presence haunted still; and for the breast
He forced an all unwilling interest:
Vain was the struggle in that mental net,
His spirit seem'd to dare you to forget!

XX.
There is a festival, where knights and dames,
And sought that wealth or lofty lineage claims,
Appear—a hightborn and a welcome guest,
To Otho's hall came Lara with the rest,
The long carnal shades the illumined hall,
Well speeds alike the banquet and the ball;
And the gay dance of bounding Beauty's train
Links grace and harmony in happiest chain:
Blest are the early hearts and gentle hands
That mingle there in well-accorded bands;
It is a sight the careful brow might smooth,
And make Age smile, and dream itself to Youth,
And Youth forget such hour was pass'd on earth,
So springs the exulting bosom to that mirth!

XXI.
And Lara gazed on those, sedately glad,
His brow belied him if his soul was sad;
And his glance follow'd fast each fluttering fair
Whose steps of lightness woke no echo there
He lean'd against the lofty pillar nigh,
With folded arms and long attentive eye,
Nor mark'd a glance so sternly fix'd on his—
Ill brook'd high Lara scrutiny like this:
At length he caught it, 'tis a face unknown,
But seems as searching his, and his alone;
Prying and dark, a stranger's by his mien,
Who still till now had gazed on him unseen;
At length encountering meets the mutual gaze
Of keen inquiry, and of mute amaze;
On Lara's glance emotion gathering grew,
As if distrusting that the stranger throw'd;
Along the stranger's aspect fix'd and stern,
Flash'd more than thence the vulgar eye could learn.

XXII.
"'Tis he !" the stranger cried, and those that heard,
Reecho'd fast and far the whisper'd word;
"'Tis he!"—"'Tis who?" they question far and near.
Till louder accents rung on Lara's ear;
So widely spread, few bosoms well could brook
The general marvel, or that single look;
But Lara stirr'd not, changed not, the surprise
That sprang at first to his arrested eyes
Seem'd now subsided, neither sunk nor raised,
Glanced his eye round, though still the stranger gazed;
And drawing nigh, exclaim'd, with haughty sneer,
"'Tis he!—how came he thence?—what doth he here?"

XXIII.
It were too much for Lara to pass by
Such questions, so repeated fierce and high;
With look collected, but with accent cold,
More mildly firm than petulantly bold,
He turn'd, and met the inquisitorial tone—
"My name is Lara!—when thine own is known,
Doubt not my fitting answer to requite
The unlook'd for courtesy of such a knight.
"'Tis Lara!—further wouldst thou mark or ask?
I shun no question, and I wear no mask."

"Thou shun'st no question! Ponder—is there none
Thy heart must answer, though thine ear would shun?
And deem'st thou me unknown too? Gaze again
At least thy memory was not given in vain.
Oh! never canst thou cancel half her debt
Eternity forbids thee to forget."
With slow and searching glance upon his face
Grew Lara's eyes, but nothing there could trace
They knew, or chose to know—with dubious look
He deemed no answer, but his head he shook,
And half contemptuous turn'd to pass away;
But the stern stranger motion'd him to stay.

"A word!—I charge thee say, and answer here
To one, who, wert thou noble, were thy peer,
But as thou wast and art—nay, frown not, lord,
If false, 'tis ease to disprove the word—"
But, as thou wast and art, on thee looks down,
Distrust thy smile;—it trusts not at thy frown.
Art thou not 'sa t's deeds—"

"Whate'er I be,
Words wh'd these, accusers like to thee
I list no further; those with whom they weigh
May hear the rest, nor venture to gainsay
The wondrous tale no doubt thy tongue can tell,
Which thus begins so courteously and well.

Let Otho cherish here his polish'd guest,
To him my thanks and thoughts shall be express'd."
And here their wondering host hath interposed—
"Whate'er there be between you undisclosed,
This is no time nor fitting place to mar
The mirthful meeting with a wordy war.
If thou, Sir Ezzelin, hast aught to show
Which it beths Count Lara's ear to know,
To-morrow, here, or elsewhere, as may best
Beseech your mutual judgment, speak the rest;
I pledge myself for thee, as not unknown,
Though like Count Lara now return'd alone
From other lands, almost a stranger grown;
And if from Lara's blood and gentle birth,
I augur right of courage and of worth,
He will not that untainted line belie,
Nor aught that knighthood may accord, deny."

"To-morrow be it," Ezzelin replied,
"And here our several worth and truth be tried.
I gage my life, my falchion to attest
My words, so may I mingle with the blest!"
What answers Lara? to its centre shrunk
His soul in deep abstraction sudden sunk;
The words of many, and the eyes of all
That there were gather'd, seem'd on him to fall;
But his were silent, his appear'd to stray
In far forgetfulness away—away—
Alas! that heedlessness of all around
Bespoke remembrance only too profound.

XXIV.

"To-morrow!—say, to-morrow!" farther word
Than those repeated none from Lara heard;
Upon his brow no outward passion spoke;
From his large eye no flashing anger broke;
Yet there was something fix'd in low tone,
Which show'd resolve, determined, though unknown.
He asked his cloak—his head he slightly bow'd,
And passing Ezzelin, he left the crowd;
And, as he pass'd him, smiling met the frown
With which that chieflain's brow would bear him down:
It was nor smile of mirth, no struggling pride
That curbs to scorn the wrath: it cannot hide;
But that of one in his own heart secure
Of all that he would do, or could endure.
Could this mean peace? the calmness of the good?
Or guilt grown old in desperate hardihood?

Alas! too like in confidence are each,
For man to trust to mortal look or speech;
From deeds, and deeds alone may he discern,
Truths which it wrings the unpractised heart to learn

XXV.

And Lara call'd his page, and went his way—
Well could that stripling word or sign obey:
His only follower from those climes afar,
Where the soul glows beneath a brighter star,
For Lara left the shore from whence he sprung,
In duty patient, and sedate though young;
Silent as him he served, his faith appears
Above his station, and beyond his years.
Though not unknown the tongue of Lara's land,
In such as him he rarely heard command;
But fleet his step, and clear his tones would come,
When Lara's lip breath'd forth the words of home.
Those accents as his native mountains dear,
Awake their absent echoes in his ear,
Friends', kindreds', parents', wonted voice recall,
Now lost, abjured, for one—his friend, his all:
For him earth now disclosed no other guide.
What marvel then he rarely left his side?

XXVI.

Light was his form, and darkly delicate
That brow whereon his native sun had sate,
But had not marr'd, though in his beams he grew,
The check whereon oft the unbidden blush shone through;
Yet not such blush as mounts when health would show
All the heart's hue in that delighted glow;
But 'twas a hectic tint of secret care
That for a burning moment fever'd there;
And the wild sparkle of his eye seem'd caught
From high, and lighten'd with electric thought,
Though its black orb those long low lashes' fringe
Had temper'd with a melancholy tinge;
Yet less of sorrow than of pride was there,
Or if 'twere grief, a grief that none should share;
And pleas'd not him the sport that please his age
The tricks of youth, the frolics of the page;
For hours on Lara he would fix his glance,
As all-forgotten in that watchful trance;
And from his chief withdrawn, he wander'd lone,
Brief were his answers, and his questions none;
His walk the wood, his sport some foreign book;
His resting-place the bank that curbs the brook:
He seem'd like him he served, to live apart
From all that lures the eye, and fills the heart;
To know no brotherhood, and take from earth
No gift beyond that bitter boon—our birth.

XXVII.

If sought be loved, 'twas Lara; but was shown
His faith in reverence and in deeds alone;
In mute attention; and his care, which guess'd
Each wish, fulfill'd it ere the tongue express'd.
Still there was haughtiness in all he did,
A spirit deep that brook'd not to be chid;
His zeal, though more than that of servile hands,
In act alone obeys, his air commands;
As if 'twas Lara's less than his desire
That thus he served, but surely not for hire.
Slight were the tasks enjoin'd him by his lord,
To hold the stirrup, or to bear the sword;
Again to that accustom'd couch must creep,
Where joy subsides, and sorrow sighs to sleep,
And man, o'erlabor'd with his being's strife.

Shrinks to that sweet forgetfulness of life:
There lie love's feverish hope, and cunning's grace.
Hate's working brain, and lull'd ambition's wile
O'er each vain eye oblivion's pinions wave,
And quench'd existence crouches in a grave.

What better name may slumber's bed become?
Night's sepulchre, the universal home,
Where weakness, strength, vice, virtue, sunk aspina,
Alire in naked helplessness recline;
Glad for a while to heave unconscious breath,
Yet wake to wrestle with the dread of death;
And shun, though day but dawn on ills increas,
That sleep, the loveliest, since it dreams the less.

CANTO II.

I.

Night wanes—the vapors round the mountains curl'd
Melt into morn, and Light awakes the world
Man has another day to swell the past,
And lead him near to little, but his last;
But mighty Nature bounds as from her birth,
The sun is in the heavens, and life on earth;
Flowers in the valley, splendor in the beam,
Health on the gale, and freshness in the stream.

Immortal man! behold her glories shine,
And cry, exulting inly, "they are thine!"
Gaze on, while yet thy gazed'd eye may see;
A morrow comes when they are not for thee;
And grieve what may above thy senseless bier,
Nor earth nor sky will yield a single tear;
Nor cloud shall gather more, nor leaf shall fall,
Nor gale breathe forth one sigh for thee, for all;
But creeping things shall revel in their spoil,
And fit thy clay to fertilize the soil.

II.

'Tis morn—'tis noon—assembled in the hall
The gather'd chief-tains come to Otho's call;
'Tis now the promised hour, that must proclaim
The life or death of Lara's future fame;
When Ezzelin his charge may here unfold,
And whatsoever the tale, it must be told.
His faith was pledged, and Lara's promise given,
To meet it in the eye of man and heaven.
Why comes he not? Such truths to be divulged,
Methinks the accuser's rest is long indulged.

III.

The hour is past, and Lara too is there
With self-confiding coldly patient air:
Why comes not Ezzelin? The hour is past,
And murmurs rise, and Otho's brow o'ercast
"I know my friend! his faith I cannot fear,
If yet he be on earth, expect him here;
The roof that held him in the valley stands
Between my own and noble Lara's lands;
My halls from such a guest had honor gain'd,
Nor had Sir Ezzelin his host disdain'd,
But that some previous proof forbade his stay,
And urged him to prepare against to-day:

---
The word I pledged for his I pledge again,
Or will myself redeem his knighthood's stain.

He ceased—and Lara answer'd: "I am here
To lend at thy demand a listening ear
To tales of evil from a stranger's tongue,
Whose words already might my heart have wrung,
But that I deem'd him scarcely less than mad,
Or, at the worst, a foe ignobly bad.
I know him not—but me it seems he knew
In lands where—but I must not trifle too:
Produce this babbler—or redeem the pledge;
Here in thy hold, and with thy falchion's edge."

Proud Otho on the instant, reddening, threw
His glove on earth, and forth his sabre flew:
"The last alternative befits me best,
And thus I answer for mine absent guest."

With cheek unchanging from its sallow bloom,
However near his own or other's tomb;
With hand, whose almost careless coolness spoke
Its grasp well used to deal the sabre-stroke:
With eye, though calm, determined not to spare,
Did Lara too his willing weapon bare.
In vain the circling chieftains round them closed,
For Otho's frenzy would not be opposed;
And from his lips those words of insult fell—
His sword is good who can maintain them well.

IV.

Short was the conflict; furious, blindly rash,
Vain Otho gave his bosom to the gash:
He bled, and fell; but not with deadly wound,
Stretched by a dextrous sleight along the ground.
" Demand thy life! " He answer'd not: and then
From that red floor he no'er had risen again,
For Lara's brow upon the moment grew
Almost to blackness in its demon hue;
Ana fiercer shook his angry falchion now
Than when his foe's was level'd at his brow;
Then all was stern collectness and art,
Now rose the unleaven'd hatred of his heart;
So little sparing to the foe he fell'd,
That when the approaching crowd his arm withheld,
He almost turn'd the thirsty point on those,
Who thus for mercy dared to interpose;
But to a moment's thought that purpose bent;
Yet look'd he on him still with eye intent,
As if he loathed the ineffectual strife
That left a foe, how'er o'erthrown, with life;
As if to search how far the wound he gave
Had sent his victim onward to his grave.

V.

They raised the bleeding Otho, and to Leech
Forbade all present question, sign, and speech;
The others met within a neighboring hall,
And he, incensed and heedless of them all,
The cause and conqueror in this sudden fray,
In haughty silence slowly strode away;
He back'd his steed, his homeward path he took,
Nor cast on Otho's towers a single look.

VI.

But where was he? that meteor of a night,
Who meanc'd but to disappear with light?
Where was this Ezzelin? who came and went
To leave no other trace of his intent.

He left the dome of Otho long ere morn,
In darkness, yet so well the path was worn
He could not miss it: near his dwelling lay;
But there he was not, and with coming day
Came fast inquiry, which unfolded nought
Except the absence of the chief it sought.
A chamber tenantless, a stool at rest,
His host alarm'd, his murmuring squires distress
Their search extends along, around the path,
In dread to meet the marks of prowlers' wrath;
But none are there, and not a brake hath borne,
Nor gout of blood, nor shred of mantie torn;
Nor fall nor struggle hath defaced the grass,
Which still retains a mark where murder was;
Nor dabling fingers left to tell the tale,
The bitter print of each convulsive nail,
When agonized hands, that cease to guard,
Wound in that pang the smoothness of the sward
Some such had been, if here a life was reft;
But these were not; and doubting hope is left;
And strange suspicion, whispering Lara's name.
Now daily mutters o'er his blacken'd fame;
Then sudden silent when his form appear'd,
Awaits the absence of the thing it fear'd,
Again its wonted wondering to renew,
And dye conjecture with a darker hue.

VII.

Days roll along, and Otho's wounds are heal'd,
But not his pride; and hate no more conceal'd
He was a man of power, and Lara's foe,
The friend of all who sought to work him wo,
And from his country's justice now demands
Account of Ezzelin at Lara's hands.
Who else than Lara could have cause to fear
His presence? who had made him disappear,
If not the man on whom his menaced charge
Had sate too deeply were he left at large?
The general rumor ignorantly loud,
The mystery dearest to the curious crowd;
The seeming friendliness of him who strove
To win and confide in, and awake no love;
The sweeping fierceness which his soul betray'd,
The skill with which he wielded his keen blade;
Where had his arm unwarlike caught that art?
Where had that fierceness grown upon his heart:
For it was not the blind capricious rage
A word can kindle and a word assuage;
But the deep working of a soul unmix'd
With ight where its wrath had fix'd;
Such as long power and overgorged success
Concentrates into all that's merciless;
These, link'd with that desire which ever sways
Mankind, the rather to condemn than praise,
'Gainst Lara gathering raised at length a storm,
Such as himself might fear, and foes would form
And he must answer for the absent head
Of one who haunts him still, alive or dead.

VIII.

Within that land was many a malcontent,
Who cursed the tyranny to which he bent;
That soil full many a wringing despot saw,
Who work'd his wantonness in form of law;
Long war without and frequent broil within
Had made a path for blood and giant sin,
That waited but a signal to begin
New havoc, such as civil discord blends,
Which knows no neutral, owns but foes or friends.
fix'd in his feudal fortress each was lord,
In word and deed obey'd, in soul abhor'd.
Taus Lara had inherited his lands,
And with them pining hearts and sluggish hands;
But that long absence from his native clime
Had left him stainless of oppression's crime,
And now diverted by his milder sway,
All dread by slow degrees had worn away.
The menials felt their usual awe alone,
But more for him than them that fear was grown;
They deem'd him now unhappy, though at first
Their evil judgment augur'd of the worst;
And each long restless night, and silent mood,
Was traced to sickness, fed by solitude:
And though his lonely habits threw of late
Gloom o'er his chamber, cheerful was his gate;
For thence the wretched ne'er unsoothed withdrew,
For them, at least, his soul compassion knew.
Cold to the great, contemptuous to the high,
The humble pass'd not his unheedling eye;
Much he would speak not, but beneath his roof,
They found asylum oft, and ne'er reproov.
And they who watch'd might mark that day by day
Some new retainers gather'd to his sway;
But most of late, since Ezzelin was lost,
He play'd the courteous lord and bounteous host:
Perchance his strife with Othe made him dread
Some snare prepared for his obnoxious head;
Whate'er his view, his favor more obtains
With these, the people, than his fellow thanes
If this were policy, so far 'twas sound,
The million judged but of him as they found;
From him by sterners chiefs to exile driven
They but required a shelter, and 'twas given.
By him no peasant mourn'd his rified cot,
And scarce the Serf could murmur o'er his lot;
With him old avarice found its hoard secure,
With him contempt forbore to mock the poor;
Youth, present cheer, and promised recompense
Detain'd, till all too late to part from thence:
To hate he offer'd, with the coming change,
The deep reversion of delay'd revenge;
To love, long baffled by the unequal match,
The well-won charms success was sure to snatch.
All now was ripe, he wait's but to proclaim
That slavery nothing which was still a name.
The moment came, the hour when Otho thought
Secure at last the vengeance which he sought:
His summons found the destined criminal
Begirt by thousands in his swarming hall,
Fresh from their feudal fetters newly riven,
Defying earth, and confident of heaven.
That morning he had freed the soil-bound slaves
Who dig no land for tyrants but their graves!
Such is their cry—some watchword for the fight
Must vindicate the wrong, and warp the right:
Religion—freedom—vengeance—what you will,
A word's enough to raise mankind to kill;
Some factious phrase by cunning caught and spread,
That guilt may reign, and wolves and worms be fed!

IX.

Throughout that clime the feudal chiefs had gain'd
Such sway, their infant monarch hardly reign'd;
Now was the hour for faction's rebel growth,
The Serfs contam'd the one, and hated both:
They waited but a leader, and they found
One to their cause inseparably bound;

By circumstance compell'd to plunge again,
In self-defence, amidst the strife of men.
Cut off by some mysterious fate from those Whom birth and nature meant not for his foes.
Had Lara from that night, to him accurst,
Prepared to meet, but not alone, the worst:
Some reason urged, whate'er it was, to shun
Inquiry into deeds at distance done;
By mingling with his own the cause of all,
Even if he fail'd, he still delay'd his fall.
The sullen calm that long his bosom kept,
The storm that once had spent itself and slept,
Roused by events that seem'd for doom'd to urge
His gloomy fortunes to their utmost verge.
Burst forth, and made him all he once had been,
And is again; he only changed the scene.
Light care had he for life, and less for fame,
But not less fitted for the desperate game:
He deem'd himself mark'd out for others' hate
And mock'd at ruin so they shared his fate.
What care he for the freedom of the crowd?
He raised the humble but to bend the proud.
He had hoped quiet in his suilen lair,
But man and destiny beset him there:
Insur'd to hunters, he was found at bay;
And they must kill, they cannot spare the prey
Stern, unambiguous, silent, he had been.
Henceforth a calm spectator of life's scene;
But, dragg'd again upon the arena, stood
A leader not unequal to the feud;
In voice—mien—gesture—savage nature spoke,
And from his eye the gladiator broke.

X.

What boots the oft-repeated tale of strife,
The feast of vultures, and the waste of life?
The varying fortune of each separate field,
The fierce that vanquish'd, and the faint that yield'd
The smoking ruin, and the crumbled wall?
In this the struggle was the same with all;
Save that distemper'd passions lent their force
In bitterness that banish'd all remorse.
None sued, for Mercy knew her cry was vain.
The captive died upon the battle-plain:
In either cause, one rage alone possesst
The empire of the alternate victor's breast;
And they that smote for freedom or for away,
Deem'd few were slain, while more remain'd to slay
It was too late to check the wasting brand,
And Desolation reap'd the banish'd land;
The torch was lighted, and the flame was spread,
And Carnage smiled upon her daily dead.

XI.

Fresh with the nerve the new-born impulse sprung
The first success to Lara's numbers chung:
But that vain victory hath ruin'd all,
They form no longer to their leader's call;
In blind confusion on the foe they press,
And think to snatch is to secure success.
The lust of booty, and the thirst of hate,
Lure on the broken brigands to their fate
In vain he doth whate'er a chief may do,
To check the headlong fury of that crew;
In vain their stubborn ardor he would tame
The hand that kindles cannot quench the flame
The wary foe alone hath turn'd their mood,
And shown their rashness to that erring brood.
The feign'd retreat—The nightly ambuscade,
The daily harass, and the flight delay'd,
The long privation, and the hoped supply,
The tenacious rest beneath the humid sky,
The stubborn wall that marks the leaguer's art,
And pulls the patience of his baffled heart,
Of these, they had not deem'd: the battle-day
They could encounter as a veteran may;
But more preferr'd the fury of the strife,
And present death, to hourly suffering life:
And famine, wrings, and fever sweeps away
His numbers melting fast from their array;
Intemperate triumph fades to discontent,
And Lara's soul alone seems still unent
But few remain to aid his voice and hand;
And thousands dwindled to a scanty band
Desperate, though few, the last and best remain'd
To mourn the discipline they late disdain'd.
One hope survives, the frontier is not far,
And thence they may escape from native war;
And bear within them to the neighboring state
An exile's sorrows, or an outlaw's hate:
Hard is the task their father-land to quit,
But harder still to perish or submit.

XII.

It is resolved—they march—consenting Night
Guides with her star their dim and torchless flight;
Already they perceive its tranquil beam
Sleep on the surface of the barrier stream;
Already they descry—Is you the bank?
Away! 'tis lined with many a hostile rank.
Return or fly!—What glitters in the rear?
'Tis Otho's banner—the pursuer's spear!
Are those the shepherds' fires upon the height?
Also! they blaze too widely for the flight;
Cut off from hope, and compass'd in the toil,
Less blood parcheur hath bought a richer spoil!

XIII.

A moment's pause, 'tis but to breathe their band,
Or shall they onward press, or here withstand?
It matters little—if they charge the foes
Who by the border-stream their march oppose,
Some few, perchance, may break and pass the line,
However link'd to baflle such design.
"The charge be ours! to wait for their assault
Were fate well worthy of a coward's halt."
Forth flies each sabre, rein'd is every steed,
And the next word shall scarce outstrip the deed;
In the next tone of Lara's gathering breath
How many shall but hear the voice of death.

XIV.

His blade is bared, in him, there is an air
As deep, but far too tranquil for despair;
A something of indifference more than then
Becomes the bravest, if they feel for men—
He turn'd his eye on Kaled, ever near,
And still too faithful to betray one fear;
Perchance 'twas but the moon's dim twilight threw
Along his aspect an unwonted hue
Of mournful paleness, whose deep tint express
The truth, and not the terror of his breast.
This Lara mark'd and laid his hand on his;
It trembled not in such an hour as this;
His lip was silent, scarcely beat his heart,
His eye alone proclaim'd, "We will not part!"

Thy band may perish, or thy friends may nec
Farewell to life, but not adieu to thee!"
The word hath pass'd his lips, and onward driven
Pours the link'd band through ranks asunder rivet.
Well has each steed obey'd the armed heel,
And fatal the sabre, and rings the steel;
Outnumber'd, not outbraved, they still oppose
Despair to daring, and a front to foes;
And blood is mingled with the dashing stream
Which runs all redly till the morning beam.

XV.

Commanding, aiding, animating all,
When foes appear'd to press, or friend to fall
Cheers Lara's voice, and waves or strikes his steed,
Inspiring hope himself had ceased to feel.
None fled, for well they knew that flight were vain.
But those that waver turn to smile again,
While yet they find the firmest of the foe
Recoil before their leader's look and blow:
Now girt with numbers, now almost alone,
He foils their ranks, or reunites his own;
Himself he spared not—once they seem'd to fly—
Now was the time, he waved his hand on high,
And shook—Why sudden droops that plumed crest!
The shaft is sped—the arrow's in his breast!
That signal arrow left the unpardoned side,
And Death hath stricken down you arm of pride.
The word of triumph faint from his tongue;
That hand, so raised, how droopingly it hung!
But yet the sword instinctively retains,
Though from its fellow shrink the falling reins;
These Kaled snatch'd: dizzy with the blow,
And senseless bending o'er his saddle-bow,
Perceives not Lara that his anxious page
Beguil'd his charger from the combat's rage.
Meantime his followers charge, and charge again—
Too mix'd the slayers now to heed the slain.

XVI.

Day glimmers on the dying and the dead,
The cloven cuirass, and the helpless head;
The war-horse masterless is on the earth,
And that last gasp hath burst his bloody girth;
And near, yet quivering with what life remain'd,
The heel that urged him and the band that rein'd;
And some too near that rolling torrent lie,
Whose waters mock the lip of those that die;
That panting thirst which scorches in the breath
Of those that die the soldier's fiery breath,
In vain impels the burning mouth to crave
One drop—the last—to cool it for the grave;
With feeble and convulsive effort swept,
Their limbs along the crimson'd turf have crept
The faint remains of life such struggles waste,
But yet they reach the stream and bend to taste
They feel its freshness, and almost partake—
Why pause? No further thirst have they to slake
It is unquench'd, and yet they feel it not;
It was an agony—but now forgot!

XVII.

Beneath a lime, remote from the scene,
Where but for him that strife had never been,
A breathing but devoted warrior lay
'Twas Lara bleeding fast from life away:
His follower one, and now his only guide,
Kneels Kaled watchful o'er his welling side,
And with his scarf would staunch the tides that rush
With each convolution. in a blacker gush;
LARA.

And then, as his faint breathing waxes low,
In feebler, not less fatal trickling flow;
He scarce can speak, but motions him 'tis vain,
And merely adds another throb to pain.
And claps the hand that pang which would assuage,
And sadly smiles his thanks to that dark page,
Who nothing fears, nor feels, nor heeds, nor sees,
Save that damp brow which rests upon his knees;
Save that pale aspect, where the eye, though dim,
Yield all the light that shone on earth for him.

XVIII.
The foe arrives, who long had search'd the field,
Their triumph nought till Lara too should yield;
They would remove him, but they see 'twere vain,
And he regards them with a calm disdain,
That rose to reconcile him with his fate,
And that escape to death from living hate:
And Otho comes, and leaping from his steed,
Looks on the bleeding foe that made him bleed,
And questions of his state; he answers not,
Scarce glances on him as on one forgot,
And turns to Kaled,—each remaining word;
They understood not, if distinctly heard;
His dying tones are in that other tongue,
To which some strange remembrance wildly clung.
They speak of other scenes, but what—is known
To Kaled, whom their meaning reach'd alone;
And he replied, though faintly, to their sound,
While gazed the rest in dumb amazement round:
They seem'd even then—that twain—unto the last
To half forget the present in the past;
To share between themselves some separate fate,
Whose darkness none beside should penetrate.

XIX.
Their words though faint were many—from the tone
Their import those who heard could judge alone;
From this, you might have deem'd young Kaled's death
More near than Lara's by his voice and breath,
So sad, so deep, and hesitating broke.
The accents his scarce-moving pale lips spoke;
But Lara's voice, though low, at first was clear
And calm, till murmuring death gisp'd hoarsely near,
But from his visage little could we guess,
So unregentant, dark and passionless,
Save that when struggling nearer to his last,
Upon that page his eye was kindly cast;
And once as Kaled's answering accents coast,
Rose Lara's hand, and pointed to the East:
Where (as then the breaking sun from high Roll'd back the clouds) the morrow caught his eye,
Or that 'twas chance, or some remember'd scene,
That raised his arm to point where such had been,
Scarce Kaled seem'd to know, but turn'd away,
As if his heart abhor'd that coming day,
And shrunk his glance before that morning light,
To look on Lara's brow—where all grew night.
Yet sense seem'd left, though better were its loss;
For when one near display'd the absolving cross,
And proffer'd to his touch the holy bead,
Of which his parting soul might own the need,
He look'd upon it with an eye profane,
And smiled—Heaven pardon! if 'twere with disdain;
And Kaled, though he spoke not, nor withdrew
From Lara's face his fix'd despairing view,
With brow repulsive, and with gesture swift,
'Fling back the hand which held the sacred gift,
As if such but disturb'd the expiring man,
Nor seem'd to know his life but then began,
That life of Immortality, secure
To none, save them whose faith in Christ is sure.

XX.
But gasping heaved the breath that Lara drew,
And dull the film along his dim eye grew;
His limbs stretch'd flattering, and his head droop'd o'er
The weak yet still untiring knee that bore;
He press'd the hand he hold upon his heart—
It beats no more, but Kaled will not part
With the cold grasp, but feels, and feels in vain,
For that faint thro' which answers not again.
"It beats!"—away, thou dreamer! he is gone—
It once was Lara which thou look'st upon.

XXI.
He gazed, as if not yet had pass'd away
The haughty spirit of that humble clay;
And those around have roused him from his trance,
But cannot tear from thence his fixed glance;
And when in raising him from where he bore,
Within his arms the form that felt no more,
He saw the head his breast would still sustain,
Roll down like earth to earth upon the plain;
He did not dash himself thereby, nor tear
The glossy tendrils of his raven hair,
But strove to stand and gaze, but reel'd and fell,
Scarce breathing more than that he loved so well
Than that he loved! Oh! never yet beneath
The breast of man such trusty love may breathe,
That trying moment hath at once reveal'd
The secret long and yet but half-conceal'd;
In baring to revive that lifeless breast,
Its grief seem'd ended, but the sex confest;
And life return'd, and Kaled felt no shame—
What now to her was Womanhood or Fame? 3

XXII.
And Lara sleeps not where his fathers sleep,
But where he died his grave was dug as deep,
Nor is his mortal slumber less profound,
Though priest nor bless'd nor marble deck'd the mound,
And he was mourn'd by one whose quiet grief,
Less loud, outlasts a people's for their chief.
Vain was all question ask'd her of the past,
And vain o'en menace—silent to the last;
She told nor whence, nor why she left behind
Her all for one who seem'd but little kind.
Why did she love him? Curious fool!—be still—
Is human love the growth of human will?
To her he might be gentleness; the stern
Have deeper thoughts than your dull eyes discern,
And when they love, your smilers guess not how
Beats the strong heart, though less the lips avow.
They were not common links, that form'd the chain
That bound to Lara Kaled's heart and brain,
But that wild tale she brook'd not to unfold,
And seal'd is now each lip that could have told.

XXIII.
They laid him in the earth, and on his breast,
Besides the wound that sent his soul to rest,
They found the scatter'd dints of many a scar,
Which were not planted there in recent war:
Where'er had pass'd his summer years of life,
It seems they vanish'd in a land of strife;
But all unknown his glory or his guilt,
These only told that somewhere blood was spilt,
And Ezzelin, who might have spoke the past,
Return'd no more—that night appear'd his last.

XXIV.
Upon that night (a peasant's is the tale)
A Serf that cross'd the intervening vale,
When Cynthia's light almost gave way to morn,
And nearly veil'd in mist her waning horn;
A Serf, that rose betimes to thread the wood,
And hew the bough that bought his children's food,
Pass'd by the river that divides the plain
Of Otho's lands and Lara's broad domain:
He heard a tramp—a horse and horseman broke
From out the wood—before him was a cloak
Wrapt round some burden at his saddle-bow;
Bent was his head, and hidden was his brow.
Roused by the sudden sight at such a time,
And some foreboding that it might be crime,
Himself unheeded watch'd the stranger's course,
Who reach'd the river, bounded from his horse,
And lifting thence the burden which he bore,
Heaved up the bank, and dashed it from the shore,
Then paused, and look'd, and turn'd, and seem'd to watch,
And still another hurried glance would snatch,
And follow with his step the stream that flow'd,
As if even yet too much its surface show'd:
At once he started, stoop'd, around him strown
The winter floods had scatter'd heaps of stone;
Of these the heaviest thence he gather'd there,
And slung them with a more than common care.
Meantime the Serf had crept to where unseen
Himself might safely mark what this might mean;
He caught a glimpse, as of a floating breast,
And something glitter'd starlike on the vest,
But ere he well could mark the buoyant trunk,
A massy fragment smote it, and it sunk:
It rose again but indistinct to view,
And left the waters of a purple hue,
Then deeply disappear'd: the horseman gazed,
Fill'd at' b'd the latest eddy it had raised;
Then turning, vaulted on his paviug steed,
And instant spur'd him into panting speed.
His face was mask'd—the features of the dead
If dead it were, escaped the observer's dread;
But if in sooth a star its bosom bore,
Such is the badge that knighthood ever wore,
And such 'tis known Sir Ezzelin had worn
Upon the night that led to such a morn.
If thus he perish'd, Heaven receive his soul!
His undiscover'd limbs to ocean roll;
And charity upon the hope would dwell,
It was not Lara's hand by which he fell.

XXV.
And Kaled—Lara—Ezzelin, are gone,
Alike without their monumental stone!
The first, all efforts vainly strove to wean
From lingering where her chieftain's blood had been Grief had so tamed a spirit once too proud,
Her tears were few, her wailing never loud;
But furious would you tear her from the spot
Where yet she scarce believed that he was not
Her eye shot forth with all the living fire
That haunts the tigress in her whelpless ire,
But left to waste her weary moments there,
She talk'd all idly unto shapes of air,
Such as the busy brain of Sorrow paints,
And wos to listen to her fond complaints:
And she would sit beneath the very tree
Where lay his drooping head upon her knee;
And in that posture where she saw him fall,
His words, his looks, his dying grasp recall;
And she had shorn, but saved her raven hair,
And oft would snatch it from her bosom there,
And fold, and press it gently to the ground,
As if she stanch'd anew some phantom's wound
Herself would question, and for him reply;
Then rising, start, and beckon him to fly
From some imagined spectre in pursuit;
Then seat her down upon some linden's root,
And hide her visage with her meagre hand,
Or trace strange characters along the sand—
This could not last—she lies by him she loved,
Her tale untold—her truth too dearly proved.
NOTE TO LARA.

The event in section xxiv. Canto II. was suggested by the description of the death or rather burial of the Duke of Gandia.

The most interesting and particular account of this mysterious event is given by Burchard, and is in substance as follows: 'On the eighth day of June, the Cardinal of Valenza, and the Duke of Gandia, sons of the Pope, supped with their mother, Vanozza, near the church of S. Pietro ad montan., (near the palace) where a large number of people were present at the entertainment. A late hour approaching, and the cardinal having reminded his brother, that it was time to return to the apostolic palace, they mounted their horses or mules, with only a few attendants, and proceeded together as far as the palace of the Cardinal Ascacio Sforza, when the duke informed the cardinal, that before he returned home, he had to pay a visit of pleasure. Dismissing therefore all his attendants except his stajiero, or footman, and a person in a mask, who had paid him a visit whilst he was asleep, and who, during the space of a month or thereabouts, previous to this time, had called upon him almost daily, at the apostolic palace, he took this person behind him on his mule, and proceeded to the street of the Jews, where he quitted his servant, directing him to remain there until a certain hour; when, if he did not return, he might repair to the palace. The duke then seated the person in the mask behind him, and rode, I know not whither; out in that night he was assassinated, and thrown into the river. The servant, after having been dismissed, was also assaulted and mortally wounded; and although he was attended with great care, yet such was his situation, that he could give no intelligible account of what had befallen his master. In the morning, the duke not having returned to the palace, his servants began to be alarmed; and one of them informed the pontiff of the evening excursion of his sons, and that the duke had not yet made his appearance. This gave the pope no small anxiety; but he conjectured that the duke had been attacked by some courteous to pass the night with her, and not choosing to quit the house in open day, had waited till the following evening to return home. When, however, the evening arrived, and he found himself disappointed in his expectations, he became deeply afflicted, and began to make inquiries from different persons, whom he ordered to search for the Duke. Among these was a man named Giorgio Schiavoni, who, having discharged some timber from a bark in the river, had remained on board the vessel to watch it, and being interrogated whether he had seen any one thrown into the river or the night preceding, he replied, that he saw two men on foot, who came down the street, and looked diligently about, to observe whether any person was passing. That seeing no one, they returned, and a short time afterwards two others came, and looked around in the same manner as the former: no person still appearing, they gave a sign to their companions, when a man came, mounted on a white horse, having behind him a dead body, the head and arms of which hung on one side, and the feet on the other side of the horse; the two persons on foot supporting the body, to prevent its falling. They thus proceeded towards that part where the filth of the city is usually discharged into the river, and turning the horse, with his tail towards the water, the two persons took the dead body by the arms and feet, and with all their strength flung it into the river. The person on horseback then asked if they had thrown it in, to which they replied, Signor, si (yes, Sir.) He then looked towards the river, and seeing a mantle floating on the stream, he inquired what it was that appeared black, to which they answered, it was a mantle; and one of them threw stones upon it, in consequence of which it sunk. The attendants of the pontiff then inquired from Giorgio, why he had not revealed this to the governor of the city; to which he replied, that he had seen in his time a hundred dead bodies thrown into the river at the same place, without any inquiry being made respecting them, and that he had not therefore, considered it as a matter of any importance. The fishermen and seamen were then collected, and ordered to search the river, where, on the following evening, they found the body of the duke, with his habit entire, and thirty ducats in his purse. He was pierced with nine wounds, one of which was in his throat, the others in his head, body, and limbs. No sooner was the pontiff informed of the death of his son, and that he had been thrown, like filth, into the river, than, giving way to his grief, he shut himself up in a chamber, and wept bitterly. The Cardinal of Segovia, and other attendants on the pope, went to the door, and after many hours spent in persuasions and exhortations, prevailed upon him to admit them. From the evening of Wednesday, till the following Saturday, the pope took no food; nor did he sleep from Thursday morning till the same hour on the ensuing day. At length, however, giving way to the entreaties of his attendants, he began to restrain his sorrow, and to consider the injury which his own health might sustain, by the further indulgence of his grief.'—Roscoe's Leo Tenth, vol. I. page 263.

The grand army of the Turks, (in 1715,) under the Prime Vizier, to open to themselves a way into the heart of the Morea, and to form the siege of Napoli di Romania, the most considerable place in all that country,* thought it best in the first place to attack Corinth, upon which they made several storms. The garrison being weakened, and the governor seeing it was impossible to hold out against so mighty a force, thought it fit to beat a parley; but while they were treating about the articles, one of the magazines in the Turkish camp, wherein they had six hundred barrels of powder, blew up by accident, whereby six or seven hundred men were killed; which so enraged the infidels, that they would not grant any capitulation, but stormed the place with so much fury, that they took it, and put most of the garrison, with Signior Minotti, the governor, to the sword. The rest, with Antonio Benbo, provetor extraordinary, were made prisoners of war."—History of the Turks, vol. iii. p. 151.

I.

Many a vanish'd year and age,
And tempest's breath, and battle's rage,
Have swept o'er Corinth; yet she stands
A fortress form'd to Freedom's hand.

* Napoli di Romania is not now the most considerable place in the Morea, but Tripolitza, where the Pacha resides, and maintains his government.

Napoli is near Argos. I visited all three in 1810-11; and in the course of journeying through the country from my first arrival in 1809, I crossed the Isthmus eight times in my way from Athens to the Morea, over the mountains, as in the other direction, when passing from the Gulf of Athens to that of Lepanto. Both the routes are picturesque and beautiful, though very different: that by sea has more scenery, but the voyage being always within sight of land, and often very near it, presents many attractive views of the distant islands, Eorina, Ithaca, &c., and the coast of the continent.

The whirlwind's wrath, the earthquake's shock
Have left untouch'd her hoary rock,
The key-stone of a land, which still,
Though fall'n, looks proudly on that hill,
The landmark to the double tide
That purple rolls on either side,
As if their waters chafed to meet,
Yet pause and crouch beneath her feet.
But could the blood before her shed
Since first Timolean's brother bled,
Or baffled Persian's despot fled,
Arise from out the earth which drank
The stream of slaughter as it sank,
That sanguine ocean would o'erflow
Her isthmus idly spread below:
Or could the bones of all the slain,
Who perish'd there, be piled again,
That rival pyramid would rise
More mountain-like, through those clear sinks
Than you tower-eapt Acropolis,
Which seems the very clouds to kiss.

II.

On dun Cithaeron's ridge appears
The gleam of twice ten thousand spears;
And downward to the Isthmian plain,
From shore to shore of either main,
The tent is pitch'd, the crescent shines
Along the Moslem's leaguering lines;
And the dusk Spahi's bands advance
Beneath each bearded pacha's glance;
And far and wide as eye can reach
The turban'd cohorts throng the beach:
And there the Arab's camel kneels,
And there his steed the Tartar wheels;
The Turco-man hath left his herd,
The sabre round his loins to gird.
And there the valiant thunders pour,
Till waves grow smoother to the roar.
The trench is dug, the cannon's breath
Wings the far hissing globe of death;
Fast whirl the fragments from the wall,
Which crumbles with the ponderous ball;
And from that wall the foe replies,
O'er dusty plain and smoky skies,
With fires that answer fast and well
The summons of the Infidel.

III.
But near and nearest to the wall
Of those who wish and work its fall,
With deeper skill in war's black art
Than Othman's sons, and high of heart
As any chief that ever stood
Triumphant in the fields of blood;
From post to post, and deed to deed,
Fast spurring on his reeking steed,
Where sallying ranks the trench assail,
And make the foremost Moslem quail;
Or where the battery, guarded well,
Remains as yet impregnable,
Aliighting cheerly to inspire
The soldier slackening in his fire,
The first and freshest of the host
Which Stamboul's sultan there can boast,
To guide the follower o'er the field,
To point the tube, the lance to wield,
Or whirl around the bickering blade;—
Was Alp, the Adrian renegade!

IV.
From Venice—once a race of worth
His gentle sire—he drew his birth;
But late an exile from her shore,
Against his countrymen he bore
The arms they taught to bear; and now
The turban girt his shaven brow.
Through many a change had Corinth pass'd
With Greece to Venice' rule at last;
And here, before her walls, with those to Greece and Venice equal foes,
He stood a foe, with all the zeal
Which young and fiery converts feel,
Within whose heated bosom thrones
The memory of a thousand wrongs.
To him had Venice ceased to be
Her ancient civic boast—‘t the Free;”
And in the palace of St. Mark
Unnamed accusers in the dark
Within the “Lion's mouth” had placed
A charge against him unexecuted;
He fled in time, and saved his life,
To waste his future years in strife,
That taught his land how great her loss
In him who triumph'd o'er the Cross,
'Gainst which he rear'd the Crescent high,
And battled to avenge or die.

V.
Coumourg'i—he whose closing scene
Adorn'd the triumph of Eugene,
When on Carlowitz's bloody plain
The last and mightiest of the slain,
He sank, regretting not to die,
But curst the Christian's victory—

Coumourgi—can his glory cease,
That latest conqueror of Greece,
Till Christian hands to Greece restore
The freedom Venice gave of yore?
A hundred years have roll'd away
Since he refused the Moslem's sway,
And now he led the Mussulman,
And gave the guidance of the van
To Alp, who well repaid the trust
By cities levell'd with the dust;
And proved, by many a deed of death,
How firm his heart in novel faith.

VI.
The walls grew weak; and fast and hot
Against them pour'd the ceaseless shot,
With unsubating fury sent
From battery to battlement;
And thunder-like the pealing din
Rose from each heated culverin;
And here and there some crackling domo
Was fired before the exploding bomb:
And as the fabric sank beneath
The shattering shell's volcanic breath,
In red and wreathing columns flash'd
The flame, as loud the ruin crash'd.
Or into countless meteors driven,
Its earth-stars melted into heaven;
Whose clouds that day grew doubly dun,
Impervious to the hidden sun,
With voluted smoke that slowly grew
To one wide sky of sulphurous hu.

VII.
But not for vengeance, long delay'd,
Alone, did Alp, the renegade,
The Moslem warriors sternly teach
His skill to pierce the promised breach;
Within these walls a maid was pent
His hope would win without consent
Of that inexorable sire,
Whose heart refused him in its ire
When Alp, beneath his Christian name,
Her virgin hand aspired to claim.
In happier mood, and earlier time,
While unimpeach'd for traitorous crime,
Gayest in gondola or ball,
He glitter'd through the Carnival;
And tun'd the softest serenade
That e'er on Adria's waters play'd
At midnight to Italian maid.

VIII.
And many deep'd her heart was won.
For sought by numbers, given to none,
Had young Francesca's hand remain'd
Still by the church's bonds unchain'd:
And when the Adriatic boats
Lanciott to the Paynim shore
Her wonted smiles were seen to fail,
And pensive wax'd the maid and pale;
More constant at confessional,
More rare at masque and festival;
Or seen at such, with downcast eyes,
Which conquer'd hearts they ceased to prize
With listless look she seems to gaze,
With humbler care her form arrays;
Her voice less lively in the song,
Her step, though light, less fleet among
The pairs, on whom the Morning's glance
Breaks, yet unsated with the dance.

IX.

sent by the state to guard the land,
(Which wrested from the Moslem's hand,
While Sobieski tamed his pride
By Buda's wall and Danube's side,
The chiefs of Venice wrung away
From Patra to Euboa's bay,)
Minotti held in Corinth's towers
The Doge's delegated powers,
While yet the pitying eye of Peace
Smiled o'er her long-forgotten Greece:
And ere that faithless trust was broke
Which freed her from the unchristian yoke.
With him his gentle daughter came,
Nor there, since Menelaus' dame
Forsook her lord and land, to prove
What woes await on lawless love,
Had fairer form adorn'd the shore
Than she, the matchless stranger, bore.

X.

The wall is rent, the ruins yawn;
And, with to-morrow's earliest dawn,
O'er the disjointed mass shall vault
The foremost of the fierce assault.
The heads are rank'd; the chosen van
Of Tartar and of Muselman,
The full of hope, misnamed "forlorn,"
Who told the thought of death in scorn,
And win their way with falchion's force,
Or pave the path with many a corse,
O'er which the following brave may rise,
Their stepping-stone—the last who dies!

XI.

'Tis midnight; on the mountains brown
The cold round moon shines deeply down;
Blue roll the waters, blue the sky
Spreads like an ocean hung on high,
Bespangled with those isles of light,
So wildly, spiritually bright;
Who ever gazed upon them shining,
And turn'd to earth without repining,
Nor wish'd for wings to flee away,
And mix with their eternal ray?
The waves on either shore lay there
Calm, clear, and azure as the air;
And scarce their foam the pebbles shook,
But murmur'd meekly as the brook.
The winds were pillow'd on the waves;
The banners droop'd along their staves,
And, as they fell around them furling,
Above them shone the crescent curling;
And that deep silence was unbroke,
Save where the watch his signal spoke,
Save where the steed neigh'd oft and shrill,
And echo answer'd from the hill,
And the wide hum of that wild host
Rustled like leaves from coast to coast,
As rose the Muezzin's voice in air
In midnight call to wonted prayer;
It rose, that chant'd mournful strain,
Like some lone spirit's o'er the plain:
'Twas musical, but sadly sweet,
Such as when winds and harp-strings meet,

And take a long unmeasured tone,
To mortal minstrelsy unknown.
It seem'd to those within the wall
A cry prophetic of their fall:
It struck even the besieger's ear
With something ominous and drear,
An undefined and sudden thrill,
Which makes the heart a moment still,
Then beat with quicker pulse, ashamed
Of that strange sense its silence framed;
Such as a sudden passing-bell
Wakes, though but for a stranger's kneel

XII.

The tent of Alp was on the shore;
The sound was hush'd, the prayer was o'er;
The watch was set, the night-round made,
All mandates issued and obey'd:
'Tis but another anxious night,
His pains the morrow may require
With all revenge and love can pay,
In guardon of their long delay.
Few hours remain, and he hath need
Of rest, to nerve for many a deed
Of slaughter; but within his soul
The thoughts like troubled waters roll.
He stood alone among the host;
Not his the loud fanatic boast
To plant the crescent o'er the cross,
Or risk a life with little loss,
Secure in paradise to be
By Houri's loved immortally:
Nor his, what burning patriots feel,
The stern exaltedness of zeal,
Profuse of blood, untired in toil,
When battling on the parent soil.
He stood alone—a renegade
Against the country he betray'd;
He stood alone amidst his band,
Without a trusted heart or hand;
They follow'd him, for he was brave,
And great the spoil he got and gave;
They eurched to him, for he had skill
To warp and wield the vulgar will;
But still his Christian origin
With them was little less than sin.
They envied even the faithless fame
He earn'd beneath a Moslem name;
Since he, their mightiest chief had been
In youth a bitter Nazarene.
They did not know how pride can stoop,
When baffled feelings withering droop;
They did not know how hate can burn
In hearts once changed from soft to stern;
Nor all the false and fatal zeal
The convert of revenge can feel.
He ruled them—man may rule the worst,
By ever daring to be first:
So lions o'er the jackal sway;
The jackal points, he fells the prey,
Then on the vulgar yelling press,
To gorge the relics of success.

XIII.

His head grows fever'd, and his pulse
The quick successive throbs convulse;
In vain from side to side he throws
His form, in courtship of repose.
THE SIEGE OF CORINTH.

Or if he dozed, a sound, a start
Awoke him with a sunken heart.
The turban on his hot brow press'd,
The mail weigh'd lead-like on his breast,
Though oft and long beneath its weight
Upon his eyes had slumber sate,
Without or couch or canopy,
Except a rougher field and sky
Than now might yield a warrior's bed,
Than now along the heaven was spread;
He could not rest, he could not stay
Within his tent to wait for day,
But walk'd him forth along the sand,
Where thousand sleepers strew'd the strand
What pillow'd them? and why should he
More wakeful than the humblest be,
Since more their peril, worse their toil?
And yet they fearless dream of spoil;
While he alone, where thousands pass'd
A night of sleep, perchance their last,
In sickly vigi wander'd on,
And envir'd all he gazed upon.

XIV
He felt his soul become more light
Beneath the freshness of the night.
Cool was the silent sky though calm,
And bathed his brow with airy balm:
Behind, the camp—before him lay,
In many a winding creek and bay,
Lepanto's gulf; and, on the brow
Of Delphi's hill, unshaken snow,
High and eternal, such as shone
Through thousand summers brightly gone,
Along the gulf, the mount, the elime;
It will not melt, like man, to time:
Tyrant and slave are swept away,
Less form'd to wear before the ray;
But that white vell, the lightest, fairest
Which on the mighty mount thou hail'st,
While tower and tree are torn and rent,
Shines o'er its craggy battlement;
In form a peak, in height a cloud,
In texture like a hovering shroud,
Thus high by parting Freedom spread,
As from her fond abode she fled,
And linger'd on the spot, where long
Her prophet spirit spake in song.
Oh, till her step at moments falters
O'er wither'd fields, and ruin'd altars,
And fain would wake, in souls too broken,
By pointing to each glorious token.
But vain her voice, till better days
Dawn in those yet remember'd rays
Which shone upon the Persian flying,
And saw the Spartan smile in dying.

XV.
Not mindless of these mighty times
Was Alp, despite his flight and crimes
And through this night, as on he wander'd,
And o'er the past and present ponder'd,
And thought upon the glorious dead
Who there in better cause had bled,
He felt how faint and feebly dim
The fame that could accrue to him,
Who cheer'd the band, and waved the sword,
A traitor in a turban'd horse:
And led them to the lawless siege,
Whose best success were sacrilege.
Not so had those his fancy number'd,
The chiefs whose dust around him slumber'd
Their phalanx marshall'd on the plain,
Whose bulwarks were not then in vain.
They fell devoted, but undying;
The very gale their names seem'd sighing:
The waters murmur'd of their name;
The woods were peopled with their fame;
The silent pillar, lone and gray,
Claim'd kindred with their sacred clay;
Their spirits wrapt the dusky mountain,
Their memory sparkled o'er the fountain:
The meanest rill, the mightiest river
Roll'd mingling with their fame for ever.
Despite of every yoke she bears,
That land is glory's still and theirs!
'Tis still a watchword to the earth:
When man would do a deed of worth,
He points to Greece, and turns to tread.
So sanction'd, on the tyrant's head:
He looks to her, and rushes on
Where life is lost, or freedom won.

XVI.
Still by the shore Alp mutely mused,
And wou'd the freshness Night diffused.
There shrinks no ebb in that tideless sea,
Which changeless rolls eternally;
So that wildest of waves, in their angriest mood,
Scarcely break on the bounds of the land for a rood.
And the powerless moon beholds them flow,
Headless if she come or go:
Calm or high, in main or bay,
On their course she hath no sway.
The rock uncur'd, its base doth bare,
And looks o'er the surf, but it comes not there.
And the fringe of the foam may be seen below,
On the line that it left long ages ago:
A smooth short space of yellow sand
Between it and the greener land.

He wander'd on, along the beach,
Till within the range of a carbine's reach
Of the leaguer'd wall; but they saw him not,
Or how could he 'scape from the hostile shot?
Did traitors lurk in the Christians' hold?
Were their hands grown stiff, or their hearts wax'd cold?
I know not, in sooth; but from yonder wall
There flash'd no fire, and there hisse'd no ball,
Though he stood beneath the bastion's frowns,
That flank'd the seaward gate of the town;
Though he heard the sound, and could almost tell
The sullen words of the sentinel,
As his measured step on the stone below
Clank'd, as he paced it to and fro;
And he saw the lean dogs beneath the wall
Hold o'er the dead their carnival,
Gorging and growling o'er carcass and limb;
They were too busy to bark at him!
From a Tartar's skull they had stripp'd the flesh,
As ye peel the fig when its fruit is fresh;
And their white tusks craunch'd o'er the whiter skull,
As t slipp'd through their jaws, when their edge grew dull.
As they lazily mumbled the bones of the dead,
When they scarce could rise from the spot where they fed;
So well had they broken a lingering fast
With those who had fallen for that night's repast.
And Alp knew, by the turbans that roll'd on the sand,
The foremost of these were the best of his band:
Crimson and green were the shawls of their wear,
And each scalp had a single long tuft of hair:
All the rest was shaven and bare.
The Del's were in the wild dog's jaw,
The hair was tangled round his jaw.
But close by the shore, on the edge of the gulf,
There sat a vulture flapping a wolf,
Who had stolen from the hills, but kept away,
Scarred by the dogs, from the human prey;
But he seized on his share of a steed that lay
Pick'd by the birds, on the sands of the bay.

XVII.
Alp turn'd him from the sickening sight;
Never had shaken his nerves in fight;
But he better could brook to behold the dying,
Deep in the tide of their warm blood lying,
Sear'd with the death-thirst, and writhing in vain,
Than the perishing dead who are past all pain.
There is something of pride in the perilous hour,
Whate'er be the shape in which death may lower;
For Fame is there to say who bleeds,
And Honor's eye on daring deeds!
But when all is past, it is humbling to tread
O'er the wertaining field of the tombless dead,
And see worms of the earth and fowls of the air,
Beasts of the forest, all gathering there;
All regarding man as their prey,
All rejoicing at his decay,

XVIII.
There is a temple in ruin stands,
Fashion'd by long forgotten hands;
Two or three columns, and many a stone,
Marble and granite, with grass o'ergrown!
Out upon Time! it will leave no more
Of the things to come than the things before!
Out upon Time! who for ever will leave
But enough of the past for the future to grieve
O'er that which hath been, and o'er that which must be:
What we have seen our sons shall see;
Remnants of things that have pass'd away,
Fragments of stone, rear'd by creatures of clay.

XIX.
He sate him down at a pillar's base,
And pass'd his hand athwart his face;
Like one in dreary musings mood,
Declining was his attitude;
His head was drooping on his breast,
Fever'd, throbbing, and oppress'd;
And o'er his brow, so downward bent,
Oft his beating fingers went,
Hurriedly, as you may see
Your own run over the ivory key,
Ere the measured tone is taken
By the chords you would awaken:
There he sate all heavily,
As he heard the night-wind sigh.

Was it the wind, through some hollow stone,
Sent than soft and tender moan?
He lifted his head, and he look'd on the sea,
But it was unrippled as glass may be;
He look'd on the long grass—it wav'd not a blade.
How was that gentle sound convey'd?
He look'd to the banners—each flag lay still,
So did the leaves on Citharon's hill,
And he felt not a breath come over his cheek
What did that sudden sound bespeak?
He turn'd to the left—is he sure of sight?
There sate a lady, youthful and bright!

XX.
He started up with more of fear
Than if an armed foe were near.
"God of my fathers! what is here?"
Who art thou, and wherefore sent
So near a hostile armament?
His trembling hands refused to sign
The cross he deem'd no more divine:
He had resuming it in that hour,
But conscience wrung away the power.
He gazed, he saw: he knew the face
Of beauty, and the form of grace;
It was Francesca by his side,
The maid who might have been his bride!

The rose was yet upon her cheek,
But mellow'd with a tender stream:
Where was the play of her soft lips red?
Gone was the smile that univen'd their red.
The ocean's calm within their view,
Beside her eye had less of blue;
But like that cold wave it stood still,
And its glance, though clear, was chill;
Around her form a thin robe twining,
Nought conceal'd her bosom shining;
Through the parting of her hair,
Floating darkly downward there,
Her rounded arm show'd white and bare:
And ere yet she made reply,
Once she raised her hand on high:
It was so wan and transparent of hue,
You might have seen the moon shine through.

XXI
"I come from my rest to him I love best,
That I may be happy, and he may be blest.
I have pass'd the guards, the gate, the wall,
Sought thee in safety through foes and all.
'Tis said the lion will turn and fce
From a maid in the pride of her purity;
And the Power on high, that can shield the good
Thus from the tyrant of the wood,
Hath extended its mercy to guard us as well
From the hands of the leaguering infidel.
I come—and if I come in vain,
Never, oh never, we meet again!
Thou hast done a fearful deed
In falling away from thy father's creed:
But dash that turban to earth, and sign
The sign of the cross, and for ever be mine
Wring the black drop from thy heart,
And to-morrow unites us no more to part."

"And where should our bridal couch be spread?
In the midst of the dying and the dead?
For to-morrow we give to the slaughter and flame,
The sons and the shrines of the Christian name.
None, save thou and thine, I've sworn,
Shall be left upon the morn:
But thee will I bear to a lovely spot,
Where our hands shall be joined, and our sorrow forgot.

Like the Air of Venice; and her hated race,
Have felt the arm they would debase,
Scourge, with a whip of scorpions, those Whom vice as I envy made my foes.";

Upon his hand she laid her own—
Light was the touch, but it thrilled to the bone,
And shot a chillness to his heart,
Which fixed him beyond the power to start.
Though slight was that grasp so mortal cold,
He could not lose him from his hold;
But never did clasp of one so dear
Strike upon the pulse with such feeling of fear,
As those thin fingers, long and white,
Froze through his blood by their touch that night.
The feverish glow of his brow was gone,
And his heart sank so still that it felt like stone,
As he looked on the face, and beheld its hue
So deeply changed from what he knew;
Fair but faint—without the ray
Of mind, that made each feature play
Like sparkling waves on a sunny day;
And her motionless lips lay still as death,
And her words came forth without her breath,
And there rose not a heave o'er her bosom's swell,
And there seemed not a pulse in her veins to dwell,
Though her eye shone out, yet the lids were fixed,
And the glance that it gave was wild and unmixed'd
With aught of change, as the eyes may seem,
Of the restless who walk in a troubled dream;
Like the figures on arras, that gloomily glare,
Stir'd by the breath of the wintry air,
So seen by the dying lamp's fitful light,
Lifeless, but life-like, and awful to sight;
As they seem, through the dimness, about to come down

From the shadowy wall where their images frown;
Fearfully flitting to and fro,
As the gusts on the tapestry come and go.

'Til not for love of me be given
Tis much, then, for the love of heaven,—
Again I say—that turban tear
From off thy faithless brow, and swear
Thine injured country's sons to spare,
O thou art lost; and never shalt see
Not earth—that's past—but heaven or me.
If this thou dost accord, albeit
A heavy doom 'tis thine to meet,
That doom shall half absorb thy sin,
And mercy's gate may receive thee within
But pause one moment more, and take
The curse of Him thou didst forsake;
And look once more to heaven, and see
Its love for ever shut from thee.
There is a light cloud by the moon—
'Tis passing, and will pass full soon—
If, by the time its vapors sail
Hath ceased her shaded orb to veil,
Thy heart within thee is not changed,
Then God and man are both avenged;
Dark will thy doom be, darker still
Thine immortality of ill.'

Alp look'd to heaven, and saw on high
The sign she spoke of in the sky:
But his heart was swollen, and turn'd aside
By deep, interminable pride.
'This first false passion of his breast;
Roll'd like a torrent o'er the rest.
He sue for mercy! He dismay'd
By wild words of a timid maid!
He, wrong'd by Venice, vow to save
Her sons, devoted to the grave!
No—though that cloud were thunder's worst,
And charged to crush him—let it burst!

He look'd upon it earnestly,
Without an accent of reply;
He watch'd it passing; it is flown:
Full on his eye the clear moon shone,
And thus he spake—"Whate'er my fate,
I am no changeling—'tis too late:
The reed in storms may bow and quiver,
Then rise again; the tree must shiver
What Venice made me, I must be,
Her foe in all, save love to thee;
But thou art safe—'oh, fly with me!";
He turn'd, but she is gone!
Nothing is there but the column stone.
Hath she sunk in the earth, or melted in air?
He saw not, he knew not; but nothing is there

XXII.
The night is past, and shines the sun
As if that morn were a jocund one,
Lightly and brightly breaks away
The Morning from her mantle gray,
And the Noon will look on a sultry day.
Hark to the trump, and the drum,
And the mournful sound of the barbarous horn,
And the flap of the banners that fit as they're borne,
And the neigh of the steed, and the multitude's hum,
And the clash, and the shout, "they come, they come!"
The horsetails are pluck'd from the ground, and
The sword
From its sheath; and they form, and but wait for
The word.
Tartar, and Spahi, and Turcoman,
Strike your tents, and thong to the van,
Mount ye, spur ye, skirr the plain,
That the fugitive may flee in vain,
When he breaks from the town; and none can
Aged or young, in the Christian shape;
While your fellows on foot, in a fiery mass,
Bloodstain the breach through which they pass.
The steeds are all bridled, and snort to the rein;
Curved is each neck, and flowing each mane;
White is the foam of their champ on the bit:
The spears are uplifted; the matches are lit;
The cannon are pointed, and ready to roar,
And crush the wall they have crumbled before:
Forms in his phalanx each Janizar;
Alp at their head; his right arm is bare,
So is the blade of his scimitar.
The khan and the pachas are all at their post;
The vizier himself at the head of the host.
When the culverin's signal is fired, then on;
Leave not in Corinth a living one—
A priest at her altars, a chief in her halls,
A hearth in her mansions, a stone on her walls.
God and the prophet—Alia Hu!
Up to the skyes with that wild halloo!
'There the breach lies for passage, the ladder to scale;
And your hands on your sabres, and how should ye fail?
He who first downs with the red cross may crave
His heart's dearest wish; let him ask it, and have it!
Thus utter'd Coundourgi, the dauntless vizier;
The reply was the brandish of sabre and spear,
And tle shout of fierce thousands in joyous ire;
Silence—hark to the signal—hark!

XXIII.
As the wolves, that headlong go
On the stately buffalo,
Though with fiery eyes, and angry roar,
And hoofs that stamp, and horns that gore,
He tramples on the earth, or tosses on high
The foremost, who rush on his strength but to die,
Thus against the wall they went,
Thus the first, the foremost, rush'd and rent;
Many a bosom, sheathed in brass,
Strew'd the earth like broken glass,
Shiver'd by the shot, that tore
The ground whereon they moved no more;
Even as they fell, in files they lay,
Like the mower's grass at the close of day,
When his work is done on the level'd plain;
Such was the fall of the foremost slain.

XXIV.
As the spring-tides, with heavy plash,
From the cliffs invading dash
Huge fragments, sapp'd by the ceaseless flow,
Till white and thundering down they go,
Like the avalanche's snow,
On the Alpine vales below;
Thus at length, outbreathed and worn,
Corinth's sons were downward borne
By the long and oft renew'd
Charge of the Moslem multitude.
In firmness they stood, and in masses they fell,
Hemp'd, by the host of the infidel,
Hand to hand, and foot to foot:
Nothing there, save death, was mute;
Stroke, and thrust, and flash, and cry
For quarter, or for victory,
Mingle there with the volleying thunder,
Which makes the distant cities wonder
How the sounding battle goes,
If with them, or for their foes;
If they must mourn, or may rejoice
In that annihilating voice,
Which pierces the deep hills through and through
With an echo dread and new:
Ye might have heard it, on that day,
O'er Salamis and Megara;
(We have heard the hearers say,)
Even unto Piræus bay.

XXV.
From the point of encountering blades to the hilt,
Sabres and swords with blood were gilt;

XXVI.
Hark to the Allah shout! a hand
Of the Mussulman bravest and best is at hand
Their leader's nervous arm is bare,
Swifter to smite, and never to spare—
Unclothed to the shoulder it waves them on:
Thus in the fight is he ever known;
Others a gaudier garb may show,
To tempt the spoil of the greedy foe;
Many a hand's on a richer hill,
But none on a steel more ruddily gilt;
Many a loftier turban may wear,
Alp is but known by the white arm bare;
Look through the thick of the fight, 'tis there;
There is not a standard on that shore
So well advanced the ranks before;
There is not a banner in Moslem war
Will lure the Delhis half so far;
It glances like a falling star!
Where'er that mighty arm is seen,
The bravest be, or late have been;
There the craven cries for quarter
Sadly to the vengeful Tartar;
Or the hero, silent lying,
Scorns to yield a groan in dying;
Mustering his last feeble blow
‘Gainst the naxest livell'd foe,
Though faint beneath the mutual wound
Grappling on the gory ground.

XXVII.
Still the old man stood erect,
And Alp's career a moment check'd.
"Yield thee, Minotti; quarter take
For thine own, thy daughter's sake."

"Never, renegado, never!
Though the life of thy gift would last for ever."

"Francesca!—Oh my promised bride!
Must she too perish by thy pride?"

"She is safe."—"Where? where?"—"In heaven;
From whence thy traitor soul is driven—
Far from thee, and undeified."

Grimly then Minotti smiled,
As he saw Alp staggering bow
Before his words, as with a blow.

"Oh God! when did she?"—"Yesternight—
Nor weep I for her spirit's flight:
None of my pure race shall be Slaves to Mahomet and thee—
Come on!"—"That challenge is in vain—
Alp's already with the slain!

While Minotti's words were wreaking
A lore revenge in bitter speaking
Than his faction's point had found,
Had the time allow'd to wound,
From within the neighboring porch
Of a long defended church,
Where the last and desperate few
Would the failing fight renew,
The sharp shot dashed Alp to the ground;
Ere an eye could view the wound
That crush'd through the brain of the infidel,
Round he spun, and down he fell;
A flash like fire within his eyes
Blazed, as he bent no more to rise,
And then eternal darkness sunk
Through all the palpitating trunk;
N'ught of life left, save a quivering
Where his limbs were slightly shivering:
They turn'd him on his back; his breast
And brow were stain'd with gore and dust,
And through his lips the life-blood oozed,
From its deep veins lately loosed;
But in his pulse there was no throb,
Nor on his lips one dying sob;
Sigh, nor word, nor struggling breath
Heralded his way to death:
Ere his very thought could pray,
Ussanell'd he pass'd away,
Without a hope from mercy's aid,—
To the last a renegade.

XXVIII.
Fearfully the yell arose
Of his followers and his foes
These in joy, in fury those;
Then again in conflict mixing,
Clashing swords, and spears transfixing,
Interchanged the blow and thrust
Hurling warriors in the dust.
Street by street, and foot by foot,
Still Minotti dares dispute
The latest portion of the land
Left beneath his high command;
With him, siding heart and hand,
The remnant of his gallant band.
Still the church is tenable,
Whence issued late the fated ball
That half avenged the city's fall,
When Alp, her fierce assaulter, fell:
Thither bending sternly back,
They leave before a bloody track;
And, with their faces to the foe,
Dealing wounds with every blow,
The chief, and his retreating train,
Join to those within the fane;
There they yet may breathe awhile,
Shelter'd by the massy pile.

XXIX.
Brief breathing-time! the turban'd hos.
With adding ranks and raging boast,
Press onwards with such strength and heat,
Their numbers balk their own retreat;
For narrow the way that led to the spot
Where still the Christians yielded not;
And the foremost, if fearful, may vainly try
Through the massy column to turn and fly;
They perforce must do or die;
They die; but ere their eyes could close,
Avengers o'er their bodies rose;
Fresh and furious, fast they fill
The ranks unthim'd, though slaughter'd still;
And faint the weary Christians wax
Before the still renew'd attacks:
And now the Othman's gain the gate;
Still resists its iron weight,
And still, all deadly aim'd and hot,
From every crevice comes the shot;
From every shattered window pours
The volleys of the sulphurous shower;
But the portal wavering grows and weak—
The iron yields, the hinges creak—
It bends—it falls—and all is o'er;
Lost Corinth may resist no more!

XXX.
Darkly, sternly, and all alone,
Minotti stood o'er the altar stone:
Madonna's face upon him shone,
Painted in heavenly hues above,
With eyes of light and looks of love;
And placed upon that holy shrine
To fix our thoughts on things divine,
When pictured there, we kneeling see
Her, and the boy-God on her knee,
Smiling sweetly on each prayer
To heaven, as if to waft it there.
Still she smiled: even now she smiles,
Though slaughter streams along her aisles
Min. til lifted his aged eye,
And made the sign of a cross with a sigh,
Then seized a torch which blazed thereby;
And still he stood, while, with steel and flame,
Inward and onward the Mussulman came.

XXXI.
The vaults beneath the mosaic stone
Contain'd the dead of ages gone;
Their names were on the graven floor,
But now illegible with gore;
The carved crests, and curious hues,
Varied marble's veins diffuse,
Were smear'd, and slippery—stain'd, and strown
With broken swords, and helmets o'erthrown:
There were dead above, and the dead below
Lay cold in many a coffin's row;
You might see them piled in sable state,
By a pale-light through a gloomy grate;
But War had enter'd their dark caves,
And stored along the vaulted graves
Her sulphurous treasures, thickly spread
In masses by the fleshless dead:
Here, throughout the sirocco, had been
The Christians' chiefest magazine;
To these a late-form'd train now led,
Minotti's last and stern resource
Against the foe's overwhelming force.

XXXII.
The foe came on, and few remain
To strive, and those must strive in vain:
For lack of further lives, to slake
The thirst of vengeance now awake,
With barbarous blows they gash the dead,
And lop the already lifeless head,
And fell the statues from their niche,
And spoil the shrines of offerings rich,
And from each other's rude hands wrest
The silver vessels saints had bless'd.
To the high altar on they go;
Oh, but it made a glorious show!
On its table still behold
The cup of consecrated gold;
Massy and deep, a glittering prize,
Brightly it sparkles to plunderers' eyes:
That morn it held the holy wine,
Converted by Christ to his blood so divine,
Which his worshippers drank at the break of day
To shrive their souls ere they join'd in the fray.
Still a few drops within it lay;
And round the sacred table glow
Twelve lofty lamps, in splendid row,
From the purest metal cast;
A spoil—the richest, and the last.

XXXIII.
So near they came, the nearest stretch'd
To grasp the spoil he almost reach'd,
When old Minotti's han
Touch'd with the torch the train—
'Tis fired!
Spire—vaults, the shrine, the spoil, the slain.
The turban'd victors, the Christian band,
All that of living or dead remain,
Hurl'd on high with the shiver'd sance,
In one wild roar expired!
The shatter'd town—the walls thrown down—
The waves a moment backward bent—
The hills that shake, although unrent,
As if an earthquake pass'd—
The thousand shapeless things all driven
In cloud and flame athwart the heaven,
By that tremendous blast—
Proclaim'd the desperate conflict o'er
On that too long afflicted shore:
Up to the sky like rockets go
All that mingled there below:
Many a tall and goodly man,
Scorch'd and shrivell'd to a span,
When he fell to earth again.
Like a cinder strew'd the plain:
Down the ashes shower like rain;
Some fell in the gulf, which received the sprinkles
With a thousand circling wrinkles;
Some fell on the shore, but, far away,
Scatter'd o'er the isthmus lay;
Christian or Moslem, which be they?
Let their mothers see and say!
When in cradled rest they lay,
And each nursing mother smiled
On the sweet sleep of her child,
Little deem'd she such a day
Would rend those tender limbs away.
Not the matrons that them bore
Could discern their offspring more;
That one moment left no trace
More of human form or face,
Save a scatter'd scalp or bone:
And down came blazing rafters, strown
Around, and many a falling stone,
Deeply dinted in the clay,
All blacken'd there and reeking lay.
All the living things that heard
That deadly earth-shock disappear'd;
The wild birds flew; the wild dogs fled,
And howling left the unburied dead;
The camels from their keepers broke;
The distant steer forsook the yoke—
The nearer steed plunged o'er the plain,
And burst his girth, and tore his rein;
The bullfrog's a note, from out the marsh,
Deepmouth'd arose, and doubly harsh
The wolves yell'd on the cavern'd hill,
Where echo roll'd in thunder still;
The jackal's troop, in gather'd cry,
Buy'd from afar complainingly,
With a mix'd and mournful sound,
Like crying babe, and beaten hound:
With sudden wing, and ruffled breast,
The eagle left his rocky nest,
And mounted nearer to the sun,
The clouds beneath him seem'd so dun
Their smoke assail'd his startled beak,
And made him higher soar and shriek—
Thus was Corinth lost and won!
NOTES TO THE SIEGE OF CORINTH.

1. The Turkoman hath left his herd.
   Page 166, line 36.
   The life of the Turkomans is wandering and patriarchal; they dwell in tents.

2. Coumourgi—he whose closing scene.
   All Coumourgi, the favorite of three sultans, and Grand Vizier to Achmet III. after recovering Peloponnesus from the Venetians in one campaign, was mortally wounded in the next, against the Germans, at the battle of Peterwaradin, (in the plain of Carlowitz,) in Hungary, endeavoring to rally his guards. He died of his wounds, next day. His last order was the decapitation of General Brunner, and some other German prisoners: and his last words, "Oh that I could thus serve all the Christian dogs!" a speech and act not unlike one of Caligula. He was a young man of great ambition and unbounded presumption: on being told that Prince Eugene, then opposed to him, "was a great general," he said, "I shall become a greater, and at his expense."

3. There shrinks no båd in that tideless sea.
   Page 169, line 91.
   The reader need hardly be reminded that there are no perceptible tides in the Mediterranean.

4. And their white tusks crack'd o'er the whiter skull.
   Page 170, line 8.
   This spectacle I have seen, thus described, beneath the wall of the Scraglio at Constantinople, in the little cavities worn by the Bosphorus in the rock, a narrow terrace of which projects between the wall and the water. I think the fact is also mentioned in Hobhouse's Travels. The bodies were probably those of some refractory Janizaries.

5. And each scalp had a single long tuft of hair.
   Page 170, line 60.
   This tuft, or long lock, is left from a superstition at Mahomet will draw them into Paradise by it.

6. Was it the wind, through some hollow stone.
   Page 169, line 57.
   I must here acknowledge a close, though unintentional, resemblance in these twelve lines to a passage in an unpublished poem of Mr. Coleridge, called "Christabel." It was not till after these lines were written that I heard that wild and singularly original and beautiful poem recited; and the MS. of that production I never saw till very recently, by the kindness of Mr. Coleridge himself, who, I hope, is convinced that I have not been a wilful plagiarist. The original idea—undoubtedly pertains to Mr. Coleridge, whose poem has been composed above fourteen years. Let me conclude by a hope that he will not longer delay the publication of a production, of which I can only add my mite of approbation to the applause of far more competent judges.

7. There is a light cloud by the moon.
   I have been told that the idea expressed from lines 683 to 693 has been admired by those whose approbation is valuable. I am glad of it: but it is not original—at least not mine: it may be found much better expressed in pages 162–3–4 of the English version of "Vathek." (I forget the precise page of the French,) a work to which I have before referred, and never recur to, or read, without a renewal of gratification.

8. The horsetails are pluck'd from the ground, and the sword.
   Page 171, line 106.
   The horsetail fixed upon a lance, a Pacha's standard.

9. And since the day when in the strait.
   Page 172, line 98.
   In the naval battle, at the mouth of the Dardanelles between the Venetians and the Turks.

10. The jackal's troop, in gather'd cry.
    Page 174, line 109.
    I believe I have taken a poetical license to transplant the jackal from Asia. In Greece I never saw nor heard these animals; but among the ruins of Ephesus I have heard them by hundreds. They haunt ruins, and follow armies.
PARISINA.

TO

SCROPE BERDMORE DAVIES, ESQ.

THE FOLLOWING POEM IS INSCRIBED,

BY ONE WHO HAS LONG ADMIRE匕 HIS TALENTS AND VALUED HIS FRIENDSHIP

January 22, 1816.

ADVERTISEMENT.

The following poem is grounded on a circumstance mentioned in Gibbon's "Antiquities of the House of Brunswick."—I am aware, that in modern times the delicacy or fastidiousness of the reader may deem such subjects unfit for the purposes of poetry. The Greek dramatists, and some of the rest of our old English writers, were of a different opinion: as Alfieri and Schiller have also been, more recently, upon the continent. The following extract will explain the facts on which the story is founded. The name of Azo is substituted for Nicholas, as moremetrical.

"Under the reign of Nicholas III. Ferrara was polluted with a domestic tragedy. By the testimony of an attendant, and his own observation, the Marquis of Este discovered the incestuous loves of his wife Parisina, and Hugo his bastard son, a beautiful and valiant youth. They were beheaded in the castle by the sentence of a father and husband, who published his shame, and survived their execution. He was unfortunate, if they were guilty; if they were innocent, he was still more unfortunate; nor is there any possible situation in which I can sincerely approve the last act of justice of a parent."—

I.

It is the hour when from the boughs
The nightingale's high note is heard;
It is the hour when lovers' vows
Seem sweet in every whisper'd word:
And gentle winds, and waters near,
Make music to the lonely ear

Each flower the dews have lightly wet,
And in the sky the stars are met,
And on the wave is deeper blue,
And on the leaf a browner hue,
And in the heaven that clear obscure,
So softly dark, and darkly pure,
Which follows the decline of day,
As twilight melts beneath the moon away.

II.

But it is not to list to the waterfall
That Parisina leaves her hall,
And it is not to gaze on the heavenly light
That the lady walks in the shadow of night
And if she sits in Este's bower,
'Tis not for the sake of its full-blown flower—
She listens—but not for the nightingale—
Though her ear expects as soft a tale.
There glides a step through the foliage thick,
And her cheek grows pale—and her heart beats quick.
There whispers a voice through the rustling leaves,
And her blush returns, and her bosom heaves:
A moment more—and they shall meet—
'Tis past—her lover's at her feet.

III.

And what unto them is the world beside,
With all its change of time and tide?
Its living things—its earth and sky—
Are nothing to their mind and eye.
And heedless as the dead are they
Of aught around, above, beneath;
As if all else had passed away,
They only for each other breathe.
And whose that name? 'tis Hugo's,—his
In sooth he had not deemed of this!—
'Tis Hugo's,—he, the child of one
He loved,—his own all-evil son—
The offspring of his wayward youth,
When he betrayed Bianca's truth,
The maid whose folly could confide
In him who made her not his bride.

VII.
He pluck'd his poniard in its sheath,
But sheath'd it ere the point was bare.
How'er unworthy now to breathe,
He could not slay a thing so fair—
At least, not smiling—sleeping—there—
Nay more—he did not wake her then,
But gazed upon her with a glance
Which, had she roused her from her trance,
Had frozen her sense to sleep again—
And o'er his brow the burning lamp
Gleam'd on the dew-drops big and damp;
She spoke no more—but still she slumber'd—
While, in his thought, her days are number'd.

VIII.
And with the morn he sought, and found,
In many a tale from those around,
The proof of all he fear'd to know,
Their present guilt, his future woe.
The long-conning damsels seek
To save themselves, and would transfer
The guilt—the shame—the doom—to her
Concealment is no more—they speak
All circumstance which may compel
Full credence to the tale they tell:
And Azo's tortured heart and ear
Have nothing more to feel or hear.

IX.
He was not one who brook'd delay.
Within the chamber of his state,
The chief of Este's ancient sway
Upon his throne of judgment sate;
His nobles and his guards are there,
Before him is the sinful pair;
Both young—and one how passing fair!
With swordless belt, and fetter'd hand,
Oh, Christ! that such a son should stand
Before a father's face!
Yet thus must Hugo meet his sire,
And hear the sentence of his ire,
The tale of his disgrace!
And yet he seems not overcome,
Although, as yet, his voice be dumb.

X.
And still, and pale, and silently
Did Parisina wait her doom;
How changed since last her speaking eye
Glanced gladness round the glittering room
Where high-born men were proud to wait—
Where Beauty watch'd to imitate
Her gentle voice—her lovely mien—
And gather from her air and gait
The graces of its queen:
Then,—had her eye in sorrow wept,
A thousand warriors forth had leapt,
A thousand swords had sheathless flown,
And made her quarrel all their own.
XI.

And he for her had also wept,
But for the eyes that on him gazed:
His sorrow, if he felt it, slept;
Stern and erect his brow was raised.
Whate'er the grief his soul avow'd,
He would not shrink before the crowd;
But yet he dared not look on her:
Remembrance of the hours that were—
His guilt—his love—his present state—
His father's wrath—all good men's hate—
His earthy, his eternal fate—
And her's, oh, her's!—he dared not throw
One look upon that deathlike brow!
Else had his rising heart betray'd
Remorse for all the wreck it made.

XII.

And Azo spake:— "But yesterday
I gloried in a wife and son;
That dream this morning pass'd away,
 Ere day delines, I shall have none.
My life must linger on alone!
Well,—let that pass,—there breathes not one
Who would not do as I have done:
Those ties are broken—not by me;
Let that too pass—The doom's prepared!
Hugo, the priest aver's all thees,
And then—thy crime's reward!
Away! address thy prayers to Heaven,
Before its evening stars are met—
Learn if thou there canst be forgiven;
Its mercy may absolve thee yet.
But here, upon the earth beneath,
There is no spot where thou and I
Together, for an hour, could breathe:
Farewell! I will not see thee die—
But thou, frail thing! shalt view his head—
Away! I cannot speak the rest:
Go! woman of the wanton breast,
Not I, but thou his blood dost shed:
So! if that sight thou canst outlive,
And joy thee in the life I give"
He ceased—and stood with folded arms;
And on which the crowing fowls sounded.
Or all the chiefs that there were rank'd;
When those dull chains, in meeting chime.

XIV.

And now, on high, the sun was set,
Before rose up, the sun shall set,
And mock'd with grey and leaden ray,
Sent forth, the future black and white.

The convent bells are ringing;
In the gray square tower swaying.
With the black, and with the gaudy arcs.
All was confused in sympathy!

XV.

He stood, and round the painted eyes she stood.
But there with glassy gaze she stood:
And there the chief with his bare arm tarry'd.
Till then had smiled in sympathy?

That sun on his head digg'd greater
As he there did bow and listen—
That sun on his head digg'd greater
As he there did bow and listen—

PARISINA.

But yet she lived—and all too on—
Recover'd from that death-like swoon—
But most of strength, my soul of fame—
Then didst not give me life alone.

For though the mind be drest by
And Bless'd the care that o'er the soul
And the voice and spirit used to grace.
And felt then all thy father's love:

The Lay, the Lay, and all the Lay;
And every Lay, and all the Lay;
As cruel were the Lay, and all the Lay;
A Lay on her soul so deep mislay.

She gav'st the Lay, and all the Lay,
And all the Lay, and all the Lay;
The Lay, the Lay, the Lay, and Lay;
And Lay on her soul so deep mislay.

With every Lay, and all the Lay;
With every Lay, and all the Lay;
Of every Lay, and all the Lay;
Lay on her soul so deep mislay.

The Lay, the Lay, and all the Lay;
Of every Lay, and all the Lay;
The Lay, the Lay, and all the Lay;
Lay on her soul so deep mislay.
And the rings of Chestnut hair
Carl'd half down his neck so bare;
But brighter still the beam was thrown
Upon the axe which near him shone
With a clear and ghastly glitter—
Oh! that parting hour was bitter!
Even the stern stood chill'd with awe:
Dark the crime, and just the law—
Yet they shudder'd as they saw.

XVII.
The parting prayers are said and over
Of that false son—and daring lover!
His heads and sions are all account'd,
His hours to their last minute mounted—
His mantling cloak before was stripp'd,
His bright brown locks must now be clipp'd:
'Tis done—all closely are they shorn—
The vest which till this moment worn—
The scarf which Parisina gave—
Must not adorn him to the grave.
Even that must now be thrown aside,
And o'er his eyes the kerchief tied;
But no—that last indignity
Shall ne'er approach his haughty eye.
All feelings seemingly subdued,
In deep disdain were half renew'd,
When headsman's hands prepared to bind
Those eyes which would not brook such blind;
As if they dared not look on death.

"No—yours my forfeit blood and breath—
These hands are chain'd—but let me die
At least with an unshackled eye;
Strike: "—and as the word he said,
Upon the block he bow'd his head;
These the last accents Hugo spoke—
"Strike"—and flashing fell the stroke—
Roll'd the head—and, gushing, sunk
Back the stain'd and heaving trunk
In the dust, which each deep vein
Slaked with its ensanguined rain;
His eyes and lips a moment quiver,
Convulsed and quick—then fix for ever.
He died as erring man should die,
Without display, without parade;
Mockly had he bow'd his head,
As not disdaining priestly aid,
Nor desperate of all hope on high.
And while before the Prior kneeling,
His heart was wean'd from earthly feeling;
His wrathful sire—his paramour—
What were they in such an hour?
No more reproach—no more despair;
No thought but heaven—no word but prayer—
Save the few which from him broke,
When, bared to meet the headsman's stroke,
He claim'd to die with eyes unbound,
His sole adieu to those around.

XVIII.
Still as the lips that closed in death,
Each gazer's bosom held his breath;
But yet, afar, from man to man,
A cold electric shiver ran,
As down the deadly blow descended
On him whose life and love thus ended,
And with a hushing sound comprest,
A sigh shrunk back on every breast;

But no more thrilling noise rose there
Beyond the blow that to the block
Pierced through with forced and sullen shock
Save one:—what cleaves the silent air
So madly shrill, so passing wild?
That, as a mother's o'er her child,
Done to death by sudden blow,
To the sky these accents go,
Like a soul's in endless wo.
Through Azof's palace-lattice driven,
That horrid voice ascends to heaven,
And every eye is turn'd thereon;
But sound and sight alike are gone!
It was a woman's shriek—and ne'er
In madlier accents base despair;
And those who heard it, as it past,
In mercy wish'd it were the last.

XIX.
Hugo is fallen; and, from that hour
No more in palace, hall, or bower,
Was Parisina heard or seen;
Her name—as if she never had been—
Was banish'd from each lip and ear,
Like words of wantonness or fear;
And from Prince Azof's voice by none
Was mention heard of wife or son;
No tomb—no memory had they;
Theirs was unconsecrated clay;
At least the knight's who died that day,
But Parisina's fate lies hid
Like dust beneath the coffin lid:
Whether in convent she abode,
And walk'd to heaven her dreary road,
By blighted and remorseful years
Of scourg'd, and fast, and sleepless tears
Or if she fell by bowl or steel,
For that dark love she dared to feel;
Or if, upon the moment smote,
She died by tortures less remote;
Like him she saw upon the block,
With heart that shared the headsman's shoe
In quicken'd brokenness that came,
In pity, o'er her shattered frame,
None knew—and none can ever know:
But what would it be, the end below,
Her life began and closed in wo; 3

XX.
And Azof found another bride,
And goodly sons grew by his side;
But none so lovely and so brave
As him who wither'd in the grave;
Or if they were—on his cold eye
Their growth but glanced unheeded by,
Or noticed with a smother'd sigh.
But never tear his cheek descended,
And never smile his brow unbended,
And o'er that fair broad brow were wrought
The intersected lines of thought;
Those furrows which the burning share
Of Sorrow plough'd untimely there;
Sears of the lacerating mind
Which the Soul's war doth leave behind.
He was pass'd all mirth or wo:
Nothing more remain'd below
But sleepless nights and heavy days,
A mind all deaf to scorn or praise,
NOTES TO PARISINA.

A heart which shunn’d itself—and yet
That would not yield—nor could forget,
Which when it least appear’d to melt,
Intensely thought—intensely felt;
The deepest ice which ever froze
Can only o’er the surface close—
The living stream lies quick below,
And flows—and cannot cease to flow.
Still was his seal’d-up bosom haunted
By thoughts which Nature hath implanted;
Too deeply rooted thence to vanish,
How’er our stifled tears we banish:
When, struggling as they rise to start,
We check those waters of the heart,
They are not dried—those tears unshed
But flow back to the fountain head,
And resting in their spring more pure,
For ever in its depth endure,
Unseen, unwept, but unconceal’d,
And cherish’d most where least reveal’d.
With inward starts of feeling left,
To throb o’er those of life bereft;
Without the power to fill again
The desert gap which made his pain;
Without the hope to meet them where
United souls shall gladness share,
With all the consciousness that he
Had only pass’d a just decree;
That they had wrought their doom of ill;
Yet Azo’s age was wretched still.
The tainted branches of the tree;
If lopp’d with care a strength may give,
By which the rest shall bloom and live
All greenly fresh and wildly free;
But if the lightning, in its wrath,
The waving boughs with fury seath;
The massy trunk the ruin feels,
And never more a leaf reveals.

Her life began and closed in wo.
Page 180, line 109.
"This turned out a calamitous year for the people of Ferrara, for there occurred a very tragical event in the court of their sovereign. Our annals, both printed and in manuscript, with the exception of the unpolished and negligent work of Sardi, and one other, have given the following relation of it, from which, however, are rejected many details, and especially the narrative of Bandelli, who wrote a century afterwards, and who does not accord with the contemporary historians.
"By the above-mentioned Stella dell’ Assasino,
the Marquis in the year 1405, had a son called Ugo, a beautiful and ingenious youth. Parisina Malates ta, second wife of Niccolo, like the generality of step-mothers, treated him with little kindness, to the infinite regret of the Marquis, who regarded him with fond partiality. One day she asked leave of her husband to undertake a certain journey, to which he consented, but upon condition that Ugo should bear her company; for he hoped by these means to induce her, in the end, to lay aside the obstinate aversion which she had conceived against him. And indeed his intent was accomplished but too well, since, during the journey, she not only diverted herself of all her hatred, but fell into the opposite extreme. After their return, the Marquis had no longer any occasion to renew his former re-proofs. It happened one day that a servant of the Marquis, named Zoeo, or, as some call him, Giorgio, passing before the apartments of Parisina, saw going out from them one of her chambermaids, all terrified and in tears. Asking the reason, she told him that her mistress, for some slight offence, had been beating her; and, giving vent to her rage, she added, that she could easily be revenged, if she chose to make known the criminal familiarity which subsisted between Parisina and her stepson. The servant took note of the words, and related them to his master. He was astounded thereat, but scarcely believing his ears, he assured himself of the fact, alas! too clearly, on the 18th of May, by looking through a hole made in the ceiling of his wife’s chamber. Instantly he broke into a furious rage, and arrested both of them, together with Aldobrandino Rangoni, of Modena, her gentleman, and also, as some say, two of the women of her chamber, as abettors of this sinful act. He ordered them to be brought to a hasty trial, desiring the judges to pronounce sentence, in the accustomed forms, upon the culprits. This sentence was death. Some were there that bestirred themselves in favor of the delinquents, and, among others, Ugocciun Contrario, who was all powerful with Niccolo, and also his aged and much deserving minister, Alberto dal Sale. Both of these, their tears flowing down their cheeks, and upon their knees, implored him for mercy: adducing whatever reasons they could suggest for sparing the offenders, besides those motives of honor and decency which might persuade him to conceal from the public so scandalous a deed. But his rage made him inflexible, and, on the instant, he commanded that the sentence should be put in execution.

"It was, then, in the prisons of the castle, and exactly in those frightful dungeons which are seen at this day beneath the chamber called the Aurora, at the foot of the Lion's tower, at the top of the street Glovecca, that on the night of the 21st of May were beheaded, first Ugo, and afterwards Parisina. Zoese, he that accused her, conducted the latter under his arm to the place of punishment. She, all along, fancied that she was to be thrown into a pit and asked at every step, whether she was yet come to the spot? She was told that her punishment was the axe. She inquired what was become of Ugo, and received for answer, that he was already dead; at the which, sighing grievously, she exclaimed, 'Now, then, I wish not myself to live; ' and, being come to the block, she stripped herself with her own hands of all her ornaments, and wrapping a cloth around her head, submitted to the fatal stroke, which terminated the cruel scene. The same was done with Rangoni, who, together with the others, according to two calendars in the library of St. Francesco, was buried in the cemetery of that convent. Nothing else is known respecting the women."

"The Marquis kept watch the whole of that dreadful night, e. g., as he was walking backwards and forwards, inquired of the captain of the castle if Ugo was dead yet? who answered him, Yes. He then gave himself up to the most desperate lamentations, exclaiming, 'Oh! that I too were dead, since I have been hurried on to resolve thus against my own Ugo!' And then, gnawing with his teeth a cane which he had in his hand, he passed the rest of the night in sighs and in tears, calling frequently upon his own dear Ugo. On the following day, calling to mind that it would be necessary to make public his justification, seeing that the transaction could not be kept secret, he ordered the narrative to be drawn out upon paper, and sent it to all the courts of Italy.

"On receiving this advice, the Doge of Venice, Francesco Foscarì, gave orders, but without publishing his reasons, that stop should be put to the preparations for a tournament, which, under the auspices of the Marquis, and at the expense of the city of Padua, was about to take place, in the square of St. Mark, in order to celebrate his advancement to the ducal chair."

"The Marquis, in addition to what he had already done, from some unaccountable burst of vengeance, commanded that as many of the married women as were well known to him to be faithless, like his Parisina, should, like her, be beheaded. Amongst others, Barberina, or, as some call her, Laodamia Romei, wife of the court judge, underwent this sentence, at the usual place of execution, that is to say, in the quarter of St. Giacomo, opposite the present fortress, beyond St. Paul's. It cannot be told how strange appeared this proceeding in a prince, who, considering his own disposition, should, as it seemed, have been in such cases most indulgent. Some, however, there were, who did not fail to commend him."
THE PRISONER OF CHILLON;

A FABLE.

SONNET ON CHILLON.

WERNAL spirit of the chainless mind!
Brightest in dungeons, Liberty! thou art,
For there thy habitation is the heart—
He heart which love of thee alone can bind;
And when thy sons to fetters are consign'd—
To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless gloom,
Their country conquers with their martyrdom,
And Freedom's fame finds wings on every wind.
Chillon! thy prison is a holy place,
And thy sad floor an altar—for 'twas trod,
Until his very steps have left a trace
Worn, as if thy cold pavement were a sod,
By Bonnivard!—May none those marks efface!
For they appeal from tyranny to God.

I.

My hair is gray, but not with years,
Nor grew it white
In a single night,

As men's have grown from sudden fears:
My limbs are bow'd, though not with toil,
But rusted with a vile repose,
For they have been a dungeon's spoil,
And mine has been the fate of those
To whom the goodly earth and air
Are ban'td, and barr'd—forbidden fare;
But this was for my father's faith
I suffer'd chains and courted death;
That father perish'd at the stake
For tenets he would not forsake;
And for the same his linear race
In darkness found a dwelling-place;
We were seven—who now are one,
Six in youth and one in age,
Finish'd as they had begun,
Proud of Persecution's rage;
One in fire, and two in field,
Their belief with blood have seal'd:
Dying as their father died.
For the God their foes denied;
Three were in a dungeon cast,
Of whom this wreck is left the last.

II.

There are seven pillars of gothic mould,
In Chillon's dungeons deep and old,
There are seven columns; massy and gray
Dim with a dull imprison'd ray,
A sunbeam which hath lost its way.
And through the crevice and the cleft
Of the thick wall is fallen and left;
Creeping o'er the floor so damp,
Like a marsh's meteor lamp;
And in each pillar there is a ring,
And in each ring there is a chain;
That iron is a cankerling thing,
For in these limbs its teeth remain,
With marks that will not wear away,
Till I have done with this new day,
Which now is painful to these eyes,
Which have not seen the sun so rise
For years—I cannot count them o'er,
I lost their long and heavy score
When my last brother droop'd and died
And I lay living by his side.

III.

They chain'd us each to a column stone,
And we were three—yet, each alone;
We could not move a single pace,
We could not see each other's face,
But with that pale and livid light
That made us strangers in our sight,
And thus together—yet apart,
Fetter'd in hand, but pined in heart;
'Twas still some solace, in the earth
Of the pure elements of earth,
To hearken to each other's speech,
And each turn comforter to each
With some new hope, or legend old,
Or song heroically bold;
But even these at length grew cold.
Our voices took a dreary tone,
An echo of the dungeon-stone,
A grating sound—not full and free
As they of yore were wont to be;
It might be fancy—but to me
They never sounded like our own.
IV.

I was the eldest of the three,
And to uphold and cheer the rest
I ought to do—and did my best—
And each did well in his degree.
The youngest, whom my father loved,
Because our mother's brow was given
To him—'twas eyes as blue as heaven,
For him my soul was sorely moved;
And truly might it be distress
To see such bird in such a nest;
For he was beautiful as day—
(When day was beautiful to me)

As to young eagles, being free—
A polar day, which will not see
A sunset till its summer's gone,
Its sleepless summer of long light,
The snow-clad offspring of the sun;
And thus he was as pure and bright,
And in his natural spirit gay,
With tears for nought but others' ills,
And then they flow'd like mountain rills,
Unless he could assuage the wo
Which he abhor'd to view below.

V.

The other was as pure of mind,
But form'd to combat with his kind;
Strong in his frame, and of a mood
Which 'gainst the world in war had stood,
And perish'd in the foremost rank
With joy—but not in chains to pine:
His spirit wither'd with their clank,
I saw it silently decline—
And so perchance in sooth did mine;
But yet I forced it on to cheer
Those relics of a home so dear.
He was a hunter of the hills,
Had follow'd there the deer and wolf;
To him this dungeon was a gulf,
And getter'd feet the worst of ills.

VI.

Lake Leman lies by Chillon's walls;
A thousand feet in depth below
Its massy waters meet and flow;
Thus much the fathom-line was sent
From Chillon's snow-white battlement;
Which round about the wave enthralls;
A double dungeon wall and wave
Have made—and like a living grave.
Below the surface of the lake
The dark vault lies wherein we lay,
We heard it ripple night and day;
Sounding o'er our heads it knock'd;
And I have felt the winter's spray
Wash through the bars when winds were high;
And wanton in the happy sky;
And then the very rock hath rock'd,
And I have felt it shake, unshock'd,
Because I could have smiled to see
The death that would have set me free.

VII.

I said my nearer brother pined,
I said his mighty heart declined,
He loathed and put away his food;
It was not that 'twas coarse and rude.

For we were used to hunter's fare,
And for the like had little care:
The milk drawn from the mountain goats
Was changed for water from the mount,
Our bread was such as captive's tears
Have moisten'd many a thousand years
Since man first pent his fellow men
Like brutes within an iron den:
But what were these to us or him?
These wasted not his heart or limb,
His brother's soul was of that mould
Which in a palace had grown cold,
Had his free breathing been denied
The range of the steep mountain's side;
But why delay the truth?—he died.
I saw, and could not hold his head,
Nor reach his dying hand—nor dead,
Though hard I strove, but strive in vain,
To rend and gnash my bonds in twain.
He died—and they unlock'd his chain,
And scoop'd for him a shallow grave
Even from the cold earth of our cave.
I begg'd them, as a boon, to lay
His corpse in dust whereon the day
Might shine—it was a foolish thought,
But then within my brain it wrought,
That even in death his free-born breast
In such a dungeon could not rest.
I might have spared my idle prayer—
They coldly laugh'd—and laid him there
The flat and turfless earth above
The being we so much did love;
His empty chain above it leant,
Such murder's fitting monument!

VIII.

But he, the favorite and the flower,
Most cherish'd since his natal hour,
His mother's image in fair face,
The infant love of all his race,
His martyr'd father's dearest thought,
My latest care, for whom I sought
To hoard my life, that his might be Less wretched now, and one day free;
He, too, who yet had held untired
A spirit natural and inspired—
He, too, was struck, and day by day
Was wither'd on the track away.
Oh God! it is a fearful thing
To see the human soul take wing
In any shape, in any mood:
I've seen it rushing forth in blood,
I've seen it on the breaking ocean
Strive with a swain convulsive motion.
I've seen the sick and ghastly bed
Of Sin delirious with its dread:
But these were horrors—this was wo
Unmix'd with such—but sure and slow;
He faded, and so calm and meek,
So softly worn, so sweetly weak,
So tearless, yet so tender—kind,
And grieve'd for those he left behind:
With all the while a cheek whose bloom
Was as a mockery of the tomb,
Whose tints as gently sunk away
As a departing rainbow's ray—
An eye of most transparent light,
That almost made the dungeon bright.
And not a word of murmur—not
A groan o'er his untimely lot,—
A little talk of better days,
A little hope my own to raise,
For I was sunk in silence—lost
In this last loss, of all the most;
And then the sighs he would suppress
Of fainting nature's feebleness,
More slowly drawn, grew less and less:
I listen'd, but I could not hear—
I call'd, for I was wild with fear:
I knew 'twas hopeless, but my dread
Would not be thus admonished;
I call'd, and thought I heard a sound—
I burst my chain with one strong bound,
And rush'd to him;—I found him not,
I only stirr'd in this black spot,
I only lived—I only drew
The accursed breath of dungeon-dew:
The last—the sole—the dearest link
Between me and the eternal brink,
Which bound me to my falling race,
Was broken in this fatal place.
One on the earth, and one beneath—
My brothers—both had ceased to breathe;
I took that hand which lay so still;
Alas! my own was full as chill;
I had not strength to stir, or strive,
But felt that I was still alive—
A frantic feeling, when we know
That what we love shall ne'er be so.
I know not why
I could not die,
I had no earthly hope—but faith,
And that forbade a selfish death.

IX.
What next befell me then and there
I know not well—I never knew—
First came the loss of light, and air,
And then of darkness too:
I had no thought, no feeling—none—
Among the stones I stood a stone,
And was, scarce conscious what I wist,
As shrubless crags within the mist;
For all was blank, and bleak, and gray:
It was not night—it was not day,
It was not even the dungeon-light,
So hateful to my heavy sight,
But vacancy absorbing space,
And fixness—without a place;
There were no stars—no earth—no time—
No check—no change—no good—no crime—
But silence, and a stilly breath
Which neither was of life nor death;
A sea of stagnant idleness,
Blind, boundless mute, and motionless!

X.
A light broke in upon my brain,—
It was the carol of a bird;
It ceased, and then it came again,
The sweetest song ear ever heard,
And mine was thankful till my eyes
Ran over with the glad surprise,
And they that moment could not see
I was the mate of misery;
But then by dull degrees came back
My senses to their wonted track

I saw the dungeon walls and floor
Close slowly round me as before,
I saw the glimmer of the sun
Creeping as it before had done,
But through the crevice where it came
That bird was perch'd, as fond and tame,
And tamer than upon the tree;
A lovely bird, with azure wings,
And song that said a thousand things,
And seem'd to say them all for me!
I never saw its like before,
I ne'er shall see its likeness more:
It seem'd like me to want a mate,
But was not half so desolate,
And it was come to love me when
None lived to love me so again,
And cheering from my dungeon's brink,
Had brought me back to feel and think.
I know not if it late were free,
Or broke its cage to perch on mine,
But knowing well captivity,
Sweet bird! I could not wish for thine,
Or if it were, in winged guise,
A visitant from Paradise;
For—Heaven forgive that thought! the while
Which made me both to weep and smile—
I sometimes deem'd that it might be
My brothers soul come down to me:
But then at last away it flew,
And then 'twas mortal—well I knew,
For he would never thus have flown,
And left me twice so doubly lone,—
Lone—as the corpse within its shroud,
Lone—as a solitary cloud,
A single cloud on a sunny day,
While all the rest of heaven is clear,
A frown upon the atmosphere,
That hath no business to appear
When skies are blue, and earth is gay.

XI.
A kind of change came in my fate,
My keepers grew compassionate,
I know not what had made them so,
They were inured to sights of wo,
But so it was—my broken chain
With links unfasten'd did remain,
And it was liberty to stride
Along my cell from side to side,
And up and down, and then athwart,
And tread it over every part;
And round the pillars one by one,
Returning where my walk began,
Avoiding only, as I trod,
My brothers' graves without a sod;
For if I thought with heedless tread
My step profan'd their lowly bed,
My breast came gaspingly and thick,
And my crush'd heart fell blind and sick.

XII.
I made a footing in the wall,
It was not therefrom to escape,
For I had buried one and all,
Who loved me in a human shape;
And the whole earth would henceforth be
A wider prison unto me;
No child—no sire—no kin had I,
No partner in my misery;
I thought of this, and I was glad,
For thought of them had made me mad;
But I was curious to ascend
To my barr’d windows, and to bend
Once more, upon the mountains high,
The quiet of a loving eye.

XIII.
I saw them—and they were the same,
They were not changed like me in frame;
I saw their thousand years of snow
Or, high—their wide long lake below,
And the blue Rhone in fullest blow;
I heard the torrents leap and rush
O’er channel’d rock and broken bush;
I saw the white-wall’d distant town,
And whiter sails go skimming down;
And then there was a little isle,
Which is, my very face did smile,
The only one in view;
A small green isle, it seem’d no more,
Scarce broader than my dungeon floor;
But in it there were three tall trees,
And o’er it blew the mountain breeze,
And by it there were waters flowing,
And on it there were young flowers growing
Of gentle breath and hue.
The fish swam by the castle wall,
And they seem’d joyous each and all;
The eagle rode the rising blast,
Methought he never flew so fast
As then to me he seem’d to fly,
And then new tears came in my eye,
And I felt troubled—and would fain
I had not left my recent chain;
And when I did descend again,
The darkness of my dim abode
Fell on me as a heavy load:
It was as is a new-dug grave,
Closing o’er one we sought to save,
And yet my glance, too much oppressed,
Had almost need of such a rest.

XIV.
It might be months, or years, or days
I kept no count—I took no note,
I had no hope my eyes to raise,
And clear them of their dreary view;
At last men came to set me free,
I ask’d not why, and reck’d not where.
It was at length the same to me,
Fetter’d or fetterless to be,
I learn’d to love despair.
And thus when they appear’d at last,
And all my bonds aside were cast,
These heavy walls to me had grown
A hermitage—and all my own!
And half I felt as they were come
To tear me from a second home:
With spiders I had friendship made,
And watch’d them in their sullen trade.
Had seen the mice by moonlight play,
And why should I feel less than they?
We were all inmates of one place,
And I, the monarch of each race,
Had power to kill—yet, strange to tell
In quiet we had learn’d to dwell—
My very chains and I grew friends,
So much a long communion tends
To make us what we are—even I
Regain’d my freedom with a sigh.

NOTES TO THE PRISONER OF CHILLON.

1. By Bonnivard!—may none those marks efface!
Page 183, line 13.
Francois de Bonnivard, fils de Louis de Bonnivard, originaire de Seyscel et Seigneur de Lunes, naquit en 1496; il fit ses études à l’université de Genève.
Il est très curieux de noter que le texte que nous avons cité est en fait une citation directe de la Histoire de Genève de St. Victor, qui aborde plusieurs aspects de la vie de Bonnivard. Il est évident que l'auteur du poème a fait preuve d’une grande préparation et d’une connaissance approfondie du sujet. Sa vision du passé est enrichie par une compréhension profonde des idées et des personnalités de l'époque. Cela en fait un travail d'écriture puissant et inspirant.
NOTES TO THE PRISONER OF CHILLON

Bonnivard, encore jeune, s'annonça hautement comme le défenseur de Genève contre le Duc de Savoie et l'Évêque.

En 1518, Bonnivard devint le martyr de sa patrie. Le Duc de Savoie, tant entré dans Genève avec cinq cent hommes, Bonnivard criaît le ressentiment du Duc; il voulut se retirer à Fribourg pour éviter les suites; mais il fut traîné par deux hommes qui l'accompagnaient, et conduit par ordre du Prince à Grolé où il resta prisonnier pendant deux ans. Bonnivard eût malheureux dans ses voyages; comme ses malheurs n'avoient point ralenti son zèle pour Genève, il eût toujours un ennemi redoutable pour ceux qui le menaçaient, et par consequent il levoit être exposé à leurs coups. Il fut rencontré en 1530 sur le Jura, par des voleurs, qui le dépouillaient, et qui le mirèrent encore entre les mains du Château de Chillon, où il resta sans être interrogé jusqu'en 1535; il fut alors livré par les Bernois, qui s'emparaient du Pays de Vaud.

Bonnivard, en sortant de sa captivité, eut le plaisir de trouver Genève libre et réformée; la République s'empressa de lui reconnaître sa reconnaissance et de le dédommager des maux qu'il avait soufferts; elle le rétablit Bourgeois de la ville au mois de Juin 1536; elle lui donna la maison habitée autrefois par le Vicaire général, et elle lui assigna une pension de 200 fans d'où tant qu'il séjournerait à Genève. Il fut admis dans le Conseil de Deux-Cents en 1537.

Bonnivard n'a pas fini d'être utile: appréc avoir travaillé à rendre Genève libre, il réussit à la rendre tolérante. Bonnivard engagea le Conseil à accorder aux Églises-théologiques et aux paysans un temps suffisant pour examiner les propositions qu'on leur faisait: il réussit par sa douceur: on prêche toujours le Christianisme avec succès quand on le prêche avec charité.

Bonnivard fut savant; ses manuscrits, qui sont dans la Bibliothèque publique, prouvent qu'il avait bien lu les auteurs classiques latins, et qu'il avait approfondi la théologie et l'Histoire. Ce grand homme aimait les sciences, et il croyait qu'elles pouvaient faire la gloire de Genève; aussi il ne dédaigna rien pour les fixer dans cette ville natale; en 1531 il donna sa bibliothèque au public; elle fut le commencement de notre bibliothèque publique; et ces livres sont en partie les rares et belles éditions du quinzième siècle qu'on voit dans notre collection. Enfin, pendant la même année, ce bon patriote institua la République son héritière à condition qu'elle emploierait ses biens à entretenir le collège dont on projetait la fondation.

Il paroit que Bonnivard mourut en 1570; mais on ne peut l'assurer, parce qu'il y a une lacune dans le Nécrologe depuis le mois de Juillet 1570 jusqu'en 1671.

In a single night.

Ludovico Sforza, and others.—The same is asserted of Marie Antoinette’s, the wife of Louis XVI, though not in quite so short a period. Grief is said to have the same effect to such, and not to fear this change in hers was to be attributed.

From Chillon’s snow-white settlement.

The Château de Chillon is situated between Clarens and Villeneuve, which last is at one extremity of the Lake of Geneva. On its left are the entrances of the Rhône, and opposite are the heights of Montreux and the range of Alps above Berozet and St. Gingy.

Near it, on a hill behind, is a torrent; below it, washing its walls, the lake has been fathomed to the depth of eight hundred feet. (French measure;) within it are a range of dungeons, in which the early reformers, and subsequently prisoners of state, were confined. Across one of the vaults is a beam black with age, on which we were informed that the condemned were formerly executed. In the cells are seven pillars, or rather, eight, one being half merged in the wall, in some of these are rings for the fetters and the fettered; in the pavement the steps of Bonnivard have left their traces—he was confined here several years.

It is by this castle that Rousseau has fixed the catastrophe of his Heloise, in the rescue of one of her children by Julie from the water; the shock of which, and the illness produced by the immersion is the cause of her death.

The château is large, and seen along the lake for a great distance. The walls are white.

And then there was a little isle.

Between the entrances of the Rhône and Villeveau, not far from Chillon, is a very small island; the only one I could perceive, in my voyage round and over the lake, within its circumference. It contains a few trees, (I think not above three,) and from its singleness and diminutive size has a peculiar effect upon the view.

When the foregoing poem was composed, I was not sufficiently aware of the history of Bonnivard, or I should have endeavored to dignify the subject by an attempt to celebrate his courage and his virtues. Some account of his life will be found in a note appended to the “Sonnet on Chillon,” with which I have been furnished by the kindness of a citizen of that Republic, which is still proud of the memory of a man worthy of the best age of ancien freedom.”
BEPPO;

A VENETIAN STORY.

1st known. Farewell, Monteverdi Traveller; Look you beg, and wear strange suits: disable all the benefits of your own country; be out of love with your Nativitie, and almost chide God for making you that countenance you are; or I will scarce think that you have swam in a Convales.--As You Like It, Act IV. Sc. I.

Annotation of the Commentators.

That is, been at Venice, which was much visited by the young English gentlemen of those times, and was then what Porta is now—the seat of all dissoluteness.—B. A.

I.
All countries, at least it should be, that throughout the Catholic persuasion,
Some weeks before Shrove Tuesday comes about,
The people take their fill of recreation,
and buy repentance, ere they grow devout,
However high their rank, or low their station,
With fiddling, feasting, drinking, masking,
And other things which may be had for asking.

II.
The moment night with dusky mantle covers
The skies, (and the more duskyly the better,)
The time less liked by husbands than by lovers.
Begins, and prudery flings aside her fetter;
And gayety on restless tiptoe hovers,
Giggling with all the gallants who beget her;
And there are songs and quavers, roaring, humming,
Guitars, and every other sort of strumming.

III.
And there are dresses splendid, but fantastical,
Masks of all times and nations, Turks and Jews,
And harlequins and clowns, with feats gymnastical,
Greens, Romans, Yankee-doodles, and Hindoos;
All kinds of dress, except the ecclesiastical,
All people, as their fancies hit, may choose,
But no one in these parts may quiz the clergy,
Therefore take heed, ye Freethinkers! I charge ye.

IV.
You'd better walk about begirt with briers,
Instead of coat and small-clothes, than put on
A single stitch reflecting upon friars,
Although you swore it only was in fun;
They'd haul you o'er the coals, and stir the fires
Of Phlegathon with every mother's son.
No, say one mass to cool the caldron's bubble
That boil'd your bones, unless you paid them double.

V.
But saving this, you may put on what'ever
You like by way of doublet, cape, or cloak,
Such as in Monmouth-street, or in Rag Fair
Would rig you out in seriousness or joke;
And even in Italy such places are,
With prettier name in softer accents spoke,
For, baiting Covent Garden, I can hit on
No place that's call'd "Piazza!" in Great Britain.

VI.
This feast is named the Carnival, which being Interpreted, implies "farewell to flesh;"—
So call'd, because the name and thing agreeing,
Through Lent they live on fish both salt and fresh,
But why they usher Lent with so much glee in,
Is more than I call to, although I guess
'Tis as we take a glass with friends at parting,
In the stage-coach or packet just at starting.

VII.
And thus they bid farewell to carnal dishes,
And solid meats, and highly spiced ragouts,
To live for forty days on ill-dress'd fishes,
Because they have no sauces to their stews,
A thing which causes many "poohs" and "pishes;"
And several oaths which would not suit the Muse
From travellers accustomed to a boy
To eat their salmon, at the least, with soy;

VIII.
And therefore humbly I would recommend
"The curious in fish-sauce," before they cross
The sea, to bid their cook, or wife, or friend,
Walk or ride to the Strand, and buy in gross.
(Or if set out beforehand, these may send
By any means least liable to loss,
Ketchup, Soy, Chili-vinegar, and Harvey,
Or, by the Lord! a Lent will well nigh starve ye,
IX.
That is to say, if your religion's Roman,
And you at Rome would do as Romans do,
According to the proverb,—although no man,
If foreign, is obliged to fast; and you,
If Protestant, or sickly, or a woman,
Would rather dine in sin on a ragout—
Dine and be d—d! I don't mean to be coarse,
But that's the penalty, to say no worse.

X.
Of all the places where the Carnival
Was most facetious in the days of yore,
For dance, and song, and serenade, and ball,
And masque, and mine, and mystery, and more
Than I have time to tell now, or at all,
Venice the bell from every city bore,
And at the moment when I fix my story
That seaborne city was in all her glory.

XI.
They've pretty faces yet, those same Venetians,
Blacks eye, arch'd brows, and sweet expressions still;
Such as of old were copied from the Grecians,
In ancient arts by moderns mimick'd ill;
And like so many Venus of Titian's,
(The best's at Florence—see it, if ye will,) They look when leaning over the balcony,
Or stepp'd from out a picture by Giorgione,

XII.
Whose tints are truth and beauty at their best;
And when you to Manfrini's palace go,
That picture (howsoever fine the rest)
Is loveliest to my mind of all the show;
It may perhaps be also to your zest,
And that's the cause I rhyme upon it so;
'Tis but the portait of his son, and wife,
And self; but such a woman! love in life.

XIII.
Love in full life and length, not love ideal,
No, nor ideal beauty, that fine name,
But something better still, so very real,
That the sweet model must have been the same;
A thing that you would purchase, beg, or steal,
Wor't not impossible, besides a shame:
The face recalls some face, as 'twere with pain,
You once have seen but ne'er will see again;

XIV.
One of those forms which fit us, when we
Are young, and fix our eyes on every face;
And, Oh! the loveliness at times we see
In momentary gliding, the soft grace,
The youth, the bloom, the beauty which agree,
In many a nameless being we retrace,
Whose course and home we knew not, nor shall know
Like the lost Pleiad I seen no more below.

XV.
I said that like a picture by Giorgione
Venetian women were, and so they are,
Particularly seen from a balcony,
(For beauty's sometimes best set off afar,) And there, just like a heroine of Goldoni,
They peep from out the blind, or o'er the bar;
And truth to say, they're mostly very pretty,
And rather like to show it, more's the pity!

XVI.
For glances beget ogles, ogles sighs,
Sighs wishes, wishes words, and words a letter,
Which flies on wings of light-heel'd Mercuaries,
Who do such things because they know no better
And then, God knows, what mischief may arise,
When love links two young people in one fetter,
Vile assignations, and adulterous beds,
Elopements, broken vows, and hearts, and heads.

XVII.
Shakspeare described the sex in Desdemona
As very fair, but yet suspect in fame,
And to this day from Venice to Verona
Such matters may be probably the same,
Except that since those times was never known a
Husband whom mere suspicion could inflame
To suffocate a wife no more than twenty,
Because she had a 'e cavalier servente.'

XVIII.
Their jealousy (if they are ever jealous)
Is of a fair complexion altogether,
Not like that sotty devil of Othello's,
Which smoothers women in a bed of feather,
But worthier of these much more jolly fellows.
When weary of the matrimonial tether,
His head for such a wife no mortal bothers
But takes at once another, or another's.

XIX.
Didst ever see a gondola? For fear
You should not, I'll describe it you exactly:
'Tis a long cover'd boat that's common here,
Carved at the prow, built lightly, but compactly
Row'd by two rowers, each call'd 'Gondolier,'
It glides along the water looking blackly,
Just like a coffin clapt in a canoe,
Where none can make out what you say or do.

XX.
And up and down the long canals they go,
And under the Rialto shoot along,
By night and day, all paces, swift or slow,
And round the theatres, a sable throng,
They wait in their dusk livery of wo,
But not to them do woful things belong,
For sometimes they contain a deal of fun,
Like mourning coaches when the funeral's done.

XXI.
But to my story.—'Twas some years ago,
It may be thirty, forty, more or less,
The carnival was at its height, and so
Were all kinds of buffoonery and dress;
A certain lady went to see the show,
Her real name I know not, nor can guess,
And so we'll call her Laura, if you please,
Because it slips into my verse with ease.

XXII.
She was not old, nor young, nor at the years
Which certain people call a 'certain age,'
Which yet the most uncertain age appears,
Because I never heard, nor could engage
A person yet by prayers, or bribes, or tears,
To name, define by speech, or write on page,
The period meant precisely by that word.—
Which surely is exceedingly absurd.
XXIII.
Laura was blooming still, had made the best
Of time, and time return'd the compliment,
And treated her gently, so that, drest,
She look'd extremely well where'er she went:
A pretty woman is a welcome guest,
And Laura's brow a brow had rarely bent,
Indeed she shone all smiles, and seem'd to flatter
Mankind with her black eyes for looking at her

XXIV.
She was a married woman; 'tis convenient,
Because in Christian countries 'tis a rule
To view their little slips with eyes more lenient,
Whereas, if single ladies play the fool,
(Unless within the period intervenient
A well-timed wedding makes the scandal cool)
I don't know how they ever can get over it,
Except they manage never to discover it.

XXV.
Her husband sail'd upon the Adriatic,
And made some voyages, too, in other seas,
And when he lay in quarantine for prattique,
(A forty days' precaution 'gainst disease,
His wife would mount, at times, her highest attic,
For thence she could discern the ship with ease.
He was a merchant trading to Aleppo,
His name Giuseppe, call'd more bready, Beppo.

XXVI.
He was a man as dusky as a Spaniard,
Sunburnt with travel, yet a portly figure;
Though color'd, as it were, within a tanyard,
He was a person both of sense and vigor—
A better seaman never yet did man yard;
And she, although her manners show'd no rigor,
Was deem'd a woman of the strictest principle,
So much as to be thought almost invincible.

XXVII.
But several years elapsed since they had met;
Some people thought the ship was lost, and some
That he had somehow blunder'd into debt,
And did not like the thought of steering home;
And there were several offer'd any bet,
Or that he would, or that he would not come,
For most men (till by losing render'd sager)
Will back their own opinions with a wager.

XXVIII.
'Tis said that their last parting was pathetic,
As partings often are, or ought to be,
And their presentiment was quite prophetic
That they should never more each other see,
(A sort of morbid feeling, half poetic,
Which I have known occur in two or three,) When kneeling on the shore upon her sad knee,
He left his Adriatic Ariadne.

XXIX.
And Laura waited long, and wept a little,
And thought of wearing weeds, as well she might;
She almost lost all appetite for victual,
And could not sleep with ease alone at night;
She deem'd the window-frames and shutters brittle
Against a daring housebreaker or sprite,
And so she thought it prudent to connect her
With a vice-husband, chiefly to protect her.

XXX.
She chose, (and what is there they will not choose
If only you will but oppose their choice?)
Till Beppo should return from his long cruise,
And bid once more her faithful heart rejoice,
A man some women like, and yet abuse—
A coxcomb was he by the public voice;
A count of wealth, they said, as well as quality,
And in his pleasures of great liberality.

XXXI.
And then he was a count, and then he knew
Music, and dancing, fiddling, French, and Tuscan
The last, not easy, be it known to you,
For few Italians speak the right Etruscan.
He was a critic upon operas, too,
And knew all niceties of the sock and buskin,
And no Venetian audience could endure a
Song, scene, or air, when he cried "seccatura"

XXXII.
His "bravo" was decisive, for that sound
Hush'd "academia" sigh'd in silent awe;
The fiddlers trembled as he look'd around,
For fear of some false note's detected flaw;
The "prima donna's" tuneful heart would bound,
Dreading the deep damnation of his "bah!"
Soprano, basso, even the contra-alto,
Wish'd him five fathoms under the Rialto.

XXXIII.
He patronized the Improvisatori,
Nay, could himself extemporize some stanzas,
Wrote rhymes, sung songs, could also tell a story,
Sold pictures, and was skilful in the dance as Italians can be, though in this their glory
Must surely yield the palm to that which France
In short, he was a perfect cavaliero,
And to his very valet seem'd a hero.

XXXIV.
Then he was faithful, too, as well as amorous,
So that no sort of female could complain,
Although they're now and then a little clamorous,
He never put the pretty souls in pain;
His heart was one of those which most enamour us
Wax to receive, and marble to retain.
He was a lover of the good old school,
Who still become more constant as they cool.

XXXV.
No wonder such an accomplishments should turn
A female head, however sage and steady—
With scarce a hope that Beppo could return,
In law he was almost as good as dead, he
Nor sent, nor wrote, nor show'd the least concern,
And she had waited several years already;
And really if a man won't let us know
That he's alive, he's dead, or should be so.

XXXVI.
Besides, within the Alps, to every woman,
(Although, God knows, it is a grievous sin,
'Tis, I may say, permitted to have two men;
I can't tell who first brought the custom in,
But "Cavalier Serventes" are quite common.
And no one notices, nor cares a pin;
And we may call this (not to say the worst),
A second marriage which corrupts the first.
XXXVII.
The word was formerly a "Cicisbeo,"
But that is now grown vulgar and indecent;
The Spaniards call the person a "Cortoso," (recent; For the same mode subsists in Spain, though
In short it reaches from the Po to Tejo,
And may perhaps at last be o'er the sea sent.
But Heaven preserve Old England from such counsels!
Or what becomes of damage and divorces?

XXXVIII.
However, I still think, with all due deference
To the fair single part of the creation,
That married ladies should preserve the preference
In late-a-while or general conversation—
And this I say without peculiar reference
To England, France, or any other nation—
Because they know the world, and are at ease,
And being natural, naturally please.

XXXIX.
Tis true your budding Miss is very charming,
But shy and awkward at first coming out,
So much alarm'd that she is quite alarming,
All Giggle, Blush; half Pertness, and half Pout;
And glancing at Mammon, for fear there's harm in
What you, she, it, or they may be about,
The Nursery still lips out in all they utter—
Besides, they always smell of bread and butter.

XL.
But "Cavalier Servente" is the phrase
Used in politest circles to express
This supernumerary slave, who stays
Close to the lady as a part of dress,
Her word the only law which he obeys.
His is no sincere, as you may guess;
Chair, servants, gondola, he goes to call,
And carries fan and tippet, gloves and shawl.

XLI.
With all its sinful doings, I must say,
That Italy's a pleasant place to me,
Who love to see the Sun shine every day,
And vines (not nail'd to walls) from tree to tree
Pestoon'd, much like the back scene of a play, or melodrame, which people flock to see,
When the first act is ended by a dance
In vineyards copied from the south of France.

XLII.
I like on Autumn evenings to ride out,
Without being forced to bid my groom be sure
My cloak is round his middle strapp'd about,
Because the skies are not the most secure;
I know too that, if stopp'd upon my route,
Where the green alleys w windingly allure,
Reeling with grapes red wagons choke the way,—
In England 'twould be dunt, dust, or a dray.

XLIII.
I also like to dine on beefsteaks,
To see the Sun set, sure he'll rise to-morrow,
Not through a misty morning twinkling weak
As a drunken man's dead eye in maudlin sorrow,
But with all Heaven t' himself; that day will break as Seateous as cloudless, nor be forced to borrow
That sort of farthing candlelight which glimmers
Where reeking Lond'n's smoky caldron simmers.

XLIV.
I love the language, that soft bastard Latin,
Which melts like kisses from a female mouth,
And sounds as if it should be writ on satin,
With syllables which breathe of the sweet South.
And gentle liquids gliding all so pat in,
That not a single accent seems uncouth,
Like our harsh northern whistling, granting guttural,
Which we're obliged to hiss, and spit, and sputter all.

XLV.
I like the women too, (forgive my folly)
From the rich peasant cheek of ruddy bronze,
And large black eyes that flash on you a valley
Of rays that say a thousand things at once,
To the high dam's brow, more melancholy,
But clear, and with a wild and liquid glance,
Heart on her lips, and soul within her eyes,
Soft as her clime, and sunny as her skies.

XLVI.
Eve of the land which still is Paradise!
Italian beauty! didst thou not inspire
Raphael, who died in thy embrace, and vies
With all we know of Heaven, or can desire,
In what he hath bequeath'd us?—in what guise
Though flashing from the fervor of the lyre,
Would words describe thy past and present glow
While yet Canova can create below?*

XLVII.
"England! with all thy faults I love thee still"*
I said at Calais, and have not forgot it;
I like to speak and lucubrate my fill;
I like the government, (but that is not it)
I like the freedom of the press and quill;
I like the Habeas Corpus, (when we've got it)
I like a parliamentary debate,
Particularly when 'tis not too late:

XLVIII.
Like the taxes, when they're not too many,
I like a coal-steel fire, when not too dear;
I like a beef-steak, too, as well as any;
Have no objection to a pot of beer;
I like the weather, when it is not rainy;
That is, I like two months of every year.
And so God save the Regent, Church, and King
Which means that I like all and every thing.

XLIX.
Our standing army, and disbanded seamen,
Poor's rate, Reform, my own, the nation's debt.
Our little riots just to show we are free men.
Our trifling bankruptcies in the Gazette,
Our cloudy climate, and our chilly women,
All these I can forgive, and those forget,
And greatly venerate our recent glories,
And wish they were not owing the Tories.

* Note.
(In talking thus, the writer, more especially
Of women, would be understood to say,
He spoke as a spectator, not officially,
And always, reader, in a mocking way;
Perhaps, too, in no very great degree shall be Appear to have offended in this lay,
Since, as all know, without the sex, our sentences
Would seem unsatisfy'd like their unmind'd breasts.)

Princes a Death.
L.
But to my tale of Laura,—for I find
Digression is a sin, that by degrees
Becomes exceeding tedious to my mind,
And, therefore, may the reader too displease—
The gentle reader, who may wax unkind,
And caring little for the author's ease,
Insist on knowing what he means, a hard
And hapless situation for a bard.

Oh that I had the art of easy writing
What should be easy reading! could I scale
Parnassus, where the Muses sit inditing
Those pretty poems, never known to fall,
How quickly would I print, (the world delighting,)
A Grecian, Syrian, or Assyrian tale:
And sell you, mix'd with western sentimentism,
Sane samples of the first Orientalism.

But I am but a nameless sort of person,
(A broken Dandy lately on my travels,)
And take for rhyme, to hook my rambling verse on,
The first that Walker's Lexicon unravels,
And when I can't find that, I put a worse on,
Not caring as I ought for critics' civilities;
I've a half mind to tumble down to prose,
But verse is more in fashion—so here goes.

The Count and Laura made their new arrangement,
Which lasted, as arrangements sometimes do,
For half a dozen years without estrangement;
They had their little differences; too;
Those jealous whiffs, which never any change meant:
In such affairs there probably are few
Who have not had this pouting sort of squabble,
From sinners of high station to the rabble.

But on the whole, they were a happy pair,
As happy as unlawful love could make them;
The gentleman was fond, the lady fair,
Their chains so slight, 'twas not worth while to break them:
The world beheld them with indulgent air;
The pious only wish'd "the devil take them!"
He took them not; he very often waits,
And leaves old sinners to be young one's baits.

But they were young; Oh! what without our youth
Would love be! What would youth be without love!
Youth lends it joy, and sweetness, vigor, truth,
Heart's soul, and all that seems as from above:
But, languishing with years, it grows uncouth—
One of few things experience don't improve,
Which is, perhaps, the reason why 'd fellows
Are always so preposterously jealous.

It was the Carnival, as I have said
Some six and thirty stanzas back, and so
Laura the usual preparations made,
Which you do when your mind's made up to go
To-night to Mrs. Boehm's masquerade,
Spectator, or partaker in the show;
The only difference known between the cases
Is—here, we have six weeks of "varnish'd faces."

Laura, when drest, was (as I sang before)
A pretty woman as was ever seen,
Fresh as the Angel o'er a new inn door,
Or frontispiece of a new Magazine,
With all the fashions which the last month wore,
Color'd, and silver paper leaved between
That and the title-page, for fear the press
Should soil with words of speech the parts of dress.

They went to the Ridotto;—'tis a ball
Where people dance, and sup, and dance again;
Its proper name, perhaps, was a masqued ball,
But that's of no importance to my strain;
'Tis (on a smaller scale) like our Vauxhall,
Excepting that it can't be spoilt by rain:
The company is "mix'd," (the phrase I quote so
As much as saving, they're below your notice;)

For a "mix'd company" implies that, save
Yourself and friends, and half a hundred more
Whom you may bow to without looking grave,
The rest are but a vulgar set, the bore
Of public places, where they basely brave
The fashionable stare of twenty score
Of well-bred persons, call'd "the World;" but I
Although I know them, really don't know why

This is the case in England; at least was During the dynasty of Dandies, now
Perchance succeeded by some other class
Of imitated imitators—how Irreparably soon decline, alas!
The demagogues of fashion: all below
Is frail; how easily the world is lost
By love, or war, and now and then by frost.

Crush'd was Napoleon by the northern Thor,
Who knock'd his army down with icy hammer,
Stopp'd by the elements, like a whaler, or
A blundering novice in his new French grammar.
Good cause had he to doubt the chance of war.
And as for Fortune—but I dare not d— a her,
Because, were I to ponder to infinity,
The more I should believe in her divinity.

She rules the present, past, and all to be yet,
She gives us luck in lotteries, love, and marriage.
I cannot say that she's done much for me yet;
Nor that I mean her bounties to disparage,
We've not yet closed accounts, and we shall see yet
How much she'll make amends for past miscarriage;
Meantime the goddess I'll no more important,
Unless to thank her when she's made my fortune.

To turn,—and to return,—the devil take it!
This story slips for ever through my fingers,
Because, just as the stanza likes to make it,
It needs must be—and so it rather lingers;
This form of verse began, I can't well break it,
But must keep time and tune like public singer;
But if I once get through my present measure,
I'll take another when I'm next at leisure.
LXIV.
They went to the Ridotto, ('tis a place To which I mean to go myself to-morrow, Just to divert my thoughts a little space, Because I'm rather hippish, and may borrow Some spirits, guessing at what kind of face May luck beneath each mask, and as my sorrow Slackens its pace sometimes, I'll make, or find, Some thing shall leave it half an hour behind.)

LXV.
Now Laura moves along the joyous crowd, Smiles in her eyes, and simpers on her lips; To some she whispers, others speaks aloud; To some she curtsies, and to some she dips, Complaints of warmth, and this complaint avow'd, Her lover brings the lemonade, she sips; She then surveys, condemns, but pities still Her dearest friends for being drest so ill.

LXVI.
One has false curls, another too much paint, "A third—where did she buy that frightful turban? A fourth so pale she fears she's going to faint, A fifth's look's vulgar, dowdyish, and suburban, A sixth's white silk has got a yellow taint, A seventh's thin muslin surely will be her bane, And lo! an eighth appears,—'twill see no more!" For fear, like Banquo's kings, they reach a score.

LXVII.
Meantime, while she was thus at others gazing, Others were levelling their looks at her; She heard the men's half-whisper'd mode of praising, And, till 'twas done, determined not to stir; The women only thought it quite amazing That at her time of life so many were admirers still,—but men are so debased, Those brazen creatures always suit their taste.

LXVIII.
For my part, now, I ne'er could understand Why naughty women— but, don't discuss A thing which is a scandal to the land, I only don't see why it should be thus; And if I were but in a gown and band, Just to entitle me to make a fuss, I'd preach on this till Wilberforce and Romilly Should quote in their next speeches from my homily.

LXIX.
While Laura thus was seen and seeing, smiling, Talking, she knew not why and cared not what, So that her female friends, with envy broiling, Beheld her airs and triumph, and all that; And well drest males still kept before her filing, And passing bow'd and mingled with her chat; More than the rest one person seem'd to stare With pertinacity that's rather rare.

LXX.
He was a Turk, the color of mahogany; And Laura saw him, and at first was glad, Because the Turks so much admire philogyny, Although their usage of their wives is sad; 'Tis sa'd they use no better than a dog any Poor woman, whom they purchase like a pad: They have a number, though they ne'er exhibit 'em, Four wives by law, and conclude "ad libitum."

LXXI.
They lock them up, and veil, and gnar' them daily, They scarcely can behold their male relations, So that their moments do not pass so gaily As is supposed the case with northern nations; Confine'ment, too, must make them look quite pale, And as the Turks after long conversations, Their days are either past in doing nothing, Or bathing, nursing, making love, and clothing.

LXXII.
They cannot read, and so don't lip in criticism; Nor write, and so they don't affect the muse; Were never caught in epigram or witticism, Have no romances, sermons, plays, reviews,— In harams learning soon would make a pretty schiera But luckily these beauties are no "blues," No bustling Botherbys have they to show 'em "That charming passage in the last new poem."

LXXIII.
No solemn, antique gentleman of rhyme, Who having angled all his life for fame, And getting but a nibble at a time, Still fussily keeps fishing on, the same Small "Triton of the minnows," the sublime Of mediocrity, the furious tame, The echo's echo, usher of the school Of female wits, boy bards,—in short, a fool!

LXXIV.
A talking oracle of awful phrase, [laws] The approving "Good!" (by no means good in Humming like flies around the newest blaze, The bluest of bluebottles you e'er saw, Teasing with blame, exculcating with praise, Gorging the little fame he gets all raw, Translating tongues he knows not even by letter, And sweating plays so middling, bad were better.

LXXV.
One hates an author that's all author, fellows In foolscap uniforms turn'd up with ink, So very anxious, clever, fine, and jealous, One don't know what to say to them, or think, Unless to puff them with a pair of bellows; Of coxcombry's worst coxcomb e'en the pink Are preferable to these shreds of paper, These unquench'd snuffings of the midnight taper.

LXXVI.
Of these same we see several, and of others, Men of the world, who know the world like men Scott, Rogers, Moore, and all the better brothers, Who think of something else besides the pen; But for the children of the "mighty mother," The would-be wits and can't-be gentlemen, I leave them to their daily "tea is ready," Smug coterie, and literary lady.

LXXVII.
The poor dear Mussulwomen whom I mention Have none of these instructive pleasant people And one would seem to them a new invention, Unknown as belis within a Turkish steetle; I think 'twould almost be worth while to pension (Though best-sown projects very often reap ill A missionary author, just to preach) Our Christian usage of the parts of speech.
LXXVIII.

No chemistry for them unfolds her gasses,
No metaphysics are let loose in lectures,
No circulating library amasses
Religious novels, moral tales, and strictures
Upon the living manners, as they pass us;
No exhibition glares with annual pictures:
They stare not on the stars from out their attics,
Nor deal (thank God for that!) in mathematics.

LXXIX.

Why I thank God for that is no great matter,
I have my reasons, you no doubt suppose,
And as, perhaps, they would not highly flatter,
I’ll keep them for my life (to come) in prose;
I fear I have a little turn for satire,
And yet methinks the older that one grows
Inclines us more to laugh than scold, though laughter
Leaves us so doubly serious shortly after.

LXXX.

Oh, Mirth and Innocence! Oh, Milk and Water!
Ye happy mixtures of more happy days!
In these sad centuries of sin and slaughter,
Abominable Man no more allays
His thirst with such pure beverage.
No matter, I love you both, and both shall have my praise:
Oh, for old Saturn’s reign of sugar-candy!—
Meantime I drink to your return in brandy.

LXXXI.

Our Laura’s Turk still kept his eyes upon her,
Less in the Mussulman than Christian way,
Which seems to say, “Madam, I do you honor,
And while I please to stare, you’ll please to stay.”
Could staring win a woman, this had won her,
But Laura could not thus be led astray;—
She had stood fire too long and well, to boggle
Even at this stranger’s most outlandish ogle.

LXXXII.

The morning now was on the point of breaking,
A turn of time at which I would advise
Ladies who have been dancing, or partaking
In any other kind of exercise,
To make their preparations for forsaking
The ball-room ere the sun begins to rise,
Because when once the lamps and candles fail,
His blushes make them look a little pale.

LXXXIII.

I’ve seen some balls and revels in my time,
And stayed them over for some silly reason,
And then I look’d (I hope it was no crime)
To see what lady best stood out the season;
And though I’ve seen some thousands in their prime,
Lovely and pleasing, and who still may please on,
I never saw but one, (the stars withdrawn,)—
Whose bloom could after dancing dare the dawn.

LXXXIV.

The name of this Aurora I’ll not mention,
Although I might, for she was nought to me
More than that patent work of God’s invention,
A charming woman, whom we like to see;
But writing names would merit reprehension,
Yet if you like to find out this fair she,
At the next London or Parisian ball
You still may mark her cheek, out-blooming all.

LXXXV.

Laura, who knew it would not do at all
To meet the daylight after seven hours’ sitting
Among three thousand people at a ball,
To make her curtesy thought it right and fitting
The Count was at her elbow with her shawl,
And they the room were on the point of quitting
When lo! those cursed gondoliers had got
Just in the very place where they should not.

LXXXVI.

In this they’re like our coachmen, and the cause
Is much the same—the crowd, and pulling hauling.
With blasphemies enough to break their jaws,
They make a never intermittent hawling.
At home, our Bow-street gemmen keep the laws,
And here a sentry stands within your calling;
But for all that, there is a deal of swearing,
And nauseous words past mentioning or bearing

LXXXVII.

The Count and Laura found their boat at last,
And homeward floated o’er the silent tide,
Discussing all the dances gone and past;
The dancers and their dresses, too, beside;
Some little scandals eke: but all agast
(As to their palace stairs the rowsers glide)
Sate Laura by the side of her Adorer,
When lo! the Mussulman was there before her.

LXXXVIII.

“Sir,” said the Count, with brow exceeding grave
“Your unexpected presence here will make
It necessary for myself to crave
Its import? But perhaps ‘tis a mistake;
I hope it is so; and at once to wave
All compliment, I hope so for your sake;
You understand my meaning, or you shall.”
“Sir,” (quothat the Turk,) “‘tis no mistake at all

LXXXIX.

“That lady is my wife!” Much wonder paints
The lady’s changing cheek, as well it might;
But where an Englishwoman sometimes faints,
Italian females don’t do so outright;
They only call a little on their saints,
And then come to themselves, almost or quite,
Which saves much hartshorn, salts, and sprinkling faces,
And cutting stays, as usual in such cases.

XC.

She said,—what could she say? Why not a word
But the Count courteously invited in
The stranger, much appeased by what he heard:
“Such things, perhaps, we’d best desist within,’”
 Said he; “don’t let us make ourselves absurd
In public, by a scene, nor raise a din,
For then the chief and only satisfaction
Will be much quizzing on the whole transaction.”

XCI.

They enter’d, and for coffee call’d—it came,
A beverage for Turks and Christians both,
Although the way they make it’s no* the same.
Now Laura, much recover’d, oh! was loth
To speak, cries “Beppo! what’s your pagan name
Bless me! your beard is of amazing growth.
And how came you to keep away so long?
Are you not sensible ‘twas very wrong?
NOTES TO BEPPO.

XCVII. Himself, and much (heaven knows how gotten) cash
He then embark'd with risk of life and limb,
And got clear off, although the attempt was rash.
He said that Providence protected him—
For my part, I say nothing, lost we clash
In our opinions: well, the ship was trim
Set sail, and kept her reckoning fairly on Except three days of calm when off Cape Bonn.

XCVIII. They reach'd the island, ne transferr'd his lading
And self and live-stock, to another bottom,
And pass'd for a true Turkey merchant, trading
With goods of various names, but I've forgot 'em.
However, he got off by this evading,
Or else the people would perhaps have shot him,
And thus at Venice landed to reclaim
His wife, religion, house, and Christian name.

XCIX. His wife received, the patriarch rebaptized him,
(He made the church a present by the way;)
He then threw off the garments which disguised him.
And borrow'd the Count's small-clothes for a day;
His friends the more for his long absence prized him.
Finding he'd wherewithal to make them gay
With dinners, where he oft became the laugh of them,
For stories—but I don't believe the half of them.

NOTES TO BEPPO.

"Cortezo" is pronounced "Cortecho," with an anterior accent, according to the Arabesque guttural. It means what there is as yet no precise name for in England, though the practice is as common as in any tranmontane country whatever.

ADVERTISEMENT.

"Celui qui remplissait alors cette place était un gentilhomme Polonais, nommé Mazeppa, né dans le palatinat de Padolle; il avait été élevé page de Jean Casimir, et avait pris à sa cour quelque teinture des belles-lettres. Une intrigue qu'il eut dans sa jeunesse avec la femme d'un gentilhomme Polonais, ayant été découverte, le mari le fit lier tout nu sur un cheval farouche, et le laissa aller en cet état. Le cheval, qui était du pays de l'Ukraine, y retourna, et y porça Mazeppa, demi-mort de fatigue et de fièvre. Quelques paysans le secoururent: il resta longtemps parmi eux, et se signala dans plusieurs courses contre les Tartares. La supériorité de ses lumières lui donna une grande considération parmi les Cosaques: sa réputation s'augmentant de jour en jour, obligea le Czar à le faire Prince de l'Ukraine."—Voltaire, Hist. de Charles XII. p. 196.

"Le roi fuyant et poursuivi eut son cheval tué sous lui; le Colonel Gieta, blessé, et perdant tout son sang, lui donna le sien. Ainsi on remit deux fois à cheval, dans la fuite, ce conquérant qui n'avait pu y monter pendant la bataille."—Voltaire, Hist. de Charles XII. p. 216.

"Le roi alla par un autre chemin avec quelques cavaliers. Le carrosse, où il était, ronhip dans la marche; on le remit à cheval. Pour comble de disgrâce, il s'égarait le soir dans un bois; là, son courage ne pouvant plus suppléer à ses forces épuisées, le douleur de sa blessure devenues plus insupportables par fatigue, son cheval étant tombé de laissitude, il se coucha quelques heures au pied d'un arbre, en danger d'être surpris à tout moment par les vainqueurs qui le cherchaient de tous côtés."—Voltaire, Hist. de Charles XII. p. 218.

I.

'Twas after dread Pultowa's day,
When fortune left the royal Swede,
Around a slaughter'd army lay,
No more to combat and to bleed.
The power and glory of the war,
Faithless as their vain votaries, men,
Had pass'd to the triumphant Czar,
And Moscow's walls were safe again,

Until a day more dark and drear,
And a more memorable year,
Should give to slaughter and to shame,
A mightier host and haughtier name:
A greater wreck, a deeper fall,
A shock to one—a thunderbolt to all.

II.

Such was the hazard of the die;
The wounded Charles was taught to fly
By day and night through field and flood,
Stain'd with his own and subjects blood;
For thousands fell that flight to aid:
And not a voice was heard t' upbraid
Ambition in his humbled hour,
When truth had nought to dread from power,
His horse was slain, and Gieta gave
His own—and died the Russians slave.
This too sinks after many a league
Of well sustained, but vain fatigue;
And in the depth of forests, darkling
The watch-fires in the distance sparkling—
The beacons of surrounding foes—
A king must lay his limbs at length.
Are these the laurels and repose
For which the nations strain their strength!
They laid him by a savage tree,
In outworn nature's agony;
His wounds were stiff—his limbs were stark—
The heavy hour was chill and dark;
The fever in his blood forbade
A transient slumber's fitful aid,
And thus it was; but yet through all,
Kinglike the monarch bore his fall,
And made, in this extreme of ill,
His pangs the vassals of his will;
All silent and subdued were they,
As once the nations round him lay.

III.

A band of chiefs! alas! how few,
Since but the fleeting of a day
Had thinn'd it; but this wreck was true
And chivalrous: upon the clay
Each sate him down, all sad and mute,
Beside his monarch and his steed,
For danger levels man and brute,
And all are fellows in their need.
Among the rest, Mazeppa made
His pillow in an old oak's shade—
Himself as rough, and scarce less old,
The Ukraine's hetman, calm and bold;
But first, outspent with this long course,
The Cossack prince rubb'd down his horse,
And made for him a leafy bed,
And smoothed his fetlocks and his name,
And slack'd his girth, and stripp'd his rein,
And joy'd to see how well he fed;
For until now he had the dread
His wearied courser might refuse
To browse beneath the midnight dews:
But he was hardy as his lord,
And little cared for bed and board;
But spirited and docile too;
Whatever was to be done, would do.
Shaggy and swift, and strong of limb,
All Tartar-like he carried him;
Oberd his voice, and came to call,
And knew him in the midst of all;
Though thousands were around,—and Night,
Without a star, pursued her flight,—
That steed from sunset until dawn
His chief would follow like a fawn.

IV.
This done, Mazeppa spread his cloak,
And laid his lance beneath his oak,
Felt if his arms in order good
The long day's march had well withstood—
If still the powder fill'd the pan,
And flints unloos'd kept their lock—
His sabre's hilt and scabbard felt,
And whether they had chafed his belt—
And next the venerable man,
From out his haversack and can,
Prepared and spread his slender stock;
And to the monarch and his men
The whole or portion offer'd them,
With far less of inquietude
Than courtiers at a banquet would.
And Charles of this his slender share
With smiles partook a moment there,
To force of cheer a greater show,
And seem above both wounds and wo—
And then he said—" Of all our band,
Though firm of heart and strong of hand,
In skirmish, march, or forage, none
Can less have said or more have done
Than thee, Mazeppa! On the earth
So fit a pair had never birth,
Since Alexander's days till now,
As thy Bucephalus and thou:
All Scythia's fame to thine should yield
For pricking on o'er flood and field."
Mazeppa answer'd—"Ill betide
The school wherein I learn'd to ride!"
Quoth Charles—" Old Hetman, wherefore so,
Since thou hast learn'd the art so well?"
Mazeppa said—" Twere long to tell:
And we have many a league to go,
With every now and then a blow,
And ten to one at least the foe,
Before our steeds may graze at ease
Beyond the swift Borysthenes:
And, sire, your limbs have need of rest,
And I will be the sentinel
Of this your troop."—" But I request,

Said Sweden's monarch, "thou wilt tell
This tale of thine, and I may reap,
Perchance, from this the boon of sleep,
For at this moment from my eyes
The hope of present slumber flies."

"Well, sire, with such a hope, I'll track
My seventy years of memory back:
I think 'twas in my twentieth spring,—
Ay, 'twas,—when Casimir was king—
John Casimir,—I was his page
Six summers, in my earlier age;
A learned monarch, faith I was he,
And must unlike your majesty;
He made no wars, and did not gain
New realms to lose them back again;
And (save debates in Warsaw's diet)
He reigned in most unseemly quiet;
Not that he had no cares to vex,
He lov'd the muses and the sex;
And sometimes these so froward are,
They made him wish himself at war,
But soon his wrath being o'er, he took
Another mistress, or new book:
And then he gave prodigious fêtes—
All Warsaw gather'd round his gates
To gaze upon his splendid court,
And dames, and chiefs, of princely port;
He was the Polish Solomon,
So sung his poets, all but one,
Who, being unpassion'd, made a satire,
And boasted that he could not flatter.
It was a court of jests and mimes,
Where every courtier tried at rhymes;
Even I for once produced some verses,
And sign'd my odes Despairing Thirias.
There was a certain Palatine,
A count of fair and high descent,
Rich as a salt or silver mine; *
And he was proud ye may divine,
As if from heaven he had been sent;
He had such wealth in blood and ore
As few could match beneath the throne;
And he would gaze upon his store,
And o'er his pedigree would pore,
Until by some confusion led,
Which almost look'd like want of head,
He thought their merits were his own.
His wife was not of his opinion—
His junior she by thirty years—
Grew daily tired of his dominion;
And, after wishes, hopes, and fears,
To virtue a few farewell tears,
A restless dream or two, some glances
At Warsaw's youth, some songs, and dances
Awaited but the usual chances,
Those happy accidents which render
The coldest dames so very tender,
To deck her Count with titles given,
'Tis said, as passports into heaven;
But, strange to say, they rarely boast
Of these who have deserved them most

V.
"I was a goodly stripling then;
At seventy years I so may say,
That there were few, or boys or men,
Who, in my dawning time of day,
Of vassal or of knight's degree,
Could vie in vanities with me;
For I had strength, youth, gayety,
A port, not like to this ye see,
But smooth, as all is rugged now:
For time, and care, and war, have plough'd
My very soul from out my brow;
And thus I should be disadvow'd
By all my kind and kin, could they
Compare my day and yesterday;
This change was wrought, too, long ere age
Had ta'en my features for his page:
With years ye know, have not declined
My strength, my courage, or my mind,
Or at this hour I should not be Telling old tales beneath a tree,
With starless skies my canopy.
But let me on: Theresa's form—
Methinks it glides before me now,
Between me and your chestnut's bough,
The memory is so quick and warm;
And yet I find no words to tell
The shape of her I loved so well:
She had the Asiatic eye,
Such as our Turkish neighborhood
Hath mingled with our Polish blood,
Dark as above us is the sky;
But through it stole a tender light,
Like the first moonrise of midnight;
Large, dark, and swimming in the stream,
Which seem'd to melt to its own beam;
All love, half languor, and half fire,
Like saints that at the stake expire,
And lift their raptured looks on high,
As though it were a joy to die.
A brow like a midsummer lake,
Transparent with the sun therein,
When waves no murmur dare to make,
And heaven beholds her face within.
A cheek and lip—but why proceed?
I loved her then—I love her still;
And such as I am, love indeed
In fierce extremes—in good and ill.
But still we love even in our rage,
And haunted to our very age
With the vain shadow of the past,
As is Mazeppa tc the last.

VI.

"We met—we gazed—I saw, and sigh'd,
She did not speak, and yet replied;
There are ten thousand tones and signs
We hear and see, but none defines—
Involuntary sparks of thought,
Which strike from out the heart o'erwrought,
And form a strange intelligence,
Alike mysterious and intense,
Which link the burning chain that binds,
Without their will, young hearts and minds;
Conveying, as the electric wire,
We know not how, the absorbing fire.—
I saw, and sigh'd—in silence wept,
And still reluctant distance kept,
Until I was made known to her,
And we might then and there confer
Without suspicion—then even then
I long'd, and was resolved to speak,
But on my lips they died again,
The accents tremulous and weak,
Until one hour.—There is a game,
A frivolous and foolish play,
Wherewith we while away the day;
It is—I have forgot the name—
And we to this, it seems, were set,
By some strange chance, which I forget.
I reck'd not if I won or lost,
It was enough for me to be
So near to hear, and oh! to see
The being whom I loved the most.—
I watch'd her as a sentinel,
(May ours this dark night watch as well!)
Until I saw, and thus it was,
That she was pensive, nor perceived
Her occupation, nor was grieved
Nor glad to lose or gain; but still Play'd on for hours, as if her will Yet bound her to the place, though not
That hers might be the winning lot.
Then through my brain the thought did past
Even as a flash of lightning there,
That there was something in her air
Which would not doom me to despair;
And on the thought my words broke forth.
All incoherent as they were—
Their eloquence was little worth,
But yet she listened—'twas enough—
Who listens once will listen twice;
Her heart, be sure, is not of ice,
And one refusal no rebuff.

VII.

"I loved, and was beloved again—
They tell me, Sir, you never knew
Those gentle frailties; if 'tis true,
I shorten all my joy or pain;
To you 'twould seem absurd as vain;
But all men are not born to reign,
or o'er their passions, or as you
Thus o'er themselves and nations too.
I am—or rather was—a prince,
A chief of thousands, and could lead
Them on where each would foremost bleed
But could not o'er myself en vive
The like control—But to resume:
I loved, and was beloved again;
In sooth, it is a happy doom,
But yet where happiest ends in pain—
We met in secret, and the hour
Which led me to that lady's bower
Was fiery Expectation's dower.
My days and nights were nothing—all
Except that hour, which doth recall,
In the long lapse from youth to age,
No other like itself—I'd give
The Ukraine back again to live
It o'er once more—and be a page,
The happy page, who was the lord
Of one soft heart, and his own sword,
And had no other gem nor wealth
Save nature's gift of youth and health—
We met in secret—doubly sweet,
Some say, they find it so to meet;
I know not that—I would have given
My life but to have call'd her mine
In the full view of earth and heaven;
MAZEPPE.

For I did oft and long repine
'That we could only meet by stealth.

VIII.

'For lovers there are many eyes,
And such there were on us;—the devil
On such occasions should be civil—
The devil!—I'm loth to do him wrong,
It might be some untoward saint,
Who would not be at rest too long,
But to his pious bile gave vent—
But one fair night, some lurking spies
Surprised and seized us both.
The Count was something more than wroth:
I was unarm'd; but if in steel,
All cap-a-pie from head to heel,
What 'gainst their numbers could I do?—
'Twas near his castle, far away
From city or from succor near,
And almost on the break of day;
I did not tk nk to see another,
My moments seem'd reduced to few;
And with one prayer to Mary Mother,
And, it may be, a saint or two,
As I resign'd me to my fate,
They led me to the castle gate:
Theresa's doom I never knew,
Our lot was henceforth separate.—
An angry man, ye may opine,
Was he, the proud Count Palatine;
And he had reason good to be,
But he was most enraged lest such
An accident should chance to touch
Upon his future pedigree;
Nor less amazed, that such a blot
His noble 'scutcheon should have got,
While he was highest of his line;
Because unto himself he seem'd
The first of men, nor less he deem'd
In others' eyes, and most in mine.
'Beast! with a page—perchance a king
Had reconciled him to our thing;
But with a stripling of a page—
I felt—but cannot paint his rage.

IX.

"Bring forth the horse!"—the horse was brought;
In truth, he was a noble steed,
A Tartar of the Ukraine breed,
Who look'd as though the speed of thought
Were in his limbs; but he was wild,
Wild as the wild deer, and untaught,
With spur and bridle undefiled—
"Twas but a day he had been caught;
And snorting, with erected mane,
And struggling fiercely, but in vain,
In the full foam of wrath and dread
To me the desert-born was led;
They bound me on, that menial throng,
Upon his back with many a thong;
Then lost him with a sudden lash—
Away!—away!—and on we dash!—
Torrents less rapid and less rash.

X.

"Away!—away!—my breath was gone—
I saw not where he hurried on:
'Twas scarcely yet the break of day,
And on he foam'd—away!—away—
The last of human sounds when rose,
As I was darted from my foes,
Was the wild shout of savage laughter,
Which on the wind came roaring after
A moment from that rabble rout:
With sudden wrath I wrench'd my head,
And snapped the cord, which to the mane
Had bound my neck in lieu of rein,
And, writing half my form about,
Howl'd back my curse; but 'midst the tread
The thunder of my courser's speed,
Perchance they did not hear nor heed:
It vexes me—for I would fall
Have paid their insult back again.
I paid it well in after days:
There is not of that castle gate,
Its drawbridge and portcullis' weight,
Stone, bar, moat, bridge, or barrier left;
Nor of its fields a blade of grass,
Save what grows on a ridge of wall,
Where stood the hoarth-stone of the hall;
And many a time ye there might pass,
Nor dream that o'er that fortress was:
I saw its turrets in a blaze,
Their crackling battlements all cif,
And the hot lead pour down like rain
From off the scorched and blackening roof,
Whose thickness was not vengeance-proof.
They little thought that day of pain,
When launch'd, as on the lightning's flash,
They bade me to destruction dash.
That one day I should come again,
With twelve five thousand horse, to thank
The Count for his uncourteous ride.
They play'd me then a bitter prank,
When, with the wild horse for my guide
They bound me to his foaming flank;
At length I play'd them one as frank—
For time at last sets all things even.
And if we do but watch the hour,
There never yet was human power
Which could evade it, unforgift,
The patient search and vigil long
Of him who treasures up a wrong.

XI.

"Away, away, my steed and I,
Upon the pinions of the wind,
All human dwellings left behind;
We sped like meteors through the sky,
When with its crackling sound the nigh
Is checker'd with the northern light:
Town—village none were on our track,
But a wild plain of far extent,
And bounded by a forest black;
And, save the scarce seen battlement
On distant heights of some strong hold
Against the Tartar's built of old,
No trace of man,—the year before
A Turkish army had march'd o'er;
And where the Spahi's hoof hath trod
The verdure flies the bloody sod—
The sky was dull, and dim, and gray,
And a low breeze erept moaning by—
I could have answered with a sigh—
But fast we fled, away, away—
And I could neither sigh nor pray;
And my cold sweat-drops fell like rain
Upon the courser's bristling mane:
But, snorting still with rage and fear,
He flew upon his far career;
At times I almost thought, indeed,
He must have slacken'd in his speed;
But no—he bounds and slender frame
Was nothing to his angry might,
And merely like a spur became:
Each motion which I made to free
My swollen limbs from their agony
Increased his fury and affright:
(tried my voice,—'twas faint and low,
But yet he swarved as from a blow:
And, starting to each accent, sprang
As from a sudden trumpet's clang:
Meantime my cords were wet with gore,
Which, oozing through my limbs, ran o'er;
And in my tongue the thirst became
A something fierer far than flame.

XII.

"We neer'd the wild wood—'twas so wide,
I saw no bounds on either side;
'Twas studded with old sturdy trees,
That bent not to the roughest breeze
Which howls down from Siberia's waste,
And strips the forest in its haste,—
But these were few, and far between,
Set thick with shrubs more young and green,
I variant with their annual leaves.
Ere strown by those autumnal eyes
That nip the forest's foliage dead,
Discolor'd with a lifeless red,
Which stands thereon like stiften'd gore
Upon the slain when battle's o'er,
And some long winter's night hath shed
Its frost o'er every tombless head,
So cold and stark the raven's beak
May peck unperched each frozen cheek;
'Twas a wild waste of underwood,
And here and there a chestnut stood,
The strong oak, and the hardy pine!
But far apart—and well it were,
Or else a different lot were mine—
The boughs gave way, and did not tear
My limbs; and I found strength to bear
My wounds, already scor'd with cold—
My bonds forbade to loose my hold.
We rustled through the leaves like wind,
Loft shrubs, and trees, and wolves behind;
By night I heard them on the track,
Their troop came hard upon our back,
With their long gallop, which can tire
The hound's deep hate, and hunter's fire;
Where'er we flew they followed on,
Nor left us with the morning sun;
Behind I saw them, scarce a rood,
At day-break winding through the wood,
And through the night had heard their feet
Their stealing, rustling step repeat.
Oh! how I wish'd for spear or sword,
At least to die amidst the horde,
And perish—if it must be so,
At last, destroying many a foe.
When first my courser's race begun,
I wish'd the goal already won;
But now I doubted strength and speed.
Vain doubt! his swift and savage breed
Had nerved him like the mountain-roo;
Nor faster falls the blinding snow
Which whips the peasant near the door
Whose threshold he shall cross no more,
Bewilder'd with the dazzling blast,
'Tan through the forest paths he past—
Untired, untamed, and worse than wild;
All furious as a favor'd child
Balk'd of its wish; or fiercer still—
A woman piq'd—who has her will.

XIII.

The wood was past; 'twas more than noon
But chill the air, although in June;
Or it might be my veins ran cold—
Prolong'd endurance tames the bold;
And I was then not what I seem,
But heselong as a wintry stream,
And wore my feelings out before
I well could count their causes o'er;
And what with fury, fear, and wrath,
The tortures which beset my path,
Cold, hunger, sorrow, shame, distress,
Thus bound in nature's nakedness;
Sprung from a race whose rising blood
When stirr'd beyond its calmer mood,
And trodden hard upon, is like
The rattle'snake's, in act to strike,
What marvel if this worn-out trunk
Beneath its woes a moment sink?
The earth gave way, the skies roll'd round,
I seem'd to sink upon the ground
But err'd, for I was fastly bound.
My heart turn'd sick, my brain grew more,
And throbb'd awhile, then beat no more:
The skies spun like a mighty wheel;
I saw the trees like drunkards reel,
And a slight flash sprang o'er my eyes,
Which saw no farther: he who dies
Can die no more than then I died.
Overtortured by that ghastly ride,
I felt the blackness come on, and,
And strange to wake; but could not make
My senses climb up from below:
I felt as on a plank at sea,
When all the waves that dash o'er thee,
At the same time upheave and whelm,
And hurl thee towards a desert realm.
My undulating life was as
The fancied lights that fleeting pass
Our shut eyes in deep midnight, when Fever begins upon the brain;
But soon it pass'd, with little pain,
But a confusion worse than such;
I own that I should deem it much
Dying, to feel the same again;
And yet I do suppose we must Feel far more ere we turn to dust:
No matter; I have bared my brow
Full in death's face—before—and now.

XIV.

"My thoughts came back; where was I? Cold
And numb, and glad to feel my pulse
Life reassumed its lingering hold,
And throb by throb; till grown a pang
Which for a moment would conuuls
My blood lessow'd though thick and chill;
My ear with uncothh noises rang,
My heart began once more to thrill;
My sight return'd, though dim; alas!
The dizzy race seem'd almost done,
Although no goal was nearly won
Some streaks announced the coming sun—
How slow, alas! he came!
Methought that mist of dawning gray
Would never dapple into day;
How heavily it roll'd away
Before the eastern flame
Rose crimson, and deposed the stars,
And call'd the radiance from their cars,
And fill'd the earth from his deep throne,
With lonely lustre, all his own.

XVII.
"Up rose the sun; the mists were curl'd
Back from the solitary world
Which lay around—behind—before;
What booted it to traverse o'er
Plain, forest, river! Man nor brute,
Nor dint of hoof, nor print of foot,
Lay in the wild luxuriant soil;
No sign of travel—none of toil;
The very air was mute;
And not an insect's shrill small horn,
Nor matin bird's new voice was borne
From herb nor thicket. Many a wert,
Panting as if his heart would burst,
The weary brute still stagger'd on;
And still we were—or seem'd—alone:
At length, while reeling on our way,
Methought I heard a courser neigh,
From out yon tuft of blackening firs.
Is it the wind those branches stir?
No, no! from out the forest prance
A trampling troop; I see them come!
In one vast squadron they advance!
I strove to cry—my lips were dumb.
The steeds rush on in plunging pride;
But where are they the reins to guide?
A thousand horse—and none to ride!
With flowing tail, and flying mane,
Wide nostrils—never stretch'd by pain,
Mouths bloodless to the bit or rein,
And feet that iron never shod,
And flanks unscarr'd by spur or rod,
A thousand horse, the wild, the free,
Like waves that follow o'er the sea,
Came thickly thundering on,
As if our faint approach to meet;
The sight renounced my courser's feet,
A moment staggering, feebly fleet,
A moment, with a faint low neigh,
He answer'd, and then fell;
With gasps and glazing eyes he lay,
And reeking limbs immovable,
His first and last career is done!
On came the troop—they saw him stoop,
They saw me strangely bound along
His back with many a bloody thong;
They stop—they start—they snuff the air,
Gallop a moment here and there,
Approach, retire, wheel round and round,
Then plunging back with sudden bound,
Headed by one black mighty steed,
Who seem'd the patriarch of his breed,
Without a single speck or hair
Of white upon his shaggy hide;
They snort—they foam—neigh—werve saide
And backward to the forest fly,
By instinct, from a human eye.—
They left me there, to my despair,
Lrank’d to the dead and stiffening wretch,
Whose lifeless limbs beneath me stretch,
Relieved from that unwonted weight,
From whence I could not extricate
Nor him nor me—and there we lay,
The dying on the dead!
I little deem’d another day
Would see my houseless, helpless head.

"And there from morn till twilight bound,
I felt the heavy hours toll round,
With just enough of life to see
My last of suns go down on me,
In hopeless certainty of mind,
That makes us feel at length resign’d
To that which our foreboding years
Presents the worst and last of fears
Inevitable—even a boon,
No more unkind for coming soon;
Yet shunn’d and dreaded with such care,
As if it only were a snare
That prudence might escape;
At times both wish’d for and implored,
At times sought with self-pointed sword,
Yet still a dark and hideous close
To even intolerable woes,
And welcome in no shape.
And, strange to say, the songs of pleasure,
They who have revel’d beyond measure
In beauty, wassail, wine, and treasure,
Dip calm, or calmer, oft than he
Whose heritage was misery:
For he who hath in turn run through
All that was beautiful and new,
Hath nought to hope, and nought to leave;
And, save the future, (which is view’d
Not quite as men are base or good,
But as their nerves may be endued,)
With nought perhaps to grieve:—
The wretch still hopes his woes must end,
And Death, whom he so wildly deem his friend,
Appears, to his distemper’d eyes,
Arrived to rob him of his prize,
The tree of his new paradise.
To-morrow would have given him all,
Repaid his pangs, repair’d his fall;
To-morrow would have been the first
Of days no more deplored or curst,
But bright, and long, and beekoning years,
Seen dazling through the mist of tears,
Guerdon of many a painful hour;
To-morrow would have given him power
To rule, to shine, to smite, to save—
And must it dawn upon his grave?

XVIII.
"The sun was sinking—still I lay
Chain’d to the chill and stiffening steed,
I thought to mingle there our clay;
And my dim eyes of death had need,
No hope arose of being freed:
I cast my last looks up the sky,
And there between me and the sun
I saw the expecting raven fly,
Who scarce could wait till both should die,
 Ere his repast began;
He flew, and perch’d, then flew once more,
And each time nearer than before;
I saw his wing through twilight flit,
And once so near me he alit
I could have smote, but lack’d the strength
But the slight motion of my hand,
And feeble scratching of the sand,
The exerted throat’s faint struggling noise
Which scarcely could be called a voice.
Together scared him off at length.—
I know no more—my latest dream
Is something of a lovely star
Which fix’d my dull eyes from afar,
And went and came with wandering beam,
And of the cold, dull, swimming, dense
Sensation of recurring sense,
And then subsiding back to death,
And then again a little breath,
A little thrill, a short suspense,
An icy sickness curdling o’er
My heart, and sparks that cross’d my brain—
A gasp, a throb, a start of pain,
A sigh, and nothing more.

XIX.
"I woke—Where was I?—Do I see?
A human face look down on me?
And doth a roof above me close?
Do these limbs on a couch repose?
Is this a chamber where I lie?
And is it mortal you bright eye,
That watches me with gentle glance?
I closed my own again once more,
As doubtful that the former trance
Could not as yet be o’er:
A slender girl, long-haired, and tall,
Sage watching by the cottage wall;
The sparkle of her eye I caught,
Even with my first return of thought,
For ever and anon she threw
A prying, pitying glance on me
With her black eyes so wild and free.
I gazed, and gazed, until I knew
No vision it could be,—
But that I lived, and was released
From adding to the vulture’s feast:
And when the Cossack maid beheld
My heavy eyes at length unsealed,
She smiled—and I essay’d to speak,
But fail’d—and she approach’d, and made
With lip and finger signs that said,
I must not strive as yet to break
The silence, till my strength should be Enough to leave my accents free;
And then her hand on mine she laid,
And smooth’d the pillow for my head,
And stole along on tiptoe tread,
And gently oped the door, and spoke
In whispers—was ’er voice so sweet?
Even music follow’d her light feet:—
But those she call’d were not awake,
And she went forth; but, ere she pass’d
Another look on me she cast,
Another sign she made, to say,
That I had nought to fear, that all
Were near, at my command or call,
And she would not delay
Her due return:—while she was gone,
Methought I felt too much alone.
THE ISLAND

XX.
She came with mother and with sire—
What need of more?—I will not tire
With long recital of the rest,
Since I became the Cossack's guest;
They found me senseless on the plain—
They bore me to the nearest hut—
They brought me into life again—
Me—one day o'er their realm to reign!
Thus the vain fool who strove to glut
His rage, refining on my pain,
Sent me forth to the wilderness,
Bound, naked, bleeding, and alone,
To pass the desert to a throne,—
What mortal his own doom may guess?
Let me despond, let none despair!

To-morrow the Borysthenes
May see our coursers graze at ease
Upon his Turkish bank,—and never Had I such welcome for a river
As I should yield when safely there.
Comrades, good night!"—The Hetman threw
His length beneath the oak-tree shade,
With leafy couch already made,
A bed not comfortless nor new
To him, who took his rest where'er
The hour arrived, no matter where:
His eyes the hastening slumbers steep,
And if ye marvel Charles forgot
To thank his tale, he wondered not.—
The king had been an hour asleep.

THE ISLAND; OR,
CHRISTIAN AND HIS COMRADES.

ADVERTISEMENT.
The foundation of the following story will be found partly in the account of the mutiny of the Bounty in the South Seas, (in 1789,) and partly in "Mariner's account of the Tonga Islands."

CANTO I.

I.
The morning watch was come; the vessel lay
Her course, and gently made her liquid way;
The cloven billow dash'd from off her prow
In furrows form'd by that majestic plough;
The waters with their world were all before—
Behind, the South Sea's many an islet shore.
The quiet night, now dappling, 'gan to wane,
Dividing darkness from the dawning main;
The dolphins, not unconscious of the day,
Swam high, as eager of the coming ray;
The stars from broader beams began to creep,
And lift their shining eyelids from the deep;

The sail resumed its lately shadow'd white,
And the wind flutter'd with a freshening flight;
The purpling ocean owns the coming sun,
But ere he break—a deed is to be done.

II.
The gallant chief within his cabin slept,
Secure in those by whom the watch was kept:
His dreams were of Old England's welcome shore
Of toils rewarded, and of dangers o'er;
His name was added to the glorious roll
Of those who search the storm-surrounded Pole
The worst was over, and the rest seem'd sure,
And why should not his slumber be secure?
Alas! his deck was trod by unwilling feet,
And wilder hands would hold the vessel's sheet;
Young hearts, which languish'd for some sunny isle,
Where summer years and summer women smile
Men without country, who, too long estranged,
Had found no native home, or found it changed
And, half uncivilized, prefer'd the cave
Of some soft savage to the uncertain wave—
The gushing fruits that nature gave untill'd;
The wood without a path but where they will'd;
THE FIELD O'ER WHICH PROMISSOUNCIOUS PLENTY POUR'D
HER HORN: THE EQUAL LAND WITHOUT A LORD;
THE WISH—WHICH AGES HAVE NOT YET SUBDUED
IN MAN—TO HAVE NO MASTER SAVE HIS MOOD:
THE EARTH, WHOSE MINE WAS ON ITS FACE, UNSOLD,
THE GLOWING SUN AND PRODUCE ALL ITS GOLD;
I FEED FREEDOM WHICH CAN CALL EACH GROT HOME;
THE GENERAL GARDEN, WHERE ALL STEPS MAY ROAM,
WHERE NATURE OWNS A NATION AS HER CHILD,
EXULTING IN THE ENJOYMENT OF THE WILD;
THEIR SHELLS, THEIR FRUITS, THE ONLY WEALTH THEY KNOW; THEIR UNEXPLORING NAVY, THE CANOE;
THEIR SPORT, THE DASHING BREAKERS AND THE CHASE;
THEIR STRANGEST SIGHT, AN EUROPEAN FACE—
SUCH WAS THE COUNTRY IN WHICH THESE STRANGERS YEARN'D
TO SEE AGAIN; A SIGHT THEY DEARLY EARN'D.
AWAKE, BOLD BLIGH! THE FOE IS AT THE GATE,
AWAKE! AWAKE!—ALAS! IT IS TOO LATE!
FIERCELY BESIDE THY COT THE MUTINEER
STANDS, AND PROCLAIMS THE REIGN OF RAGE AND FEAR.
THY LINPS ARE BOUND, THE BAYONET AT THY BREAST;
THE HANDS, WHICH TREMBLED AT THY VOICE, ARREST;
DRAGG'D O'ER THE DECK, NO MORE AT THY COMMAND
THE OBEDIENT Pelm SHALL VEER, THE SAIL EXPAND;
THE SAVAGE SPIRIT, WHICH WOULD HULL BY WRATH
ITS DESPERATE ESCAPE FROM DUTY'S PATH,
GLARES ROUND THEE, IN THE SCARCE BELIEVING EYES
OF THOSE WHO FEAR THE CHIEF THEY SACRIFICE:
FOR NE'ER CAN MAN HIS CONSCIENCE ALL ASSUAGE, UNLESS HE DRAIN THE WINE OF PASSION—RAGE.

IV.
IN VAIN, NOT SILENCED BY THE EYE OF DEATH,
THOU CAL'ST THE LOYAL WITH THY MENACE'D BREATH;
THEY COME NOT; THEY ARE FEW, AND, OVER-AWED,
MUST ACQUIESCE, WHILE STERNER HEARTS APPLAUD,
IN VAIN THOU DOST DEMAND THE CAUSE: A CURSE
IS ALL THE ANSWER, WITH THE THREAT OF WORSE.
FULL IN THINE EYES IS WAVED THE GLITTERING BLADE, CLOSE TO THY THROAT THE POINTED BAYONET LAID,
THE LEVEL'D MUSKETS CIRCLE ROUND THY BREAST
IN HANDS AS STEELED TO DO THE DEADLY TEST.
THOU DAREST THEM TO THE WORST, EXCLAIMING—
"FIRE!"
BUT THEY WHO PITT'D NOT COULD YET ADLECT:
SOME LURKING REMNANT OF THEIR FORMER AWE
RESTRAIN'D THEM LONGER THAN THEIR BROKEN LAW;
THEY WOULD NOT DIP THEIR SOULS AT ONCE IN BLOOD,
BUT LEFT THEE TO THE MERCIES OF THE FLOOD.

V.
"HOIST OUT THE BOAT!" WAS NOW THE LEADER'S CRY;
AND WHO DARE ANSWER "NO!" TO MUTINY,
IN THE FIRST DAWNING OF THE DRUNKEN HOUR,
THE SATURNALIA OF UNHOPED-FOR POWER?
THE BOAT IS LOWER'D WITH ALL THE HASTE OF HATE,
WITH ITS SLIGHT PLANK BETWEEN THEE AND THY FATE;
HER ON'TY CARGO SUCH A SCANT SUPPLY
AS PROMISES THE DEATH THEIR HANDS DENY;
AND JUST ENOUGH OF WATER AND OF BREAD
TO KEEP, SOMERS, THE DYING FROM THE DEAD:
SOME CORDAGE, CANVANS, SAILS, AND LINES, AND TWINE,
BUT Treasures All TO HERMITS OF THE BRINE,
WERE ADDED AFTER, TO THE EARNEST PRAYER
OF THOSE WHO SAW NO HOPE, SAVE SEA AND AIR;
AND LAST, THAT TREMBLING VASSAL OF THE POLE—
THE FEELING COMPASS—NAVIGATION'S SOUL.

VI.
AND NOW THE SELF-ELECTED CHIEF FINDS TIME
TO STUN THE FIRST SENSATION OF HIS CRIME,
AND RAISE IT IN HIS FOLLOWERS—"HO! THE BOWL; LEAST PASSION SHOULD RETURN TO REASON'S SHEL.
"BRANDY FOR HEROES!" BURKE COULD ONCE EXCLAIM—
NO DOUBT A LIQUID PATH TO EPIC FAME;
AND SUCH THE NEW-BORN HEROES FOUND IT HERE,
AND DRAIN'D THE DRUUGHT WITH AN APPLAUDING CHEER
"HURRA FOR OTHAELE!" WAS THE CRY,
HOW STRANGE SUCH SHOUTS FROM SONS OF MUTINY,
THE GENTLE ISLAND, AND THE GENIAL SOIL,
The FRIENDLY HEARTS, THE FEASTS WITHOUT A TOIL,
The COURTEOUS MANNERS BUT FROM NATURE DRAWN,
The WEALTH UNHOARDED AND THE LOVE UNBOUGHT;
COULD THESE HAVE CHARM'S FOR RUDEST SEASOBS, DRIVEN
BEFORE THE MAST BY EVERY WIND OF HEAVEN?
AND NOW, EVEN NOW PREPARED WITH OTHER'S WOES
TO EARN MILD VIRTUE'S VAIN DESIRE, REPOSE?
ALAS! SUCH IS OUR NATURE! ALL BUT AIM
AT THE SAME END BY PATHWAYS NOT THE SAME,
OUR MEANS, OUR BIRTH, OUR NATION, AND OUR NAME,
OUR FORTUNE, TEMPER, EVEN OUR OUTWARD FRAME,
ARE FAR MORE POTENT O'ER OUR YIELDING CLAY
THAN SIGHT WE KNOW BEYOND OUR LITTLE DAY;
YET STILL THERE WHISPERS THE SMALL VOICE WITHIN,
HEARD THROUGH GAIN'S SILENCE, AND O'ER GLORY'S DIN
WHATSOEVER CRED HE TAUGHT OR LAND HE TROD, MAN'S CONSCIENCE IS THE ORACLE OF GOD.

VII.
THE LAUNCH IS CROWDED WITH THE FAITHFUL FEW
WHO WAIT THEIR CHIEF, A MELANCHOLY CREW:
BUT SOME REMAIN'D RELUCTANT ON THE DECK
OF THAT PROUD VESSEL—NOW A MORAL WRECK—
AND VIEW'D THEIR CAPTAIN'S FATE WITH PITEOUS EYES.
WHILE OTHERS SCOFF'D HIS AUGUR'D MISERIES,
SNEER'D AT THE PROSPECT OF HIS PYGMAL SAIL
AND THE SLIGHT BARK SO LAIDEN AND SO FRAIL.
THE TENDER NAUTILUS, WHO STRES HIS PROW,
THE SEABORN SAILOR OF HIS SHELL CANOE,
THE OCEAN MAB, THE FAIRY OF THE SEA,
SEEMS FAR LESS FRAGILE, AND, ALAS! MORE FREE.
HE, WHEN THE LIGHTNING-WING'D TORNADOES SWEET
THE SURGE, IS SAFE—HIS PORT IS IN THE DEEP—
AND TRIUMPHS O'ER THE ARMADAS OF MANKIND, WHICH SHAKE THE WORLD, YET CRUMBLE IN THE WIND.

VIII.
WHEN ALL WAS NOW PREPARED, THE VESSEL CLEAR
WHICH HAL'D HER MASTER IN THE MUTINEER—
A SEAMAN, LESS OBSTEANT THAN HIS MATES,
SHOW'D THE VAIN PITY WHICH BUT IRRITATES;
WATCH'D HIS LATE CHIEFTAIN WITH EXPLORING EYE,
AND TOLD, IN SIGNS, REPEASANT SYMPATHY;
HELD THE MOIST SHADDOCK TO HIS PARCHED MOUTH,
WHICH FELT EXHAUSTION'S DEEP AND BITTER DROUTH.
BUT SOON OBSERVED, THIS GUARDIAN WAS WITHDRAWN
FOR NO FURTHER MERCY CLOUDS REVOLUTION'S DAWN.
THEN FORWARD STEPP'D THE BOLD AND FORFORDAY
HIS CHIEF HAD CHERISH'D ONLY TO DESTROY,
AND, POINTING TO THE HELPLESS PROW BENEATH,
EXCLAIM'D, "DEPART AT ONCE! DELAY IS DEATH!"
YET THEN, EVEN THEN, HIS FEELINGS CEASED NOT ALL
IN THAT LAST MOMENT COULD A WORD RECALL
REMEMBER FOR THE BLACK DEED AS YET HALF DONE.
AND WHAT HE HID FROM MANY SHOW'D TO ONE:
THE ISLAND.

When Bligh in stern reproach demanded where
Was now his grateful sense of former care?
Where all his hopes to see his name aspire,
And blaze on Britain's thousand glories? higher?
His feverish lips thus broke their gloomy spell,
"Tis that! 'tis that! I am in hell! in hell!"
No more he said; but urging to the bark
His chief, commits him to his fragile ark,
These the sole accents from his tongue that fell,
But volumes lurk'd below his fierce farewell.

IX.
The arctic sun rose broad above the wave;
The breeze now sank, now whisper'd from his cave;
As on the Æolian harp, his fitful wings
Now swell'd, now flutter'd o'er his ocean strings.
With slow, despairing oar, the abandon'd skiff
Ploughs its drear progress to the scarce-seen cliff,
Which lifts its peak a cloud above the main:
That boat and ship shall never meet again!
But 'tis not mine to tell their tale of grief,
Their constant peril and their scant relief;
Their days of danger, and their nights of pain;
Their manly courage even when deem'd in vain;
The sapping famine, rendering scarce a son
Known to his mother in the skeleton;
The ills that lessen'd still their little store,
And starved even Hunger till he wrung no more;
The varying frowns and favors of the deep,
That now almost engulf, then leaves to creep
With crazy oar and shatter'd strength along
The tide that yields reluctant to the strong;
The incessant fever of that arid thirst
Which welcomes, as a well, the clouds that burst
Above their naked bones, and feels delight
In the cold drenching of the stormy night,
And from the outspread canvas gladly wrings
A drop to moisten life's all gasping springs;
The savage foe escaped, to seek again
More hospitable shelter from the main;
The ghastly spectres which were doom'd at last,
To tell as true a tale of dangers past,
As ever the dark annals of the deep
Disclosed for man to dread or woman weep.

X.
We leave them to their fate, but not unknown
Nor unredress'd. Revenge may have her own:
Roused discipline aloud proclaims their cause,
And injured navies urge their broken laws.
Pursue we on his track the mutineer,
Whom distant vengeance had not taught to fear.
Wide o'er the wave—away! away! away!
Once more his eyes shall hail the welcome bay;
Once more the happy shores without a law
Receive the outlaws whom they lately saw;
Nature, and Nature's goddess—woman—woos
To lands where, save their conscience, none accuse;
Where all partake the earth without dispute,
And bread itself is gather'd as a fruit: *
Where none contest the fields, the woods, the streams:
The goddessd age, where gold disturbs no dreams,
Inhabitants or inhabited the shore,
'Till Europe taught them better than before;
Bestow'd her customs, and amended theirs,
But left her vices also to their heirs.
Away with this! behold them as they were,
Do good with Nature, or with Nature err.
"Huzza! for Otaheite!" was the cry,
As stately swept the gallant vessel by.
The breeze springs up; the lately flapping sail
Extends its arch before the growing gale;
In swifter ripples stream aside the seas,
Which her bold bow flings off with dashing care.
Thus Argo plough'd the Euxine's virgin foam;
But those she wafted still look back to home—
These spurn their country with their rebel bark,
And fly her as the raven fle'd the ark;
And yet they seek to nestle with the dove
And tame their fiery spirits down to love.

CANTO II.

I.
How pleasant were the songs of Toobonai,
When summer's sun went down the coral bay.
Come, let us to the islet's softest shade,
And hear the warbling birds! the damsels said.
The wood-dove from the forest depth shall coo,
Like voices of the gods from Bolotoo;
We'll call the flowers that grow above the dead,
For these most bloom where rests the warrior's head.
And we will sit in twilight's face, and see
The sweet moon glancing through the tooa tree,
The lofty accents of whose sighing bough
Shall sadly please us as we lean below;
Or climb the steep, and view the surf in vain
Wrestle with rocky giants o'er the main,
Which spawn in columns back the buff'd spray.
How beautiful are these! how happy they!
Who, from the toil and tumult of their lives,
Steal to look down where nought but ocean strives
Even he too loves at times the blue lagoon,
And smooths his ruffled mane beneath the moon.

II.
Yes—from the sepulchre we'll gather flowers,
Then feast like spirits in their promised bowers
Then plunge and revel in the rolling surf,
Then lay our limbs along the tender turf,
And, wet and shining from the sportive toil,
Anoint our bodies with the fragrant oil,
And plait our garlands gather'd from the grave,
And wear the wreaths that sprung from out the brave
But lo! night comes, the Moon woos us back,
The sound of mats are heard along our track;
Anon the torchlight dance shall fling its sheen
In flashing maze's o'er the Marly's green;
And we too will be there; we too recall
The memory bright with many a festival,
Ere Fiji blew the shell of war, when foes
For the first time were wafted in canoes.
Alas! for them the flower of mankind bleeds;
Alas! for them our fields are rank with weeds:

* The first three sections are taken from an actual song of the Tonga Islanders, of which a prose translation is given in "Mariners Account of the Tonga Islands." Toobonai is not however one of them; but was one of those where Christian and the mutineers took refuge. I have altered and added, but have retained as much as possible of the original.
Forgotten is the rapture, or unknown,
Of wandering with the moon and love alone.
But be it so—you taught us how to wield
The club and rain our arrows o'er the field.
Now let them reap the harvest of their art!
But feast to-night! to-morrow we depart.
Strike up the dance! the cava bowl fill high!
Drain every drop!—to-morrow we may die.
In summer garments be our limbs array'd;
Around our waists the tappa's white display'd;
Thick wreaths shall form our coronal, like spring's;
And round our necks shall glance the hooni strings;
So shall their brighter hues contrast the glow
Of the dusky bosoms that beat high below.

III.

But now the dance is o'er—yet stay awhile;
Ah, pause! nor yet put out the social smile.
To-morrow for the Moon we depart,
But to-night—to-night is for the heart.
Again bestow the wreaths we gently woo,
Ye young enchantresses of gay Licoo!
How lovely are your forms! how every sense
Bows to your beauties, softly'd, but intense,
Like to the flowers on Matacoco's steep,
Which fling their fragrance far athwart the deep—
We too will see Licoo; but—oh! my heart!—
What do I say?—to-morrow we depart!

IV.

Thus rose a song—the harmony of times
Before the winds blew Europe o'er these climes.
True, they had vices—such are nature's growth—
But only the barbarian's—we have both:
The sordor of civilization, mix'd
With all the savage which man's fall hath fix'd.
Who hath not seen Dissimulasion's reign,
The prayers of Abel link'd to deeds of Cain?
Who such would see may from his lattice view
The Old World more degraded than the New,
Nor new no more, save where Columbia rears
Twin giants, born by Freedom to her spheres,
Where Chimborazo, over air, earth, wave,
Glare's with his Titan eye, and sees no slave.

V.

Such was this ditty of tradition's days,
Which to the dead—a lingering fame conveys
In song, where fame as yet hath left no sign
Beyond the sound whose charm is half divine;
Which leaves no record to the skeptic eye,
But yields young history all to harmony;
A boy Achilles, with the centaur's lyre
In hand, to teach him to surpass his sire.
For one long-cherish'd ballad's simple stave
Rung from the rock, or mingled with the wave,
Or from the bubbling streamlet's grassy side,
Or gathering mountain echoes as they glide,
Hath greater power o'er each true heart and ear,
Than all the columns Conquest's minions rear:
Invites, when hieroglyphics are a theme
For sage's labors or the student's dream.
Attracts, when history's volumes are a toll,—
The first, the freshest bud of Feeling's soil.
Such was this rude rhyme—rhyme is of the rude—
But such inspired the Norseman's solitude,
Who came and conquer'd; such, wherever rise
Lands where no foes destroy or civilize.

Exist: and what can our accomplish'd art
Of verse do more than reach the awaken'd heart?

VI.

And sweetly now those untaught melodies
Broke the luxurious silence of the skies,
The sweet siesta of a summer day,
The tropic afternoon of Toobonal,
When every flower was bloom, and air was balm,
And the first breeze began to stir the palm,
The first young voluble wind to urge the wave
All gently to refresh the thirsty cave,
Where sat the songstress with the stranger boy,
Who taught her passion's desolating joy,
Too powerful over every heart, but most
O'er those who know not how it may be lost;
O'er those who, burning in the new-born fire,
Like martyrs revel in their funeral pyre,
With such devotion to their ecstasy,
That life knows no such rapture as to die:
And do they do; for earthly life has nought
Match'd with that burst of nature, even in thought
And all our dreams of better life above
But close in one eternal glas of love.

VII.

There sat the gentle savage of the wild,
In growth a woman, though in years a child,
As childhood dates within our colder clime,
Where nought is ripen'd rapidly save crime;
The infant of an infant world, as pure
From nature—lovely, warm, and premature;
Dusky like night, but night with all her stars:
Or cavern sparkling with its native spars;
With eyes that were a language and a spell,
A form like Aphrodite's in her shell,
With all her loves around her on the deep,
Voluptuous as the first approach of sleep;
Yet full of life—for through her tropic cheek
The blush would make its way, and all but speak;
The sun-born blood suffused her neck and threw
O'er her clear nutbrown skin a lucid hue,
Like coral reddening through the darken'd wave
Which draws the diver to the crimson cave.
Such was this daughter of the Southern seas,
Herself a billow in her energies,
To bear the bark of others' happiness,
Nor feel a sorrow till their joy grew less:
Her wild and warm yet faithful bosom knew
No joy like what it gave; her hopes ne'er drew Aught from experience, that chill touchstone, whose Sad proof reduces all things from their hues:
She fear'd no ill, because she knew it not,
Or what she knew was soon—too soon—forgot:
Her smiles and tears had pass'd, as light winds pass
O'er lakes, to ruffle, not destroy, their glass,
Whose depths unsearch'd, and fountains from the hill,
Restore their surface, in itself so still,
Until the earthquake tear the naiad's cave,
Root up the spring, and trample on the wave,
And crush the living waters to a mass,
The amphibious desert of the dank morass!
And must their fate be hers? The eternal change
But grasps humanity with quicker range;
And they who fall but fall as worlds will fall,
To rise, if just, a spirit o'er them all.
Of a long race, the valiant and the free,
The naked knights of savage chivalry.
Whose grassy curves ascend along the shore;
And thine—I've seen—Achilles! I do no more.
She, when the thunder-bearing stainers came,
In vast canoes, begirt with bolts of flame,
Topp'd with tall trees, which, loftier than the palm
Seem'd rooted in the deep amid its calm;
But when the winds awaken'd, shot forth wings
Broad as the cloud along the horizon flies,
And sway'd the waves, like cities of the sea,
Making the very billows look less free;
She, with her paddling oar and dancing prow,
Shot through the surf, like reindeer through the snow
Swift-gliding o'er the breaker's whitening edge,
Light as a nereid in her ocean sledge,
And gazed and wonder'd at the giant bulk,
Which heaved from wave to wave its trembling bulk
The anchor dropp'd; it lay along the deep,
Like a huge lion in the sun asleep,
While round it warm'd the proas' fitting chain,
Like summer bees that hum around his mane.

XI.
The white man landed!—need the rest be told?
The New World stretch'd its dusky hand to the Old
Each was to each a marvel, and the tie
Of wonder warm'd to better sympathy
Kind was the welcome of the sun-born sires,
And kinder still their daughters' gentle fires.
Their union grew: the children of the storm
Found beauty link'd with many a dusky form;
While these in turn admired the paler glow,
Which seem'd so white in climes that knew no snow
The chase, the race, the liberty to roam,
The soil where every cottage show'd a home;
The sea-spread net, the lightly-launch'd canoe,
Which stem'd the studded archipelago,
O'er whose blue bosom rose the starry isles;
The healthy slumber, caroled by sportive toils;
The palm, the loftiest dryad of the woods,
Within whose bosom infant Bacchus broods,
While eagles scarce build higher than the crest
Which shadows o'er the vineyard in her breast;
The cava feast, the yam, the cocoa's root,
Which bears at once the cup, and milk, and fruit;
The bread-tree, which, without the ploughshare
Yields
The unrep'd harvest of unfurrow'd fields,
And bakes its unadulter'd loaves
Without a furnace in unpurchased groves,
And dines off famine from its fertile breast,
A priceless market for the gathering guest;
These, with the luxuries of seas and woods,
The airy joys of social solitudes,
Tamed each rude wanderer to the sympathies
Of those who were more happy, if less wise,
Did more than Europe's discipline had done.
And ci-lized civilization's son!

XII.
Of these, and there was many a willing pair,
Neusa and Torquil were not the least fair;
Both children of the isles, though distant far,
Born both beneath a sea-presiding star;
Both nourish'd amid nature's native scenes,
Loved to the last, whatever intervenes
Between us and our childhood's sympathy,
Which still revert to what first caught the eye.
He who first met the Highlands' swelling blue
Will love each peak that shows a kindred hue,
Hail in each crag a friend's familiar face,
And clasp the mountain in his tender embrace.
Long have I roamed through lands which are not mine,
Adored the Alp, and loved the Apennine,
Revered Parnassus, and beheld the steep
Jove's Ida and Olympus crown the deep:
But'twas not all long ages, nor all
Their nature held me in their thrilling thrall.
The infant rapture still survived the boy,
And Loch-na-gar with Idâ look'd o'er Troy.*
Mix'd Celtic memories with the Phrygian mount,
And Highland linns with Castalie's clear fount.
Forgive me, Homer's universal shade!
Forgive me, Phæbus! that my fancy stray'd;
The north and nature taught me to adore
Your scenes sublime, from those beloved before.

XIII.

The love which maketh all things fond and fair,
The youth which makes one rainbow of the air,
The dangers past, that make even man enjoy
The pause in which he ceases to destroy,
The mutual beauty, which the sternest feel
Strike to their hearts like lightning to the steel,
United the half savage and the whole,
The maid and boy, in one absorbing soul.
No more the thundering memory of the fight
Wrapp'd his wean'd bosom in its dark delight;
No more the irksome restlessness of rest
Disturb'd him like the eagle in her nest,
Whose whetted beak and far-pervading eye
Darts for a victim over all the sky;
His heart was tamed to that voluptuous state,
At once Elysian and effeminate,
Which leaves no laurels o'er the hero's urn:—
These wither when for aught save blood they burn;
Yet when their ashes in their nook are laid,
Doth not the myrtle leave a sweet a shade?
Had Caesar known but Cleopatra's kiss,
Rome had been free, the world had not been his.
And what have Caesar's deeds and Caesar's fame
Done for the earth? We feel them in our shame:
The gory sanction of his glory stains
The rust which tyrants cherish on our chains.
Roused millions do what single Brutus did—
Sweep these mere mock-birds of the despot's song
From the tall bough where they have perch'd so long.—
Still are we hawk'd at by such mousing owls,
And take for falcons those ignoble fowls,
When but a word of freedom would dispel
These bugbears, as their terrors show too well.

XIV.

Rapt in the fond forgetfulness of life,
Neatha, the South Sea Girl, was all a wife,
With no distracting world to call
From love; with no society to scoff
At the new transient flame; no babbling crowd
Of coxcombs in admiration loud,
Or with adulterous whisper to alloy
Her duty, and her glory, and her joy.
With faith and feelings naked as her form,
She stood as stands a rainbow in a storm,
Changing its hues with light variety,
But still expanding lovelier o'er the sky,
When o'er its arch may swell, its colors move,
The cloud-compelling harbinger of love.

XV.

Here, in this grotto of the wave-worn shore,
They pass'd the trolic's red meridian o'er;
Nor long the hours—they never pass'd o'er time,
Unbroken by the clock's finereal chiming,
Which deals the daily pittance of our span,
And points and mocks with iron laugh at man
What does and they of the future do? the past?
The present, like a tyrant, held them fast;
Their hour-glass was the sea-sand, and the tide
Like her smooth billow, saw their moments glide;
Their clock the sun, in his unbounded tow'r;
They reckon'd not, whose day was but an hour:
The nightingale, their only vespertine,
Sung sweetly to the rose the day's farewell:—
The broad sun set, but not with lingering sweep
As in the north he mellow's o'er the deep,
But fiery, and fierce, as if he left
The world for ever, earth of light bereft,
Plunged with red forehead down along the wave
As dives a hero headlong to his grave.
Then rose they, looking first along the skies,
And then for light into each other's eyes,
Wondering that summer show'd so brief a sun.
And asking if indeed the day were done.

XVI.

And let not this seem strange: the devotee
Lives not in earth, but in his estate;
Around him days and worlds are needless driven,
His soul is gone before his dust to heaven.
Is love less potent? No—his path is trod,
Alike uplifted gloriously to God:
Or link'd to all we know of heaven below,
The other better self, whose joy or woe
Is more than ours; the all-absorbing flame
Which, kindled by another, grows the same.
Wrapp'd in one blaze; the pure, yet funeral pile:
Where gentle hearts, like Brumani, sit and smile
How often we forget all time, when lone,
Admiring Nature's universal throne,
Her woods, her wilds, her waters, the intense
Reply of hers to our intelligence!
Live not the stars and mountains? Are the waves
Without a spirit? Are the dropping coves
Without a feeling in their silent tears?
No, no;—they woo and clasp us to their spheres,
Dissolve this clog and clo'd of clay before
Its hour, and merge our soul in the great shore,
Strip off this fond and false identity!—
Who thinks of self, when gazing on the sky?
And who, though gazing lower, ever thought,
In the young moments ere the heart is taught

* When very young, about eight years of age, after an attack of the scarlet fever at Aberdeen, I was removed by medical advice into the Highlands. Here I passed occasionally some summers, and from this period I date my love of mountainous countries. I can never forget the effect, a few years afterwards in England, of the only thing I had long seen, even in miniature, of a mountain, in the Malvern Hills. After I returned to Cheb- shalgh, I used to watch them every afternoon, at sunset, with a sensa- tion which I cannot describe. This was boyish enough; but I was then only thirteen years of age, and it was in the holidays.

* The now well-known story of the loves of the knight's galà and rose need not be more alluded to, being a discovery, in the common reader.
Tune's lesson, of man's baseness or his own?
All nature is his realm, and love his throne.

VII.
Nuena arose, and Torquil: twilight's hour
Come sad and softly to their rocky bowers,
Which, kindly by degrees its dewy spars,
Echoed their dim light to the mastering stars,
Slowly the pair, partaking nature's calm,
Sought out their cottage, built beneath the palm;
Now smiling and now silent, as the scene;
Lovely as Love — the spirit! — when serene.
The Ocean scarce spoke louder with his swell,
Than breathes his mimic murmurer in the shell.
As, far divided from his parent deep,
The sea-born infant cries, and will not sleep,
Raising his little plaint in vain, to rave
For the broad bosom of his nursing wave:
The woods droop'd darkly, as inclined to rest,
The tropic bird wheel'd rock-ward to his nest,
And the blue sky spread round them like a lake
Of peace, where Piety her thirst might slake.

VIII.
But through the palm and plantain, hark, a voice!
Not such as would have been a lover's choice,
In such an hour, to break the air so still;
No dying nigh — breathe, harping o'er the hill,
Striking the strings of nature, rock and tree,
Those best and earliest lyres of harmony,
With Echo for their chorus; nor the alarm
Of the loud war whoop to dispel the charm;
Nor the soliogiy of the hermit owl,
Exhaling all his solitary soul,
The dim though large-eyed winged anchoretie,
Who peals his dreary pean o'er the night; —
But a loud, long, and naval whistle, shrill
As ever started through a sea-bird's bill;
And then a pause, and then a hoarse, "Hillo!
Torquil! my boy! what cheer? Ho! brother, ho!
"Who hails?" cried Torquil, following with his eye
The sound. "Here's one," was all the brief reply.

X.
But here the herald of the self-same mouth
Came breathing o'er the aromatic south,
Not like a "bed of violets" on the gale,
But such as wafts its cloud o'er grog or ale,
Borne from a short frail pipe, which yet had blown
Its gentle odors over either zone,
And puff'd where'er winds rise or waters roll,
Had wafted smoke from Portsmouth; * the Pcle,
Opposed its vapor as the lightning flash'd,
And rook'd, 'mid mountain billows unabash'd,
To Zulia a constant sacrifice,
Through every change of all the varying skies.
And what was he that bore it? — I may err,
But deem him sailor or philosopher.†

* If the reader will apply to his ear the sea-shell on his chimney-piece, he will be aware of what is allowed if the Live or Sleeper's voice is allowed in the shores of the British empire, he will find in "Glebe," the same idea better expressed in two lines — The poem of the reader, but have heard the lines quoted by a more refined reader, who seems to be of a different opinion from the author of the Quarterly Review, who qualified it, in his answer to the Critical Reviewer of his Journal, as trash of the worst and most lance description. It is to Mr. Locke, the author of "Glebe," so qualified, and of some Latins poets, which he with Martial or Catullus in obscurity, that the incommensurable Mr. Secretary addresses his declaration against prosperity!...
† Hobbes, the father of Locke's and other philosophy, was an heterogeneous wanderer, never to pipecs beyond cymomgion.

Sublime tobacco! which from east to west
Cheers the tar's labor or the Turkman's rest;
Which on the Moslem's ottoman divides
His hours, and rivals opium and his bride;
Magnificent in Stamboul, but less grand,
Though not less loved, in Wapping or the Strand
Divine in hookas, glorious in a pipe,
When tipp'd with amber, mellow, rich, and ripe;
Like other charmers, wooing the caress
More dazzlingly when daring in full dress;
Yet thy true lovers more admire by far
Thy naked beauties — Give me a cigar!

XX.
Through the approaching darkness of the wood
A human figure broke the solitude,
Fantastically, it may be, array'd,
A seaman in a savage masquerade;
Such as appears to rise out from the deep,
When o'er the line the merry vessels sweep,
And the rough satnallia of the tar
Flock o'er the deck, in Neptune's borrow'd ear;* and
And pleased the god of ocean sees his name
Revive once more, though but in mimic game
Of his true sons, who riot in the breeze
Undreamt of in his native Cythera;
Still the old god delights, from out the main,
To snatch some glimpses of his ancient reign
Our sailor's jacket, though in ragged trim,
His constant pipe, which never yet burn'd dim
His foremast air, and somewhat rolling gait,
Like his dear vessel, spoke his former state;
But then a sort of kerchief round his head,
Not over-tightly bound, nor nicely spread;
And stead of a sword, (ah! too early torn!
For even the mildest woods will have their thorn)
A curious sort of somewhat scanty mat
Now served for inexpressibles and hat;
His naked feet and neck, and sunburnt face,
Perchance might suit alike with either race.
His arms were all his own, our Europe's growth;
Which two worlds bless for civilizing both;
The musket swung behind his shoulders broad
And somewhat stoop'd by his marine abode,
But brawny as the boat's; and hung beneath,
His cutlass droop'd, unconscious of a sheath.
Or lost or worn away; his pistols were
Link'd to his belt, a matrimonial pair,—
(Not let this metaphor appear a scoff,
Though one miss'd fire, the other would go off;)
These, with a bayonet, not so free from rust
As when the arm chest held its brighter trust,
Completed his accoutrements, as Night Survey'd him in his garb heteroclite.

XXI.
"What cheer, Ben Bunting?" cried (when in full view
Our new acquaintance) Torquil, "Aught of new?"
"Ey, ey!" quoth Ben, "not new, but news now;
A strange sail in the offing. — Sail! and how?
What! could you make her out? It cannot be,
I've seen no rag of canvas on the sea."
"Bolke," said Ben, "you might not from the bay,
But from the bluff-head, where I watch'd to-day,
I saw her in the doldrums; for the wind
Was light and baulding. — "* When the sun declined

* This rough but joyful ceremony, used in crossing the line, has been a often and as well described, that it would not be more alluded to CANTO III.

I.

The fight was o'er; the flashing through the gloom,
Which robes the cannon as he wings a tomb,
Had ceased; and sulphur vapors upward driven
Had left the earth, and but polluted heaven:
The rattling roar which rung in every volley
Had left the echoes to their melancholy;
No more they shriek'd their horror, boom for boom;
The strife was done, the vanquish'd had their doom;
The mutineers were crush'd, dispersed, or ta'en,
Or lived to deem the happiest were the slain.
Few, few escaped, and those were hunted o'er
The isle they loved beyond their native shore.
No further home was theirs, it seem'd, on earth,
Once renegades to that which gave them birth;
Track'd like wild beasts, like them they sought the wild,
As to a mother's bosom flies the child;
But vainly wolves and lions seek their den,
And still more vainly men escape from men.

II.

Beneath a rock whose jutting base protrudes
Far over ocean in his fiercest moods,
When scaling his enormous crag the wave
Is hurl'd down headlong, like the foremost brave,
And falls back on the foaming crowd behind,
Which fight beneath the banners of the wind,
But now at rest, a little remnant drew
Together, bleeding, thirsty, faint, and few,
But still their weapons in their hands, and still
With something of the pride of former will,
As men not all unused to meditate,
And strive much more than wonder at their fate.

Their present lot was what they had foreseen,
And dared as what was likely to have been;
Yet still the lingering hope, which deem'd their lot
Not pardon'd, but unsought for or forgot.
Or trusted that, if sought, their distant caves
Might still be miss'd amid the world of waves,
Had wean'd their thoughts in part from what they saw
And felt, the vengeance of their country's law.
Their sea-green isle, their guilt-crown paradise,
No more could shield their virtue or their vice.
Their better feelings, if such were, were throw'n
Back on themselves,—their sins remain'd alone.
Proscribed even in their second country, they
Were lost; in vain the world before them lay.
All outlets seem'd secure. Their new allies
Had fought and bled in mutual sacrifice:
But what avail'd the club, and spear, and arm
Of Hercules against the sulphur charm,
The magic of the thunder, which destroy'd
The warrior ere his strength could be employ'd for Dog, like a spreading pestilence, the grave
No less of human bravery than the brave:
Their own scant numbers acted all the few
Against the many oft will dare and do;
But though the choice seems native to die free,
Even Greece can boast but one Thermopylae,
Till now, when she has forger her broken chain
Back to a sword, and dies and lives again!

III.

Beside the jutting rock the few appear'd,
Like the last remnant of the red-deer's herd;
Their eyes were feverish, and their aspect worn,
But still the hunter's blood was on their horn,
A little stream came tumbling from the height,
And straggling into ocean as it might,
Its bounding crystal r'd this in the ray,
And gush'd from cliff to crag with saltless spray;
Close on the wild, wide ocean, yet as pure
And fresh as innocence, and more secure,
Its silver torrent glitter'd o'er the deep,
As the shy chamois' eye o'erlooks the steep,
While far below the vast and sullen swell
Of ocean's alpine azure rose and fell:
To this young spring they rush'd,—all feelings first
Absorb'd in passion's and in nature's thirst,—
Drank as they do who drink their last, and threw
Their arms aside to revel in its dew;
Cool'd their scorched throats, and wash'd the gory stains
From wounds whose only bandage might be chains;
Then, when their drought was quench'd, look'd sadly round,
As wondering how so many still were found
Alive and fetterless:—but silent all,
Each sought his fellow's eyes, as if to call
On him for language which his lips denied,
As though their voices with their cause had died.

IV.

Stern, and aloof a little from the rest,
Stood Christian, with his arms across his chest.
The ruddy, reckless, dauntless, hue once spread
Along his cheek was livid now as lead;

* Archilochus, king of Sparta, and son of Agesilaus, whom he saw a machine invented for the casting of stones and darts, exclaimed that it was the "grave of valor." The same story has been told of some knights on the first application of gunpowder; but its original source is in Pindarus.
His light-brown locks, so graceful in their flow,
Now rose like startled vipers o'er his brow,
Still as a statue, with his lips compress'd
To stifle even the breath within his breast.
Fast by the rock, all menacing, but mute,
He stood; and, save a slight beat of his foot,
Which deepen'd now and then the sandy dint
Beneath his heel, his form seem'd turn'd to flint.
Some paces further Torquil lean'd his head
Against a bank, and spoke not, but he bled,—
Not mortally—his worst wound was within:
His brow was pale, his blue eyes sunken in,
And blood-drops, sprinkled o'er his yellow hair,
Show'd that his faintness came not from despair,
But nature's ebb. Beside him was another,
Rough as a bear, but willing as a brother,—
Ben Bunting, who essay'd to wash, and wipe,
And bind his wound—then calmly lit his pipe,
A trophy which survived a hundred fights,
A beacon which had cheer'd ten thousand nights.
The fourth and last of this deserted group
Walk'd up and down—at times would stand, then a stop.
To pick a pebble up—then let it drop—
Then hurry as in haste—then quickly stop—
Then cast his eyes on his companions—then
Half whistle half a tune, and pause again—
And then his former movements would redouble,
With something between carelessness and trouble:
This is a long description, but applies
To scarce five minutes pass'd before the eyes;
But yet what minutes! Moments like to these Rend men's lives into immortalties.

V.
At length Jack Skyserape, a mercurial man,
Who flutter'd over all things like a fan,
More brave than firm, and more disposed to dare
And die at once than wrestle with despair,
Exclaim'd "G—d Damn!"—"Those syllables intense,— Nucleus of England's native eloquence,
As the Turk's "Allah " or the Roman's more
Pagan "Proh Jupiter!" was wont of yore
To give their first impressions such a vent,
By way of echo to embarrassment.
'ack was embarrass'd, never hero more,
And as he knew not what to say, he swore;
Nor swore in vain; the long congenial sound
Revisit Ben Bunting from his pipe profound:
He drew it from his mouth, and look'd full wise,
But merely added to the oath his eye;
Thus rendering the paper phrase complete,
A peroration I need not repeat.

VI.
But Christian, of a higher order, stood
Like an extinct volcano in his mood;
Silent, and sad, and savage,—with the trace
Of passion reeking from his clouded face;
Till lifting up again his sombre eye,
It glanced on Torquil, who lean'd faintly by.
"And is it thus," he cried, "unhappy boy!
And thee, too, thee—my madness must destroy!"
He said, and strode to where young Torquil stood,
Yet dabbled with his lately flowing blood;
Seized his hand visitfully, but did not press,
And shrank as fearful of his own cares—
Inquired into his state; and when he heard
The wound was slighter than he deem'd or fear'd.
A moment's brightness pass'd along his brow,
As much as such a moment would allow.
"Yes," he exclaim'd, "we are taken in the toil,
But not a coward or a common spoli;
Dearly they have bought us—death you still may buy,
And I must fall; but have you strength to fly?
'Twould be some comfort still, could you survive;
Our dwindled band is now too few to strive.
Oh! for a sole canoe! though but a shell,
To bear you hence to where a hope may dwell!
For me, my lot is what I sought; to be,
In life or death, the fearless and the free."

VII.
Even as he spoke, around the promontory,
Which nod'd o'er the billows high and heavy.
A dark speck dotted ocean—on it flew
Like to the shadow of a roused sea-mew;
Onward it came—and, lo! a second follow'd—
Now seen—now hid—where ocean's vale was ho! low'd;
And near, and nearer, till their dusky crew
Presented well-known aspects to the view,
Till on the surf their skimming paddles play,
Buoyant as wings, and flitting through the spray,
Now perching on the wave's high curl, and now
Dash'd downward in the thundering foam below
Which flings its broad and boiling sheet on sheet,
And slings its high flakes, shiver'd into sleet;
But floating still through surf and swell, drew nigh
The banks, like small birds through a lowering sky.
Their art seem'd nature—such the skill to sweep
The wave of these born playmates of the deep.

VIII.
And who the first that, springing on the strand,
Leap'd like a nereid from her shell to land,
With dark but brilliant skin, and dewy eye
Shining with love, and hope, and constancy?
Neuh—the fond, the faithful, the adored—
Her heart on Torquil's like a torrent pour'd;
And smiled, and wept, and near, and nearer clasp'd,
As if to be assured 'twas him she grasp'd;
Shudder'd to see his yet warm wound, and then,
To find it trivial, smiled and wept again.
She was a warrior's daughter, and could bear
Such sights, and feel, and mourn, but not despair
Her lover liv'd,—nor foes nor fears could blight
That full-blown moment in its all delight:
Joy trickled in her tears, joy fill'd the sob
That rock'd her heart till almost heard to throb,
And paradise was breathing in the sigh
Of nature's child in nature's ecstasy.

IX.
The sterners spirits who beheld that meeting,
Were not unmoved: who are, when hearts are greeting?
Even Christian gazed upon the maid and boy
With tearless eye, but yet a gloomy joy
Mix'd with those bitter thoughts the soul arrays,
In hopeless visions of our better days,
When all's gone—to the rainbow's latest ray,
"And but for me!" he said, and turn'd away
Then gazed upon the pair, as in his den
A lion looks upon his cubs again;
And then relapsed into his sullen guise,
As heedless of his further destinies.

But brief their time for good or evil thought;
The billows round the promontory brought
The splash of hostile oars.—Alas! who made
That sound a dread? All round them seem'd array'd
Against them, save the bride of Toobonai:
She, as she caught the first glimpse o'er the bay
Of the arm'd boats, which hurried to complete
The remnant's ruin with their flying feet,
Beck'n'd the natives round her to their prows,
BLark'd their guests, and launch'd their light
Canoes,
in one placed Christian and his comrades twain;
But she and Torquil must not part again.
She fix'd him in her own.—Away! away!
They clear the breakers, dart along the bay,
And towards a group of islets, such as bear
The sea-bird's nest and seal's surf-hollow'd lair,
They skim the blue tops of the billows; fast
They flew, and fast their fierce pursuers chased.
They gain upon them—now they lose again,—
Again make way and menace o'er the main;
And now the two canoes in chase divide,
And follow different courses o'er the tide,
To haffle the pursuit.—Away! away!
As life is on each paddle's flight to-day,
And more than life or lives to Neuha: Love
Freights the frail bark and urges to the cove—
And now the refuge and the foe are nigh—
Yet, yet a moment!—Fly, thou light ark, fly!

CANTO IV.

I.

White as a white sail on a dusky sea,
When half the horizon's clouded and half free.
Fluttering between the dun wave and the sky
Is hope's last gleam in man's extremity.
Her anchor parts, but still her snowy sail
Attracts our eye amid the rudest gale;
Though every wave she climbs divides us more,
The heart still follows from the loneliest shore.

II.

Not distant from the isle of Toobonai,
A black rock rear's its bosom o'er the spray,
The haunt of birds, a desert to mankind,
Where the rough seal repose from the wind,
And sleeps unwieldy in his cavern dun,
Or gambols with huge frolic in the sun:
There shrilly to the passing one is heard
The startled echo of the ocean bird,
Who rears on its bare breast her callow brood,
The feather'd fishers of the solitude.
A narrow segment of the yellow sand
On one side forms the outline of a strand
Here, the young turtle, crawling from his shell
Steals to the deep wherein his parents dwell;
Chipp'd by the beam, a nursing of the day,
But hatch'd for ocean by the fostering ray;
The rest was one bleak precipice, as e'er
Save mariners a shelter and despair;

A spot to make the saved regret the deck
Which late went down, and envy the lost wreck.
Such was the stern asylum Neuha chose
To shield her lover from his following foes;
But all its secret was not told; she knew
In this a treasure hidden from the view.

III.

Ere the canoes divided, near the spot,
The men that man'd what held her Torquil's sail
But her command removed, to strengthen more
The skiff which wafted Christian from the shore.
This he would have opposed; but with a smile
She pointed calmly to the craggy isle,
And bade him "speed and prosper." She would take
The rest upon herself for Torquil's sake.
They parted with this added aid; afar
The proa darted like a shooting star,
And gain'd on the pursuers, who now steer'd
Right on the rock which she and Torquil near'd.
They pull'd; her arm, though delicate, was free
And firm as ever grappled with the sea,
And yielded scarce to Torquil's manly strength
The prow now almost lay within its length
Of the crag's steep, inexorable face,
With nought but soundless waters for its base;
Within a hundred boats' length was the foe,
And now what refuge but their frail canoes?
This Torquil ask'd with half upbraiding eye,
Which said—"Has Neuha brought me here to die!
Is this a place of safety, or a grave,
And you huge rock the tombstone of the wave?"

IV.

They rested on their paddles, and uprose
Neuha, and pointing to the approaching foes,
Cried, "Torquil, follow me, and fearless follow!"
Then plunged at once into the ocean's hollow.
There was no time to pause—the foes were near—
Chains in his eyes, and menace in his ear;
With vigor they pull'd on, and as they came,
Hail'd him to yield, and by his forfeit name.
Headlong he leapt—to him the swimmer's skill
Was native, and now all his hope from ill;
But how, or where? He dived, and rose no more;
The boat's crew look'd as amazed o'er sea and shore.
There was no landing on that precipice,
Steep, harsh, and slippery as a berg of ice.
They watch'd awhile to see him float again,
But not a trace rebubbled from the main:
The wave roll'd on, no ripple on its face,
Since their first plunge recall'd a single trace;
The little whirl which eddied, and slight foam,
That whiten'd o'er what seem'd their latest home,
White as a sepulchre above the pair
Who left no marble (mournful as an heir)
The quiet proa wavering o'er the tide
Was all that told of Torquil and his bride;
And but for this alone the whole might seem
The vanish'd phantom of a seaman's dream.
They paused and search'd in vain, then pull'd away
Even superstition now forbade their stay.
Some said he had not plung'd into the wave,
But vanish'd like a corpse-light from a grave;
Others, that something supernatural
Glared in his figure, more than mortal tall;
While all agreed that in his check and eye
Their was a dead hue of eternity.
THE ISLAND.

Still as their oars receded from the crag,
Round every weed a moment would they lag,
Expectant of some token of their prey;
But no—he had melted from them like the spray.

V.

And where was he, the pilgrim of the deep,
Following the nereid? Had they ceased to weep
For ever? or, received in coral caves,
Wrung life and pity from the softening waves?
Did they with ocean's hidden sovereigns dwell,
And sound with mermen the fantastic shell?
Did Neuha with the mermaids comb her hair,
Flowing o'er ocean as it stream'd in air?
Or had they perish'd, and in silence slept
Beneath the gulf wherein they boldly leapt?

VI.

Youth Neuha plunged into the deep, and he Follow'd: her track beneath her native sea
Was as a native's of the element,
So smoothly, bravely, brilliantly she went,
Leaving a streak of light behind her heel,
Which struck and flashed like an amphibious steel.
Closely, and scarcely less expert to trace
The depths where divers hold their pearl in chase.

Toorquill, the nursling of the northern seas,
Pursued her liquid steps with heart and ease.
Deep—deeper for an instant Neuha led
The way—then upward soar'd—and as she spread
Her arms, and flung the foam from off her locks,
Laugh'd, and the sound was answer'd by the rocks.
They had gain'd a central realm of earth again,
But look'd for tree, and field, and sky, in vain.
Around she pointed to a spacious cave,
Whose only portal was the keyless wave,°
(A hollow archway by the sun unseen,
Save through the billows' glassy veil of green,
In some transparent ocean holiday,
When all the sunny people are at play,) Wiped with her hair the brine from Toorquill's eyes, And could her hands with joy that surprise;
Led him to where the rock appear'd to jut,
And form a something like a Triton's hut;
For all was darkness for a space, till day
Through clefts above let in a sober'd ray;
As in some old cathedral's glimmering aisle
The dusty monuments from light recoil,
Thus sadly in their refuge submarine
The vault drew half her shadow from the scene.

VII.

Forth from her bosom the young savage drew
A pine torch, strongly girded with gnatoo;
A plaited-leaf o'er all, the more to keep
Its latent sparkle from the sapping deep.
This mantle kept it dry; then from a nook
Of the same plaited-leaf a flint she took,
A few shrunk wither'd twigs, and from the blade
Of Toorquill's knife struck fire, and thus array'd
The grot with torchlight. Wide it was and high,
And show'd a self-born Gothic canopy;
The arch upright by nature's architect,
The architect some earthquake might erect:

The buttress from some mountain's bosom hurled,
When the Poles crash'd, and water was the world;
Or harden'd from some earth-aboding fire,
While yet the globe rook'd from its funeral pyre;
The fretted pinnacle, the aisle, the nave,*
Were there, all scoop'd by Darkness from her cave
There, with a little tinge of fantasy
Fantastic faces mop'd and mow'd on high,
And then a mitre and a shrine would fix
The eye upon its seeming crucifix:
Thus Nature play'd with the stalactites,
And built herself a chapel of the seas.

VIII.

And Neuha took her Torquill by the hand,
And waved along the vault her kindled brand
And led him into each recess, and show'd
The secret places of their new abode.
Nor these alone, for all had been prepared
Before, to soothe the lover's lot she share'd:
The mat for rest; for dress the fresh gnatoo,
And sandal-clad to fence against his own
For food the cocoa-nut, the yam, the bread
Born of the fruit; for board the plantain spread
With his broad leaf, or turtle-shell he bore
A banquet in the flesh it cover'd o'er;
The gourd with water recent from the rill,
The ripe banana from the mellow hill;
A pine torch-PILE to keep undying light,
And she herself, as beautiful as night,
To fling her shadowy spirit o'er the scene
And make their subterranean world serene.
She had foreseen, since first the stranger's sail
Drew to their isle, that force or flight might fail,
And form'd a refuge of the rocky den
For Toorquill's safety from his countrymen.
Each dawn had wafted there her light can.;
Laden with all the golden fruits that grew;
Each eve had seen her gliding through the hour
With all could cheer or deck their sparry bower,
And now she spread her little store with smiles,
The happiest daughter of the loving isles.

IX.

She, as he gazed with grateful wonder, press'd
Her shelter'd love to her impassion'd breast;
And suited to her soft caresses, told
An olden tale of love,—for love is old,
Old as eternity, but not outworn
With each new being born or to be born:°
How a young chief, a thousand moons ago,
Diving for turtle in the depths below,
Had risen, in tracking fast his ocean prey.
Into the cave which round and o'er them lay,
How in some desperate feud of after-time,
He shed'd there a daughter of the dwell;
A foe beloved, and offspring of a foe,
Saved by his tribe but for a captive's wo;
How, when the storm of war was still'd, he led
His island clan to where the waters spread

* Of this cave (which is no fiction) the original will be found in the ninth chapter of "Mariner's Account of the Tonga Islands." I have taken the nominal liberty to suggest to Tooboodi, the last island where any distinct account is left of Christian and his comrades.

° This may seem too minute for the general outline (in Mariner's Account) from which it is taken. But few men have travelled without seeing something of the kind—we know, that is. Without adhering to Elison, in Sturge Purb's last journal, (if my memory do not err, for there are eight years since I read the book,) he mentions having met with a rock or mountain so exactly resembling a Gothic cathedral, that only a minute inspection could convince him that it was a work of nature.

° The reader will recollect the epigrams of the Greek antiquity, or its transition into most of the modern languages.

"Wether than art, thy master see,
He was or is, or is to be"
Their deep green shadow o'er the rocky door,
Then dived—it seemed as if to rise no more:
His wondering mates, amazed within their bark,
Or deem'd him mad, or prey to the blue shark;
Row'd down in sorrow the sea-girded rock,
Then paused upon their paddles from the shock;
When, fresh and springing from the deep, they saw
A goddess rise—so deem'd they in their awe;
And their companion, glorious by her side,
Proud and exulting in his mermaid pride;
And how, when undeceived, the pair they bore
With sounding conchs and joyous shouts to shore;
If we they had gladly lived and calmly died,—
And why not also Terquill and his bride?
Not mine to tell the rapturous caress
Which follow'd wildly in that wild recess.
This tale; enough that all within that cave
Was love, though buried strong as in the grave
Where Abelard, through twenty years of death,
Whose Eloïsa's form was lower'd beneath
Their nuptial vault, his arms outstretch'd, and press'd
The kindling ashes to his kindled breast.*

The waves without sang round their couch, their roar
As much unheeded as if life were o'er;
Within, their hearts made all their harmony,
Love's broken murmur and more broken sigh.

X.

And they, the cause and sharers of the shock
Which left them exiles of the hollow rock,
Where were they? O'er the sea for life they plied,
To seek from Heaven the shelter men denied.
Another course had been their choice—but where?
The wave which bore them still their foes would bear;
Who disappointed of their former chase,

In search of Christian now renew'd their race.
Eager with anger, their strong arms made way
Like vultures baffled of their previous prey.
They gain'd upon them, all whose safety lay
In some bleak crag or deeply-hidden bay:
No further chance or choice remain'd; and right
For the first further rock which met their sight
They steer'd, to take their latest view of land,
And yield as victims, or die sword in hand;
Dismiss'd the natives and their shallop, who
Would still have battled for that scanty crew;
But Christian bade them seek their shore again,
Nor add a sacrifice which we in vain;
For what were simple bow and savage spear
Against the arms that must be wielded here?

XI.

They landed on a wild but narrow scene,
Where few but Nature's footsteps—yet had been;
Prepared their arms, and with that gloomy eye,
Stern and sus'tain'd of man's extremity,
When hope is gone, nor glory's self remains
To cheer resistance against death or chains,—
They stood, the three, as the three hundred stood
Who dyed Thermopylae with holy blood.
But, ah! how different! 'tis the cressst makes all,
Degrades or hallows courage in its fall.
O'er them no fame, eternal and intense,
Blazed through the clouds of death and beckon'd hence;

No grateful country, smiling through her tears.
Begun the praises of a thousand years;
No nation's eyes weep on their tomb be bent.
No heroes envy them their monument;
However boldly their warm blood was spilt,
Their life was shame, their epitaph was guilt.
And this they knew and felt, at least the one,
The leader of the band he had undone.
Who, born perchance for better things, had set
His life upon a cast which linger'd yet:
But now the die was to be thrown, and all
The chances were in favor of his fall;
And such a fall! But still he faced the shock,
Obdurate as a portion of the rock
Whereon he stood, and fix'd his level'd gun,
Dark as a sullen cloud before the sun.

XII.

The boat drew nigh, well arm'd, and firm the crew
To act whatever duty bade them do;
Careless of danger, as the onward wind
Is of the leaves it strews, nor looks behind.
And yet perhaps they rather wish'd to go
Against a nation's than a native foe.
And felt that this poor victim of self-will,
Briton no more, had once been Britain's still.
They hail'd him to surrender—no reply:
Their arms were poised, and glitter'd in the sky.
They hail'd again—no answer; yet once more
They offer'd quarter louder than before.
The echoes only, from the rock's rebound,
Took their last farewell of the dying sound.
Then flash'd the flint, and blazed the volleying flame
And the smoke rose between them and their aim.
While the rock rattled with the bullets' knell,
Which peal'd in vain, and flatten'd as they fell:
Then flew the only answer to be given
By those who had lost all hope in earth or heaven.
After the first fierce peal, as they pull'd higher,
They heard the voice of Christian shout, "Now fire!
And ere the word upon the echo died,
Two fell; the rest assall'd the rock's rough side,
And, furious at the madness of their foes,
Disdain'd all further efforts, save to close
But steep the creag, and all without a path,
Each step opposed a bastion to their wrath
While, placed 'mid cliffs the least accessible
Which Christian's eyes were train'd to mark full well,
The three maintain'd a strife which must not yield,
In spots where eagles might have chosen to build.
Their every shot told; while the assailant fell,
Dash'd on the shingles like the limpet shell;
But still enough survived, and mounted still,
Scattering their numbers here and there, until Surrounded and commanded, though not nigh
Enough for seizure, near enough to die,
The desperate trio held aloof their fate
But by a thread, like sharks who have gorged the bulk;
Yet to the very last they battled well,
And not a groan from their foes echo fell.
Christian died last—twice wounded; and once more
Mercy was offer'd when they saw his gore;
Too late for life, but not too late to die,
With, though a hostile hand, to close his eye.
A limb was broken, and he droop'd along
The crag, as doth a falcon rest of young.
The sound revived him, or appear'd to wake
Some passion which a weakly gesture spake.

* The tradition is attached to the story of Eloïsa, that when her body was lowered into the grave of Abelard, (who had been buried twenty years) he pressed his arms to receive her.
Ho ban'd to the foremost, who drew nigh,
But, as they neard, he rear'd his weapon high—
His last ball had been aim'd, but from his breast
He tore the topmost button from his vest,*
Down the tube dash'd it, levell'd, fired, and smiled
As his foe fell; then, like a serpent, coil'd
His wounded, weary form, to where the steep
Look'd desperate as himself along the deep;
Cast one glance back, and clenched his hand, and shook
His last rage 'gainst the earth which he forsook;
Then plunged: the rock below received like glass
His body crush'd into one gory mass,
With scarce a shred to tell of human form,
Or fragment for the sea-bird or the worm;
A fair-hair'd scalp, besmeard with blood and weeds,
Yet reck'd, the remnant of himself and deeds,
Some splinters of his weapons, (to the last,
As long as hand could hold, he held them fast.)
Yet glitter'd, but at distance—hair'd away
To rust beneath the dew and dashing spray;
The rest was nothing—save a life mispent,
And soul—but who shall answer where it went?
'Tis ours to bear, not judge the dead; and they
Who doom to hell, themselves are on the way,
Unless these bullies or eternal pains
Are pardon'd their bad hearts for their worse brains.

XIII.
The deed was over! All were gone or ta'en,
The fugitive, the captive, or the slain.
Chain'd on the deck, where once, a gallant crew,
They stood with honor, were the wretched few
Survivors of the skirmish on the isle;
But the last rock left no surviving spoil.
Cold these lay where they fell, and wertering,
While o'er them flapp'd the sea-bird's dewy wing,
Now wheeling nearer from the neighboring surge,
And screaming high their harsh and hungry dirge:
But calm and careless heav'd the wave below,
Eternal with unsympathetic flow;
Far o'er its face the dolphins sported on,
And sprung the flying fish against the sun,*

Till its dried wing relapsed from its brief height.
To gather moisture for another flight.

XIV.
'Twas morn; and Neuha, who by dawn of day
Swam smoothly forth to catch the rising ray,
And watch if aught approach'd the amphibious lab
Where lay her lover, saw a sail in air:
It flapp'd, it fill'd, and to the growing gale
Bent its broad arch: her breath began to fail
With fluttering fear, her heart beat thick and high,
While yet a doubt sprang where its course might lie.
But no! it came not; fast and far away
The shadow lessen'd as it clear'd the bay.
She gazed and flung the sea-foam from her eyes,
To watch as for a rainbow in the skies.
On the horizon verged the distant deck,
Diminish'd, dwindled to a very speck—
Then vanish'd. All was ocean, all was joy!
Down plunged she through the cave to rouse her boy
Told all she had seen, and all she hoped, and all
That happy love could augur or recall;
Sprung forth again, with Torquill following free
His bounding nereid over the broad sea;
Swam round the rock, to where a shallow cleft
Hid the canoe that Neuha there had left
Drifting along the tide, without an oar,
That eve the strangers chased them from the shore
But when these vanish'd, she pursued her prow,
Regain'd, and urged to where they found it now,
Nor ever did more love and joy embank,
Than now was wafted in that slender ark.

XV.
Again their own shore rises on the view,
No more polluted with a hostile hue;
No sullen ship lay bristling o'er the foam,
A floating dungeon:—all was hope and home!
A thousand prosas darted o'er the bay,
With sounding shells, and heralded their way;
The chiefs came down, around the people pour'd,
And welcome Torquill as a son restored;
The women throng'd, embracing and embraced
By Neuha, asking where they had been chased,
And how escaped? The tale was told; and thus
One acclamation rent the sky again;
And from that hour a new tradition gave
Their sanctuary the name of "Neuha's Cave."
A hundred fires, far flickering from the height,
Blazed o'er the general revel of the night,
The feast in honor of the guest, return'd
To peace and pleasure, perilously earn'd:
A night succeeded by such happy days
As only the yet infant world displays.
APPENDIX TO THE ISLAND.

EXTRACT FROM THE VOYAGE OF CAPTAIN BLIGH.

On the 27th of December it blew a severe storm of wind from the eastward, in the course of which we suffered greatly. One sea broke away the spar and spars out of the starboard main-chains; another broke into the ship and stowe all the boats. Several casks of beer that had been lashed on deck broke loose, and were washed overboard; and it was not without great risk, and difficulty, that we were able to secure the boats from being washed away entirely. A great quantity of our bread was also damaged and rendered useless, for the sea had stowe in our stern, and filled the cabin with water.

On the 29th, we took in the necessary spares, and having finished our business, sailed on the 10th.

I now divided the people into three watches, and gave the charge of the third watch to Mr. Fletcher Christian, one of the mates. I have always considered this a desirable regulation, and I am persuaded that an unbroken rest will not only contribute much towards the health of the ship's company, but enables them more readily to exert themselves in cases of sudden emergency.

As I wished to proceed to Otaheite without stopping, I reduced the allowance of bread to two-thirds, and caused the water for drinking to be filtered through drip-stones, bought at Teneriffe for that purpose. I now acquainted the ship's company of the object of the voyage, and gave assurances of certain promotion to every one whose endeavors should merit it.

On Tuesday the 26th of February, being in south latitude 29 degrees, 33 minutes, and 44 degrees 44 minutes west longitude, we bent new sails, and made other necessary preparations for encountering the weather that was to be expected in a high latitude. Our distance from the coast of Brazil was about one hundred leagues.

On the forenoon of Sunday the 2d of March, after seeing that every person was clean, divine service was performed, according to my usual custom on this day. I gave to Mr. Fletcher Christian, whom I had before directed to take charge of the third watch, a written order to act as lieutenant.

The change of temperature soon began to be sensibly felt, and that the people might not suffer from their own negligence, I supplied them with thick clothing, as better suited to the climate. A great number of whales of an immense size, with two spout-holes on the back of the head, were seen on the 11th.

On a complaint made to me by the master, I found a great number of the seamen, with two dozen of lashes, for insubordination and mutinous behaviour, which was the first time that there was any occasion for punishment on board.

We were off Cape St. Diego, the eastern part of the Terra del Fuego, and the wind being unfavorable, I thought more advisable to go round to the westward of Staten-land than to attempt passing through Straits le Maire. We passed New Year's Harbor and Cape St. John, and on Monday the 31st were in latitude 60 degrees 1 minute south. But the wind became variable, and we had bad weather. Storms, attended with great sea, prevailed until the 12th of April. The ship began to leak, and required pumping every hour, which was no more than we had expected. We had to shift the lower yards of spars and high sea. The decks also became so leaky, that it was necessary to allot the great cabin, of which I made little use except in fine weather, to those people who had not berths to hang their clothes in. Hence we were obliged to pump hourly in our passage from Cape Horn. The sails and rigging also required repair, and, on examining the provisions, a considerable quantity was found damaged.

Having remained thirty-eight days in this place, and my people having received all the advantage that could be derived from refreshments of every kind that could be met with, we sailed on the 1st of July.

A gale of wind blew on the 20th, with a high sea: it increased after noon with such violence, that the ship was driven almost forcible under before we could get the sails cleared up. The lower yards were lowered, and the topgallant-masts got down upon deck, which relieved her much. We lay to all night, and in the morning bore away under a reefed foresail. The sea was still running high, in the afternoon it became very unsafe to stand on; we therefore lay to all night, without any accident, excepting that a man at the steerage was thrown over the wheel and much bruised. Towards noon the violence of the storm abated, and we again bore away under the reefed foresail.

In a few days we passed the island of St. Paul, where there is good fresh water, as I was informed by a Dutch captain, and also a hot spring, which boils fish as completely as if done by a fire. Approaching to Van Diemen's land, we had much bad weather, with snow and hail; but nothing was seen to indicate our vicinity on the 13th of August, ex such...day by five of the natives; but the men were not taken until nearly three weeks afterwards. Leaving the place where they were, in a different quarter of the island of Otaheite, I went thither in the cutter, thinking there would be no great difficulty in securing them with the assistance of the natives. However, the adventure of securing them was not so easy as it was supposed to be. We found a house near a house in which they were, they came out without their fire-arms, and delivered themselves up. Some of the chiefs had formerly seized and carried off these natives; but they were prevailed on by fair promises of returning peaceably to the ship, to release them. But finding an opportunity again to get possession of their arms, they set the natives at defiance.

The object of the voyage being now completed, all the bread-fruit plants, to the number of one thousand and fifteen, were got on board on Tuesday the 81st of March. Besides these, we had collected many other plants, some of them bearing the finest fruits in the world; and valuable, from affording brilliant dyes, and for various properties besides.

At sunset of the 4th of April, we made sail from Otaheite, bidding farewell to an island where a great many tosses, and of the most delightful kind, were seen. Some of the chiefs were present, and of these, I was much pleased with the utmost affection and regard, and which seemed to increase in proportion to our stay. That we were not insensible to their kindness, the succeeding circumstance may, perhaps, be justly supposed.

On Tuesday evening, before we took our departure, a number of natives were brought to me, and I was entertained with a simple and touching address, which included wishes that I might return to Otaheite and stay with them as long as I should live. It was a surprise to my hearers, who were not acquainted with the language. I understood them, however, and after returning many expressions of regard and esteem, ended with a request that my native friends would be allowed to accompany me on my voyage.

A few days after reaching the Island of Huaheine, I made for the Island of Otaheite, and arrived at the south-west point of it on the 20th of April. I found it very lovely, and the people who live there are exceedingly kind.

carried on a brisk trade for yams: we also got plaintains and bread-fruit. But the yams were in great abundance, and very fine and large. One of them weighed above forty-five pounds. Sailing canoes were to be seen continually, containing more than nine passengers. Such a number of them gradually arrived from different islands, that it was impossible to get any thing done, the multitude became so great that we could hardly have obtained the authority to command the whole. I therefore ordered a waterning party, then employed, to come on board, and sailed on Sunday the 26th of April.

We kept near the island of Kotoo all the afternoon, and on the morning of Monday. We had some chance that we might come off to the ship, but in this we were disappointed. The wind being northerly, we steered to the westward in the evening, to pass south of Tufoa;

and gave directions for this course to be continued
during the night. The master had the first watch, the gunner the middle watch, and Mr. Christian the morning watch. This was the turn of duty for the

Hallet to the voyage had advanced in a course of uninterrupted prosperity, and had been attended with circumstances equally pleasing and satisfactory. But a very different scene was now to be discerned. We had been in the midst of the turmoil which was for some time to render all our past labor productive only of misery and distress; and it had been concerted with so much secrecy and circumspection, that no one cir-

On the night of Monday, the watch was set as I had described. Just before sunrise on Tuesday morning, while I was yet asleep, Mr. Christian, with the master-at-arms, gunner's mate, and Thomas Burkitt, seaman, came into my cabin, and seizing me, tied my hands with a cord behind my back, threatening me with instant death if I spoke or made the least noise. I nevertheless called out as loud as I could a hope of assistance; but the officers not of our party were already secured by sentinels at their doors. At my own cabin door were three men, besides the four within: all except Christian had muskets and bayonets; he had only a cutlass. I was dragged out of bed, and forced on deck in my shirt, sufferin great pain in the meantime from the tightness with which my hands were tied. I was demanding the reason of the violence, the only reply was along out of my tongue. The master, the gunner, surgeon, master's mate, and Nelson the gardener, were kept confined below, and the fore-hatchway was guarded by sentinels. Mr. Samuel, though a helpless person, the clerk, were allowed to come on deck, where they

We veered the main-mast, and the carpenter was ordered into the boat. He was permitted, though not without opposition to take his tool-chest.

Mr. Samuel secured my journals and commission, with some important ship papers, and we got into the boat as quickly as possible. He attempted to save the time-keeper, and a box with my surveys, drawings, and remarks for fifteen years past, which were very numerous, when he was hurtied away with—"Damn your eyes, you are well off to get what you have."

Much alteration took place among the mutinous crew during the transaction of this whole affair.
Some swore, "I'll damn Bligh, and if he gets any thing with him," meaning me; and when the carpenter's chest was being carried away, "Damn my eyes, he will have a ves-

The master had by this time sent, requesting that he might come on deck, which was permitted; but he, too, was soon ordered back again to his cabin. Mr.

Certain individuals were called on to get into the cast and were hurled over the ship's side; whence

I concluded that along with them I was to be set adrift. Another effort to bring about a change produced nothing but menaces of having my brains blown out.

The boatswain and those seamen who were to be put into the boat were allowed to collect twine, canvases, lines, sails, cordage, an eight-and-twenty-gallon eask of water; and Mr. Samuel got one hundred pounds of provisions for them, and fifty dollars of letters of credit for the purchase of rum and wine; also a quadrant and compass, but he was prohibited, on pain of death, to touch any map or astronomical book, and any instrument, or any of my surveys and drawings.

The mutineers having that, which was very dear to me, they next called on deck, and forced over the ship's side into the boat, while I was kept apart from ev-very one aboat the mizen-mast. Christian, armed with a bayonet, held the cord fastening my hands, and the guard around me stood with their pieces cocked; but on my daring the ungrateful wretch to fire, they uncocked them. Isaac Martin, one of them, I saw had an inclination to assist me; and

This seemed a great restraint on them, which was interpared, we explained each other's sentiments by looks. But this was observed, and he was removed. He then got into the boat, attempting to leave the ship; however, he was compelled to return. Some officers were now called on, and contrary to the quartermasters, the sail maker, two cooks, my clerk, the butcher, and a boy. There remained on board Fletcher Christian, the master's mate; Peter Haywood, Edward Young, George Stewart, midshipmen; the master-at-arms, gunner's mate, boatswain's mate, gardener, armorer, carpenter's mate, carpenter's crew, and fourteen seamen, being altogether the most able men of the ship's company.

Having little or no wind, we rowed pretty fast towards the island of Tofoa, which bore northeast about ten leagues distant. The ship while in sight steered west-northwest; but this I considered only as a feint, for when we were sent away, "Huzza for Otaheite!" was frequently heard among the mutineers.

Christian, the chief of them, was of a respectable family in the north of England. This was the third voyage he had made with me. Notwithstanding the roughness with which I was treated, the remembrance of past kindnesses produced some remorse in him. While they were forcing me out of the ship, I asked him whether this was a proper return for the many instances he had experienced of my friendship? He appeared disturbed at the question, and answered with much emotion, "That—Captain Bligh—that is the thing—I am in hell—I am in hell!" His abilities to take charge of the third watch, as I had so divided the ship's company, were fully equal to the task.

Haywood was also of a respectable family in the north of England, and a young man of abilities, as well as Christian. These two had been objects of my particular regard and attention, and I had taken great pains to instruct them, having entertained hopes that, as professional men, they would have become a credit to their country. Young was well recommended, and Stewart of creditable parents in the Orkneys, at which place, on the return of the Resolution from the South Seas in 1780, we received a great number of seamen, that in consideration of these alone I should gladly have taken him with me. But he had always borne a good character.

When I had time to reflect, an inward satisfaction prevented the depression of my spirits. Yet, a few hours before, my situation had been peculiarly flattering; I had a ship in the most perfect order, stored with every necessary, both for health and service; the object of the voyage was attained, and two-thirds of it now completed. The remaining part had every prospect of success.

It will naturally be asked, what could be the cause of such a revolt? In answer, I can only conjecture that the mutineers had flattered themselves with the hope of a happier life among the Otaheitians than they could possibly enjoy in England, which, joined to some female connexions, most probably occasioned the whole transaction.

The women of Otaheite are handsome, mild, and cheerful in manners and conversation, possessed of great sensibility, and have sufficient delicacy to make them be admired and beloved. The chiefs were so much attached to our people, that they rather encouraged their stay among them than otherwise, and even made them promises of large possessions. Under these and many other concomitant circumstances, it ought hardly to be the subject of surprise that a set of sailors, most of them void of connexions, should be led away, where they had the power of fixing themselves in the midst of plenty, in one of the finest islands in the world, where there was no necessity to labor, and where the allurements of dissipation are beyond any conception that can be formed of it. The utmost, however, that a commander could have expected was desertions, such as have already happened more or less in the South Seas, and not an act of open mutiny.

But the secrecy of this mutiny surpasses belief. Thirteen of the party who were now with me had always lived forward among the seamen, yet neither they, nor the messmates of Christian, Stewart, Haywood, and Young, had ever observed any circumstance to excite suspicion of what was plotting; and it is not wonderful if I fell a sacrifice to it, my mind being entirely free from suspicion. Perhaps, had mariners been on board, a sentinel at my cabin door might have prevented it; for I constantly slept with the door open, that the officer of the watch might have access to me on all occasions. If the mutiny had been occasioned by any grievances, either real or imaginary, I must have discovered symptoms of discontent, which would have put me on my guard; but it was far otherwise. With Christian, in particular, I was on the most friendly terms; that very day he was engaged to have dined with me; and the preceding night he excused himself from supping with me on pretense of indisposition, for which I felt concerned, having no suspicion of his honor or integrity.

ACT I.
SCENE I.

Manfred alone.—Scene, a Gothic Gallery.—Time, Midnight.

Man. The lamp must be replenish'd, but even then it will not burn so long as I must watch:
My slumbers—if I slumber—are not sleep,
But a continuance of enduring thought,
Which then I can resist not: in my heart
There is a vigil and these eyes but close
To look within: and yet I live, and bear
The aspect and the form of breathing men.
But grief should be the instructor of the wise;
Sorrow is knowledge: they who know the most,
Must mourn the deepest o'er the fatal truth,
The Tree of Knowledge is not that of life.
Philosophy and science, and the springs

Of wonder, and the wisdom of the world,
I have essay'd, and in my mind there is
A power to make these subject to itself—
But they avail not: I have done men good,
And I have met with good even among men—
But this avail'd not: I have had my foes,
And none have baffled, many fallen before me—
But this avail'd not: Good or evil, life,
Powers, passions, all I see in other beings,
Have been to me as rain unto the sands
Since that all-nameless hour. I have no dread,
And feel the curse to have no natural fear,
Nor fluttering throb, that beats with hopes or wishes
Or lurking love of something on the earth.—

Now to my task.—Mysterious Agency!
Ye spirits of the unbounded Universe!
Whom I have sought in darkness and in light—
Ye, who do compass earth about, and dwell
In subtler essence—ye, to whom the tops
Of mountains inaccessible are haunts,
And earth's and ocean's caves familiar things—
I call upon ye by the written charm
Which gives me power upon you—Rise! appear!

[A pause]
They come not yet.—Now by the voice of him
Who is the first among you—by this sign,
Which makes you tremble—by the claims of him
Who is undying.—Rise! appear!—Appear!

[A pause]
If it be so.—Spirits of earth and air,
Ye shall not thus elude me: by a power,
Deeper than all yet urged, a tyrant-spell,
Which had its birthplace in a star condemn'd,
The burning wreck of a demolish'd world,
A wandering hell in the eternal space;
By the strong curse which is upon my soul,
The thought which is within me and around me,
I do compel ye to my will.—Appear!

[A star is seen at the darker end of the gallery: it is stationary; and a voice is heard singing.
MANFRED.

FIRST SPIRIT.

Mortal! to thy bidding bow’d,
From my mansion in the cloud,
Which the breath of twilight builds,
And the summer’s sunset gilds
With the azure and vermillion,
Which is mix’d for my pavilion;
Though thy quest may be forbidden,
On a star-beam I have ridden;
To thine adjuration bow’d,
Mortal—be thy wish avow’d.

Voice of the SECOND SPIRIT.

Mount Blanc is the monarch of mountains;
They crown’d him long ago
On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds,
With a diadem of snow.
Around his waist are forests braced,
The Avalanche in his hand;
Be it ever so thundering ball
Must pause for my command.
The Glacier’s cold and restless mass
Moves onward day by day;
But I am he who bids it pass,
Or with its ice delay.
I am the spirit of the place,
Could the mountain bow
And quiver to his cavern’d base—
And what with me wouldst Thou?

Voice of the THIRD SPIRIT.

In the blue depth of the waters,
Where the wave hath no strife,
Where the wind is a stranger,
And the sea-snake hath life,
Where the mermaid is decked
Her green hair with shells;
Like the storm on the surface
Came the sound of thy spells;
O’er my calm Hall of Coral
The deep echo roll’d—
To the Spirit of Ocean
Thy wishes unfold!

FOURTH SPIRIT.

Where the slumbering earthquake
Lies pillow’d on fire,
And the lakes of bitumen
Rise boilingly higher;
Where the roots of the Andes
Strike deep in the earth,
As their summits to heaven
Shoot soaringly forth;
I have quitted my birthplace,
Thy bidding to bide—
Thy spell hath subdued me,
Thy will be my guide!

FIFTH SPIRIT.

I am the Rider of the wind,
The Stirrer of the storm;
The hurricane I left behind
Is yet with lightning warm;
To speed to thee, o’er shore and sea
I swept upon the blast;
The fleet I met sail’d well, and yet
Twill sink ere night be past.

SIXTH SPIRIT.

My dwelling is the shadow of the night,
Why doth thy magic torture me with light?

SEVENTH SPIRIT.

The star which rules thy destiny
Was ruled, ere earth began, by me:
It was a world as fresh and fair
As e’er revolved round sun in air,
Its course was free and regular,
Space bosom’d not a lovelier star.
The hour arrived—and it became
A wandering mass of shapeless flame,
A pathless comet, and a curse,
The menace of the universe;
Still rolling on with innate force,
Without a sphere, without a course!
A bright deformity on high,
The monster of the upper sky!
And thou! beneath its influence born—
Thou worm! whom I obey and scorn—
Forced by a power, (which is not thine),
And lent thee but to make thee mine,
For this brief moment to descend,
Where these weak spirits round thee bend
And parley with a thing like thee—
What wouldst thou, Child of Clay! with me?

The Seven Spirits.

Earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds, thy star,
Are at thy beck and bidding, Child of Clay!
Before thee at thy quest their spirits are—
What wouldst thou with us, son of mortals—say?

Man. Forgetfulness—
First Spirit. Of what—of whom—and why:
Man. Of that which is within me; read it there—
Ye know it, and I cannot utter it.

Spirit. We can but give thee that which we possess:
Ask of us subjects, sovereignty, the power
O’er earth, the whole, or portion, or a sign
Which shall control the elements, whereof
We are the dominators, each and all,
These shall be thine.

Man. Oblivion, self-oblivion—
Can ye not wring from out the hidden realms
Ye offer so profusely what I ask?
Spirit. It is not in our essence, in our skill;
But—thou mayst die.

Man. Will death bestow it on me?
Spirit. We are immortal, and do not forget;
We are eternal; and to us the past
Is, as the future, present. Art thou answer’d?

Man. Ye quock me—but the power which brought ye here
Hath made you mine. Slaves, scoff not at my will!
The mind, the Spirit, the Promethean spark,
The lightning of my being, is as bright,
Pervading, and far-darting as your own,
And shall not yield to yours, though coop’d in clay
Answer, or I will teach ye what I am.
Spirit. We answer as we answer’d; our reply
Is even in thine own words.

Man. Why say ye so?
Spirit. If, as thou say’st, thine essence be as cura
We have replied in telling thee, the thing
Mortals call death nought to do with us.
Man. I then have call’d ye from your realms in vain.
Ye cannot, or ye will not, aid me.
Spir. Say;
What we possess we offer; it is thine:
Bethink ere thou dismiss us, ask again—
Kingdom, and sway, and strength, and length of days—
Man. Accursed! what have I to do with days?
They are to long already.—Hence—begone!
Spir. Yet father! being here, our will would do thee service;
Bethink thee, is there then no other gift
Which we can make not worthless in-thine eyes?
Man. No, none: yet stay—one moment, ere we part—
I would behold ye face to face. I hear
Your voices, sweet and melancholy sounds,
As music on the waters; and I see
The steady aspect of a clear large star;
But nothing more. Approach me as ye are,
Or one, or all, in your accustomed forms.
Spir. We have no forms beyond the elements
Of which we are the mind and principle:
But choose a form—in that we will appear.
Man. I have no choice; there is no form on earth.
Hideous or beautiful to me. Let him,
Who is most powerful of ye, take such aspect
As unto him may seem most fitting—Come!
Seventh Spirit. (Appearing in the shape of a beautiful female figure.) Behold!
Man. Oh God! if it be true, and thou
Art not a madness and a mockery.
I yet will be most happy. I will claspe thee,
And we again will be—[The figure vanishes.
My heart is crush’d!]
[Manfred falls senseless.
A voice is heard in the Incantation which follows.)
When the moon is on the wave,
And the glow-worm in the grass,
And the meteor on the grave,
And the wisp on the morass;
When the falling stars are shooting,
And the answer’d owls are hooting,
And the silent leaves are still
In the shadow of the hill,
Shall my soul be upon thine,
With a power and with a sign.

Though thy slumber may be deep,
Yet thy spirit shall not sleep;
There are shades which will not vanish,
There are thoughts thou canst not banish;
By a power to thee unknown,
Thou canst never be alone;
Thou art wrapt as with a shroud,
Thou art gather’d in a cloud;
And for ever shalt thou dwell
In the spirit of this spell.

Though thou seest me not pass by,
Thou shalt feel me with thine eye
As a thing that, though unseen,
Must be near thee, and hath been
And when in that secret dread
Thou hast turn’d around thy head,
Thou shalt marvel I am not
As thy shadow on the spot,
And the power which thou dost feel
Shall be what thou must confess.

And a magic voice and verse
Hath baptized thee with a curse,
And a spirit of the air
Hath begirt thee with a snare;
In the wind there is a voice
Shall forbid thee to rejoice;
And to thee shall Night dony
All the quiet of her sky;
And the day shall have a sun,
Which shall make thee wish it done.

From thy false tears I did distil
An essence which hath strength to kill;
From thy own heart I then did wring
The black blood in its blackest spring:
From thy own smile I snatch’d the snake,
For there it coil’d as in a brake;
From thy own lip I drew the charm
Which gave all these their chiefest harm:
In proving every poison known,
I found the strongest was thine own.

By thy cold breast and serpent smile,
By thy unfathom’d gulfs of guile,
By that most seeming virtuous eye,
By thy shut soul’s hypocrisy;
By the perfection of thine art
Which pass’d for human thine own heart;
By thy delight in others’ pain,
And by thy brotherhood of Cain,
I call upon thee! and compel
Thyself to be thy proper Hell!

And on thy head I pour the vial
Which doth devote thee to this trial,
Nor to slumber, nor to die,
Shall be in thy destiny;
Though thy death shall still seem near
To thy wish, out as a fear;
Lo! the spell now works around thee,
And the clankless chain hath bound thee;
O’er thy heart and brain together
Hath the word been pass’d—now wither!

Man. The spirits I have raised abandon me—
The spells which I have studied baffled me—
The remedy I reck’d of tortured me;
I lean no more on superhuman aid,
It hath no power upon the past, and for
The future, till the past be gulf’d in darkness,
It is not of my search.—My mother Earth!
And thou fresh breaking Day, and you, ye Mountains,
Why are ye beautiful? I cannot love ye.
And thou, the bright eye of the universe,
That openest over all, and unto all
Art a delight—thou shin'st not on my heart,
And you, ye crags, upon whose extreme edge
I stand, and on the torrent's brink beneath
Behold the tall pines dwindled as to shrubs
In distance of distance; when a leap,
A stir, a motion, even a breath, would bring
My breast upon its rocky bosom's bed
To rest for ever—wherefore do I pause?
I feel the impulse—yet I do not plunge;
I see the peril—yet do not recede;
And my brain reels—and yet my foot is firm
There is a power upon me which withholds,
And makes it my fatality to live;
If it be life to wear within myself
This barrenness of spirit, and to be
My own soul's sepulchre, for I have ceased
To justify my deeds unto myself—
The last infirmity of evil.
Ay, thou wing'd and cloud-eleving minister,
[An eagle passes.
Whose happy flight is highest into heaven,
Well may'st thou swoop so near me—I should be
Thy prey, and gorge thine eaglets; thou art gone
Where the eye cannot follow thee; but thine
Yet pierces downward, onward, or above,
With a pervading vision.—Beautiful!
How beautiful is all this visible world!
How glorious in its action and itself!
But we, who name ourselves its sovereigns, we,
Half dust, half deity, alike unfit
To sink or soar, with our mix'd essence make
A conflict of its elements, and breathe
The breath of degradation and of pride,
Contending with low wants and lofty will,
Till our mortality predominates,
And men are—what they name not to themselves,
And trust not to each other. Hark! the note,
[The Shepherd's pipe in the distance is heard.
The mutual music of the mountain reed—
For here the patriarchal days are not
A pastoral fable—pipes in the liberal air,
Mix'd with the sweet bells of the samturing herd;
My soul would drink those echoes.—Oh, that I were
The viewless spirit of a lovely sound,
A living voice, a breathing harmony,
A bedbless enjoyment—born and dying
With the best tone which made me!—
*Enter from below a CHAMOIS HUNTER.

Chamois Hunter.
Even so
This way the chamois leapt: her nimble feet
Have baffled me; my gains to-day will scarce
Repay my breakneck travail.—What is here?
Who seems not of my trade, and yet hath reach'd
A height which none even of our mountaineers
Save our best hunters, may attain; his garb
Is goodly, his mien manly, and his air
Proud as a freeborn peasant's, at this distance—
I will approach him nearer.

M sn. (not perceiving the other.) To be thus—
Gray-haired d with anguish, like these blasted pines,
Wrecks of a single winter, barkless, branchless,
A mangled trunk upon a cursed root,
Which but supplies a feeling to decay—
And to be thus, eternally but thus,
Having been otherwise! Now furrow'd o'er,
With wrinkles, plough'd by moments, not by years
And hours—all tortured into ages—hours
Which I outlive!—ye topping crags of ice!
Ye avalanches, whom a breath draws down
In mountainsous o'erwhelming, come and crush me.
I hear ye momentarily, beneath,
Crash with a frequent conflict; but ye pass,
And only fall on things that still would live;
On the young flourishing forest, or the hut
And hamlet of the harmless villager.

C. Hun. The mist begins to rise from up the valley;
I'll warn him to descend, or he may chance
To lose at once his way and life together.

Man. The mists boil up around the glaciers; clouds
Rise curling fast beneath me, white and sulphury
Like foam from the roused ocean of deep Hell,
Whose every wave breaks on a living shore,
Heap'd with the damn'd like pebbles.—I am giddy.
Ch. Hun. I must approach him cautiously; if near
A sudden step will startle him, and he Seems tottering already.

Man. Mountains have fallen,
Leaving a gap in the clouds, and with the shock
Rocking their Alpine brethren; filling up
The ripe green valleys with destruction's splinters.
Damming the rivers with a sudden dash,
Which crush'd the waters into mist, and made
Their fountains find another channel—thus,
Thus, in its old age, did Mount Rosenberg.
Whence I stood I know not beneath it?

C. Hun. Friend! have a care,
Your next step may be fatal—for the love
Of Him who made you, stand not on that brink!

Man (not hearing him.) Such would have been for me a fitting tomb;
My bones had then been quiet in their depth;
They had not then been strewn upon the rocks
For the wind's pastime—as thus—thus they shall be—
In this one plunge.—Farewell, ye opening heavens
Look not upon me thus reproachfully—
Ye were not meant for me—Earth ' take these atoms!
[As MANFRED is in act to spring from the cliff, the CHAMOIS HUNTER seizes and retains him with a sudden grasp.

C. Hun. Hold, madman!—though aweary of thy life,
Stain not our pure vales with thy guilty blood—
Away with me—I will not quit my hold.

Man. I am most sick at heart—nay, grasp me
not—
I am all feebleness—the mountains whirl
Spinning around me—I grow blind—What art thou?

C. Hun. I'll answer that anon.—Away with me—
The clouds grow thicker—there—now lean on me—
Place your foot here—here, take this staff, and cling
A moment to that shrub—now give me your hand,
And hold fast by my girde—softly—well—
The Chalet will be gained within an hour—
Come on, we'll quickly find a surer footing,
And something like a pathway, which the torrent
Hath wash'd since winter.—Come, 'tis bravely done—
You should have been a hunter.—Follow me.
[As they descend the rocks with difficulty, the some closes.
ACT II.

SCENE I.

A Cottage among the Bernese Alps.

Manfred and the Chamois Hunter.

C. Hun. No, no—yet pause—thou must not yet go forth:
Thy mind and body are alike unfit.
To trust each other, for some hours, at least;
When thou art better, I will be thy guide—
But whither?

Man. It imports not: I do know
My route full well, and need no further guidance.

C. Hun. Thy garb and gait bespeak thee of high lineage—
One of the many chiefs, whose castled crags
Look o'er the lower valleys—which of these May call thee lord? I only know their portals;
My way of life leads me but rarely down
To bask by the huge hearts of those old halls,
Carousing with the vassals; but the paths,
Which step from out our mountains to their doors,
Know from childhood—which of these is thine?

Man. No matter.

C. Hun. Well, sir, pardon me the question,
And be of better cheer. Come, taste my wine:
'Tis of an ancient vintage; many a day
'Thas thaw'd my veins among our glaciers, now
Let it do thus for thine—Come, pledge me fairly.

Man. Away, away! there's blood upon the brim!
Will it then never—never sink in the earth?

C. Hun. What dost thou mean? thy senses wander to thee.:

Man. I say 'tis blood—my blood! the pure warm stream
Which ran in the veins of my fathers, and in ours,
When we were in our youth, and had one heart,
And loved each other as we should not love,
And this was shed: but still it rises up,
Coloring the clouds, that shut me out from heaven,
Where thou art not—and I shall never be.

C. Hun. Man of strange words, and some half-maddening sin,
Which makes thee people vanity, whate'er
Thy dread and sufferance be, there's comfort yet—
The aid of holy men, and heavenly patience—

Man. Patience and patience! Hence—that word was made
For brutes of burden, not for birds of prey;
Preach it to mortals of a dust like thine,—
I am not of thine order.

C. Hun. Thanks to heaven!
I would not be of thine for the free fame
Of William Tell; but whatso'er thine ill,
It must be borne, and these wild starts are useless.

Man. Do I not bear it?—Look on me—I live.

C. Hun. This is convulsion, and no healthful life.

Man. I tell thee, man! I have lived many years,
Many long years, but they are nothing now
To those which I must number: ages—ages—
Space and eternity—and consciousness,
With the fierce thirst of death—and still unlaked!

C. Hun. Why, on thy brow the seal of middle age
Hath scarce been set; I am thine elder far.

Man. Think'st thou existence doth depend on time?

It doth; but actions are our epochs: mine
Have made my days and nights imperishable
Endless, and all alike, as sands on the shore,
Innumerable atoms; and one desert,
Barren and cold, on which the wild waves break,
But nothing rests, save carcasses and wrecks,
Rocks, and the salt surf-weeds of bitterness.

C. Hun. Alas! he's mad—but yet I must not leave him.

Man. I would I were—for then the things I see
Would be but a distemper'd dream.

C. Hun. What is it
That thou dost see, or think thou look'st upon?

Man. Myself, and thee—a peasant of the Alps—
Thy humble virtues, hospitable home,
And spirit patient, pious, proud, and free;
Thy self-respect, grated on innocent thoughts;
Thy days of health, and nights of sleep; thy toils,
By danger dignified, yet guiltless; hopes
Of cheerful old age and a quiet grave,
With cross and garland over its green turf,
And thy grandchildren's love for epitaph;
This do I see—and then I look within—
It matters not—my soul was scorched already!

C. Hun. And wouldst thou then exchange thy lot for mine?

Man. No, friend! I would not wrong thee nor exchange
My lot with living being: I can bear—
However wretchedly, 'tis still to bear—
In life what others could not brook to dream,
But perish in their slumber.

C. Hun. And with this—
This cautious feeling for another's pain,
Canst thou be black with evil?—say not so.
Can one of gentle thoughts have wreak'd revenge
Upon his enemies?

Man. Oh! no, no, no!
My injuries came down on those who loved me—
On those whom I best loved: I never quell'd
An enemy, save in my just defence—
But my embrace was fatal.

C. Hun. Heaven give thee rest—
And penitence restore thee to thyself;
My prayers shall be for thee.

Man. I need them not.
But can endure thy pity. I depart—
'Tis time—farewell!—here's gold and thanks for thee—

No words—It is thy due.—Follow me not—
I know my path—the mountain perils pass'd:—
And once again, I charge thee, follow not!

SCENE II.

A lower Valley in the Alps.—A Cataract.

Enter Manfred.

It is noon—the sunbow's rays still arch
The torrent with the many hues of heaven,
And roll the sheeted silver's waving column
O'er the crag's headlong perpendicular,
And fling its lines of foaming light along,
And to and fro, like the pale courser's tail,
The Giant steed, to be bestrode by Death,
As told in the Apocalypse. No eyes
But mine now drink this sight of loveliness
I should be sole in this sweet solitude,
And with the Spirit of the place divide
The homage of these waters—I will call her.

MANFRED takes some of the water into the palm of his hand, and flings it in the air, muttering the adoration. After a pause, the WITCH OF THE ALPS rises beneath the arch
of the sunbeam of the torrent.

Beautiful Spirit! with thy hair of light,
And dazzling eyes of glory, in whose form
The charms of earth's least-mortal daughters grow
To an unearthly stature, in an essence
Of purer elements; while the hues of youth,—
Carnation'd like a sleeping infant's cheek,
Rock'd by the beating of her mother's heart,
Or the rose tints, which summer's twilight leaves
Upon the lofty glacier's virgin snow,
The blush of earth embracing with her heaven—
Tinge thy celestial aspect, and make tame
The beauties of the sunbow which bends e'er thee.
Beautiful Spirit! in thy calm clear brow,
Wherein is glass'd serenity of soul,
Which of itself shows immortality,
I read that thou wilt pardon to a Son
Of Earth, whom the abstruser powers permit
At times to commune with them—if that he
Avail him of his spells—to call thee thus,
And gaze on thee a moment.

Witch. Son of Earth! I know thee, and the powers which give thee power;
I know thee for a man of many thoughts,
And deeds of good and ill, extreme in both,
Fatal and fated in thy sufferings.
I have expected this—what wouldst thou with me?
Man. To look upon thy beauty—nothing further.
The face of the earth hath madden'd me, and I
Take refuge in her mysteries, and pierce
To the abodes of those who govern her—
But they can nothing aid me. I have sought
From them what they could not bestow, and now
I search no further.

Witch. What could be the quest
Which is not in the power of the most powerful,
The rulers of the invisible?
Man. A boon;—
But why should I repeat it? 'twere in vain.

Witch. I know not that; let thy lips utter it.

Man. Well, though it torture me, 'tis but the same;
My pang shall find a voice. From my youth upwards
My spirit walk'd not with the souls of men,
Nor look'd upon the earth with human eyes;
The thirst of their ambition was not mine,
The aim of their existence was not mine;
My joys, my griefs, my passions, and my powers,
Made me a stranger; though I wore the form,
I had no sympathy with breathing flesh,
Nor midst the creatures of clay that girded me
Was there but one who—but of her anon.
I said with men, and with the thoughts of men,
I held but slight communion; but instead,
My joy was in the Wilderness, to breathe
The difficult air of the iced mountain's top,
Where the birds dare not build, nor insect's wing
Plit o'er the herbless granite; or to plunge
Into the torrent, and to roll along
On the swift whirl of the new breaking wave
Of river-stream, or ocean, in their flow.
In these my early strength exulted; or

To follow through the night the moving noon,
The stars and their development; or catch
The dazzling lightnings till my eyes grew dim;
Or to look, listing, on the scatter'd leaves,
While Autumn winds were at their evening song
These were my pastimes, and to be alone;
For if the beings, of whom I was one,—
Hating to be so,—cross'd me in my path,
I felt myself degraded back to them,
And was all clay again. And then I dived,
In my lone wanderings, to the caves of death,
Searching its cause in its effect; and drew
From with'er'd bones, and skulls, and heap'd up dust
Conclusions most forbidden. Then I pass'd
The nights of years in sciences untaught,
Save in the old time; and with time and toil,
And terrible ordeal, and such penance
As in itself hath power upon the air,
And spirits that do compass air and earth,
Space, and the peopled infinite, I made
Mine eyes familiar with Eternity,
Such as, before me, did the Magi, and
He who from out their fountain dwellings rais'd
Eros and Anteros* at Gadara,
As I do thee;—and with my knowledge grew
The thirst of knowledge, and the power anon joy
Of this most bright intelligence, until——

Witch. Proceed.

Man. Oh! I but thus prolong'd my words
Boasting these idle attributes, becuse
As I approach the core of my heart's grief—
But to my task. I have not named to thee
Father or mother, mistress, friend, or being,
With whom I wore the chain of human ties:
If I had such, they seem'd not such to me—
Yet there was one——

Witch. Spare not thyself—proceed.

Man. She was like me in lineaments—her eyes,
Her hair, her features, all, to the very tone
Even of her voice, they said were like to mine;
But soft'en'd all, and temper'd into beauty;
She had the same lone thoughts and wanderings.
The quest of hidden knowledge, and a mind
To comprehend the universe: nor these Alone, but with them gentler powers than mine,
Pity, and smiles, and tears—which I had not,
And tenderness—but that I had for her;
Humility—and that I never had.
Her faults were mine—her virtues were her own—
I lov'd her, and destroy'd her!

Witch. With thy hand?

Man. Not with my hand, but heart—which breaks her heart—
It gaz'd on mine, and with'er'd. I have shed
Blood, but not here—and yet her blood was shed—
I saw—and could not stanch it.

Witch. And for this—
A being of the race thou dost despise,
The order which thine own would rise above,
Mingling with us and ours, thou dost forego
The gifts of our great knowledge, and shrink'st back
To recreant mortality—Away!

Man. Laughter of Air! I tell thee, since that hour——
But words are breath—look on me in my sleep,
Or watch my watchings—Come and sit by me.
My solitude is solitude no more,
But peopled with the Furies;—I have grasped
My teeth in darkness till returning morn,
Then cursed myself till sunset;—I have pray'd
For madness as a blessing—'tis demned me.
I have affronted death—but in the war
Of elements the waters shrunk from me,
And fatal things pass'd harmless—the cold hand
Of an all-pitiless demon held me back,
Back by a single hair, which would not break.
In phantasy, imagination, all
The alluence of my soul—which one day was
A Crossus in creation—I plunged deep,
But, like an ebbing wave, it dash'd me back
Into the gulf of my unfathom'd thought.
I plumped amidst mankind—Forgetfulness
I sought in all, save where 'tis to be found,
And that I have to learn—my sciences,
My long pursued and superhuman art,
Is mortal here—I dwell in my despair—
And live—and live forever.

Witch. It may be
That I can aid thee.

Man. To do this thy power
Must wake the dead, or lay me low with them.
Do so—in any shape—in any hour—
With any torture—so it be the last.
Witch. That is not in my province; but if thou
Wilt swear obedience to my will, and do
My bidding, it may help thee to thy wishes.

Man. I will not swear—Obey! and whom? the Whose presence I command, and be the slave
Of those who served me—Never!

Witch. Is this all?
Hast thou no gentler answer?—Yet bethink thee,
And pause ere thou rejectest.

Man. I have said it.

Witch. Enough!—I may retire then—say!

Man. Retire!

(The Witch disappears.)

Man. (alone.) We are the fools of time and terror:
Days
Steal on us and steal from us; yet we live,
Loathing our life, and dreading still to die.
In all the days of this detested yoke—
This vital weight upon the struggling heart,
Which sinks with sorrow, or beats quick with pain,
Or joy that ends in agony or faintness—
In all the days of past and future, for
In life there is no present, we can number
How few—how less than few—wherein the soul
Forbears to pant for death, and yet draws back
As from a stream in winter, though the chill
Be but a moment's. I have one resource
Still in my science—I can call the dead,
And ask them what it is we dread to be:
The sternest answer can but be the Grave,
And that is nothing—if they answer not—
The buried Prophet answer'd to the Hag
Of Endor; and the Spartan Monarch drew
From the Byzantine maid's unsleeping spirit
An answer and his destiny—he slew
That which he loved, unknowing what he slew,
And died unpard'n'd—though he call'd in aid
The Phryxian Jove, and in Phigalia roused
The Arcadian Evocators to compel
The indignant shadow to depose her wrath,
Or fix her term of vengeance—she replied
In words of dubious import, but fulfilled. 3
If I had never lived, that which I love
Had still been living; had I never loved,
That which I love would still be beautiful—
Happy and giving happiness. What is she?
What is she now?—a sufferer for my sins—
A thing I dare not think upon—or nothing.
Within few hours I shall not call in vain—
Yet in this hour I dread the thing I dare:
Until this hour I never shrunk to gaze
On spirit, good or evil—now I tremble,
And feel a strange cold thaw upon my heart,
But I can act even what I most abhor,
And champion human fears.—the night approaches.

Exit

SCENE III.

The Summit of the Jungfrau Mountain

Enter First Destiny.
The moon is rising broad, and round, and bright,
And here on snows, where never human foot
Of common mortal trod, we nightly tread,
And leave no traces; o'er the savage sea,
The glassy ocean of the mountain ice,
We skim its rugged breakers, which put on
The aspect of a tumbling tempest's foam,
Frozen in a moment—a dead whirlpool's image;
And this most steep fantastic pinnacle,
The fretwork of some earthquake—where the clouds
Pulse to repose themselves in passing by—
Is sacred to our revels, or our vigilis;
Here do I wait my sisters, on our way
To the Hall of Arimanes, for to-night
Is our great festival—'tis strange they come not.

A Voice without, singing.

The Captive Usurper,
Hurl'd down from the throne,
Lay buried in torpor,
Forgotten and lone;

I broke through his slumber,
I shiver'd his chain,
I leagued him with number;

He's Tyrant again!
With the blood of a million he'll answer my mace,
With a nation's destruction—his flight and despair.

Second Voice, without.
The ship sail'd on, the ship sail'd fast,
But I left not a sail, and I left not a mast;
There is not a plank of the hull or the deck,
And there is not a wretch to lament o'er his wreck
Save one, whom I held, as he swam, by the hair,
And he was a subject well worthy my care;
A traitor on land, and a pirate at sea—

But I saved him to wreak further havoc for me.

First Destiny, answering.
The city lies sleeping;
The morn, to deplore it,
May dawn on it weeping;
Sullenly, slowly,
The black plague flew o'er it,—
Thousands lie lowly;
Tens of thousands shall perish—
The living shall fly from
The sick they should cherish;
But nothing can vanquish
The touch that they die from Sorrow and anguish.
And evil and dread,
Envelop a nation—
The best are the dead,
Who see not the sight
Of their own desolation—
This work of a night—
This wreck of a realm—this deed of my doing—
For ages I've done, and shall still be renewing!

Enter the Second and Third Destinies.
The Three.
Our hands contain the hearts of men,
Our footsteps are their graves;
We only give to take again
The spirits of our slaves!

First Des. Welcome!—Where’s Nemesis?
Second Des.
At some great work;
But what I know not, for my hands were full.
Third Des. Behold she cometh.

Enter Nemesis.
First Des.
Say, where hast thou been?
My sisters and thyself are slow to-night.
Nem. I was detain’d repairing shattered thrones
Marrying fools, restoring dynasties,
Avenging men upon their enemies,
And making them repent their own revenge;
Goading the wise to madness; from the dull
Shaping out oracles to rule the world
Affresh, for they were waxing out of date,
And mortals dared to ponder for themselves,
To weigh kings in the balance, and to speak
Of freedom, the forbidden fruit.—Away!
We have outstay’d the hour—mount we our clouds?

[Exeunt.

Scene IV.

The Hall of Arimanes.—Arimanes on his Throne, a Globe of Fire, surrounded by the Spirits.

Hymn of the Spirits.
Hail to our Master!—Prince of Earth and Air!
Who walks the clouds and waters—in his hand
The sceptre of the elements—which tear
Themselves to chaos at his high command!
He breatheth—and a tempest shakes the sea;
He speaketh—and the clouds reply in thunder;
He gazeth—from his glance the sunbeams flee;
He moveth—earthquakes rend the world asunder.
Beneath his footsteps the volcanoes rise;
His shadow is the Pestilence; his path
The comets herald through the cracking skies;
And planets turn to ashes at his wrath.
To him War offers daily sacrifice;
To him Death pays his tribute; Life is his,
With all its infinitude of agonies—
And his the spirit of whatever is!

Enter the Destinies and Nemesis.
First Des. Glory to Arimanes! on the earth
His power increaseth—both my sisters did
His bidding, nor did I neglect my duty!
Second Des. Glory to Arimanes! we who bow
The necks of men, bow down before his throne!
Third Des. Glory to Arimanes! we await
His nod!
Nem. Sovereign of Sovereigns! we are thine,

And all that liveth, more or less, is ours,
And most things wholly so; still to increase
Our power, increasing thine, demands our care
And we are vigilant—thy late commands
Have been fulfill’d to the utmost.

Enter Manfred.
A Spirit. What is here
A mortal!—Thou most rash and fatal wretch,
Bow down and worship!
Second Spirit. I do know the man—
A Magician of great power and fearful skill!
Third Spirit. Bow down and worship, slave!
What, know’st thou not
Thy and our Sovereign?—Tremble, and obey
All the Spirits. Prostrate thyself, and thy condemned clay,
Child of the Earth! or dread the worst.
Man. I know it;
And yet, see I kneel not.
Fourth Spirit. Twill be taught thee.
Man. 'Tis taught already;—many a night on the earth,
On the bare ground, have I bow’d my face,
And strew’d my head with ashes; I have known
The fulness of humiliation, for
I sunk before my vain despair, and knelt
To my own desolation.
Fifth Spirit. Dost thou dare
Refuse to Arimanes on his throne
What the whole earth accords, beholding not
The terror of his Glory—CrOuch! I say.
Man. Bid him bow down to that which is above
him,
The overruling Infinite—the Maker
Who made him not for worship—let him kneel,
And we will kneel together.
The Spirits.
Crush the worm!
Tear him in pieces!—
First Des. "Hence! Avant!*—he’s mine.
Prince of the Powers invisible! This man
Is of no common order, as his port
And presence here denote; his sufferings
Have been of an immortal nature, like
Our own; his knowledge, and his powers, and will
As far as is compatible with clay,
Which cloaks the ethereal essence, have been such
As clay hath seldomborne; his aspirations
Have been beyond the dwellers of the earth,
And they have only taught him what we know—
That knowledge is not happiness, and science
But an exchange of ignorance for that
Which is another kind of ignorance.
This is not all—the passions, attributes
Of earth, and heaven, from which no power, nor being,
Nor breath from the worm upwards is exempt;
Have pierced his heart; and in their consequence
Made him a thing, which I, who pity not,
Yet pardon those who pity. He is mine,
And thine, it may be—be it so, or not
No other Spirit in this region hath
A soul like his—or power upon his soul.
Nem. What doth he here then?
First Des. Let him answer that.
Man. Ye know what I have known; and without power
I could not be among ye: but there are—
BYRON'S WORKS.

Powers deeper still beyond—I come in quest
Of such, to answer unto what I seek.

Nem. What would'st thou?

Man. Thou canst not reply to me.

Call up the dead—my question is for them.

Nem. Great Arimanthes, doth thy will avouch
The wishes of this mortal?

Ari. Yea.

Nem. Whom would'st thou

Uncharnel?

Man. One without a tomb—call up

Astarte.

NEMESIS.

Shadow! or Spirit!
Whatever thou art,
Which still doth inherit
The whole or a part
Of the form of thy birth,
Of the mould of thy clay,
Which return'd to the earth,
Reappear to the day!
Bear what thou borest,
The heart and the form,
And the aspect thou wast,
Rediscover from the worm.
Appear!—Appear!—Appear!
Who sent thee there requires thee here!

[The Phantom of Astarte rises and stands in the midst.

Man. Can this be death? there's bloom upon her cheek;

But now I see it is no living hue,
But a strange hectic—like the unnatural red
Which Autumn plants upon the perish'd leaf.
It is the same! Oh, God! that I should dread
To look upon the same—Astarte!—No,
I cannot speak to her—but bid her speak—
Forgive me or condemn me.

NEMESIS.

By the power which hath broken
The grave which enthrall'd thee,
Speak to him who hath spoken,
Or those who have call'd thee!

Man. She is silent,
And in that silence I am more than answer'd.

Nem. My power extends no further. Prince of air!

It rests with thee alone—command her voice.

Ari. Spirit—obey this sceptre!

Nem. Silent still!
She is not of our order, but belongs
To the other powers. Mortal! thy quest is vain,
And we are baffled also.

Man. Hear me, hear me—

Astarte! my beloved! speak to me:
I have so much endured—so much endure—
Look on me! the grave hath not changed thee more
Than I am changed for thee. Thou lovedst me
Too much, as I loved thee; we were not made
To torture thus each other, though it were
The deadliest sin to love as we have loved.
Say that thou loath'st me—not that I do bear
This punishment for both—that thou wilt be
One of the blessed—and that I shall die;
For hitherto all hateful things conspire
To bind me in existence—in a life

Which makes me shrink from immortality—
A future like the past. I cannot rest.
I know not what I ask, nor what I seek:
I feel but what thou art—and what I am;
And I would hear yet once more before I perish
The voice which was my music—Speak to me!
For I have call'd on thee in the still night,
Startled the slumbering birds from the hush'd boughs,
And woke the mountain wolves, and made the caves
Acquainted with thy vainly echoed name,
Which answer'd me—many things answer'd me—
Spirits and men—but thou wert silent all.
Yet speak to me! I have outwatch'd the stars,
And gazed o'er heaven in vain in search of thee.
Speak to me! I have wander'd o'er the earth,
And never found thy likeness—Speak to me!
Look on the fiends around—they feel for me:
I fear them not, and feel for thee alone—
Speak to me! though it be in wrath;—but say—
I reek not what—but let me hear thee once—

This once—once more!—

Phantom of Astarte. Manfred!

Man. Say, say on—
I live but in the sound—it is thy voice!

Phan. Manfred! To-morrow ends thine earthly ills.

Farewell!

Man. Yet one word more—am I forgiven?

Phan. Farewell!—

Man. Say, shall we meet again?

Phan. Farewell!

Man. One word for mercy! Say, thou lovest me.

Phan. Manfred!

[The Spirit of Astarte disappears.

Nem. She's gone, and will not be recall'd;
Her words will be fulfill'd. Return to the earth.

A Spirit. He is convulsed—This is to be a mortal,
And seek the things beyond mortality.

Another Spirit. Yet, see, he mastereth himself, and makes

His torture tributary to his will.
Had he been one of us, he would have made
An awful spirit

Nem. Hast thou further question
Of our great sovereign, or his worshippers?

Man. None.

Nem. Then for a time farewell.

Man. We meet then! Where? On the earth—
Even as thou wilt: and for the grace accorded
I now depart a debtor. Fare ye well!

[Exit MANFRED

(Scene closes.)

ACT III.

SCENE I.

A Hall in the Castle of Manfred.

MANFRED and HERMAN.

Man. What is the hour?

Her. It wants but one till sunset
And promises a lovely twilight.
I may have been, or am, both rest between Heaven and myself,—I shall not choose a mortal
To be my mediator. Have I sinned
Against your ordinances? prove and punish!
Abbot. My son! I did not speak of punish
But penitence and pardon,—with thyself
The choice of such remains—and for the last,
Our institutions and our strong belief
Have given me power to smooth the path from sin
To higher hope and better thoughts; the first
I leave to heaven:—"Vengeance is mine alone,"
So saith the Lord, and with all humbleness
His servant echoes back the awful word.

Man. Old man! there is no power in holy men,
Nor charm in prayer—nor purifying form
Of penitence—nor outward look—nor fast
Nor agony—nor, greater than all these,
The innate tortures of that deep despair,
Which is remorse without the fear of hell
But all in all sufficient to itself
Would make a hell of heaven—can exercise
From out the unbounded spirit, the quick sense
Of its own sins, wrongs, sufferance, and revenge
Upon itself; there is no future pang
Can deal that justice on the self condemn'd
He deals on his own soul.

Abbot. All this is well,
For this will pass away, and be succeeded
By an auspicious hope, which shall look up
With calm assurance to that blessed place
Which all who seek may win, whatever be
Their earthly errors, so they be atoned:
And the commencement of atonement is
The sense of its necessity.—Say on—
And all our church can teach thee shall be taught;
And all we can absolve thee shall be pardon'd.

Man. When Rome's sixth emperor was near his last,
The victim of a self-inflicted wound,
To shun the tortures of a public death
From senates once his slaves, a certain soldier,
With show of royal pity, would have stanch'd
The gushing throat with his officious robe;
The dying Roman thrust him back and said
Some empire still in his expiring glance,
"It is too late—is this fidelity?"

Abbot. And what of this?
Man. "It is too late!"

Abbot. It never can be so,
To reconcile thyself with thy own soul,
And thy own soul with heaven. Hast thou no hope:
'Tis strange—even those who do despair above,
Yet shape themselves some phantasy on earth,
To which frail twig they cling like drowning men
Man. Ay—father! I have had those earthly visions
And noble aspirations in my youth,
To make my own the mind of other men,
The enlightener of nations; and to rise
I knew not whither—it might be to fall;
But fall, even as the mountain-cataract,
Which having leapt from its more dazzling height.
Even in the foaming strength of its abyss,
(Which casts up misty columns that become Clouds raining from the reassembled skies,) Lies low but mighty still. But this is past,
My thoughts mistook themselves.

Abbot. And wherefore so?

Man. I could not tame my nature down; for he Must serve who fain would sway—and sooth—and sue—
And watch all time—and pry into all place—
And be a living lie—who would become
A mighty thing among the mean, and such
The mass are; I disdain'd to mingle with
A herd, though to be leader—and of wolves.
The lion is alone, and so am I.

Abbott. And why not live and act with other men?

Man. Because my nature was averse from life;
And yet not cruel; for I would not make,
But find a desolation—like the wind,
The red-hot breath of the most lone Simoom,
Which dwells but in the desert, and sweeps o'er
The barren sands which bear no shrubs to blast,
And reveals o'er their wild and arid waves,
And seeketh not, so that it is not sought,
But being met is deadly; such hath been
The course of my existence; but there came
Things in my path which are no more.

Abbott. Alas! I 'gin to fear that thou art past all aid
From me and from my calling; yet so young,
I still would—

Man. Look on me! there is an order
Of mortals on the earth, who do become
Old in their youth, and die ere middle age,
Without the violence of warlike death;
Some perishing of pleasure—some of study—
Some worn with toil—some of mere weariness—
Some of disease—and some of insanity—
And some of wither'd, or of broken hearts.
For this last is a malady which slays
More than are number'd in the lists of Fate,
Taking all shapes, and bearing many names.
Look upon me! for even of all these things
Have I partaken; and of all these things
One were enough; then wonder not that I Am what I am, but that I ever was,
Or having been, that I am still on earth.

Abbott. Yet, hear me still—

Man. Old man! I do respect
Thine order, and revere thy years; I deem Thy purpose pious, but it is in vain:
Think me not curtail; I would spare thyself,
Far more than me, in shunning at this time
All further colloquy—and so—farewell.

Exit MANFRED.

Abbott. This should have been a noble creature: he Hath all the energy which would have made
A goodly frame of glorious elements,
Had they been wisely mingled; as it is,
It is an awful chaos—light and darkness—
And mind and dust—and passions and pure thoughts.
Mix'd, and contending without end or order,
All dormant or destructive: he will perish,
And yet he must not; I will try once more,
For such are worth redemption; and my duty
Is to dare all things for a righteous end,
I'll follow him—but cautiously, though surely.

Exit Abbott.

SCENE II.

Another Chamber.

MANFRED and HERMAN.

Her. My lord, you bade me wait on you at sunset:
the sinks behind the mountain.

Man. Doth it so?

I will look on him

[MANFRED advances to the Window of the Hall.

Glorious Orb! the ido.

Of early nature, and the vigorous race
Of undisposed mankind, the giant sons
Of the embrace of angels, with a sex
More beautiful than they, which did draw down
The erring spirits who can ne'er return,—

Most glorious orb! that wea'g a worship, ere
The mystery of thy making was reveal'd!

Thou earliest minister of the Almighty,
Which gladden'd, on their mountain tops, the hearts
Of the Chaldean shepherds, till they pour'd
Themselves in orisons! Thou material God!
And representative of the Unknown—

Who chose thee for his shadow! Thou chief star.
Centre of many stars! which mak'at our earth
Endurable, and temperest the hues
And hearts of all who walk within thy rays!

Sire of the seasons! Monarch of the climes,
And those who dwell in them! for near or far,
Our inborn spirits have a tint of thee,
Even as our outward aspects;—thou dost rise,
And shine, and set in glory. Fare thee well!
I ne'er shall see thee more. As my first glance
Of love and wonder was for thee, now take
My latest look: thou wilt not beam on one
To whom the gifts of life and warmth have been
Of a more fatal nature. He is gone:

I follow.

[Exit MANFRED.

SCENE III.

The Mountains.—The Castle of Manfred at some distance.—A Terrace before a Tower.—Time, Twilight.

HERMAN, MANUEL, and other Dependants of MANFRED.

Her. 'Tis strange enough; night after night, for years,
He hath pursued long vigils in this tower,
Without a witness. I have been within it,—
So have we all been oftentimes, but from it,
Or its contents, it were impossible
To draw conclusions absolute, of aught
His studies tend to. To be sure, there is One chamber where none enter: I would give
The fee of what I have to come these three years
To ponder upon its mysteries.

Manuel. 'Twere dangerous;
Content thyself with what thou know'st already.
Her. Ah! Manuel! thou art elderly and wise,
And couldst say much; thou hast dwelt within the castle—
How many years is't?

Manuel. Ere Count Manfred's birth, I served his father, whom he ought resembles.
Her. There be more sons in like predicament.
But wherein do they differ?

Manuel. Of features or of form, but mind and habits;
Count Sigismund was proud,—but gay and free,—
A warrior and a reveller; he dwelt not
With books and solitude, nor made the night
A gloomy vigil, but a festal time,
Merrier than day; he did not walk the rocks
The trees which grew along the broken arches
Waved dark in the blue midnight, and the star
Shone through the rents of ruin; from afar
The watch-dog bay'd beyond the Tiber; and More near from o'er the Cæsars' palaces came
The owl's long cry, and, interruptedly,
Of distant sentinels the fitful song
Begun and died upon the gentle wind.
Some cypress trees beyond the time-worn breach
Appear'd to skirt the horizon, yet they stood
Within a bowshot—Where the Cæsars dwelt,
And dwell the timeless birds of night, amidst
A grove which springs through level'd battlements
And twines its roots with the imperial hearths.
Ivy usurps the laurel's place of growth;—
But the gladiators' bloody Circus stands,
A noble wreck in ruinous perfection!
While Cæsars' chambers, and the Augustan halls,
Grovel on earth in indistinct decay.—
And thou didst shine, thou rolling moon, upon
All this, and cast a wide and tender light,
Which soften'd down the hoar austerity
Of rugg'd desolation, and fill'd up,
As 'twere anew, the gaps of centuries,
Leaving that beautiful which still was so,
And making that which was not, till the place
Became religion, and the heart ran o'er
With silent worship of the great of old!—
The dead, but sceptered sovereigns, who still rule
Our spirits from their urns.—
'Twas such a night:
'Tis strange that I recall it at this time:
But I have found our thoughts take wildest flight
Even at the moment when they should array
Themselves in pensive order.

Enter the Abbot.

Abb. Where is your master?

Her. Yonder in the tower.

Abb. I must speak with him.

Kansel. 'Tis impossible; He is most private, and must not be thus Intruded on.

Abb. Upon myself I take
The forfeit of my fault, if fault there be—
But I must see him.

Her. Thou hast seen him once
This ne already.

Abb. Herman! I command thee,
Knock, and apprise & c Count of my approach.

Her. We dare not
Abb. Then it seems I must be herald
Of my own purpose.

Man. Reverend father, stop—
I pray you pause.

Abb. Why so?

Man. But step this way,
And I will tell you further. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.

Interior of the Tower.

MANFRED alone.

Man. The stars are forth, the moon above the tops
Of the snow-shining mountains.—Beautiful! I linger yet with Nature, for the night
Hath been to me a more familiar face
Than that of man; and in her starry shade
Of dim and solitary loveliness, I learn'd the language of another world.
I do remember me, that in my youth,
When I was wandering—upon such a night
I stood within the Coliseum's wall,
Midst the chief relics of almighty Rome;
BYRON'S WORKS.

His sight may shock thine old limbs into palsy.
I say to thee—Retire!
Abbott. And I reply—
Never—till I have battled with this fiend—
What doth he here?—
Man. Why—ay—what doth he here?—
I did not send for him,—he is unbidden.
Abbott. Ah! lost mortal! what with guests like these Hast thou to do? I tremble for thy sake;
Why doth he gaze on thee, and thou on him?
Ah! he unveils his aspect; on his brow
The thunder-scars are graven; from his eye
Glares forth the immortality of hell—
Avaunt!—
Man. Pronounce—what is thy mission?
Spirit. Come!—
Abbott. What art thou, unknown being? I answer——speak!—
Spirit. The genius of this mortal.—Come! 'tis time.
Man. I am prepared for all things, but deny
The power which summons me. Who sent thee here?
Spirit. Thou 'lt know anon—Come! come!—
Man. I have commanded things of an essence greater far than thine,
And striven with thy masters. Get thee hence!
Spirit. Mortal! thine hour is come—Away!—I say.
Man. I knew, and know my hour is come, but not to render up my soul to such as thee:
Away! I'll die as I have lived—alone.
Spirit. Then I must summon up my brethren.—
Rise!—[Other spirits rise up.]
Abbott. Avaunt! ye evil ones!—Avaunt! I say,—
Ye have no power where pious hath power,
And I do charge ye in the name—
Spirit. Old man!
We know ourselves, our mission, and thine order;
Waste not thy holy words on idle uses,
it were in vain; this man is forfeited.
Once more I summon him—Away! away!
Man. I do defy ye,—though I feel my soul
Is ebbing from me, yet I do defy ye;
Nor will I hence, while I have earthly breath
To breathe my scorn upon ye—earthly strength to wrestle, though with spirits: what ye take
Shall be ta'en limb by limb.
Spirit. Reluctant mortal!
Is this the Magian who would so perversely
The world invisible, and make himself
Almost our equal?—Can it be that thou
Art it as in love with life? the very life
Which made thee wretched!

*Man. Thou false fiend, thou fiend!
My life is in its last hour,—that I know,
Nor would redeem a moment of that hour;
I do not combat against death, but thee
And thy surrounding angels: my past power
Was purchased by no compact with thy crew,
But by superior science—penance—daring—
And length of watching—strength of mind—and skill!
In knowledge of our fathers—when the earth
Saw men and spirits walking side by side,
And gave ye no supremacy: I stand
Upon my strength—I do defy—deny—
Spurn back, and scorn ye!—
Spirit. But thy many crimes
Have made thee—
Man. What are they to such as thee?
Must crimes be punish'd but by other crimes,
And greater criminals?—Back to thy hell!
Thou hast no power upon me, that I feel;
Thou never shalt possess me, that I know:
What I have done is done; I bear within
A torture which could nothing gain from thine:
The mind which is immortal makes itself
Requital for its good or evil thoughts—
Is its own origin of ill and end—
And its own place and time—its innate sense,
When stripp'd of this mortality, derives
No color from the fleeting things without;
But is absorb'd in sufferance or in joy,
Born from the knowledge of his own desert,
Thou didst not tempt me, and thou couldst not tempt me;
I have not been thy dupe, nor am thy prey—
But was my own destroyer, and will be
My own hereafter.—Back, ye baffled fiends!
The hand of death is on me—but not yours!

[The Demons disappear.]
Abbott. Alas! how pale thou art—thy lips are white—
And thy breast heaves—and thy gasping throat
The accents rattle: Give thy prayers to heaven—
Pray—albeit but in thought,—but die not thus.
Man. 'Tis over—my dull eyes can fix thee not,
But all things swim around me, and the earth
Heaves as it were beneath me. Fare thee well—
Give me thy hand.
Abbott. Cold—cold—even to the heart—
But yet one prayer—alas! how fares it with thee?
Man. Old man! 'tis not so difficult to die.

[Manfred expires.]
Abbott. Ho's gone—his soul hath ta'en its last flight—
Whither? I dread to think—but he is gone.
NOTES TO MANFRED.

The torrent with the many hues of heaven.
Page 224, lines 102 and 103.
This iris is formed by the rays of the sun over the very part of the Alpine torrents; it is exactly like a rainbow, come down to pay a visit, and so close that you may walk into it—this effect lasts till noon.

Eros and Anteros, at Gadara.

The philosopher Iambicus. The story of the raising of Eros and Anteros may be found in his life by Eunapius. It is well told.

The story of Pausanias, king of Sparta, (who commanded the Greeks at the battle of Platea, and afterwards perished for an attempt to betray the Lacedemonians,) and Cleonice is told in Plutarch's
Life of Cinam; and in the Lacedaemonians
the Sophist, in his description of Greece.

THE DEFORMED TRANSFORMED;
A DRAMA.

ADVERTISEMENT.

This production is founded partly on the story of a novel called "The Three Brothers," published many years ago, from which M. G. Lewis's "Wood Demon" was also taken, and partly on the "Faust" of the great Goethe. The present publication contains the two first Parts only, and the opening chorus of the third. The rest may, perhaps, appear hereafter

DRAMATIS PERSONAE.

Men.—STRANGER, afterwards Cæsar.
ARNOLD.
BOURBON.
PHILIBERT.
CELLINI.

Women.—BERTHA.
OLIMPIA.

Spirits, Soldiers, Citizens of Rome, Priests,
Peasants, &c.

PART I.

SCENE I.

A Forest.

Enter ARNOLD and his mother BERTHA.

Bert. Out, hunchback!

Arn. I was born so, mother

Bert. Out

Thou incubus! Thou nightmare! Of seven sons
The sole abortion!

Arn. Would that I had been so,
And never seen the light!

Bert. I would so too!

But as thou hast—hence, hence—and do thy best!
That back of thine may bear its burden; 'tis
More high, if not so broad as that of others.
Arn. It bears its burden;—but, my heart! Will it
Sustain that which you lay upon it, mother?
I love, or, at the least, I loved you: nothing
Save you, in nature, can love aught like me,
You nursed me—do not kill me!

Bert. You—I nursed thee.
BYRON’S WORKS.

Because thou wast my first-born, and I knew not
If there would be another unlike thee,
That monstrous sport of nature. But get hence, And gather wood!

Arn. I will; but when I bring it,
Speak to me kindly. Though my brothers are
So beautiful and lusty, and as free
As the free chase they follow, do not spurn me:
Our milk has been the same.

Bert. As is the hedgehog’s
Which sucks at midnight from the wholesome dam
Of the young bull, until the milkmaid find
The nipple next day sore andudder dry.
Call not thy brethren! Call me not Mother; for if I brought thee forth, it was
As foolish hens at times hatch vipers, by Sitting upon strange eggs. Out, urchin, out.

[Exit BERtha.]

Arn. (solus.) Oh mother!—She’s gone, and I must do
Her bidding;—wearily but willingly
I would fulfil it, could I only hope
A kind word in return. What shall I do?
[ARNOLD begins to cut wood: in doing this he swoons one of his hands.

My labor for the day is over now.
Accursed be this blood that flows so fast;
For double curses will be my need now
At home.—What home? I have no home, no kin,
No kind—not made like other creatures, or
To share their sports or pleasures. Must I bleed too
Like them? Oh that each drop which falls to earth
Would rise a snake to sting them, as they have stung me!
Or that the devil, to whom they liken me,
Would aid his likeness! If I must partake
His form, why not his power? Is it because I have not his will too? For one kind word
From her who bore me would still reconcile me
Even to this hateful aspect. Let me wash
The wound.

[ARNOLD goes to a spring, and stoops to wash
his hand: he starts back.

They are right; and Nature’s mirror shows me
What she hath made me. I will not look on it
Again, and scarce dare think on’t. Hideous wretch
That I am! The very waters mock me with My horrid shadow—like a demon placed
Deep in the fountain to scare back the cattle
From drinking therein.

[He pauses.

And shall I live on,
A burden to the earth, myself, and shame
Un: what brought me into life? Thou blood,
Which flowest so freely from a scratch, let me
Try if thou wilt not in a fuller stream
Four forth my woes for ever with thyself
On earth, to which I will restore at once
This hateful compound of her atoms, and Resolve back to her elements, and take
The shape of any reptile save myself,
And make a world for myriads of new worms!
This knife! now let me prove if this will sever
This wither’d slip of nature’s nightsnade—my Vile form—from the creation, as it hath
The green bough from the forest.

[ARNOLD places the knife in the ground, with the point upwards.

Now ‘tis set,
And I can fall upon it. Yet one glance

On the fair day, which sees no foul thing like Myself, and the sweet sun, which warn’d me, but
In vain. The birds—how joyously they sing!
So let them, for I would not be lamented:
But let their merriest notes be Arnold’s knell;
The fallen leaves my monument; the murmur
Of the near fountain my sole elegy:
Now, knife, stand firmly, as I sin would fall!

[As he rushes to throw himself upon the knife, his eye is suddenly caught by the fountain which seems in motion.

The fountain moves without a wind: but shall
The ripple of a spring change my resolve?
No. Yet it moves again! The waters stir,
Not as with air, but by some subterrane
And rocking power of the internal world.
What’s here? A mist! No more?

[A cloud comes from the fountain. He stands gazing upon it: it is dispelled, and a tall black man comes towards him.

Arn. What would you? Speak
Spirit or man?

Stran. As man is both, why not Say both in one?

Your form is man’s, and yet
You may be devil.

Stran. So many men are that
Which is so called or thought, that you may add me
To which you please, without much wrong to either.
But come: you wish to kill yourself;—pursue
Your purpose.

Arn. You have interrupted me.

Stran. What is that resolution which can e’er
Be interrupted? If I be the devil
You deem, a single moment would have made you
Mine, and for ever, by your suicide;
And yet my coming saves you.

Arn. I said not
You were the demon, but that your approach
Was like one.

Stran. Unless you keep company
With him (and you seem scarce used to such high Society) you can’t tell how he approaches:
And for his aspect, look upon the fountain,
And then on me, and judge which of us twain
Look likest what the boors believe to be
Their cloven-footed terror.

Arn. Do you—dare you
To taunt me with my born deformity?

Stran. Were I to taunt a buffalo with this Cloven foot of thine, or the swift dromedary
With thy sublime of humps, the animals
Would revel in the compliment. And yet
Both beings are more swift, more strong, more mighty
In action and endurance than thyself,
And all the fierce and fair of the same kind
With thee. Thy form is natural; ’twas only
Nature’s mistaken largess to bestow
The gifts which are of others upon man.

Arn. Give me the strength then of the buffalo’s foot,
When he spurns high the dust, beholding his
Near enemy; or let me have the long
And patient swiftness of the desert-ship,
The helmsless dromedary;—and I’ll bear
Thy bendish sarcasm with a saintly patience.

Stran. I will.

Arn. (with surprise.) Thou canst?
Stran. Perhaps. Would you aught else?
Arn. Thou mockest me.
Stran. Not I. Why should I mock
What all are mocking? That's poor sport, methinks,
To talk to thee in human language (for Thou canst not yet speak mine) the forester
Hunts not the wretched coney, but the boar,
Or wolf, or lion, leaving paistry game
To pettyburghers, who leave once a year
Their walls, to fill their household caldrons with Such scullion prey. The meanest gibe at thee,—
Now I can mock the mightiest.
Arn. Then waste not
Thy time on me: I seek thee not.
Stran. Your thoughts
Are not far from me. Do not send me back:
I am not easily recall'd to do
Good service.
Arn. What wilt thou do for me?
Stran. Change
Shapes with you, if you will, since yours so irks you,
Or form you to your wish in any shape.
Arn. Oh! then you are indeed the demon, for Nought else would cunningly wear mine.
Stran. I'll show thee
The brightest which the world e'er bore, and give thee
Thy choice.
Arn. On what condition?
Stran. There's a question!
An hour ago you would have given your soul
To look like other men, and now you pause
To wear the form of heroes.
Arn. No; I will not.
I must not compromise my soul.
Stran. What soul,
Worth naming so, would dwell in such a carcass?
Arn. 'Tis an aspiring one, what'er the tenement
In which it is misled. But name your compact:
Must it be sign'd in blood?
Stran. Not in your own.
Arn. Whose blood then?
Stran. We will talk of that hereafter.
But I'll be moderate with you, for I see
Great things within you. You shall have no bond
But your own will, no contract save your deeds.
Are you content?
Arn. I take thee at thy word.
Stran. Now then!—
[The Stranger approaches the fountain, and turns to ArnolD.
A little of your blood.
Arn. For what?
Stran. To mingle with the magic of the waters,
And make the charm effective.
Arn. (holding out his wounded arm.) Take it all.
Stran. Not now. A few drops will suffice for this.
[The Stranger takes some of Arnold's blood in his hand, and casts it into the fountain.
Stran. Shadows of beauty!
Shadows of power
Rise to your duty—
This 's the hour!
Walk lovely and pliant
From the depth of this fountain,
As the cloud-shapen giant
Bestrides the Hartz mountain.

Come as ye were,
That our eyes may behold
The model in air
Of the form I will mould,
Bright as the Iris
When ether is spann'd;—
Such his desire is,
[Pointing to Arnold
Such my command!
Demons heroic—
Demons who wore
The form of the stoic
Or sophist of yore—
Or the shape of each victor,
From Macedon's bay
To each high Roman's picture,
Who breath'd to destroy.
Shadows of beauty!
Shadows of power!
Up to your duty—
This is the hour!
[Various Phantoms arise from the wat'r, and pass in succession before the Stranger and Arnold.
Arn. What do I see?
Stran. The black-eyed Roman, with
The eagle's beak between those eyes which ne'er
Beheld a conqueror, or look'd along
The land he made not Rome's, while Rome became
His, and all theirs who heir'd his very name.
Arn. The phantasm's bald; my quest is beauty
Could I
Inherit but his fame with his defects!
Stran. His brow was girt with laurels more than hairs.
You see his aspect—choose it, or reject.
I can but promise you his form; his fame
Must be long sought and fought for.
Arn. I will fight too,
But not as a mock Caesar. Let him pass;
His aspect may be fair, but suits me not.
Stran. Then you are far more difficult to please
Than Cato's sister, or than Brutus' mother,
Or Cleopatra at sixteen—an age
When love is not less in the eye than heart.
But be it so! Shadow, pass on!
[The phantom of Julius Caesar disappears.
Arn. And can it
Be, that the man who shook the earth 's gone,
And left no footstep?
Stran. There you err. His substance
Left graves enough, and woes enough, and fame
More than enough to track his memory;
But for his shadow, 'tis no more than yours
Except a little longer and less crooked
I the sun. Behold another!
[A second phantom passes.
Arn. Who is he?
Stran. He was the fairest and the bravest of Athenians. Look upon him well.
Arn. He is
More lovely than the last. How beautiful!
Stran. Such was the curled son of Clinias wouldst thou
Invest thee with his form?
Arn. Would that I had Been born with it! But since I may choose further,
I will look further.
[The shade of Alcibiades disappears.
Stran. Lo! behold again!
Arn. What! that low, swarthy, short-nosed, round-eyed satyr,
With the wide nostrils and Silenus' aspect,
The splay feet and low stature! I had better
Remain that which I am.

Stran. And yet he was
The earth's perfection of all mental beauty,
And personization of all virtue.
But you reject him?

Arn. If his form could bring me
That which redeem'd it—no.

Stran. I have no power
To promise that; but you may try and find it
Easier in such a form, or in your own.

Arn. No. I was not born for philosophy,
Though I have that about me which has need on't.
Let him fleet on.

Stran. Be air, thou hemlock-drinker!
[The shadow of Socrates disappears: another rises.

Arn. What's here? whose broad brow and whose curly beard
And manly aspect look like Hercules,
Save that his jugund eye hath more of Bacchus
Than the sad purger of the infernal world,
Leaning dejected on his club of conquest,
As if he knew the worthlessness of those
For whom he had fought.

Stran. It was the man who lost
The ancient world for love.

Arn. I cannot blame him,
Since I have risk'd my soul because I find not
That which he exchang'd the earth for.

Stran. Since so far
You seem congenial, will you wear his features?

Arn. No. As you leave me choice, I am difficult,
If but to see the heroes I should ne'er
Have seen else on this side of the dim shore
Whence they float back before us.

Stran. Hence, triumvir!
Thy Cleopatra's waiting.
[The shade of Antony disappears: another rises.

Arn. Who is this?
Who truly looketh like a demigod,
Blooming and bright, with golden hair, and stature,
If not more high than mortal, yet immortal
In all that nameless bearing of his limbs,
Which he wears as the sun his rays—a something
Which shines from him, and yet is but the flashing
Emanation of a thing more glorious still.

Was he e'er human only?

Stran. Let the earth speak,
If there be atoms of him left, or even
Of the more solid gold that form'd his urn.

Arn. Who was this glory of mankind?

Stran. The shame
Of Greece in peace, her thunderbolt in war—
Demetrius the Macedonian, and Taker of cities.

Arn. Yet one shadow more.
[addressing the shadow.] Get thee to Lavinia's lap.
[The shade of Demetrius Polioecetes vanishes: another rises.

I'll fit you still,
Fear not, my hunchback. If the shadows of
That which existed please not your nice taste,
I'll animate the ideal marble, till
Your soul be reconciled to her new garment.

Arn. Content! I will fix here.
[The shade of Polioecetes vanishes.

Stran. I will commend
Your choice. The godlike son of the sex-goddess
The unshorn boy of Peleus, with his locks
As beautiful and clear as the amber waves
Of rich Pactolus, roll'd o'er sands of gold,
Soften'd by intervening crystal, and
Rippled like flowing waters by the wind,
All vow'd to Sperrchis as they were—behold them
And him—as he stood by Polixana,
With sanction'd and with softer'd love, before
The altar, gazing on his Trojan bride,
With some remorse within for Hector slain
And Priam weeping, mingled with deep passion
For the sweet downcast virgin, whose young hand
Trembled in his who slew her brother. So
He stood! the temple! Look upon him as Greece look'd her last upon her best, the instant
Ere Paris' arrow flew.

Arn. I gaze upon him
As if I were his soul, whose form shall soon
Envelop mine.
[The shade of Demetrius Polioecetes vanishes.

Stran. You have done well. The greatest Deformony should only barter with
The extreme beauty, if the proverb's true
Of mortals, that extremes meet.

Arn. Come! Be quick
I am impatient.

Stran. As a youthful beauty
Before her glass. You both see what is not,
But dream it is what must be.

Arn. Must I wait?

Stran. No; that were a pity. But a word or two
His stature is twelve cubits: would you so far Outstep these times, and be a Titan? Or
[The shade of Demetrius Polioecetes vanishes.

(To talk canonically) wax a son
Of Anak?

Arn. Why not?

Stran. Glorious ambition!
I love thee most in darts! A mortal of Philistine stature would have gladly parchd
His own Goliath down to a slight David;
But thou, my manikin, wouldst wear a show
Rather than hero. Thou shalt be indulged,
If such be thy desire; and yet, by being
A little less removed from present men
In figure, thou canst sway them more; for all
Would rise against thee now, as if to hunt
A new-found mammoth; and their cursed engines,
Their culverins, and so forth, would find way
Through our friend's armor there, with greater ease
Than the adulterer's arrow through his heel,
Which Thetis had forgotten to baptize
In Styx.

Arn. Then let it be as thou deem'st best.
Stran. Thou shalt be beauteous as the thing thou seest,
And strong as what it was, and—

Arn. I ask not
For valor, since deformity is daring
It is its essence to o'ertake mankind
By heart and soul, and make itself the equal—
Ay, the superior of the rest. There is A spar in its halt movements, to become
All that the others cannot, in such things
As still are free to both, to compensate
For stepdame Nature's avarice at first.
They woo with fearless deeds the smiles of fortune.
And oft, like Timour, the lame Tartar, win them.
Stran. Well spoken! And thou doubtless wilt remain
Fare'd as thou art. I may dismiss the mould
Of shadow, which must turn to flesh, to incase
This daring soul, which could achieve no less
Without it?

Arm. Had no power presented me
The possibility of change, I would Have done the best which spirit may to make
Its way, with all deformity's dull, deadly,
Discouraging weight upon me, like a mountain,
In feeling, on my heart as on my shoulders—
An hateful and unsightly molehill to
The eyes of happier man. I would have look'd
On beauty in that sex which is the type
Of all we know or dream of beautiful
Beyond the wold they brighten, with a sigh—
Not of love, but of despair; nor sought to win,
Though to a heart all love, what could not love me
In turn, because of this vile crooked clog,
Which makes me lonely. Nay, I could have borne
It all, had not my mother spurn'd me from her.
The she-bear licks her Cubs into a sort
Of shape—my dam beheld my shape was hopeless.
Had she exposed me, like the Spartan, ere
I knew the passionate part of life, I had Been a clod of the valley,—happier nothing
Than what I am. But even thus, the lowest,
Ugliest, and meanest of mankind, what courage
And perseverance could have done, perchance
Had made me something—as it has made heroes
Of the same mould as mine. You lately saw me
Master of my own life, and quick to quit it;
And he who is so is the master of Whatever dreads to die.

Stran. Decide between
What you have been, or will be.

Arm. I have done so.
You have open'd brighter prospects to my eyes,
And sweeter to my heart. As I am now,
I might be fear'd, admired, respected, loved
Of all save those next to me, of whom I
Would be beloved. As thou showest me
A choice of forms, I take the one I view.

Haste! Haste!

Stran. And what shall I wear?

Arm. Surely he
Who can command all forms will choose the highest,
Something initerior even to that which was Pelides now before us. Perhaps his
Who slew him, that of Paris: or—still higher—
The poet's god, clothed in such limbs as are Themselves a poetry.

Stran. Less will content me;
For I, too, love a change.

Arm. Your aspect is
Dusky, but not uncomely.

Stran. If I chose,
I might be whiter; but I have a penchant
For black—it is so honest, and besides
Can neither blush with shame nor pale with fear;
But I have worn it long enough of late,
And now I'll take your figure.

Arm. Mine.

Stran. Yes. You
Shall change with Thetis' son, and I with Bertha,
Your mother's offspring. People have their tastes;
You have yours—I mine.

Arm. Despatch! despatch!

Stran. Even so

[The Stranger takes some earth and moulds a along the turf, and then addresses the phantom of Achilles.]

Beautiful shadow
Of Thetis's boy!

Who sleeps in the meadow
Whose grass grows 'er Troy
From the red earth, like Adam,*

Thy likeness I shape,
As the being who made him,
Whose actions I ape.

Thou clay, be all glowing,
'Till the rose in his cheek
Be as fair as, when blowing,
It wears its first streak!

Ye violets, I scatter,
Now turn into eyes!

And thou sunshiny water,
Of blood take the guise!

Let these hyacinth boughs
Be his long flowing hair,
And wave o'er his brows,
As thou wastest in air!

Let his heart be this marble
I tear from the rock!

But his voice as the warble
Of birds on yon oak!

Let his flesh be the purest
Of mould, in which grew
The lily-root surest,
And drank the best dew!

Let his limbs be the lightest
Which clay can compound,
And his aspect the brightest
On earth to be found!

Elements, near me,
Be mingled and stirr'd,
Know me, and hear me,
And leap to my word!

Sunbeams, awaken
This earth's animation!
'Tis done! He hath taken
His stand in creation!

[Arnold falls senseless; his soul passes into the shape of Achilles, which rises from the ground; while the phantom has disappeared, part by part, as the figure was formed from the earth.

Arm. (in his new form.) I love, and I shall be beloved! Oh life!

At last I feel thee! Glorious spirit!

Stran. Stop!

What shall become of your abandon'd garment,
Your hump, and lump, and clod of ugliness,
Which late you wore, or were?

Arm. Who cares? Let wolves
And vultures take it, if they will.

Stran. And if
They do, and are not scared by it, you'll say
It must be peace-time, and no better fare
Abroad i' the fields.

Arm. Let us but leave it there;
No matter what becomes on't.

Stran. That's ungracious.

If not ungrateful. Whatso' er it be,
It hath sustain'd your soul full many a day.

* Adam means red earth from which the first man was formed.
Arn. Ay, as the dunghill may conceal a gem
Which is now set in gold, as jewels should be.
Stran. But if I give another form, it must be
By fair exchange, not robbery. For they
Who make men without women's aid have long
Had patents for the same, and do not love
Your interlopers. The devil may take men,
Not make them,—though he reap the benefit
Of the original workmanship:—and therefore
Some one must be found to assume the shape
You have quitted.
Arn. Who would do so?
Stran. That I know not,
And therefore I must.
Arn. You!
Stran. I said it ere
You inhabited your present dome of beauty.
Arn. True. I forgot all things in the new joy
Of this immortal change.
Stran. In a few moments
I will be as you were, and you shall see
Yourself for ever by you, as your shadow.
Arn. I would be spared this.
Stran. But it cannot be.
What! shrink already, being what you are,
From seeing what you were?
Arn. Do as thou wilt.
Stran. (to the late form of Arnold, extended on the earth.)
Clay! not dead, but soulless!
Though no man would choose thee,
An immortal no less
Deigns not to refuse thee.
Clay thou art; and unto spirit
All clay is of equal merit.
Fire! without which nought can live;
Fire! but in which nought can live,
Save the fabled salamander,
Or immortal souls, which wander,
Praying what doth not forgive,
Howling for a drop of water,
Burning in a queenless lot:
Fire! the only element
Where nor fish, beast, bird, nor worm,
Save the worm which dieth not,
Can preserve a moment's form,
But must with thyself be blent;
Fire! man's safeguard and his slaugther:
Fire! Creation's first-born daughter,
And Destruction's threaten'd son
When heaven with the world hath done
Fire! assist me to renew
Life in what lies in my view
Stiff and cold!
His resurrection rests with me and you!
One little, marvly spark of flame—
And he again shall seem the same;
But I his spirit's place shall hold!
[An ignis-fatua flies through the wood, and rests on the brow of the body. The Stranger disappears: the body rises.
Arn. (in his new form.) Oh! horrible!
Stran. (in Arnold's late shape.) What! trem blost thou?
Arn. I merely shudder. Where is fled the shape
Thou lately worst?
Stran. To the world of shadows.
But let us thread the present. Whither wilt thou?
as many attributes; but as I wear
A human shape, will take a human name.

Arn. More humau than the shape (though it was mine once)

trust.

Stran. Then call me Caesar.

Arn. Whv, that name belongs to empires, and has been borne

by the world's lords.

Stran. And therefore fittest for the devil in disguise—since so do you deem me, unless you call me pope instead.

Arn. Well, then,

Caesar thou shalt be. For myself, my name shall be plain Arnold still.

Ces. We'll add a title—

"Count Arnold;" it hath no ungracious sound, and will look well upon a billet-doux.

Arn. Or in an order for a battle-field.

Ces. (sings.) To horse! to horse! my coal-black steed

Paws the ground and snuffs the air!

There's not a goal of Arab's breed

More knows whom he must bear;

On the hill he will not tire,

Swifter as it waxes higher;

In the marsh he will not slacken,

On the plain be overtaken;

In the wave he will not sink,

Nor pause at the brook's side to drink;

In the race he will not pant,

In the combat he'll not faint;

On the stones he will not stumble,

Time nor toil shall make him humble;

In the still he will not stiffen,

But be winged as a griffin,

Only flying with his feet;

And will not such a voyage be sweet?

Merrily! merrily! never unsound,

Shall our bonny black horses skim over the ground!

From the Alps to the Caucasus, ride we, or fly!

For we'll leave them behind in the glance of an eye.

[They mount their horses, and disappear.

SCENE II.

A Camp before the Walls of Rome.

ARNOLD and CAESAR.

Ces. You are well enter'd now.

Arn. Ay, but my path has been o'er carcasses: mine eyes are full

Of blood.

Ces. Then wipe them, and see clearly. Why!

Thou art a conqueror; the chosen knight

And free companion of the gallant Bourbon,

Late constable of France: and now to be

Lord of the city which hath been earth's lord

Under its emperors, and—changing sex,

Not sceptre an hermaphrodite of empire—

Lady of the old world.

Arn. How old? What! are there

Two worlds?

Ces. To you you'll find these are such shortly.

By its rich harvests, new disease, and gold;
From one-half of the world named a whole new one

Because you know no better than the dull

And dubious notice of your eyes and ears.

Arn. I'll trust them.

Ces. Do! They will deceive you sweetly

And that is better than the bitter truth.

Arn. Dog!

Ces. Man!

Arn. Devil!

Ces. Your obedient humble servant

Arn. Say master rather. Thou hast lure me on.

Through scenes of blood and lust, till I am here.

Ces. And where wouldst thou be?

Arn. Oh, at peace—in peace.

Ces. And where is that which is so? From the stars

To the winding worm, all life is motion; and

In life commotion is the extreme point

Of life. The planet wheels till it becomes

A comet, and destroying as it sweeps

The stars, goes out. The poor worm winds its way,

Living upon the death of other things,

But still, like them, must live and die, the subject
Of something which has made it live and die.

You must obey what all obey, the rule

Of fix'd necessity: against her edict

Rebellion prospers not.

Arn. And when it prospers—

Ces. 'Tis no rebellion.

Arn. Will it prosper now?

Ces. The Bourbon hath given orders for the assault,

And by the dawn there will be work.

Arn. Alas!

And shall the city yield? I see the giant

Abode of the true God, and his true saint,

Saint Peter, rear its dome and cross into

The sky whence Christ ascended from the cross,

Which his blood made a badge of glory and

Of joy, (as once of torture unto him,

God and God's Son, man's sole and only refuge.)

Ces. 'Tis there, and shall be.

Arn. What?

Ces. The crucifix

Above, and many altar shrines below.

Also some culverins upon the walls,

And harquebusses, and what not; besides

The men who are to kindle them to death

Of other men.

Arn. And those scarce mortal arches,

Pile above pile of everlasting wall,

The theatre where emperors and their subjects

(Those subjects Romans) stood at gaze upon

The battles of the monarchs of the wild

And wood, the lion and his tusk rebel

Of the then untamed desert, brought to joust

In the arena, (as right well they might,

When they had left no human foe unconquer'd;)

Made even the forest pay its tribute of Life to their amphitheatre, as well

As Dacia men to die the eternal death

For a sole instant's pastime, and "Pass on,

To a new gladiator!"—Must it fall?

Ces. The city, or the amphitheatre?

The church, or one, or all? for you confound

Both them and me.

Arn. To-morrow sounds the assault

With the first cock-crow.

Ces. Which, if it end with
The evening’s first nightingale, will be Something new in the annals of great sieges;
For men must have their prey after long toil.
Arn. The sun goes down as calmly, and perhaps
More beautifully than he did on Rome.
On the day Remus leapt her wall.
Cas. I saw him.
Arn. You!
Cas. Yes, sir. You forget I am or was Spirit, till I took up with your cast shape
And a worse name. I’m Cæsar and a hunchback
Now! Well! the first of Caesars was a bald-head,
And loved his laurels better as a wig
(‘So history says’) than as a glory. Thus
The world runs on, but we’ll be merry still.
I saw your Romulus (simple as I am)
Slay his own twin, quick born of the same womb,
Because he leapt a ditch, (twas then no wall,
Whate’er it now be;) and Rome’s earliest cement
Was brother’s blood; and if its native blood
Be spilt till the choked Tiber be as red
As e’er ‘twas yellow, it will never wear
The deep hue of the ocean and the earth,
Which the great robber sons of fratricide
Have made their never-ceasing scene of slaughter
For ages.
Arn. But what have these done, their far
Remote descendants, who have lived in peace,
The peace of heaven, and in her sunshine of Piety?
Cas. And what had they done, whom the old
Romans o’erswept?—Hark!
Arn. They are soldiers singing
A reckless roundelay, upon the eve
Of many deaths, it may be of their own.
Cas. And why should they not sing as well as swans?
They are black ones, to be sure.
Arn. So, you are learn’d,
I see, too?
Arn. In my grammar, certes. I
Was educated for a monk of all times,
And once I was well versed in the forgotten
Etruscan letters, and—were I so minded—
Could make their hieroglyphics plainer than Your alphabet.
Arn. And wherefore do you not?
Cas. It answers better to resolve the alphabet
Back into hieroglyphics. Like your statesman,
And prophet, pontiff, doctor, alchymist,
Philosopher, and what not, they have built
More Babals, without new disperation, than
The stammering young ones of the flood’s dull oze,
Who fail’d and fled each other. Why? why, marry,
Because no man could understand his neighbor.
They are wiser now, and will not separate
For nonsense. Nay, it is their brotherhood,
Their Shibboleth, their Koran, Talmud, their Cabala; their best brick-work, wherewithal
They build more—
Arn. (interrupting him.) Oh, thou everlasting sneerer!
Be silent! How the soldier’s rough strain seems Soft’ned by distance to a hymn-like cadence!—
Listen!
Cas. Yes, I have heard the angel sing.
Arn. And demons howl.
Cas. And man to. Let us listen!
love all music.

Song of the Soldiers within.
The black bands came over
The Alps and their snow;
With Bourbon, the rover,
They passed the broad Po.
We have beaten all foemen,
We have captured a king,
We have turn’d back on no men,
And so let us sing!
Here’s the Bourbon for ever!
Though pennyless all,
We’ll have one more endeavor
At yonder old wall.
With the Bourbon we’ll gather
At day-dawn before
The gates, and together
Or break or climb o’er
The wall; on the ladder
As mounts each firm foot,
Our shouts shall grow gladder,
And death only be mute.
With the Bourbon we’ll mount o’er
The walls of old Rome,
And who then shall count o’er
The spoils of each dome?
Up! up with the lily!
And down with the keys!
In old Rome, the seven-hilly,
We’ll revel at ease.
Her streets shall be gory,
Her Tiber all red,
And her temples so hoary
Shall clang with our tread.
Oh, the Bourbon! the Bourbon!
The Bourbon for aye!
Of our song bear the burden;
And fire, fire away!
With Spain for the vanguard,
Our varied host comes;
And next to the Spaniard
Beat Germany’s drums;
And Italy’s lances
Are couch’d at their mother;
But our leader from France is,
Who warr’d with his brother.
Oh, the Bourbon! the Bourbon!
Sans country or home,
We’ll follow the Bourbon,
To plunder old Rome.

Cas. An indifferent song
For those within the walls, methinks, to hear.
Arn. Yes, if they keep to their chorus. But he comes
The general with his chiefs and men of trust.
A goodly rebel!

Enter the Constable Bourbon, “cum suis,” &c., &c.
Phil. How now, noble prince,
You are not cheerful?
Bourb. Why should I be so?
Phil. Upon the eve of conquest, such as ours,
Most men would be so.
Bourb. If I were secure!
Phil. Doubt not our soldiers. Were the walls o’
amadamant,
They’d crack them. Hunger is a sharp artillery.
Bourb. That they will falter is my least of fears.
THE DEFORMED TRANSFORMED.

That they will be repulsed, with Bourbon for Their chief, and all their kindled appetites To marshal them on—were those hoary walls Mountains, and those who guard them like the gods Of the old world, I would trust my Titans;— But not—

Phil. They are but men who war with mortals. Bourb. True; but those walls have girded in great ages, And sent forth mighty spirits. The past earth And present phantom of imperious Rome Is peopled with those warriors; and methinks They flit along the eternal city's rampart, And stretch their glorious, gory, shadowy hands, And beckon me away! Phil. So let them! Wilt thou Turn back from shadowy menaces of shadows? Bourb. They do not menace me. I have faced Methinks, a sylla's menace; but they clasp And raise, and wring their dim and deathlike hands And with their thin aspen faces and fixed eyes Fascinate mine. Look there!

Phil. I look upon A lofty battlement. Bourb. And there! Phil. Not even A guard in sight; they wisely keep below, Sheltered by the gray parapet from some Stray bullet of our lanquenet's, who might Practice in the cool twilight.

Bourb. You are blind. Phil. If seeing nothing more than may be seen Be so. Bourb. A thousand years have mannd 't he walls With all their heroes,—the last Cato stands And tears his bowels, rather than to survive The liberty of that I would enslave. And the first Caesar with his triumphs flits From battlement to battlement. Phil. Then conquer The walls for which he conquer'd; and be greater! Bourb. True; so I will or perish. Phil. You can not. In such an enterprise to die is rather The dawn of an eternal day, than death. [Count ARNOLD and CAESAR advance.]

Cas. And the mere men—do they too sweetly beneath The noon of this same ever-scorching glory? Bourb. Ah! Welcome the bitter himmack! and his master, The beauty of our host, and brave as beauteous, And generous as lovely. We shall find Work for you both ere morning. Cas. You will find, So please your highness, no less for yourself. Bourb. And if I do, there will not be a laborer More forward, hunchback! Cas. You may well say so, For you have seen that back—as general, Placed in the rear in action—but your foes Have never seen it. Bourb. That's a fair retort, For I provoked it—but the Bourbon's breast Has been, and ever shall be, far advanced In danger's face as yours, were you the devil. Cas. And if I were, I might have saved myself The soil cf coming here.

Phil. Why so?

Cas. One half Of your brave bands of their own bold accord Will go to him, the other half be sent, More swiftly, not less surely. Bourb. Arnold, your slight crook'd friend's as snake-like in his words As his deeds. Cas. Your highness much mistakes me. The first snake was a flatterer—I am none; And for my deeds, I only sing when stung. Bourb. You are brave, and that's enough for me And quick In speech as sharp in action—and that's more. I am not alone a soldier, but the soldiers' Comrade. Cas. They are but bad company, your highness, And worse even for their friends than foes, as being More permanent acquaintance.

Phil. How now, fellow! Thou warest insolent, beyond the privilege Of a buffoon. Cas. You mean I speak the truth. I'll lie—it is as easy: then you'll praise me For calling you a hero. Bourb. Philibert! Let him alone; he's brave, and ever has Been first, with that swart face and mountain shoulder, In field or storm, and patient in starvation: And for his tongue, the camp is full of license, And the sharp stinging of a lively rogue Is, to my mind, far preferable to The gross, dull, heavy, gloomy execration Of a mere famish'd, sullen, grumbling slave, Whom nothing can convince save a full meal, And wine, and sleep, and a few maravedies, With which he deems himself rich.

Cas. It would be well. If the earth's princes ask'd no more. Bourb. Be silent! Cas. Ay, but not idle. Work yourself with words. You have but few to speak. Phil. What means the audacious prater? Cas. To prate, like other prophets. Bourb. Philibert! Why will you vex him? Have we not enough To think on? Arnold! I will lead the attack To-morrow.

Arn. I have heard as much, my lord. Bourb. And you will follow? Arn. Since I must not. Bourb. 'Tis necessary for the further daring Of our too needy army, that their chief Plant the first foot upon the foremost ladder's first step. Cas. Upon its topmost, let us hope: So shall he have his full deserts. Bourb. The world's Great capital perchance is ours to-morrow. Through every change the seven-hill'd city hath Retain'd her sway o'er nations, and the Caesars But yielded to the Alarics, the Alarics Unto the pontiffs. Roman, Goth, or priest, Still the world's masters! Civilized, barbarian, Or saintly, still the walls of Romulus Have been the circus of an empire. Well! 'Twas their turn—now 'tis ours; and let us hope That we will fight as well, and rule much better.
Before the Walls of Rome.—The Assault: the army in motion, with ladders to scale the walls; Bourb., with a white scarf over his armor, foremost.

PART II.

SCENE I.

Chorus of Spirits in the air.

1.
'Tis the morn, but dim and dark.
Whither flies the silent lark?
Whither shrinks the clouded sun?
Is the day indeed begun?
Nature's eye is melancholy
O'er the city high and holy:
But without there is a dim
Should arouse the saints within,
And revive the heroic ashes
Round which yellow Tiber dashes:
Oh ye-seven hills! awaken,
Ere your very base be shaken!

2.
Hearken to the steady stamp
Mars is in their every tramp!
Not a step is out of tune,
As the tides obey the moon!
On they march, though to self-slaughter
Regular as rolling water,
Whose high, waving o'ersweep the border
Of huge mole, but keep their order,
Breaking only rank by rank,
Hearken to the armor's clank!
Look down o'er each frizzly warrior,
How he glares upon the barrier:
Look on each step of each ladder,
As the stripes that streak an adder.

3.
Look upon the bristling wall,
Mann'd without an interval!
Round and round, and tier on tier,
Cannon's black mouth, shining spear,
Lit match, bell-mouth'd musquetoon
Gaping to be murderous soon;
All the warlike gear of old,
Mix'd with what we now behold,
In this strife 'twixt old and new,
Gather like a locust's crew.
Shade of Remus! 'tis a time
Awful as thy brother's crime!
Christians war against Christ's shrine;
Must its lot be like thine?

4.
Near—and near—and nearer still,
As the earthquake saps the hill,
First with trembling, hollow motion,
Like a scarce-waken'd ocean,
Then with stronger shock and louder,
Till the rocks are crushed to powder,—
Onward sweeps the rolling host!
Heroes of the immortal boast!
Mighty chiefs! eternal shadows!
First flowers of the bloody meadows
Which encompass Rome, the mother
Of a people without brother!
Will you sleep when nations' quarrels
Plough the root up of your laurels?
Ye who wept o'er Carthage burning,
WEEP NOT—STRIKE! for Rome is mourning.

* Scipio, the second Africanus, is said to have repaired a verse of Horace and weeps over the burning of Carthage. He had been saved from annihilation.
5. Onward sweeps the varied nations
Famine long hath dealt their ratios.
To the wall with hate and hunger;
Numerous as wolves, and stronger,
On they sweep. Oh! glorious city,
Must thou be a theme for pity?
Fight, like your first sire, each Roman,
Alaric was a gentle foeman,
Match’d with Bourbon’s black banditti!
Rouse thee, thou eternal city;
Rouse thee! Rather give the torch
With thy own hand to thy porch,
Then behold such hosts pollute
Your worst dwelling with their foot.

6. Ah! behold your bleeding spectre!
Ilion’s children find no Hector;
Priam’s offspring loved their brother;
Rome’s great sire forgot his mother,
When he slew his gallant twin,
With inexpiable sin.
See the giant shadow stride
O’er the ramparts high and wide!
When the first o’erleapt thy wall,
Its foundation mourn’d thy fall.
Now, though towering like a Babel,
Who to stop his steps are able?
Stalking o’er thy highest dome,
Remus claims his vengeance, Rome!

7. Now they reach thee in their anger;
Fire and smoke and hellish clangor
Are around thee, thou world’s wonder,
Death is in thy walls and under.
Now the meeting steel first clashes,
Downward then the ladder crashes,
With its iron load all gleaming,
Lying at its foot blaspheming!
Up again! for every warrior
Slain, another climbs the barrier,
Thicker grows the strife: thy ditches
Europe’s mingling gore enriches.
Rome! although thy wall — ay perish,
Such manure thy fields whi cherish,
Making gay the harvest-home;
But thy hearths, alas! oh, Rome!—
Yet be Rome amid thine anguish,
Fight as thou wast wont to vanquish!

8. Yet once more, ye old Penates
Let not your quench’d hearth’s be Atè’s!
Yet again, ye shade—ay heroes,
Yield not to these stranger Neros!
Though the son who slew his mother
Shed Rome’s blood, he was your brother:
‘Twas the Roman e’er’d the Roman,—
Brammian was a baffled foeman.
Yet again, ye saints and martyrs,
Rise! for yours are holier charters!
Mighty gods of temples falling,
Yet in ruin still appalling!
Mightieth founders of those altars,
True and Christian,—strike the assaulters!
Tiber! Tiber! let thy torrent
Show even nature’s self a torrent.

Let each breathing heart dilated
Turn, as doth the lion baited!
Rome be crash’d to one wide tomb,
But be still the Roman’s Home!
[Bourbon, Arnold, Caesar, and others, arise at the foot of the wall. Arnold is about to plant his ladder.

Bourb. Hold, Arnold! I am first.
Arn. Not so, my lord
Bourb. Hold, sir, I charge you! Follow! I am proud
Of such a follower, but will brook no leader.
[Bourbon plants his ladder and begins to mount
Now, boys! On! On!
[A shot strikes him and BOURBON falls.

Caes. And off!

Arn. Eternal powers!
The host will be appall’d,—but vengeance! vengecease!
Bourb. ’Tis nothing—lead me your hand.
[Bourbon takes Arnold by the hand and rises, but as he puts his foot on the step, falls again.
Arnold! I am sped.
Conceal my fall—all will go well—conceal it!
Fling my cloak o’er what will be dust anon,
Let not the soldiers see it.
Arn. You must be Removed; the aid of—

Bourb. No, my gallant boy,
Death is upon me. But what is one life?
The Bourbon’s spirit shall command them still.
Keep them yet ignorant that I am but clay,
Till they are conquerors—then do as you may.

Caes. Would not your highness choose to kiss the cross?
We have no priest here, but the hilt of sword
May serve instead—it did the same for Bayard.
Bourb. Thou bitter slave! to name him at this time?
But I deserve it.
Arn. (to Caesar.) Villain, hold you peace!
Caes. What, when a Christian dies? Shall I not offer
A Christian “Vade in pace”?

Arn. Silence! Oh!
Those eyes are glazing which o’erlook’d the world,
And saw no equal.

Bourb. Arnold, should’st thou see
France—But hark! hark! the assault grows warmer—Oh!
For but an hour, a minute more of life
To die within the wall! Hence, Arnold, hence!
You lose time—they will conquer Rome without thee
Arn. And without thee!

Bourb. Not so; I’ll lead them still
In spirit. Cover up my dust, and breathe not That I have ceased to breathe. Away! and be Victorious!
Arn. But I must not leave thee thus.

Bourb. You must—farewell—Up! up! the world is winning.
[Bourbon dies

Caes. (to Arnold.) Come, Count, to business.
Arn. True. I’ll weep hereafter.

[Arnold covers BOURBON’s body with a mantle.

And mounts the ladder, crying
The Bourbon! Bourbon! Oh, boys! Rome is ours
Caes. Good-night, lord constable! thouwert aman [Caesar follows Arnold; they reach the battle ment; Arnold and Caesar are struck down
BYRON'S WORKS.

Cas. A precious Somerset! Is your countship injured?

Arn. No. [Remounts the ladder.]

Cas. A rare bloodhound, when his own is heated! And 'tis no boy's play. Now he strikes them down!

Arn. [A man falls.]

Cas. The first bird of the covey! he has fallen

On the outside of the nest. Why, how now, fellow?

Wounded Man. A drop of water!

Cas. Blood's the only liquid

Nearer than Tiber.

Wounded Man. I have died for Rome. [Dies.]

Cas. And so did Bourbon, in another sense.

Oh these immortal men! and their great motives!

But I must after my young charge. He is

By this time I! the forum! Charge! charge!

[Cæsar mounts the ladder; the scene closes.

SCENE II.

The city.—Combats between the Besiegers and Besieged in the streets. Inhabitants flying in confusion.

Enter Cæsar.

Cas. I cannot find my hero; he is mix'd

With the heroic crowd that now pursue

The fugitives, or battle with the desperate.

What have we here? A cardinal or two

That do not seem in love with martyrdom.

How the old red-shanks scampers! Could they doff

Their hose as they have doff'd their hats, 'twould be

A blessing, as a mark the less for plunder.

But let them fly; the crimson kennels now

Will not much stain their stockings, since the mine

Is of the self-same purple hue.

Enter a party fighting—Arnold at the head of the Besiegers.

He comes.

Hand in hand with the mild twins—Gore and glory.

Holloa! hold, Count!

Arn. Away! they must not rally.

Cas. I tell thee, be not rash; a golden bridge

Is for a flying enemy. I gave thee

A form of beauty, and an

Exemption from some maladies of body,

But not of mind, which is not mine to give.

But though I gave the form of Thetis' son,

I dipt thee not in Styx; and 'gainst a foe

I would not warrant thy chivalric heart

More than Pelides' heel; why then, be cautious,

And know thyself a mortal still.

Arn. And who

With aught of soul would combat if he were

Inulnerable? That were pretty sport.

Think'st thou I beat for hares when lions roar?

[Arnold rushes into the combat.

Cas. A precious sample of humanity!

Well, his blood's up; and if a little's shed,

Twill serve to curb his fever.

[Arnold engages with a Roman who retires

Towards a portico.

Arn. Yield thee, slave!

Rom. That's soon said.

Arn. My word is known.

Rom. So shall I my leeds.

[They re-engage. Cæsar comes forward.

Cas. Why, Arnold! hold thine own; thou hast

in hand

A famous artisan, a cunning sculptor:

Also a dealer in the sword and dagger.

Not so, my musqueter; 'twas he who slew

The Bourbon from the wall.

Arn. Ay, did he so?

Then he hath carved his monument.

Rom. I yet

May live to carve your better's.

Cas. Well said, my man of marble. Benvenuto

Thou hast some practice in both ways; and he

Who slays Cellini will have work'd as hard

As e'er thou didst upon Carrara's blocks.

[Arnold disarms and wounds Cellini, but slightly; the latter draws a pistol, and fires;

then retires, and disappears through the portico.

Cas. How fastest thou? Thou hast a taste, me-thinks,

Of red Bellona's banquet.

Arn. (staggers.) 'Tis a scratch.

Lend me thy scarf. He shall not 'scape me thus.

Cas. Where is it?

Arn. In the shoulder, not the sword arm—

And that's enough. I am thirsty; would I had

A helm of water!

Cas. That's a liquid now

In requisition, but by no means easiest

To come at.

Arn. And my thirst increases;—but

I'll find a way to quench it.

Cas. Or be quench'd

Thyself?

Arn. The chance is even; we will throw

The dice thereon. But I lose time in prating;

Pritate be quick. [Cæsar binds on the scarf.

Cas. And what dost thou so idly?

Why dost not strike?

Cas. Your old philosophers

Beheld mankind, as mere spectators of

The Olympic games. When I behold a prize

Worth wresting for, I may be found a Milo.

Arn. Ay, against an oak.

Cas. A forest, when it suits me.

I combat with a mass or not at all.

Meantime, pursue thy sport as I do mine;

Which is just now to gaze, since all these laborers

Will reap my harvest gratis.

Arn. Thou art still

A friend!

Cas. And thou—a man.

Arn. Why, such I fain would show me.

Cas. True—as men are

Arn. And what is that?

Cas. Thou feelest and thou seest.

[Exit Arnold, joining in the combat which still continues between detached parties. The scene closes.

SCENE III.

St. Peter's.—The Interior of the Church.—The Pope at the Altar.—Priests, &c., crowding in confusion, and Citizens flying for refuge, pursued by Soldiery.

Enter CASAR.

A Spanish Soldier. Down with them, comrades! seize upon those lamps! Or, bald-pated shaving to the chin! His rosary of gold! Lutheran Soldier. Revenge! revenge! Plunder hereafter, but for vengeance now— Yonder stands Anti-Christ! Cas. (interposing.) How now, schismatic! What wouldst thou? Lutheran Sol. In the holy name of Christ, Destroy proud Anti-Christ. I am a Christian. Cas. Yes, a disciple that would make the founder Of your belief renounce it, could he see Such proselytes. Best stint thyself to plunder. Lutheran Sol. I say he is the devil. Cas. Hush! keep that secret, lest he should recognize you for his own. Lutheran Sol. Why should you save him? I repeat he is the devil, or the devil's vicar upon earth. Cas. And that's the reason; would you make a quarrel With your best friends? You had far better be quiet; His hour is not yet come. Lutheran Sol. That shall be seen! The Lutheran Soldier rushes forward; a shot strikes him from one of the Pope's Guards, and he falls at the foot of the Altar. Cas. (to the Lutheran.) I told you so. Lutheran Sol. And will you not avenge me? Cas. Not I! You know that "Vengeance is the Lord's." You see he loves no interlopers. Lutheran Sol. (dying.) Oh! Had I but slain him, I had gone on high, Crown'd with eternal glory! Heaven, forgive My feebleness of arm that reach'd him not, And take thy servant to thy mercy. "Tis A glorious triumph still; proud Babylon's No more; the Harlot of the Seven Hills Hath changed her scarlet raiment for sackcloth And ashes! [The Lutheran dies. Cas. Yes, thine own amid the rest. Well done, old Babel! [The Guards defend themselves desperately, while the Pontiff escapes, by a private passage, to the Vatican and the Castle of St. Angelo. Cas. Ha! right nobly battled! Now, priest! now, soldier! the two great professions, Together by the ears and hearts! I have not seen A more comic pantomime since Titus Took Jewry. But the Romans had the best then; Now they must take their turn. Soldiers. He hath escaped! Fl-l-l! Another Sol. They have barr'd the narrow passage up. And it is droll'd with dead even to the door. Cas. I am glad he hath escaped; he may thank me for't In part. I would not have his bulls abolish'd— Twere worth one half our empire: his indulgences Demand some in return; no, no, he must not Fall; and besides, his now escape may furnish A future miracle, in future proof Of his infallibility. [To the Spanish Soldier. Well, cut-throats! What do you pause for? If you make not haste, There will not be a link of pious gold left And you too, Catholicks! Would ye return From such a pilgrimage without a relic? The very Lutherans have more true devotion See how they strip the shrines! Soldiers. By holy Peter He speaks the truth; the heretics will bear The best away. Cas. And that were shame! Go to. Assist in their conversion. [The Soldiers disperse; many quit the Church, others enter. Cas. They are gone, and others come; so flows the wave on wave Of what these creatures call eternity, Deeming themselves the breakers of the ocean, While they are but its bubbles, ignorant That foam is their foundation. So another! Enter Olimpia, flying from the pursuit.—She springs upon the Altar. Sol. She's mine. Another Sol. (opposing the former.) You lie, I track'd her first; and, were she The Pope's niece, I'll not yield her. (They fight. 3d Sol. (advancing towards Olimpia.) You may settle Your claims; I'll make mine good. Olimp. Infernal slave! You touch me not alive. 3d Sol. Alive or dead! Olimp. (embracing a massive crucifix.) Respect your God! 3d Sol. Yes, when he shines in gold. Girl, you but grasp your dowry. [As he advances, Olimpia, with a strong and sudden effort, casts down the crucifix; it strikes the Soldier, who falls. 3d Sol. Oh, great God! Olimp. Ah! now you recognize him. 3d Sol. My brain's crush'd Comrades, help, ho! All's darkness! (He dies. Other Soldiers, (coming up.) Slay her, although she had a thousand lives: She hath kill'd our comrade. Olimp. Welcome such a death! You have no life to give, which the worst slave Would take. Great God! through thy redeeming Son. And thy Son's Mother, now receive me as I would approach thee, worthy her, and him, And thee! [Enter Arnold. Arn. What do I see? Accursed jackals! Forbear! Cas. (aside and laughing.) Ha! ha! here's equa- ty! The dogs Have as much right as he. But to the issue! Soldiers. Count, she hath slain our comrade. Arn. With what weapon? Sol. The cross, beneath which he is crush'd; behold him Lie there, more like a worm than man; she cast it upon his head. Arn. Even so; there is a woman Worthy a brave man's liking. Were ye such, Ye would have honor'd her. But get ye hence, And thank your meanness, other God you have none For your existence. Had you touch'd a hair
Of thosedishavell'd locks, I would have thinnd'd
Your ranks more than the enemy. Away!
Ye jackals! gnaw the bones the lion leaves,
But not even these till he permits.

[Arnold. (murmuring.)] The lion
Might conquer for himself then.

Arn. (cuts him down.) Mutineer!
Rebel in hell—you shall obey on earth!

[The Soldiers assault ARNOLD.]
Arn. Come on! I'm glad on't! I will show you,
Slaves,
How you should be commanded, and who led you
First o'er the wall you were so shy to scale,
Until I waved my banners from its height,
As you are bold within it.

[Arnold moves down the foremost; the rest throw down their arms.]
Then learn to grant it. Have I taught you who
Led you o'er Rome's eternal battalions?
Soldiers. We saw it, and we know it; yet forgive
A moment's error in the heat of conquest—
The conquest which you led to.
Arn. Get you hence!
Hence to your quarters! you will find them fix'd
In the Colonna palace.
Olimp. (aside.) In my father's House!
Arn. (to the Soldiers.) Leave your arms; ye have no further need
Of such: the city's render'd. And mark well
You keep your hands clean, or I'll find a stream,
As red as Tiber now runs, for your baptism.
Soldiers. (deposing their arms and departing.) We obey!
Arn. (to Olimpia.) Lady, you are safe.
Olimp. I should be so,
Had a knife even; but it matters not—
Death hath a thousand gates; and on the marble,
Even at the altar foot, whence I look down
Upon destruction, shall my head be dash'd,
Ere thou ascend it. God forgive thee, man! Arn.
I wish to merit his forgiveness, and
Thine own, although I have not injured thee.
Olimp. No! thou hast only sack'd my native land,—
No injury!—and made my father's house
A den of thieves! No injury!—this temple—
Slippery with Roman and with holy gore.
No injury! And now thou would'st preserve me,
To he—but that shall never be!

[She raises her eyes to Heaven, folds her robe round her, and prepares to dash herself down on the side of the Altar opposite to that where Arnold stands.]

Arn. Hold! hold!

I swear.
Olimp. Spare thine already forfeit soul
A perjury for which even hell would hate thee.
I know thee.
Arn. No, thou know'st me not; I am not
Of these men, though—
Olimp. I judge thee by thy mates;
It is for God to judge thee as thou art.
I see thee purple with the blood of Rome;
Take mine, 'tis all thou o'er shalt have of me!
And here, upon the marble of this temple,
Where the baptismal font baptized me God's
I offer him a blood less holy
But not less pure (pure as it left me then,
A redeem'd infant) than the holy water
The saints have sanctified!

[Olimpia waves her hand to Arnold with dis dain, and dashes herself on the pavement from the Altar.]
Arn. Eternal God! I feel thee now! Help! help! She's gone.
Ces. (approaches.) I am here.
Arn. Thou! but oh, save her!
Ces. (assisting him to raise Olimpia.) She hath done it well!
The leap was serious.
Arn. Oh! she is lifeless!
Ces. If She be so, I have nought to do with that:
The resurrection is beyond me.
Arn. Slave!
Ces. Ay, slave or master, 'tis all one: methinks
Good words, however, are as well at times.
Arn. Words!—Canst thou aid her?
Ces. I will try. A sprinkling
Of that same holy water may be useful.

[He brings some in his helmet from the font.]
Arn. 'Tis mix'd with blood,
Ces. There is no cleaner now
In Rome.
Arn. How pale! how beautiful! how lifeless!
Alive or dead, thou essence of all beauty,
I love but thee!
Ces. Even so Achilles loved
Penthésilea: with his form it seems
You have his heart, and yet it was no soft one.
Arn. She breathes! But no, 'twas nothing, or the last
Faint flutter life disputes with death.
Ces. She breathes.
Arn. Thou say'st it? Then 'tis truth.
Ces. You do me right—
The devil speaks truth much oftener than he's deem'd:
He hath an ignorant audience.
Arn. (without attending to him.) Yes! her heart beats.
Ces. A sage reflection,
But somewhat late i' the day. Where shall we deal her?
I say she lives.
Arn. And will she live?
Ces. As much.
As dust can.
Arn. Then she is dead!
Ces. Bah! bah. You are so
And do not know it. She will come to life—
Such as you think so, such as you now are;
But we must work by human means.
Arn. We will.
Convey her into the Colonna palace,
Where I have pitch'd my banner.
Ces. Come, then! raise her up
Arn. Softly!
Ces. As softly as they bear the dead,
Perhaps because they cannot feel the jolting.
Arn. But doth she live indeed?
Ces. Nay, never fear
But, if you use it for, blame not me.

Arn. Let her but live!

Ces. The spirit of her life
Is yet within her breast, and may revive.
Count! Count! I am your servant in all things,
And this is a new office — 'tis not oft
I am employ'd in such, but you perceive
How stanch a friend is what you call a fiend.
On earth you have often only fiends for friends;
Now I desert not mine. Soft! bear her hence,
The beautiful half-clay, and nearly spirit!
I am almost enamour'd of her, as
Of old the angels of her earliest sex.

Arn. Thou!

Ces. I! But fear not. I'll not be your rival.

Arn. Rival!

Ces. I could be one right formidable;
But since I slew the seven husbands of Tobias' future bride, (and after all)
'Twas suck'd out by some incense,) I have laid
Aside intrigue: 'tis rarely worth the trouble
Of gaining, or — what is more difficult —
Getting rid of your prize again: for there's
The rub! at least to mortals.

Arn. Softly, peace! softly! methinks her lips move, her eyes open!

Ces. Like stars, no doubt; for that's a metaphor
For Lucifer and Venus.

Arn. To the palace
Colonna, as I told you!

Ces. Oh! I know

My way through Rome.

Arn. Now onward, onward! Gently.

[Exeunt, bearing Olimpia.—The scene closes.

PART III.

SCENE I.

A Castle in the Apennines, surrounded by a wild but smiling country.—Chorus of Peasants singing before the Gates.

CHORUS.

1. The wars are over,
The spring is come;
The bride and her lover
Have sought their home:
They are happy, we rejoice;
Let their hearts have an echo in every voice!

2. The spring is come; the violet's gone,
The first-born child of the early sun:
With us she is but a winter's flower,
The snow on the hills cannot blast her bower,
And she lifts up her dewy eye of blue
To the youngest sky of the self-same hue.

CHORUS.

But the wars are over,
The spring is come;
The bride and her lover
Have sought their home:
They are happy, and we rejoice;
Let their hearts have an echo from every voice.

[Exeunt the Peasantry, singing;
HEAVEN AND EARTH;

A MYSTERY,

FOUNDED ON THE FOLLOWING PASSAGE IN GENESIS, CHAP. VI.

"And it came to pass . . . . . . that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose."

And woman waiting for her demon lover."—Coleridge.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Angels.—Samiás. Azæziel. Raphael the Archangel.

Men.—Noah and his Sons. Irad. Japhet.

Women.—Anah. Ahólibaham.

Chorus of Spirits of the Earth.—Chorus of Mortals.

PART I.

SCENE I.

A woody and mountainous district near Mount Ararat.—Time, Midnight.

Enter Anah and Ahólibaham.

Anah. Our father sleeps: it is the hour when they Who love us are accustom’d to descend Through the deep clouds o’er rocky Ararat: How my heart beats!

Aho. Let us proceed upon Our invocation.

Anah. But the stars are hidden. I tremble.

Aho. So do I, but not with fear Of aught save their delay.

Anah. My sister, though I love Azæziel more than—oh, too much! What was I going to say? my heart grows impious. Aho. And where is the impiety of loving Celestial natures? Anah. But, Ahólibaham, I love our God less since his angel loved me. This cannot be of good; and though I know not That I do wrong, I feel a thousand fears Which are not ominous of right.

Aho. Then wed thee Unto some son of clay, and toil and spin! There’s Japhet loves thee well, hath loved thee long Marry, and bring forth dust!

Anah. I should have loved Azæziel not less were he mortal; yet I am glad he is not. I can not outlive him, And when I think that his immortal wings Will one day hover o’er the sepulchre Of the poor child of clay which so adored him, As he adores the Highest, death becomes Less terrible; but yet I pity him: His grief will be of ages, or at least Mine would be such for him, were I the seraph. And he the perishable.

Aho. Rather say, That he will single forth some other daughter Of Earth, and love her as he once loved Anah.

Anah. And if it should be so, and she loved him Better thus than that he should weep for me.

Aho. If I thought thus of Samias’s love, All seraph as he is, I’d spurn him from me. But to our invocation! ‘Tis the hour.

Anah. Seraph! From thy sphere! Whatever star contain thy glory; In the eternal depths of heaven.
Albeit thou watchest with "the seven"*
Though through space infinite and hoary
Before thy bright worlds worlds be driven,
Yet hear!
Oh! think of her who holds thee dear!
And though she nothing is to thee,
Yet think that thou art all to her.
Thou canst not tell,—and never be Such pangs decreed to aught save me,—
The bitterness of tears.
Eternity is in thy years,
Unborn, undying beauty in thine eyes;
With me thou canst not sympathize,
Except in love, and there thou must Acknowledge that more loving dust
Ne'er wept beneath the skies.
Thou walk'st thy many worlds, thou see'st
The face of him who made thee great,
As he hath made me of the least
Of those cast out from Eden's gate:
Yet, Seraph dear!
Oh hear!
For thou hast loved me, and I would not die
Until I know what I must die in knowing,
That thou foget'st in thine eternity
Her whose heart death could not keep from o'er-flowing
For thee, immortal essence as thou art!
Great is their love who love in sin and fear;
And such, I feel, are waging in my heart
A war unworthy: to an Adamite
Forgive, my Seraph! that such thoughts appear,
For sorrow is our element;
Delight
An Eden kept afar from sight,
Though sometimes with our visions blent.
The hour is near
Which tells me we are not abandon'd quite.—
Appear! Appear!
Seraph!
My own Azazel! be but here,
And leave the stars to their own light.
Aho.
Samiasa!
Where'so'er
I hearlest in the upper air—
Or warring with the spirits who may dare
Dispute with him
Who made all empires, empire; or recalling
Some wandering star, which shoots through the abyss
Whose tenants dying, while their world is falling,
Share the dim destiny of clay in this;
Or joining with the interior cherubim,
Thou deignest to partake their hymn—
Samiasa!
I call thee, I await thee, and I love thee.
Many may worship thee, that will I not.
If that thy spirit down to mine may move thee,
Descend and share my lot!
Though I be form'd of clay,
And thou of beams
More bright than those of day
On Eden's streams,
Thine immortality can not repay
With love more warm than mine
My love. There is a ray

* The archangels said to be seven in number.

In me, which, though forbidden yet to shine,
I feel was lighted at thy God's and thine.
It may be hidden long: death and decay
Our mother Eve bequeath'd us—but my heart
Defies it: though this life must pass away,
Is that a cause for thee and me to part?
Thou art immortal—so am I: I feel—
I feel my immortality o'er sweep
All pains, all tears, all time, all fears, and peal,
Like the eternal thunders of the deep,
Into my ears this truth—"thou livest for ever!"
But if it be in joy
I know not, nor would know;
That secret rests with the Almighty giver
Who folds in clouds the fonts of bliss and wo
But thee and me he never can destroy;
Change as he may, but not o'erwhelm; we are
Of as eternal essence and must war
With him if he will war with us: with thee
I can share all things, even immortal sorrow;
For thou hast ventured to share life with me,
And shall I shrink from thine eternity?
No! though the serpent's sting should pierce me through,
And thou thyself wert like the serpent coil
Around me still! and I will smile
And curse thee not; but hold
Thee in as warm a fold
As—but descend; and prove
A mortal's love
For an immortal. If the skies contain
More joy than thou canst give and take, remain!
Anah. Sister! sister! I view them winging
Their bright way through the parted night.
Aho. The clouds from off their pinions flanging,
As though they bore to-morrow's light.
Anah. But if our father see the sight!
Aho. He would but deem it was the moon
Rising unto some sorcerer's tune
An hour too soon.
Anah. They come! he comes!—Azazel!
Aho.
Haste
To meet them! Oh! for wings to bear
My spirit, while they hover there,
To Samiasa's breast!
Anah. Lo! they have kindled all the west,
Like a returning sunset;—lo!
On Ararat's late secret crest
A mild and many-color'd bow,
The remnant of their flashing path,
Now shines! and now, behold! it hath
Return'd to night, as rippling foam,
Which the leviathan hath lash'd
From his unfathomable home,
When sporting on the face of the calm deep,
Subsides soon after he again hath dash'd
Down, down, to where the ocean's fountains sleep.
Aho. They have touch'd earth! Samiasa!
Anah.
SCENE II.

Enter Irad and Japhet.
Irad. Despond not; wherefore wilt thou wander thus
To add thy silence to the silent night,
And lift thy tearful eye unto the stars?
They cannot aid thee.
BYRON'S WORKS.

Japh. But they soothe me—now perhaps she looks upon them as I look. Methinks a being that is beautiful Becometh more so as it looks on beauty, the eternal beauty of undying things. Oh, Anah!

Irad. But she loves thee not.

Japh. Alas! Irad. And proud Ahobilamah spurns me also. Japh. I feel for thee too.

Irad. Let her keep her pride, mine hath enabled me to bear her scorn: it may be, time too will avenge it.

Japh. Canst thou find joy in such a thought?

Irad. Nor joy nor sorrow, I loved her well; I would have loved her better, I had love been met with love: as 'tis, I leave her To brighter destinies, if so she deems them.

Japh. What destinies?

Irad. I have some cause to think she loves another.

Japh. Anah!

Irad. No; her sister.

Japh. What other?

Irad. That I know not; but her air, If not her words, tells me she loves another.

Japh. Ay, but not Anah: she but loves her God. Irad. Whate'er she loveth, so she loves thee not, what can it profit thee?

Japh. True, nothing; but I love.

Irad. And so did I.

Japh. And now thou lovest not, or think'st thou lovest not, art thou happier?

Irad. Yes.

Japh. I pity thee.

Irad. Me! why?

Japh. For being happy, deprived of that which makes my misery.

Irad. I take thy taunt as part of thy distemper, and would not feel as thou dost for more shakels Than all our father's herds would bring if weigh'd against the metal of the sons of Cain—The yellow dust they try to barter with us, as if such useless and discolor'd trash, The refuse of the earth, could be received for milk, and wool, and flesh, and fruits, and all our flocks and wilderness afford. Go, Japhet, sigh to the stars as wolves howl to the moon—

I must back to my rest.

Japh. And so would I.

Irad. Thou wilt not to our tents then?

Japh. No, Irad; I will to the cavern, whose mouth they open from the internal world To let the inner spirits of the earth forth when they walk its surface.

Irad. Wherefore so?

Japh. What wouldst thou there?

Irad. Sooth further my sad spirit with gloom as sad: it is a hopeless spot, and I am hopeless.

Japh. But 'tis dangerous; strange sounds and sights have peopled it with terrors. I must go with thee.

Irad. No; believe me I feel no evil thought, and fear no evil.

Irad. But evil things will be thy foe the more as not being of them: turn thy steps aside, or let mine be with thine.

Japh. No, neither, Irad: I must proceed alone.

Irad. Then peace be with thee!

Japh. (soleus.) Peace! I have sought it where it should be found, in love—with love, too, which perhaps deserved it, and, in its stead, a heaviness of heart—A weakness of the spirit—listless days, and nights inexorable to sweet sleep—Have come upon me. Peace! what peace? the calm of desolation, and the stillness of the untroudden forest, only broken by the sweeping tempest through its groaning boughs; such is the sullen or the fitful state of my mind overworn. The earth's grown wicked and many signs and portents have proclaimed a change at hand, and an overwhelming doom to perishable beings. Oh, my Anah! When the dreadful hour denounces shall open wide the fountains of the deep, how mightest thou have lain within this bosom, folded from the elements; this bosom, which in vain hath beat for thee, and then will beat more vainly, While thing—Oh, God! at least remit to her Thy wrath! for she is pure amid the failing as a star in the clouds, which cannot quench, although they obscure it for an hour. My Anah! how would I have adored thee, but thou wouldest not; and still would I redeem thee—see thee live when ocean is earth's grave, and, unopposed by rock or shallow, the leviathan, lord of the shoreless sea and watery world, shall wonder at His boundlessness of realm.

[Exit Japhet.]

Enter Noah and Shem.

Noah. Where is thy brother Japhet?

Shem. He went forth according to his wont, to meet with Irad, he said; but, as I fear, to bend his steps towards anah's tents, round which he loves nightly, like a dove round and round its pillaged nest; or else he walks the wild up to the cavern which opens to the heart of Ararat. Noah. What doth he there? it is an evil spot upon an earth all evil; for things worse than those on wicked men resort there: he still loves this daughter of a fated race, although he could not wed her if she loved him, and that she doth not. Oh, the unhappy hearts of men! that one of my blood, knowing well the destiny and evil of these days, and that the hour approacheth, should indulge in such forbidden yearnings! lead the way; he must be sought for!

Shem. Go not forward, father; I will seek Japhet.

Noah. Do not fear for me: all evil things are powerless on the man selected by Jehovah—let us go.

Shem. To the tents of the father of the sisters?

No. No; to the cavern of the Caucasus.

[Exeunt Noah and Shem.]
Japh. By the approaching denoue! by the earth Which will be strangled by the ocean! by The deep which will lay open all her fountains! The heaven which will convert her clouds to seas, And the Omnipotent who makes and crushes! Thou unknown, terrible, and indistinct, Yet Awful Thing of Shadows, speak to me! Why dost thou laugh that horrid laugh?

Japh. For earth and all her children.

Spirit. Ha! Ha! Ha! [Spirit vanishes]

Japh. How the fiend mocks the tortures of a wofl The coming desolation of an orb, On which the sun shall rise and warm no life! How the earth sleeps! and all that in it is Sleep too upon the very eve of death!

Japh. The coming desolation of an orb, On which the sun shall rise and warm no life! How the earth sleeps! and all that in it is Sleep too upon the very eve of death!

Why should they wake to meet it? What is here, Which look like death in life, and speak like things Born ere this dying world? They come like clouds.

[Various Spirits pass from the cavern.]

Spirit. Rejoice!

The abhor'd race Which could not keep in Eden their high place; But listen'd to the voice Of knowledge without power, Are nigh the hour Of death!

Not slow, not single, not by sword, nor sorrow, Nor years, nor heart-break, nor time's sapping motion, Shall they drop off. Behold their last to-morrow!

Earth shall be ocean! And no breath, Save of the winds, be on the unbounded wave! Angels shall tire their wings, but find no spot; Not even a rock from out the liquid grave Shall lift its point to save.

Or show the place where strong despair hath died After long looking o'er the ocean wide For the expected ebb which cometh not All shall be void, Destroy'd!

Another element shall be the lord Of life, and the abhor'd
Children of dust be quench'd; and of each hue Of earth nought left but the unbroken blue; And of the variegated mountain Shall nought remain Unchanged, nor of the level plain; Cedar and pine shall lift their tops in vain:

All merged within the universal fountain, Man, earth, and fire, shall die, And sea and sky Look vast and lifeless in the eternal eye

Upon the foam Who shall erect a home?

Japh. (coming forward.) My sires! Earth's seed shall not expire! Only the evil shall be put away From day.

Avaunt! ye exulting demons of the waste! Who howl your hideous joy When God destroys whom you dare not destroy, Hence! haste!

Back to your inner caves! Until the waves Shall search you in your secret place,

And drive your sullen race.
Forth, to be roll'd upon the tossing winds
In restless wretchedness along all space; Spirit.

Sohn of the saved!
When thou and thine have brav'd
The wide and warring element;
When the great barrier of the deep is rent,
Shall thou and thine be good or happy!—No!—
Thy new world and new race shall be of wo—
Less goodly in their aspect, in their years
Less than the glorious giants, who
Yet walk the world in pride,
The sons of Heaven by many a mortal bride.
Thine shall be nothing of the past, save tears.
And art thou not ashamed
Thus to survive,
And eat, and drink, and live?
With a base heart so far subdued and tamed,
As even to hear this wide destruction named,
Without such grief and courage, as should rather
Bid thee await the world-dissolving wave,
Than seek a shelter with thy favor'd father,
And build thy city o'er the drown'd earth's grave?
Who would outlive their kind,
Except the base and blind?
Mine
Hateth thine,
As of a different order in the sphere,
But not our own.
There is not one who hath not left a throne
Wax'd in heaven to dwell in darkness here,
Rather than see his mates endure alone.
Go, wretch! and give
A life like thine to other wretches—live!
And when the annihilating waters roar
Above what they have done,
Envy the giant patriarchs then no more,
And scorn thy sire as the surviving one!
Thyself for being his son!

Chorus of Spirits issuing from the cave.*
Rejoice!
No more the human voice
Shall vex our joys in middle air
With prayer;
No more
Shall they adore;
And we, who ne'er for ages have adored
The prayer-exacting Lord,
To whom the omission of a sacrifice
Is vice;
We, we shall view the deep's salt sources pour'd,
Until one element shall do the work
Of all in chaos; until they,
The creatures proud of their poor clay,
Shall perish, and their bleached bones shall lurk
In caves, in dens, in clefts of mountains, where,
The deep shall follow to their latest hair;
Where even the brutes, in their despair,
Shall cease to prey on man and on each other,
And the striped tiger shall lie down to die
Beside the lamb, as though he were his brother;
Till all things shall be as they were,
Silent and uncreated, save the sky:
While a brief truce
Is made with Death, who shall forbear
The little remnant of the past creation,
To generate new nations for his use;
This remnant, floating o'er the undulation
Of the subsiding deluge, from its slime,
When the hot sun hath baked the reeking soil
Into a world, shall give again to time
New beings—years—diseases—sorrow—crime—
With all companionship of hate and toil,
Until
Japh. (interrupting them.) The eternal will Shall deign to expound this dream
Of good and evil; and redeem
Unto himself all times, all things;
And, gather'd under his almighty wings
Abolish hell!
And to the expiated Earth
Restore the beauty of her birth,
Her Eden in an endless paradise,
Where man no more can fall as once he fell,
And even the very demons shall do well!

Spirits. And when shall take effect this wondrous spell?

Japh. When the Redeemer cometh; first in pain,
And the in glory.

Spirits. Meantime, still struggle in the mortal frame,
Till earth wax hoary;
War with yourselves, and hell, and heaven, in vain,
Until the clouds look gory
With the blood reeking from each battle plain;
New times, new climes, new arts, new men; but still
The same old tears, old crimes, and oldest ill,
Shall be among your race in different forms;
But the same moral storms
Shall oversweep the future, as the waves
In a few hours the glorious giant's graves.*

Chorus of Spirits.
Brethren, rejoice!
Mortal, farewell!
Hark! hark! already we can hear the voice
Of growing ocean's gloomy swell;
The winds, too, plume their piercing wings
The clouds have nearly fill'd their springs;
The fountains of the great deep shall be broken,
And heaven set wide her windows; while mankind
View, unacknowledged, each tremendous token—
Still, as they were, from the beginning, blind,
We hear the sound they cannot hear,
The mustering thunders of the threatening sphere;
Yet a few hours their coming is delay'd;
Their flashing banners, folded still on high
Yet undis played,
Save to the Spirit's all-pervading eye.
How! how! oh Earth!
Thy death is nearer than thy recent birth;
Tremble, ye mountains! soon to shrink below
The ocean's overflow;
The wave shall break upon your cliffs; and shells,
The little shells, of ocean's least things be Deposited where now the eagle's offspring dwells—
How shall he shrivek o'er the remorseless sea!
And call his nestlings up with fruitless yell,
Unanswer'd, save by the encroaching swell;—
While man shall long in vain for his broad wings,
The wings which could not save:—
Where could he rest them, while the whole space brings
Nought to his eye beyond the deep, his grave?

* "And there were giants in the earth in those days, and also: mighty men, which were of old men of renown."—Genesis.
Brethren, rejoice!
And loudly lift each superhuman voice—
All die,
Save the slight remnant of Seth's seed—
The seed of Seth.
Exempt for future sorrow's sake from death
But of the sons of Cain
None shall remain;
And all his worldly daughters
Must lie beneath the desolating waters;
Or, floating upward, with their long hair laid
Along the wave, the cruel heaven upbraids,
Which would not spare
Beings even in death so fair.
I: is dazed.
All die!
And to the universal human cry
The universal silence shall succeed!
Fly, brethren, fly!
But still rejoice!
We fall!
They fall!
So perish all
These petty foes of Heaven who shrink from hell!
[The Spirits disappear, soaring upwards.
Japh. (solus.) God hath proclaim'd the destiny of earth;
My father's ark of safety hath announced it;
The very demons shriek it from their caves;
The scroll of Enoch prophesied it long
In silent books, which, in their silence, say
More to the mind than thunder to the ear:
And yet men listen'd not, nor listen; but
Walk darkling to their doom; which, though so nigh,
Shakes them no more in their dim disbelief,
Than their last cries shall shake the Almighty purpose,
Or deaf obedient ocean, which fulfils it.
No sign yet hangs its banner in the air;
The clouds are few, and of their wonted texture;
The sun will rise upon the earth's last day
As on the fourth day of creation, when God said unto him, "Shine!" and he broke forth
Into the dawn, which lighted not the yet
Uniform'd forefather of mankind—but roused
Before the human orison of the earlier
Made and far sweeter voices of the birds,
Which in the open firmament of heaven
Have wings like angels, and like them salute
Heaven first each day before the Adamites:
Their matima now draw nigh—the east is kindling—and
And they will sing! and day will break! Both near,
So near the awful close! For these must drop
Their out worn pinions on the deep; and day,
After the bright course of a few brief morrows,—
Ay, day will rise; but upon what?—a chaos,
Which was ere day; and which renew'd, makes time
Nothing! for, without life, what are the hours?
No more to dust than is eternity
Unto Jehovah, who created both.
Without him, even eternity would be
A void: without man, time, as made for man,
Dies with man, and is swallowed in that deep
Which has no fountain; as his race will be Devour'd by that which drowns his infant world.—
What have we here? Shapes of both earth and air?
No—all of heaven, they are so beautiful.
I cannot trace their features; but their forms,
How lovely they move along the side
Of the gray mountain, scattering its mist!
And after the swart savage spirits, whose Infernal immortality pour'd forth
Their impious hymn of triumph, they shall be Welcome as Eden. It may be they come
To tell me the reprobate of our young world,
For which I have so often pray'd—They come!
Anah! oh, God! and with her—

Enter Samiasa, Azariel, Anah, and Aholibamah.

Anah. Japhet!
Sam. Lo!
A son of Adam:
Aza. What doth the earthborn here,
While all his race are slumbering?
Japh. Angel! what
Dost thou on earth when thou should'st be on high?
Aza. Know'st thou not, or forget'st thou, that a part
Of our great function is to guard thine earth!
Japh. But all good angels have forsaken earth.
Which is condemn'd; nay even the evil fly
The approaching chaos. Anah! Anah! my
In vain, and long, and still to be beloved.
Why walk'st thou with this spirit, in those hours
When no good spirit longer lights below?
Anah. Japhet, I cannot answer thee: yet, yet
Forgive me—
Japh. May the Heaven, which soon no more
Will pardon, do so! for thou art greatly tempted.
Aho. Back to thy tents, insulting son of Noah!
We know thee not.
Japh. The hour may come when thou
May'st know me better; and thy sister know
Me still the same which I have ever been.
Sam. Son of the patriarch, who hath ever been Upright before his God, what'er thy gifts,
And what words seem of sorrow, mix'd with wrath,
How have Azariel, or myself, brought on thee Wrong?
Japh. Wrong! the greatest of all wrongs; but thou
Say'st well, though she be dust, I did not, could not,
Deserve her. Farewell, Anah! I have said
That word so often! but now say it, ne'er
To be repeated. Angel! or what'er
Thou art, or must be soon, hast thou the power
To save this beautiful—these beautiful
Children of Cain?
Aza. From what?
Japh. And is it so,
That ye too know not? Angels! angels! ye
Have shared man's sin, and, it may be, now must Partake his punishment; or at the least
My sorrow.
Sam. Sorrow! I ne'er thought till now
To hear an Adamite speak riddles to me.
Japh. And hath not the Most High expounded them?
Then ye are lost, as they are lost.
Aho. So be it!
If they love as they are loved, they will not shrink
More to be mortal, than I would to dare
An immortality of agonies
With Samiasa!
Anah. Sister! sister! speak not
Their courage, strength, and length, of days —
Japh. They are number'd
Aho. Be it so! but while ye their hours endure.
I glory in my brethren and our fathers.
Japh. My sire and race but glory in their God,
Anah! and thou?

Anah. Whate'er our God decrees
The God of Seth as Cain, I must obey,
And will endeavor patiently to obey.
But could I dare to pray in this dread hour
Of universal vengeance, (if such should be,) It would not be to live, alone exempt
Of all my house. My sister! oh, my sister!
What were the world, or other worlds, or all
The brightest future, without the sweet past—
Thy love—my father's—all the life, and all
The things which sprang up with me, like the stars
Making my dim existence radiant with Soft lights which were not mine? Aholibamah.
Oh! if there should be mercy—seek it, find it;
I abhor death, because that thou must die.
Aho. What! hath this dreamer, with his father's ark,
The bugbear he hath built to scare the world,
Shaken my sister? Are we not the loved
Of seraphs? and if we were not, must we
Cling to a son of Noah for our lives?
Rather than thus—But the enthusiastic dreams
The worst of dreams, the phantasies engender'd
By hopeless love and heated vigil. Who Shall shake these solid mountains, this firm earth,
And bid those clouds and waters take a shape
Distinct from that which we and all our sires
Have seen them wear on their eternal way?
Who shall do this?
Japh. He whose one word produced them.
Aho. Who heard that word?
Japh. The universe, which leap'd
To life before it. Ah! smilest thou still in scorn?
Turn to thy seraphs; if they attest it not,
They are none.
Sam. Aholibamah, own thy God!
Aho. I have ever hail'd our Maker, Samiass,
As thine, and mine: a God of love, not sorrow.
Japh. Alas! what else is love but sorrow? Even
He who made earth in love had soon to grieve
Above its first and best inhabitants.
Aho. Tis said so.
Japh. It is even so.

Enter Noah and Shem.

Noah. Japheth! What
Dost thou here with these children of the wicked?
Dread'st thou not to partake their coming doom.
Japh. Father, it cannot be a sin to seek
To save an earthborn being; and behold,
These are not of the sinful, since they have
The fellowship of angels.

Noah. These are they, then,
Who leave the throne of God, to take them wives
From out the race of Cain; the sons of heaven,
Who seek earth's daughters for their beauty?
Aho. Patriarch!
Thou hast said it.

Noah. Wo, wo, wo to such communion!
Has not God made a barrier between earth
And heaven, and limited each, kind to kind?
Sam. Was not man made in high Jehovah's image?

Thus.

Aha. Farest thou, my Anah?

Yes, for thee:
I would resign the greater remnant of
This little life of mine, before one hour
Of thine eternity should know a pang.

Japh. It is for him, then! for the seraph thou Hast left me! That is nothing, if thou hast not Left thy God too, for unions like to these,
Between a mortal and an immortal, cannot
Be happy or be hallow'd. We are sent Upon the earth to toil and die: and they Are made to minister on high unto
The Highest: But if he can save thee, soon
The hour will come in which celestial aid
Alone can do so.

Anah. Ah! he speaks of death.

Sam. Of death to us! and those who are with us!
But that the man seems full of sorrow, I—
Could smile.

Japh. I grieve not for myself, nor fear;
I am safe, not for my own deserts, but those
Of a well-doing sire, who hath been found Righteous enough to save his children. Would
His power was greater of redemption! or
That by exchanging my own life for hers,
Who could alone have made me happy she,
The last and loveliest of Cain's race, could share
The ark which shall receive a remnant of
The seed of Seth!

Aho. And dost thou think that we
With Cain's, the eldest born of Adam's, blood
Warm in our veins,—strong Cain! who was begotten
In paradise,—would mingle with Seth's children?
Seth, the last offspring of old Adam's dotage?
No, not to save all earth, were earth in peril!
Our race hath always dwelt apart from thine
From the beginning, and shall do so ever.

Japh. I did not speak to thee, Aholibamah!
Too much of the forefather whom thou vaunted
Has come down in that haughty blood which springs
From him who shed the first, and that a brother's!
But thou, my Anah! let me call thee mine,
Albeit thou art not: 'tis a word I cannot
Part with, although I must from thee. My Anah!
Thou who dost rather make me dream that Abel
Had left a daughter, whose pure pious race
Survived in thee, so much unlike thou art
The rest of the stern Cainites, save in beauty,
For all of them are fairest in their favor—

Aho. (interrupting him.) And wouldst thou have her like our father's foe
In mind, in soul? If I partook thy thought,
And dream'd that ought of Abel was in her—
Get thee hence, son of Noah; thou makest strife.

Japh. Offspring of Cain, thy father did so!

Aho. But he slew not Seth; and what hast thou to do
With other deeds between his God and him?

Japh. Thou speakest well: his God hath judged him, and
I had rather name his deed, but that thyself
Didst seem to glory in him, nor to shrink
From what he had done.

Aho. He was our father's father:
The eldest born of man, the strongest, bravest,
And most enduring —Shall I blush for him
From whom we had our being? Look upon
Our race; behold their stature and their beauty,
HEAVEN AND EARTH.

Did God not love what he had made? And what Do we but imitate and emulate
His love unto created love?

Noah. I am
But man, and was not made to judge mankind,
Far less the sons of God; but as our God
Has design'd to commune with me, and reveal
His judgments, I reply, that the descent
Of seraphs from their everlasting seat
Unto a perishable and perishing,
Even on the very eve of perishing, world,
Cannot be good.

Azaz. What! though it were to save?
Noah. Not ye in all your glory can redeem
What he who made you glorious hath condemn'd.
Were your immortal mission safety, 'twould
Be general, not for two, though beautiful;
And beautiful they are, but not the less corrupt'd.

Japh. Oh father! say it not.
Noah. Son! son!
If that thou wouldst avoid their doom, forget
That they exist; they soon shall cease to be,
While thou shalt be the sire of a new world,
And better.

Japh. Let me die with this, and them!
Noah. Thou shouldst for such a thought, but shalt not; he
Who can redeem thee.

Sam. And why him and thee,
More than what he, thy son, prefers to both?
Noah. Ask him who made thee greater than my self
And mine, but not less subject to his own
Almightiness. And lo! his mildest and Least to be tempted messenger appears!

Enter Raphael, the Archangel.

Raph. Spirits!
Whose seat is near the throne,
What do ye here?
Is thus a seraph's duty to be shown,
Now that the hour is near
When earth must be alone?
Return!
Adore and burn
In glorious homage with the elected "seven
Your place is heaven.

Sam. Raphael!
The first and fairest of the sons of God,
How long hath this been law,
That earth by angels must be left untried
Earth! which oft saw
Jehovah's footsteps not disdain her sod
The world he loved, had made
For love; and oft have obey'd
His frequent mission with delighted pinions,
Adoring him in his least works display'd;
Watching this youngest star of his dominions;
And, as the latest birth of his great word,
Eager to keep it worthy of our Lord.
Why is thy brow severe?
And whenfore speak'st thou of destruction near?
Raph. Had Samia and Azaziel been
In their true place, with the angelic choir,
Written in fire
They would have seen
Jehovah's late decree,
And not inquired 'heir Maker's breath of me:

But ignorance must ever be
A part of sin;
And even the spirits' knowledge shall grow less:
As they wax proud within;
For Blindness is the first-born of Excess.
When all good angels left the world, ye stayed,
Stung with strange passions, and debased
By mortal feelings for a mortal maid;
But ye are pardon'd thus far, and replaced
With your pure equals. Hence! away! away!
Or stay,
And lose eternity by that delay!

Azaz. And thou! if earth be thus forbidden
In the decree
To us until this moment hidden,
Dost thou not err as we
In being here?

Raph. I came to call ye back to your fit sphere.
In the great name and at the word of God.
Dear, dearest in themselves, and scarce less dear
That which I came to do: till now we trod
Together the eternal space; together
Let us still walk the stars. True, earth must die
Her race; return'd into her womb, must wither,
And much which she inherits; but oh! why
Cannot this earth be made, or be destroy'd,
Without involving ever some vast void
In the immortal ranks? immortal still
In their immeasurable forfeiture.
Our brother Satan fell; his burning will
Rather than long worship dared endure
But ye who still are pure!
Seraph! less mighty than that mightiest one,
Think how he was undone!
And think if tempting man can compensate
For heaven desired too late!
Long have I warr'd,
Long must I war
With him who deem'd it hard
To be created, and to acknowledge him
Who midst the cherubim
Made him as suns to a dependent star,
Leaving the archangels at his right hand dira.
I loved him—beautiful he was: oh heaven,
Sav'd his who made, what beauty and what power
Was ever like to Satan's! Would the hour
In which he fell could ever be forgiven!
The wish is impious: but, oh ye!
Yet undestroy'd, be warn'd! Eternity
With him, or with his God, is in your choice
He hath not tempted you; he cannot tempt
The angels, from his further snares exempt:
But man hath listen'd to his voice,
And ye to woman's—beautiful she is,
The serpent's voice less subtle than her kiss.
The snake but vanquish'd dust; but she will draw
A second host from heaven, to break heaven's law
Yet, yet, oh fly!
Ye cannot die;
But they Shall pass away,
While ye shall fill with shrieks the upper sky;
For perishable clay,
Wose memory in your immortality
Shall long outlast the sun which gave them day
Think how your essence differeth from theirs
In all but suffering! why partake
The agony to which they must be heirs—
Born to be plough'd with years, and sown with curses.
And reap'd by Death, lord of the human soil?
Even had their days been left to toll their path
Through time to dust, unshortened by God's wrath,
Still they are Evil's prey and Sorrow's spoil.

Aho.
Let them fly!
I hear the voice which says that all must die
Sooner than our white-bearded patriarchs died;
And that on high
An ocean is prepared,
While from below
The deep shall rise to meet heaven's overflow.
Few shall be spared,
It seems; and of that few, the race of Cain
Must lift their eyes to Adam's God in vain.

Sister! since it is so,
And the eternal Lord
In vain would be implored
For the remission of one hour of wo,
Let us resign even what we have adored,
And meet the wave, as we would meet the sword,
If not unmoved, yet undismay'd.
And wailing loss for us than those who shall Survive in mortal or immortal thrall,
And, when the fatal waters are alloy'd,
Weep for the myriads who can weep no more.
Fly, seraphs! to your own eternal shore,
Where winds nor waves nor waters rear.

Our portion is to die,
And yours to live for ever:
But which is best, a dead eternity,
Or living, is but known to the great Giver.
Obey him, as we shall obey;
I would not keep this life of mine in clay
An hour beyond his will,
Nor see ye lose a portion of his grace,
For all the mercy which Seth's race
Find still.
Fly!
And as your pinions bear ye back to heaven,
Think that my love still mounts with thee on high,
Samissa!
And if I look up with a tearless eye,
'Tis that an angel's bride disdains to weep.—
Farewell! Now rise, inexorable deep!
Anah.
And must we die?
And must I lose thee too,
Azzaziel?
Oh, my heart! my heart!
Thy prophecies were true!
And yet thouwert so happy too!
The bow, though not unlook'd for, falls as new;
But yet depart!
Ah! why?
Yet let me not retain thee—fly!
My pangs can be but brief; but thine would be
Eternal, if repulsed from heaven for me.
Too much already hast thou deign'd
To one of Adam's race!
Our doom is sorrow; not to us alone,
But to the spirits who have not disdain'd
To love us, cometh anguish with disgrace.
The first who taught us knowledge hath been hurl'd
From his own archangelic throne
Into some unknown world:
And thou, Azzaziel! No—
Thou shalt not suffer we
For me.
Away! nor weep!
Thou canst not weep; but yet
May'st suffer more not weeping: then forget

Her, whom the surges or the all-strangling deep
Can bring no pang like this.  Fly! fly!
Being gone, 'twill be less difficult to die.
Japh.
Oh say not so!
Father! and thou, archangel, thou!
Surely celestial mercy lurks below
That pure severe serenity of brow!
Let them not meet this sea without a shore,
Save in our ark, or let me be no more!
Noah.
Peace, child of passion, peace!
If not within thy heart, yet with thy tongue
Do God no wrong!
Live as he wills—it die, when he ords,
A righteous death, unlike the seed of Cain's.
Cease, or be sorrowful in silence; cease
To weary Heaven's ear with thy selfish plaint:
Would'st thou have God commit a sin for thee?
Such would it be,
To alter his intent
For a mere mortal sorrow.  Be a man!
And bear what Adam's race must bear, and can.
Japh.
Ay, father! but when they are gone,
And we are all alone,
Floating upon the azure desert, and
The depth beneath us hides our own dear land,
And dearer, silent friends and brethren, all
Buried in its immeasurable breast,
Who, who, our tears, our shrieks, shall then command?
Can we in desolation's peace have rest?
Oh God! be thou a God, and spare
Yet while 'tis time!
Renew not Adam's fall:
Mankind were then but twain,
But they are numerous now as are the waves
And the tremendous rain,
Whose drops shall be less thick than would their graves,
Were graves permitted to the seed of Cain.
Noah.
Silence, vain boy! each word of thine's a crime.
Angel! forgive this stripling's fond despair.
Raph.
Seraphs! these mortals speak in passion:
Ye!
Who are, or should be, passionless and pure,
May now return with me.
Sam.
It may not be;
We have chosen, and will endure.
Raph.
Say'st thou?
Az.
He hath said it, and I say, Amen
Raph.
Again!
Then from this hour,
Shorn as ye are of all celestial power,
And aliens from your God.
Farewell!
Japh.
Alas! where shall they dwell?
Hark, hark! Deep sounds, and deeper still,
Are howling from the mountain's bosom:
There's not a breath of wind upon the hill,
Yet quivers every leaf, and drops each blossom:
Earth groans as if beneath a heavy load.
Noah.
Hark, hark! the sea-birds cry!
In clouds they overspread the lurid sky,
And hover round the mountain, where before
Never a white wing, wetted by the wave,
Yet dared to soar,
Even when the waters wax'd too fierce to brave.
Soon it shall be their only shore,
And then, no more!
Japh. The sun! the sun!
He riseth, but his better light is gone;
And a black circle, bound
His gloriing disk around,
Proclaims earth's last of summer days hath shone!
The clouds return into the hues of night,
Save where their brazen-color'd edges streak
The verge where brighter morns were wont to break.
Noah. And lo! you flash of light,
The distant thunder's harbing'er, appears!
It cometh! hence, away!
Leave to the elements their evil prey!
Hence to where our all-hallow'd ark uppears
Its safe and rockless sides.
Japh. Oh, father, stay!
Leave not my Anah to the swallowing tides!
Noah. Must we not leave all life to such? Begone!
Japh. Not I.
Noah. Then die
With them!
How darest thou look on that prophetic sky,
And seek to save what all things now condemn,
In overwhelming unison
With just Jehovah's wrath!
Japh. Can rage and justice join in the same path?
Noah. Blasphemer! darest thou murmur even now?
Raph. Patriarch, be still a father! smooth thy brow:
Thy son, despite his folly, shall not sink;
He knows not what he says, yet shall not drink
With sob the salt foam of the swelling waters;
But be, when passion pasheth, as good as thou,
Nor perish like heaven's children with man's daughters.
Aho. The tempest cometh; heaven and earth unite
For the annihilation of all life.
Unequal is the strife
Between our strength and the Eternal Might!
Sam. But ours is with thee; we will bear ye far
To some untrodden star,
Where thou and Anah shalt partake our lot;
And if thou dost not weep for thy lost earth,
Our forfeit heaven shall also be forgot.
Anah. Oh! my dear father's tents, my place of birth,
And mountains, land, and woods! when ye are not,
Who shall dry up my tears?
Aza. Thy spirit-lord.
Fear not; though we are shut from heaven,
Yet much is ours, whence we cannot be driven.
Raph. Rebel! thy words are wicked, as thy deeds
Shall henceforth be but weak: the flaming sword,
Which chased the first-born out of Paradise,
Stil flashes in the angelic hands.
Aza. It cannot slay us: threaten dust with death,
And talk of weapons unto that which bleeds.
What are thy swords in our immortal eyes?
Raph. The moment cometh to approve thy strength;
And learn at length
How vain to war with what thy God commands:
Thy former force was in thy faith.

Enter Mortals, flying for refuge

Chorus of Mortals.
The heavens and earth are mingling—God! oh God! What have we done? Yet spare! Hark! even the forest beasts howl forth their pray'r. The dragon crawls from out his den, To herd, in terror, innocent with men: And the birds scream 'their agony through air. Yet, yet, Jehovah! yet with' draw thy rod Of wrath, and pity thine own world's despair! Hear not man only but all nature plead!
Raph. Farewell, thou earth! ye wretched sons of clay I cannot, must not, aid you. 'Tis decreed!
[Exit Raphael.
Japh. Some clouds sweep on as vultures for their prey, While others fix'd as rocks, await the word At which their wrathful vials shall be pour'd No sooner shall robe the firmament, Nor spangled stars be glorious: Death hath risen: In the sun's place a pale and ghastly glare Hath wound itself around the dying air. Aza. Come, Anah! quit this chaos-founded prison, To which the elements again repair,
To turn it into what it was: beneath The shelter of these wings thou shalt be safe.
As was the eagle's nestling once within Its mother's.—Let the coming chaos chafe With all its elements! Heed not their din! A brighter world than this, where thou shalt breathe Ethereal life, will we explore:
These darken'd clouds are not the only skies.
[Azael and Samias fly off and disappear with Anah and Aholibamah.
Japh. They are gone! They have disappear'd amid the roar Of the forsaken world; and never more, Whether they live, or die with all earth's life Now near its last, can aught restore Anah unto these eyes.

Chorus of Mortals.
Oh son of Noah! mercy on thy kind! What! wilt thou leave us all—all behind? While safe amid the elemental strife, Thou sitt'st within thy guarded ark? A mother, (offering her infant to Japhet.) Oh let this child embark! I brought him forth in wo, But thought it joy To see him to my bosom clinging so. Why was he born? What hath he done— My unwean'd son— To move Jehovah's wrath or scorn? What is there in this milk of mine, that death Should stir all heaven and earth up to destroy My boy, And roll the waters o'er his placid breath? Save him, thou seed of Seth! Or cursed be—with him who made Thee and thy race, for which we are betray'd!
Japh. Peace! 'tis no hour for curses, but for prayer!

Chorus of Mortals.
For prayer!!!
And where
Shall prayer ascend,
When the swoln clouds unto the mountains bend
And burst,
And gushing oceans every barrier rend,
Until the very deserts know no thirst?
Accurst
Be he who made thee and thy sire!
We deem our curses vain; we must expire:
But as we know the worst,
Why should our hymn be raised, our knees be bent
Before the implacable Omnipotent,
Since we must fall the same?
If he hath made earth, let it be his shame,
To make a world for torture.—Lo! they come,
The loathsome waters, in their rage!
And with their roar make wholesome nature dumb!
The forest's trees, (coeval with the hour
When Paradise upsprung,
Ere Eve gave Adam knowledge for her dower,
Or Adam his first hymn of slavery sung,)
So massy, vast, yet green in their old age,
Are ovetopt,
Their summer blossoms by the surges lopt,
Which rise, and rise, and rise.
Vainly we look up to the lowering skies—
They meet the seas,
And shut our God from our beseeching eyes
Fly, son of Noah, fly! and take thine ease,
In thine allotted ocean-tent;
And view, all floating o'er the element,
The corpses of the world of thy young days:
Then to Jehovah raise
Thy song of praise!
A Mortal. Blessed are the dead
Who die in the Lord!
And though the waters be o'er earth outspread,
Yet, as his word,
Be the decree adored!
He gave me life—he taketh but
The breath which is his own:
And though these eyes should be for ever shut,
Not longer this weak voice before his throne
Be heard in supplicating tone,
Still blessed be the Lord

For what is past,
For that which is:
For all are his,
From first to last—
Time—space—eternity—life—death—
The vast known and immeasurable unknown;
He made, and can unmake;
And shall I, for a little gasp of breath
Blaspheme and groan?
No; let me die, as I have lived, in faith,
Nor quiver, though the universe may quake.

Chorus of Mortals.
Where shall we fly?
Not to the mountains high;
For now their torrents rush, with double roar,
To meet the ocean, which, advancing still,
Already grasps each drowning hill,
Nor leaves an unsearch'd cave.

Enter a Woman.
Woman. Oh, save me, save me!
Our valley is no more:
My father and my father's tent,
My brethren and my brethren's herds,
The pleasant trees that o'er our noonday bent
And sent forth evening songs from sweetest birds
The little rivulet which freshen'd all
Our pastures green,
No more are to be seen.
When to the mountain cliff I climb'd this morn,
I turn'd to bless the spot,
And not a leaf appear'd about to fall;—
And now they are not!—
Why was I born?
Japh. To die! in youth to die;
And happier in that doom,
Than to behold the universal tomb,
Which I
Am thus condemn'd to weep above in vain.
Why, when all perish, why must I remain?
The waters rise; Men fly in every direction,
many are overtaken by the waves; the Chorus of Mortals disperses in search of safety up the mountains; Japhet remains upon a rock, while the Ark floats towards him in the distance.
CAIN;
A MYSTERY.

TO
SIR WALTER SCOTT, BART.
THIS MYSTERY OF CAIN IS INSCRIBED,
BY HIS OBLIGED FRIEND, AND FAITHFUL SERVANT,
THE AUTHOR.

PREFACE.

The following scenes are entitled "a Mystery," in conformity with the ancient title annexed to dramas upon similar subjects, which were styled "Mysteries, or Moralties." The author has by no means taken the same liberties with his subject which were common formerly, as may be seen by any reader curious enough to refer to those very profane productions, whether in English, French, Italian, or Spanish. The author has endeavored to preserve the language adapted to his characters; and where it is (and this is but rarely) taken from actual Scripture, he has made as little alteration, even of words, as the rhythm would permit. The reader will recollect that the book of Genesis does not state that Eve was tempted by a demon, but by "the Serpent;" and that only because he was "the most subtle of all the beasts of the field." Whatever interpretation the Rabbins and the Fathers may have put upon this, I must take the words as I find them, and reply with Bishop Watson upon similar occasions, when the Fathers were quoted to him, as Moderator in the schools of Cambridge, "Behold the Book!"—holding up the Scripture. It is to be recollected that my present subject has nothing to do with the New Testament, to which no reference can be here made without anachronism. With the poems upon similar topics I have not been recently familiar. Since I was twenty I have never read Milton; but I had read him so frequently before, that this may make little difference. Gesner's "Death of Abel" I have never read since I was eight years of age, at Aberdeen.

The general impression of my recollection is delightful; but of the contents I remember only that Cain's wife was called Mahala, and Abel's Thirza: in the following pages I have called them "Adah" and "Zillah," the earliest female names which occur in Genesis; they were those of Lamech's wives; those of Cain and Abel are not called by their names. Whether, then, a coincidence of subject may have caused the same in expression, I know nothing, and care as little.

The reader will please to bear in mind (what few choose to recollect) that there is no allusion to a future state in any of the books of Moses, nor indeed in the Old Testament. For a reason for this extraordinary omission he may consult "Warburton's Divine Legation;" whether satisfactory or not, no better has yet been assigned. I have therefore supposed it new to Cain, without, I hope, any perversion of Holy Writ.

With regard to the language of Lucifer, it was difficult for me to make him talk like a clergyman upon the same subjects; but I have done what I could to restrain him within the bounds of spiritual politeness.

If he disclaims having tempted Eve in the shape of the Serpent, it is only because the book of Genesis has not the most distant allusion to any thing of the kind, but merely to the Serpent in his serpentine capacity.

Note.—The reader will perceive that the author
BYRON'S WORKS.

Adam. Son Cain, my first-born, wherefore art thou silent?
Cain. Why should I speak?
Adam. To pray.
Cain. Have ye not pray'd?
Adam. We have, most fervently.
Cain. And loudly: I have heard you.
Adam. So will God, I trust.
Abel. Amen!
Adam. But thou, my eldest-born, art silent still.
Cain. 'Tis better I should be so.
Adam.' Wherefore so?
Cain. I have nought to ask.
Adam. Nor aught to thank for?
Cain. No.
Adam. Dost thou not live?
Cain. Must I not die?
Eve. Alas! the fruit of our forbidden tree begins to fall.
Adam. And we must gather it again.
Oh, God! why didst thou plant the tree of knowledge?
Cain. And wherefore plucked ye not the tree of life?
Ye must have then defied him.
Adam. Oh! my son blaspheme not: these are serpent's words.
Cain. Why not?
The snake spoke truth: it was the tree of knowledge.
It was the tree of life: knowledge is good,
And life is good; and how can both be evil?
Eve. My boy! thou speakest as I spoke in sin,
Before thy birth: let me not see renew'd
My misery in thine. I have repented.
Let me not see my offspring fall into
The snares beyond the walls of Paradise,
Which e'en in Paradise destroy'd his parents.
Content thee with what is. Had we been so,
Then now hadst been contented.—Oh, my son,
Adam. Our orisons completed, let us hence,
Each to his task of toil—not heavy, though
Needful: the earth is young, and yields us kindly
Her fruits with little labor.
Eve. Cain, my son, behold thy father cheerful and resigned,
And do as he doth.
[Exeunt Adam and Eve Zillah. Wilt thou not, my brother?
Abel. Why wilt thou wear this gloom upon thy brow,
Which can avail thee nothing, save to rouse
The Eternal anger?
Adam. My beloved Cain,
Wilt thou frown even on me?
Cain. No, Adam; no:
I fain would be alone a little while.
Abel, I'm sick at heart; but it will pass:
Precede me, brother—I will follow shortly.
And you, too, sisters, tarry not behind,
Your gentleness must not be harshly met:
I'll follow you anon.
Adam. If not, I will return to seek you here.
Abel. The peace of God be on your spirit, brother!
Cain. (solus.) This is life!—Teil! and wherefore should I toil?—because
My father could not keep his place in Eden. What had I done in this? — I was unborn, I sought not to be born; nor love the state To which that birth has brought me. Why did he Yield to the serpent and the woman? or, Yielding, why suffer? What was there in this? The tree was planted, and why not for him? If not, why place him near it, where it grew The fairest in the centre? They have but One answer to all questions, “twas his will, And he is good.” How know I that? Because He is all-powerful, must all-good, too, follow? I judge but by the fruits—and they are bitter— Which I must feed on for a fault not mine. Whom have we here? — A shape like to the angels, Yet of a sterner and a sadder aspect Of spiritual essence: why do I quake? Why should I fear him more than other spirits, Whom I see daily wave their fiery swords Before the gates round which I linger oft, In twilight’s hour, to catch a glimpse of those Gardens which are my just inheritance, Ere the night closes o’er inhibited walls And the immoral trees which overtop The cherubim-defended battlements? If I shrink from these, the fire-arm’d angels, Why should I quail from him who now approaches? Yet he seems mightier far than they, nor less Beautiful, and yet not all as beautiful As he hath been, and might be: sorrow seems Half of his immortality. And is it So? and can aught grieve save humanity? He cometh. Enter Lucifer.

Lucifer. Mortal! Cain. Spirit, who art thou? Lucifer. Master of spirits. Cain. And being so, canst thou Leave them, and walk with dust? Lucifer. I know the thoughts Of dust, and feel for it, and with you. Cain. You know my thoughts? Lucifer. They are the thoughts of all Worthy of thought: — ’tis thy immortal part Which speaks within you. Cain. What immortal part? This has not been reveal’d: the tree of life Was withheld from us by my father’s folly, While that of knowledge, by my mother’s haste, Was pluck’d too soon; and all the fruit is death! Lucifer. They have deceived thee; thou shalt live, Cain. I live, But live to die: and, living, see no thing To make death hateful, save an inmate clanging, A loathsome and yet all invincible Instinct of life, which I abhor, as I Despise myself, yet cannot overcome— And so I live. Would I had never lived! Lucifer. Thou livest, and must live for ever: think not The earth, which is thine outward cov’ring, is Existence— it will cease, and thou wilt be No less than thou art now Cain. No less and why No more? Lucifer. It may be thou shalt be as we. Cain. And ye? Lucifer. Are everlasting.

Cain. Are ye happy? Lucifer. We are mighty. Cain. Are ye happy? Lucifer. No; art thou? Cain. How should I be so? Look on me! Lucifer. Poor clay! And thou pretendest to be wretched! Thou! Cain. I am:— and thou, with all thy might, what art thou? Lucifer. One who aspired to be what made thee, and Would not have made thee what thou art. Cain. Ah! Thou look’st almost a god; and— Lucifer. I am none, And having fail’d to be one, would be nought Save what I am. He conquer’d; let him reign! Cain. Who? Lucifer. Thy sire’s Maker, and the earth’s. Cain. And heaven, And all that in them is. So I have heard His seraphs sing; and so my father saith. Lucifer. They say— what they must sing an. say, on pain Of being that which I am—and thou art— Of spirits and of men. Cain. And what is that? Lucifer. Souls who dare use their immortality—Souls who dare look the Omnipotent tyrant in His everlasting face, and tell him, that His evil is not good! If he has made, As he saith— which I know not, nor believe— But, if he made us— he cannot unmaké: We are immortal! — nay, he’d have us so, That he may torture: — let him! He is great, But, in his greatness, is no happier than We in our conflict! Goodness would not make Evil; and what else hath he made? But let him Sit on his vast and solitary throne, CREATING WORLDS, to make eternity Less burdonsome to his immense existence And unparticipated solitude! Let him crowd orb on orb: he is alone Indefinite, indissoluble tyrant! Could he but crush himself, ‘twere the best boon He ever granted: but let him reign on, And multiply himself in misery! Spirits and men, at least we sympathize: And, suffering in concert, make our pangs, Innumerable, more endurable, By the unbounded sympathy of all— With all! but He! so wretched in his height, So restless in his wretchedness, must still Create, and re-create— Cain. Thou speak’st to me of things which joy Have swum In visions through my thought: I never could Reconcile what I saw with what I heard. My father and my mother talk to me Of serpents, and of fruits and trees: I see The gates of what they call their Paradise Guarded by fiery-sworded cherubim, Which shut them out, and me: I feel the weight Of daily toil, and constant thought; I look Around a world where I seem nothing, with Thoughts which arise within me, as if they Could master all things:— but I thought alone This misery was mine. — My father is Tamed down; my mother has forgot the mind.
Whose made her thirst for knowledge at the risk
Of an eternal curse; my brother is
A watching shepherd boy, who offers up
The firstlings of the flock to him who bids
The earth yield nothing to us without sweat.

My sister Zillah sings an earlier hymn,
'Than the birds' matins; and my Adah, my Own and beloved, she too understands not
The mind which overwhelms me: never till
Now met I aught to sympathize with me,
"I'm well—! I rather would consort with spirits.

Lucifer. And hadst thou not been fit by thine own soul.
For such companionship, I would not now
Have stood before thee as I am: a serpent
Had been enough to charm ye, as before.

Cain. Ah! didst thou tempt my mother?

Lucifer. I tempt none,
Save with the truth: was not the tree, the tree
Of knowledge? and was not the tree of life
Still fruitful? Did I bid her pluck them not?
Did I plant things prohibited within
The reach of beings innocent, and curious
By their own innocence? I would have made ye
Gods; and even He who thrust ye forth, so thrust ye
Because 'ye should not eat the fruits of life,
And become gods, as we.' Were those his words?

Cain. They were, as I have heard from those who heard them,
In thunder.

Lucifer. Then who was the demon? He Who would not let ye live, or he who would Have made ye live for ever in the joy
And power of knowledge?

Cain. Would they had snatch'd both
The fruits, or neither!

Lucifer. One is yours already;
The other may be still.

Cain. How so?

Lucifer. By being Yourselves, in your resistance. Nothing can Quench the mind, if the mind will be itself
And centre of surrounding things—'tis made to sway.

Cain. But didst thou tempt my parents?

Lucifer. I?

Cain. Poor clay! what should I tempt them for, or how?

Lucifer. They say the serpent was a spirit.

Lucifer. What faith that? It is not written so on high;
The proud One will not so far falsify,
Though man's vast fears and little vanity
Would make him cast upon the spiritual nature
His own low failing. The snake was the snake—
No more; and yet not less than those he tempted,
In nature being earth also—more in wisdom,
Since he could overcome them, and foreknew
The knowledge fatal to their narrow joys.
Think'st thou I'd take the shape of things that die?

Cain. But the thing had a demon?

Lucifer. He but wok one
In those he spake to with his fork tongue.
I tell thee that the serpent was no more
Than a mere serpent: ask the cherubim
Who guard the tempting tree. When thousand ages
Have rol'd o'er your dead ashes, and your seed's,
The seed of the then world may thus array
Their earliest fault in fable, and attribute
To me a shape I scorn, as I scorn all

That bows to him, who made things but to bend
Before his will, sole eternity;
But we, who see the truth, must speak it. Thy Counsel parents listen'd to a creeping thing,
And fell. For what should spirits tempt them? What
Was there to envy in the narrow bounds
Of Paradise, that spirits who pervade
Space—but I speak to thee of what thou know'st
Not, with all thy tree of knowledge.

Cain. But thou canst not Speak aught of knowledge which I would not know.
And do not thirst to know, and bear a mind
To know.

Lucifer. And heart to look on?

Cain. Be it proved.

Lucifer. Dar'st thou to look on Death?

Cain. He has not ye.

Lucifer. But must be undergone.

Cain. My father
Says he is something dreadful, and my mother
Weeps when he is named; and Abel lifts his eyes
To heaven, and Zillah casts her to the earth,
And sighs a prayer; and Adah looks on me,
And speaks not.

Lucifer. And thou?

Cain. Thoughts unspeakable.

Crowd in my breast to burning, when I hear
Of this Almighty Death, who is, it seems Inevitable. Could I wrestle with him?
I wrestled with the lion, when a boy
In play, till he ran roaring from my gripe.

Lucifer. It has no shape; but will absorb all Things
That bear the form of earth-born being.

Cain. Ah!

thought it was a being: who could do
Such evil things to beings save a being?

Lucifer. Ask the Destroyer.

Cain. Who?

Lucifer. The Maker—call him

Which name thou wilt: he makes but to destroy.

Cain. I knew not that, yet thought it, since I Heard
Of death: although I know not what it is,
Yet it seems horrible. I have look'd out
In the vast desolate night in search of him;
And when I saw gigantic shadows in
The umbrage of the walls of Eden, checker'd
By the far-flashing of the cherub's swords,
I watch'd for what I thought his coming; for
With fear rose longing in my heart to know
What 'twas which shook us all—but nothing came.
And then I turn'd my weary eyes from off
Our native and forbidden Paradise,
Up to the lights above us, in the azure,
Which are so beautiful: shall they, too, die.

Lucifer. Perhaps—but long onlire both thou
And thee.

Cain. I'm glad of that; I would not have them die.
They are so lovely. What is death? I fear,
I feel, it is a dreadful thing; but what,
I cannot compass; 'tis denounced against us,
Both them who sin'nd and sin'nd not, as an ill—

What ill?

Lucifer. To be resolved into the earth

Cain. But shall I know it?

Lucifer. As I know not death
I cannot answer.
Cain. Were I quiet earth,
That were no evil: would I ne'er had been Aught else but dust!
Lucifer. That is a grov'ling wish,
Less than thy father's, for he wish'd to know.
Cain. But not to live, or wherefore pluck'd he not
The life-tree?
Lucifer. He was hinder'd.
Cain. Deadly error!
Not to snatch first that fruit—but ere he pluck'd
The knowledge, he was ignorant of death.
Alas! I scarcely now know what it is,
And yet I fear it—fear I know not what!
Lucifer. And I, who know all things, fear nothing; so
What is true knowledge.
Cain. Wilt thou teach me all?
Lucifer 'Ay,' upon one condition.
Cain. Name it.
Lucifer. Thou dost fall down and worship me—thy Lord.
Cain. Thou art not the Lord my father worships.
Lucifer. No.
Cain. His equal?
Lucifer. No; I have nought in common with him!
Nor would: I would be aught above—beneath—
Aught save a sharer or a servant of his power. I dwell apart: but I am great;—
Many there are who worship me, and more
Who shall—be thou among the first.
Cain. I never
As yet have bow'd unto my father's God,
Although my brother Abel oft implores
That I would join with him in sacrifice:—
Why should I bow to thee?
Lucifer. Hast thou ne'er bow'd
To him?
Cain. Have I not said it!—need I say it?
Could not thy mighty knowledge teach thee that?
Lucifer. He who bows not to him has bow'd to me:
Cain. But I will bend to neither.
Lucifer. Ne'er the less
Thou art my worshipper; not worshipping
Him makes thee mine the same.
Cain. And what is that?
Lucifer. Thou'lt know here—and hereafter.
Cain. Let me but
Be taught the mystery of my being.
Lucifer. Follow
Where I will lead thee.
Cain. But I must retire
To till the earth—for I had promised—
Lucifer. 'What!
Cain. To cloot some first-fruits,
Lucifer. Why?
Cain. To offer up
With Abel on an altar.
Lucifer. Saidst thou not
Hath ne'er had bent to him who made thee?
Cain. Yes—
But Abel's earnest prayer wrought upon me;
The offering is more his than mine—and Adah—
Lucifer. Why dost thou hesitate?
Cain. She is my sister,
Born on the same day, of the same womb; and
She wrung from me, with tears, this promise; and
Rather than see her weep, I would methinks,
Bear all—and worship aught.
Lucifer. Then follow me.
Cain. I will.
Enter Adah.
Adah. My brother, I have come for thee;
it is our hour of rest and joy—and we Have less without thee. Thou hast labor'd not
This morn; but I have done thy task: the fruits
Are ripe and glowing as the light wh. a ripens;
Come away.
Cain. See'st thou not?
Adah. I see an angel;
We have seen many: will he share our hour
Of rest—he is welcome.
Cain. But he is not like
The angels we have seen.
Adah. Are there, then, others?
But he is welcome, as they were: they deign'd
To be our guests—will he?
Cain. (to Lucifer.) Wilt thou?
Lucifer. I ask
Thee to be mine.
Cain. I must away with him.
Adah. And leave us?
Cain. Ay!
Adah. And me?
Cain. Beloved Adah.
Adah. Let me go with thee?
Lucifer. No, she must not.
Adah. Who
Art thou that steppeth between heart and heart?
Cain. He is a god.
Adah. How know'st thou?
Cain. He speaks like
A god.
Adah. So did the serpent, and it lied.
Lucifer. Thou earnest, Adah!—was not the tree that
Of knowledge?
Adah. Ay—to our eternal sorrow.
Lucifer. And yet that grief was knowledge—so he lied not:
And if he did betray you, 'twas with truth;
And truth in its own essence cannot be
But good.
Adah. But all we know of it has gather'd
Evil on ill: expulsion from our home,
And dread, and toil, and sweat, and heaviness:
Remorse of that which was—and hope of that
Which cometh not. Cain! walk not with this spirit
Bear with what we have borne, and love me—
Love thee.
Lucifer. More than thy mother, and thy sire?
Adah. I do. Is that a sin, too?
Lucifer. No, not yet.
It one day will be in your children.
Adah. What!
Must not my daughter love her brother Enoch?
Lucifer. Not as thou lovest Cain.
Adah. Oh, my God
Shall they not love and bring forth things that love,
Out of their love? have they not drawn their milk
Out of this bosom? was not he, their father,
Born of the same sole womb, in the same hour
With me? did we not love each other? and
In multiplying our being multiply
Things which will love each other as we love
Them? And as I love thee, my Cain! go not Forth with this spirit; he is not of ours.
BYRON'S WORKS.

Lucifer. The sin I speak of is not of my making; And cannot be a sin in you—whate'er It seem in those who will replace ye in Mortality.

Adah. What is the sin which is not Sin in itself? Can circumstance make sin Or virtue—if it doth, we are the slaves Of—

Lucifer. Higher things than ye are slaves; and higher Than them or ye would be so, did they not Prefer an independence of torture To the smooth agonies of adulation In hymns and harpings, anp self-seeking prayers T. that which is omnipotent because It is omnipotent, and not from love, But terror and self-hope.

Adah. Omnipotence Must be all goodness.

Lucifer. Was it so in Eden?

Adah. Fiend! tempt me not with beauty; thou art fairer Than was the serpent, and as false. Lucifer. As true.

Ask Eve, your mother: bears she not the knowledge Of good and evil?

Adah. Oh, my mother! thou Hast p'uck'd a fruit more fatal to thine offspring Than a to thyself; thou at the least hast past Thy youth in Paradise, in innocent And happy intercourse with happy spirits; But we, thy children, ignorant of Eden, Are girt about by demons, who assume The words of God, and tempt us with our own Dissatisfied and curious thoughts—as thou Wert work'd on by the snake, in thy most flush'd And heedless, harmless wantonness of bliss. I cannot answer this immortal thing Which stands before me; I cannot abhor him; I look upon him with a pleasing fear, And yet I fly not from him; in his eye There is a fastening attraction which Fixes my fluttering eyes on his; my heart Beats quick; he awes me, and yet draws me near, Nearer and nearer.—Cain—Cain—save me from him! Cain. What dreads my Adah? This is no ill spirit.

Adah. He is not God—nor God's: I have beheld The cherubs and the seraphs: he looks not Like them.

Cain. But there are spirits loftier still— The archangels. Lucifer. And still loftier than the archangels. Adah. Ay—but not blessed. Lucifer. If the blessedness Consists in slavery—no.

Adah. I have heard it said, I he seraphs love most—cherubim know most— And this should be a cherub—since he loves not. Lucifer. And if the higher knowledge quenches love, What must he be you cannot love when known? Since the all-knowing cherubim love least, The seraphs' love can be but ignorance: That they are not compatible, the doom Of thy fond parents, for their daring, prove. Choose betwixt love and knowledge—since there is No other choice: your sire hath chosen already: Whis worship is but fear.

Adah. Oh, Cain! choose love.

Cain. For thee, my Adah, I choose not—it was Born with me—but I love nought else. Adah. Our parents. Cain. Did they love us when they snatch'd from the tree That which hath driven us all from Paradise?

Adah. We were not born then—and if we had been, Should we not love them and our children, Cain? Cain. My little Enoch! and his lisping sister. Could I but deem them happy, I would half Forget—but it can never be forgotten Through thrice a thousand generations! never Shall men love the remembrance of the man Who sow'd the seed of evil and mankind In the same hour! They pluck'd the tree of science And sin—and, not content with their own sorrow, Begot me—thee—and all the few that are, And all the unnumber'd and innumerable Multitudes, millions, myriads, which may be, To inherit agonies accumulated By ages!—and J must be sure of such things. Thy beauty and thy love—my love and joy, The rapturous moment and the placid hour, All we love in our children and each other, But lead them and ourselves through many years Of sin and pain—or few, but still of sorrow, Interecheek'd with an instant of brief pleasure, To Death—the unknown! Methinks the tree of knowledge Hath not fulfill'd its promise—if they sin'd, At least they ought to have known all things that are Of knowledge—and the mystery of death. What do they know?—that they are miserable. What need of snakes and fruits to teach us that? Adah. I am not wretched, Cain, and if thou Wert happy—

Cain. Be thou happy then alone— I will have nought to do with happiness, Which humbles me and mine.

Adah. Alone I could not, Nor would be happy; but with those around us, I think I could be so, despite of death, Which, as I know it not, I dread not, though It seems an awful shadow—if I may Judge from what I have heard. Lucifer. And thou couldst not Alone, thou say'st be happy?

Adah. Alone! Oh, my God! Who could be happy and alone, or good? To me my solitude seems sin, unless When I think how soon I shall see my brother, His brother, and our children, and our parents. Lucifer. Yet thy God is alone, and is he hap Lonely and good?

Adah. He is not so; he hath The angels and the mortals to make happy, And thus becomes so in diffusing joy? What else can joy be but the spreading joy? Lucifer. Ask of your sire, the exile fresh From Eden; Of his first-born son; ask your own heart; It is not tranquil.

Adah. Alas! no! and you— Are you of heaven?

Lucifer. If I am not, inquire The cause of this all-spreadting happiness (Which you proclaim) of the all-great and good
We breathe not by a mortal measurement—
But that's a mystery. Cain, come on with me
Adah. Will he return?
Lucifer. Ay, woman! he alone
Of mortals from that place (the first and last Who shall return, save One)—shall come back to thee
To make that silent and expectant world
As populous as this: at present there
Are few inhabitants.
Adah. Where dwellest thou?
Lucifer. Throughout all space. Where should I dwell? Where are Thy God or Gods—there am I: all things are Divided with me; life and death—and time—
Eternity—and heaven and earth—and that
Which is not heaven nor earth, but peopled with Those who once peopled or shall people both—
These are my realms! So that I do divide
H's, and possess a kingdom which is not
H's. If I were not that which I have said,
Could I stand here? His angels are within Your vision.
Adah. So they were when the fair serpent
Spoke with our mother first.
Lucifer. Cain! thou hast heard.
If thou dost long for knowledge, I can satiate
That thirst; nor ask thee to partake of fruits
Which shall deprive thee of a single good
The conqueror has left thee. Follow me.
Cain. Spirit, I have said it.

[Exeunt Lucifer and Cain
Adah (follows, exclaiming) Cain! my brother
Cain!

ACT II.

SCENE I.

The Abyss of Space.

Cain. I tread on air, and sink not; yet I feel
To sink.
Lucifer. Have faith in me, and thou shalt be Borne on the air, of which I am the prince.
Cain. Can I do so without impiety?
Lucifer. Believe—and sink not! doubt—and perish! thus
Would run the edict of the other God,
Who names me demon to his angels; they
Echo the sound to miserable things,
Which, knowing nought beyond their shallowsenses.
Worship the word which strikes their ear, and deemed Evil or good what is proclaimed to them
In their abasement. I will have none such:
Worship or worship not, thou shalt behold
The worlds beyond thy little world, nor be Amenced, for doubts beyond thy little life,
With torture of my doomings. There will come
An hour, when, tossed upon some water-drops,
A man shall say to a man, "Believe in me,
And walk the waters;" and the man shall walk
The billows and be safe. I will not say,
Believe in me, as a conditional creed
To save thee; but fly with me o'er the gulf
Of space an equal flight, and I will show
What thou dar'st not deny, the history
Of past, and present, and of future worlds.

Cain. Oh, god, or demon, or what'ere thou art,
Is yon our earth?

Lucifer. Dost thou not recognise
The dust which form'd your father ?

Cain. Can it be ?
You small blue circle, swinging in far ether,
With an inferior circle near it still,
Which looks like that which lit our earthly night?
Is this our Paradise? Where are its walls,
And they who guard them?

Lucifer. Point me out the site
Of Paradise.

Cain. How should I? As we move
Like sunbeams onward, it grows small and smaller,
And as it waxes little, and then less,
Gathers a halo round it, like the light
Which shone the roundest of the stars when I
Beheld them from the skirts of Paradise:
Methinks they both, as we recede from them,
Appear to join the innumerable stars
Which are around us; and, as we move on,
Intense their myriads.

Lucifer. And if there should be
Worlds greater than thine own, inhabited
By greater things, and they themselves far more
In number than the dust of thy dull earth,
Though multiplied to animated atoms,
All living, and all doom'd to death, and wretched,
What wouldst thou think?

Cain. I should be proud of thought
Which knew such things.

Lucifer. But if that high thought were Link'd to a servile mass of matter, and,
Knowing such things, aspiring to such things,
And science still beyond them, were chain'd down
To the most gross and petty paltry wants,
All foul and flesome, and the very best
Of thine enjoyments a sweet degradation,
A most energizing and filthy cheat,
To lure thee on to the renewal
Of fresh souls and bodies, all foredoom'd to be
As frail, and few so happy——

Cain. Spirit! I
Know nought of death, save as a dreadful thing
Of which I have heard my parents speak, as of
A hideous heritage I owe to them
No less than life; a heritage not happy,
If I may judge till now. But, spirit! if
It be as thou hast said, (and I within Feel the prophetic torture of its truth,) Here let me die: for to give birth to those Who can but suffer many years, and die,
Methinks is merely propagating death,
And multiplying murder.

Lucifer. Thou canst not
All die — there is what must survive.

Cain. The Other
Spake not of this unto my father, when
He shut him forth from Paradise, with death
Written upon his forehead. But at least
Let what is mortal of me perish, that I may be in the rest as angels are.

Lucifer. I am angelic: wouldst thou be as I am?

Cain. I know not what thou art: I see thy power,
And see thou show'st me things beyond my power,
Beyond all power of my born faculties,
Although inferior still to my desires

And my conceptions.

Lucifer. What are they, which doth
So humbly in their pride, as to sojourn
With worms in clay?

Cain. And what art thou who dwellest
So haughtily in spirit, and castst range
Nature and immortality — and yet
Seem'st sorrowful?

Lucifer. I seem that, which I am;
And therefore do I ask of thee, if thou
Wouldst be immortal?

Cain. Thou hast said, I must be
Im mortal in despite of me. I knew not
This until lately — but since it must be,
Let me, or happy or unhappy, learn
To anticipate my immortality.

Lucifer. Thou didst before I came upon thee.

Cain. How?

Lucifer. By suffering.

Cain. And must torture be immortal?

Lucifer. We and thy sons will try. But now behold;

Is it not glorious?

Cain. Oh, thou beautiful
And unimaginable ether! and
Ye multiplying masses of increased
And still increasing lights! what are ye? what
Is this blue wilderness of interminable
Air, where ye roll along, as I have seen
The leaves along the limpid streams of Eder?
Is your course measured for ye? Or do ye
Sweep on in your unbounded revelry
Through an aerial universe of endless
Expansion, at which my soul aches to think,
Intoxicated with eternity?
Oh God! Oh Gods! or whatsoe'er ye are!
How beautiful ye are! how beautiful
Your works, or accidents, or whatsoe'er
They may be! Let me die, as atoms die,
(If that they die,) or know ye in your might
And knowledge! My thoughts are not in this hour
Unworthy what I see, though my dust is;
Spirit! let me expire, or see them nearer.

Lucifer. Art thou not nearer? look back to thine earth!

Cain. Where is it? I see nothing save a mass
Of most innumerable lights.

Lucifer. Look there!

Cain. I cannot see it.

Lucifer. Yet it sparkles still.

Cain. That, yonder!

Lucifer. Yea.

Cain. And wilt thou tell me so?

Why I have seen the fire-flies and fire-worms
Sprinkle the dusky groves and the green banks
In the dim twilight, brighter than your world
Which bears them.

Lucifer. Thou hast seen both worms and worlds,
Each bright and sparkling — what dost think of them?

Cain. That they are beautiful in their own sphere,
And that the night, which makes both beautiful,
The little shining fire-fly in its flight,
And the immortal star in its great course,
Must both be guided.

Lucifer. But by whom or what?

Cain. Show me.

Lucifer. Dar'st thou behold?

Cain. How know I what
Lucifer. On, then, with me. Wouldst thou behold things mortal or immortal? Cain. Why, what are things? Lucifer. Both partly: but what doth Sit next thy heart? Cain. The things I see. Lucifer. But what Safe nearest it? Cain. The things I have not seen, Nor ever shall—the mysteries of death. Lucifer. What, if I show to thee things which have died, As I have shown thee much which cannot die? Cain. Do so. Lucifer. Away, then! on our mighty wings. Cain. Oh! how we cleave the blue! The stars fade from us! The earth! where is my earth? let me look on it, For I was made of it. Lucifer. 'Tis now beyond thee, Long's in the universe, thou in it: Yet seem not that thou canst escape it; thou Shalt soon return to earth, and all its dust; 'Tis part of thy eternity, and mine. Cain. Where dost thou lead me? Lucifer. To what was before thee! The phantasm of the world; of which thy world Is but the wretch. Cain. What! is it not then new? Lucifer. No more than life is; and that was ere thou Or I were, or the things which seem to us Greater than either: many things will have No end; and some, which would pretend to have Had no beginning, have had one as mean As thou: and mightier things have been extinct To make way for much meaner than we can Surmise; for moments only and the space Have been and must be all unchangeable. But changes make not death, except to clay; But thou art clay—and canst but comprehend That which was clay, and such thou shalt behold. Cain. Clay. spirit! What thou wilt, I can survey. Lucifer. Away, then! Cain. But the lights fade from me fast, And some till now grew larger as we approach'd, And were the look of worlds. Lucifer. And such they are. Cain. And Edens in them? Lucifer. It may be. Cain. And men? Lucifer. Yea, or things higher. Cain. Ay! and serpents too? Lucifer. Wouldst thou have men without them? must no reptiles Breathe save the erect ones? Cain. How the lights recede! Where fly we? Lucifer. To the world of phantoms, which A e beings past, and shadows still to come. Cain. But it grows dark, and dark—the stars are gone! Lucifer. And yet thou seeest. Cain. 'Tis a fearful light! No sun, no moon, no lights innumerables; The very blue of the empyrean night Fades to a tawdry twilight, yet I see

Huge dusky masses; but unlike the worlds We were approaching, which, begirt with light, Sec'nd full of life even when their atmosphere Of light gave way, and shew'd them taking shapes Unequal, of deep valleys and vast mountains; And some emitting sparks, and some displaying Enormous liquid plains, and some begirt With luminous belts, and floating moons, which too Like them the features of fair earth.—instead, All here seems dark and dreadful. Lucifer. But distinct. Thou seek'st to behold death and dead things? Cain. I seek it not; but as I know there are Such, and that my sire's sin makes him and me. And all that we inherit, liable To such, I would behold at once, what I Must one day see perforce. Lucifer. Behold! Cain. 'Tis darkness. Lucifer. And so it shall be ever; but we will Unfold its gates! Cain. Enormous vapors roll Apart—what's this? Lucifer. Enter! Cain. Can I return? Lucifer. Return! be sure: how else should death be peopled? Its present realm is thin to what it will be, Through thee and thine. Cain. The clouds still open wide And wider, and make widening circles round us Lucifer. Advance! Cain. And thou? Lucifer. Fear not! without me thou Couldst not have gone beyond thy world. On! on! [They disappear through the clouds

SCENE II.

Hades.

Enter Lucifer and Cain.

Cain. How silent and how vast are these dim worlds! For they seem more than one, and yet more peopled Than the huge brilliant luminous orbs which swung So thickly in the upper air, that I Had deem'd them rather the bright populace Of some all unimaginable heaven Than things to be inhabited themselves, But that on drawing near them I beheld Their swelling into palpable immensity Of matter, which seem'd made for life to dwell on, Rather than life itself. But here, all is So shadowy and so full of twilight, that It speaks of a day past. Lucifer. It is the realm Of death.—Wouldst have it present? Cain. Till I know That which it really is, I cannot answer. But if it be as I have heard my father Deal'd out in his long homilies, 'tis a thing— Oh God! I dare not think on't! Cursed be He who invented life that leads to death! Or the dull mass of life, that being life Could not retain, but needs must forfeit it— Even for the innocent! Lucifer. Dost thou curse thy father?
Cain. Cursed me not me in giving me my birth? Cursed he not me before my birth, in daring To pluck the fruit forbidden? Lucifer. Thou say'st well. The curse is mutual 'twixt thy sire and thee— But for thy sons and brother? Cain. Let them share it With me, their sire and brother! What else is Bequeath'd to me? I leave them my inheritance. Oh ye interminable gloomy realms Of swimming shadows and enormous shapes, Some fully shown, some indistinct, and all Mighty and melancholy—what are ye? 'Tis ye, or have ye lived? Lucifer. Somewhat of both. Cain. Then what is death? Lucifer. What? hath not he who made ye Said 'tis another life? Cain. Till now he hath Said nothing, save that all shall die. Lucifer. Perhaps He one day will. unfold that further secret. Cain. Happy the day! Lucifer. Yes, happy! when unfolded Through agonies unspeakable, and clogg'd With agonies eternal, to innumerable Yet unborn myriads of unconscious atoms, All to be animz'd for this only! Cain. What are these mighty phantoms which I see Floating about me?—they wear not the form Of the intelligences I have seen Round our regretted and unenter'd Eden, Nor wear the form of man as I have view'd it In Adam's and in Abel's, and in mine, Nor in my sister-bride's, nor in my children's: And yet they have an aspect, which, though not Of men nor angels, looks like something, which, If not the last, rose higher than the first, Haughty and high, and beautiful, and full Of seeming strength, but of inexplicable Shape, for I never saw such. They bear not The wing of seraph, nor the face of man, Nor form of mightiest brute, nor sought that is Not breathing; mighty yet and beautiful As the most beautiful and mighty which Live, and yet so unlike them, that I scarce Can call them living. Lucifer. Yet they lived. Cain. Where? Lucifer. Where Thou livest. Cain. When? Lucifer. On what thou callest earth They did inhabit. Cain. Adam is the first. Lucifer. Of thine, I grant thee—but too mean to be The last of these. Cain. And what are they? Lucifer. That which Thou shalt be. Cain. But what were they? Lucifer. Living high, Intelligent, good, great, and glorious things, As much superior unto all thy sire, Adam, could ere have been in Eden, as The sixty-thousandth generation shall be In its dull damp degeneracy, to Thee and thy son;—and how weak they are, judge By thy own flesh. Cain. Ah me! and did they perish? Lucifer. Yes, from their earth, as thou wilt fade from thine. Cain. But was mine theirs? Lucifer. It was. Cain. But not as now, It is too little and too lowly to Sustain such creatures. Lucifer. True, it was more glorious Cain. And wherefore did it fall? Lucifer. Ask him who fails Cain. But how? Lucifer. By a most crushing and inexorable Destruction and disorder of the elements, Which struck a world to chaos, as a chaos Subsiding has struck out a world: such things, Though rare in time, are frequent in eternity. Pass on, and gaze upon the past. Cain. 'Tis awful! Lucifer. And true. Behold these phantoms! they were once Material as thou art. Cain. And must I be Like them? Lucifer. Let he who made thee answer that. I show thee what thy predecessors are, And what they were thou feelest, in degree Inferior as thy petty feelings and Thy pettier portion of the immortal part Of high intelligence and earthly strength. What ye in common have with what they had Is life, and what ye shall have—death; the rest Of your poor attributes is such as suits Reptiles engender'd out of the subsiding Slime of a mighty universe, crush'd into A scarcely-yet shaped planet, peopled with Things whose enjoyment was to be in blindness— A Paradise of Ignorance, from which Knowledge was barr'd as poison. But behold What these superior beings are or were; Or, if it irk thee, turn thee back and till The earth, thy task—I'll waft thee there in safety. Cain. No: I'll stay here. Lucifer. How long? Cain. For ever! since I must one day return here from the earth, I rather would remain; I am sick of all That dust has shown me—let me dwell in shadows. Lucifer. It cannot be: thou now holdest as A vision that which is reality. To make thyself fit for this dwelling, thou Must pass through what the things thou see'st have pass'd. The gate of death. Cain. By what gate have we enter'd Even now? Lucifer. By mine! but, plighted to return, My spirit buoy'd thee up to breathe in regions Where all is breathless save thyself. Gaze on; But do not think to dwell here till thine hour Is come. Cain. And these, too; can they ne'er repose To earth again? Lucifer. Their earth is gone for ever— So changed by its convulsion, they would not Be conscious to a single present spot Of its new scarcely harden'd surface—'twas— Oh, what a beautiful world it was!
CAIN.

And is.

it is not with the earth, though I must till it,
I feel at war, but that I may not profit
By what it bears of beautiful untoiling,
Nor gratify my thousand swelling thoughts
With knowledge, nor allay my thousand fears
Of death and life.

Lucifer. What thy world is, thou seest,
But cannot comprehend the shadow of
That which it was.

CAIN. And those enormous creatures,
Phantoms inferior in intelligence
(At least so seeming) to the things we have pass'd,
Resembling somewhat the wild inhabitants
Of the deep woods of earth, the hugest which Roar nightly in the forest, but tenfold
In magnitude and terror: taller than
The cherub-guarded walls of Eden, with Eyes flashing like the fiery swords which fence them,
And tusked wall things like the trees strip'd of Their bark and branches—what were they?

Lucifer. That which
The Mammoth in thy world;—but these lie
By myriads underneath its surface.

CAIN. But
None on it?

Lucifer. No; for thy frail race to war
With them would render the curse on it useless—
'Twould be destroy'd so early.

CAIN. But why war?

Lucifer. You have forgotten the denunciation
Which drove your race from Eden—war with all things,
And death to all things, and disease to most things,
And pangs, and bitterness; those were the fruits
Of the forbidden tree.

CAIN. But animals—

Lucifer. Your Maker told ye, they were made for you,
As you for him.—You would not have their doom
Superior to your own? Had Adam not Fallen, all had stood.

CAIN. Alas! the hopeless wretches!
They too must share my sire's fate, like his sons;
Like them, too, without having shared the apple;
Like them, too, without the so dear-bought knowledge!

It was a lying tree—for we know nothing.

At least it promised knowledge at the price
Of death—but knowledge still: but what knows man?

Lucifer. It may be death leads to the highest knowledge;

And bethreaded with the sole thing certain,
At least leads to the sweetest science; therefore
The tree was true, though deadly.

CAIN. These dim realms! I see them, but I know them not.

Lucifer. Because

Thy hour is yet afar, and matter cannot Comprehend spirit wholly—but 'tis something
To know there are such realms

CAIN. We knew already

That there was death.

Lucifer. But not what was beyond it.

CAIN. Nor know I now.

Lucifer. Thou knowest that there is
A state, and many'states beyond thine own—
And this thou knowest not this morn.
Byron's Works.

Cain. And wherefore didst thou
Lead me here only to inform me this?
Lucifer. Was not thy quest for knowledge?
Cain. Yes: as being
The road to happiness.
Lucifer. If truth be so,
Thou hast it.
Cain. Then my father's God did well
When he prohibited the fatal tree.
Lucifer. But had done better in not planting it
But ignorance of evil doth not save
From evil; it must still roll on the same
A part of all things.
Cain. Not of all things. No:
I'll not believe it—for I thirst for good.
Lucifer. And who and what doth not? Who covets evil
For its own bitter sake?—None—nothing! 'tis
The leaven of all life, and lifelessness.
Cain. Within those glorious orbs which we behold,
Distant and dazzling, and innumerable,
 Ere we came down into this phantom realm,
I'll cannot come: they are too beautiful.
Lucifer. Thou hast seen them from afar.
Cain. And what of that?
Distance can but diminish glory—they
When nearer must be more ineffable.
Lucifer. Approach the things of earth most beautiful,
And judge their beauty near.
Cain. I have done this—the loveliest thing I know is loveliest nearest.
Lucifer. Then there must be delusion—what is
That
Which being nearest to thine eyes is still
More beautiful than beauteous things remote?
Cain. My sister Adah.—All the stars of heaven,
The deep blue noon of night, lit by an orb
Which looks a spirit, or a spirit's world—
The hues of twilight—the sun's gorgeous coming—
His setting indescribable, which fills
My eyes with pleasant tears, as I behold
Him sink, and feel my heart float softly with him
Along that western paradise of clouds—
The forest shade—the green bough—the bird's voice—
The vesper bird's, which seems to sing of love,
And mingleth with the song of cherubim,
As the day closes over Eden's walls:—
All these are nothing, to my eyes and heart,
Like Adah's face: I turn from earth and heaven
To gaze on it.
Lucifer. 'Tis frail as fair mortality,
In the first dawn and bloom of young creation,
And earliest embraces of earth's parents,
Can make its offspring; still it is delusion.
Cain. You think so, being not her brother.
Lucifer. Mortal!
My brotherhood's with those who have no children.
Cain. Then thou canst have no fellowship with us.
Lucifer. It may be that thine own shall be for me.
But if thou dost possess a beautiful
Being beyond all beauty in thine eyes,
Why art thou wretched?
Cain. Why do I exist?
Why art thou wretched? why are all things so?
Ev'n he who made us must be, as the maker
Of things unhappy! To produce destruction
Can surely never be the task of joy,
And yet my sire says he's omnipotent,
Then why is evil—he being good? I ask'd
This question of my father: and he said,
Because this evil only was the path
To good. Strange good, that must arise from out
Its deadly opposite. I lately saw
A lamb stung by a reptile: the poor suckling
Lay foaming on the earth, beneath the vain
And piteous bleeding of its restless dam;
My father pluck'd some herbs, and laid them to
The wound; and by degrees the helpless wretch
Resumed its careless life, and rose to drain
The mother's milk, who o'er it tremulous
Stood licking its reviving limbs with joy.
Behold, my son! said Adam, how from evil
Springs good!
Lucifer. What didst thou answer?
Cain. Nothing; for
He is my father: but I thought, that 'twere
A better portion for the animal
Never to have been stung at all, than to Purchase renewal of its little life.
With agonies unutterable, though
Dispell'd by antidotes.
Lucifer. But as thou saidst
Of all beloved things thou lovest her
Who shared thy mother's milk, and giveth her
Unto thy children—
Cain. Most assuredly:
What should I be without her?
Lucifer. What am I?
Cain. Dost though love nothing?
Lucifer. What does thy God love?
Cain. All things, my father says: but I confess
I see it not in their allotment here.
Lucifer. And, therefore, thou canst not see if I love
Or no, except some vast and general purpose,
To which particular things must melt like snows.
Cain. Snows! what are they?
Lucifer. Be happier in not knowing
What thy remoter offspring must encounter;
But bask beneath the clime which knows no winter!
Cain. But dost thou not love something like thyself?
Lucifer. And dost thou love thyself?
Cain. Yes, but love more
What makes my feelings more endurable,
And is more than myself, because I love it.
Lucifer. Thou lovest it, because 'tis beautiful,
As was the apple in thy mother's eye;
And when it ceases to be so, thy love
Will cease, like any other appetite.
Cain. Cease to be beautiful? how can that be?
Lucifer. With time.
Cain. But time has past, and hitherto
Even Adam and my mother both are fair:
Not fair like Adah and the seraphim—
But very fair.
Lucifer. All that must pass away
In them and her.
Cain. I'm sorry for it; but Cannot conceive my love for her the less.
And when her beauty disappears, methinks
He who creates all beauty will lose more
Than me in seeing perish such a work.
Lucifer. I pity thee who lovest what must perish
Cain. And I thee who lov'st nothing.
Lucifer. And thy brother—
For what?
Lucifer. To reign.
Cain. Did ye not all me th
Ye are both eternal?
Lucifer. Yea!
Cain. And what I have seen,
You blue immensity, is boundless?
Lucifer. Ay.
Cain. And cannot ye both reign then?—is ther
Not Enough?—why should ye differ?
Lucifer. We both reign.
Cain. But one of you makes evil.
Lucifer. Which?
Cain. Thou! for
If thou canst do man good, why dost thou not?
Lucifer. And why not who he made? I made ye
not.
Ye are his creatures, and not mine.
Cain. Then leave us
His creatures, as thou say'st we are, or show me
Thy dwelling, or his dwelling.
Lucifer. I could show thee
Both; but the time will come thou shalt see one
Of them for evermore.
Cain. And why not now?
Lucifer. Thy human mind hath scarcely grasp to gather
The little I have shown thee into calm
And clear thought; and thou wouldst go on aspiring
To the great double Mysteries! the two Principles
And gaze upon them on their secret throne!
Dust! limit thy ambition; for to see
Either of these, would be for thee to perish!
Cain. And let me perish, so I see them!
Lucifer. There
The son of her who snatch'd the apple spake!
But thou wouldst only perish, and not see them
That sight is for the other state.
Cain. Of death?
Lucifer. That is the prelude.
Cain. Then I dread it less,
Now that I know it leads to something definite.
Lucifer. And now I will convey thee to thy world,
Where thou shalt multiply the race of Adam,
Eat, drink, toil, tremble, laugh, weep, sleep, and die.
Cain. And to what end have I beheld these things
Which thou hast shown me?
Lucifer. Didst thou not require
Knowledge? And have I not, in what I show'd,
Taught thee to know thyself?
Cain. Alas! I seem
Nothing.
Lucifer. And this should be the human sum
Of knowledge, to know mortal nature's nothingness
Bequeath that science to thy children, and
'Twill spare them many tortures.
Cain. Haughty spirit!
Thou spakest it proudly; but thyself, though proud,
Hast a superior.
Lucifer. No! By heaven, which He Holds, and the abyss, and the immensity
Of worlds and life, which I hold with him—No!
I have a victor—true; but no superior.
Homage he has from all—but none from me;
I battle it against him, as I battled
In highest heaven. Through all eternity
And the unfathomable gulfs of Hades,
And the interminable realms of space.

Blits he not near thy heart?.
Cain. Why should he not?
Lucifer. Thy father loves him well—so does thy God.
Cain. And so do I.
Lucifer. 'Tis well and meekly done.
Cain. Mockly!
Lucifer. He is the second born of flesh,
And his mother's favorite.
Cain. Let him keep
Her favor, since the serpent was the first
To win it:
Lucifer. And his father's.
Cain. What is that
To me? should I not love that which all love?
Lucifer. And the Jehovah—the indulgent Lord
And bounteous planter of b'ard Paradise—
He, too, looks smilingly on Abel.
Cain. I
Ne'er saw him, and I know not if he smiles.
Lucifer. But you have seen his angels.
Cain. Rarely.
Lucifer. But Sufficiently to see they love your brother:
His sacrifices are acceptable.
Cain. So be they! wherefore speak to me of this?
Lucifer. Because thou hast thought of this ere now.
Cain. And if have thought, why recall a thought that—(he pauses as agitated)—Spirit!
Here we are in thy world; speak not of mine.
Thou hast shown me wonders; thou hast shown me those
Mighty Pre-Adamites who walk'd the earth
Of which ours is the wreck; thou hast pointed out
Myriads of starry worlds, of which our own
Is the dim and remote companion, in Infinity of life: thou hast shown me shadows
Of that existence with the dreaded name
Which my sire brought us—Death; thou hast shown me much—
But not all: show me where Jehovah dwells,
In his especial Paradise—or thine
Where is it?
Lucifer. Here, and o'er all space.
Cain. But ye
Have some allotted dwelling—as all things;
Clay has its earth, and other worlds their tenants;
All temporary breathing creatures their Peculiar element; and things which have Long ceased to breathe our breath, have theirs,
thou say'st;
And the Jehovah and thyself have thine—
Ye do not dwell together?
Lucifer. No, we reign
Together; but our dwellings are asunder.
Cain. Would there were only one of ye! perchance
An unity of purpose might make union
In elements which seem now jarr'd in storms.
How came ye, being spirits, wise and infinite,
To separate? Are ye not as brethren in
Your essence, and your nature, and your glory?
Lucifer. Art thou not Abel's brother?
Cain. We are brethren,
And so we shall remain; but were it not so,
Is spirit like to flesh? can it fall out?
Infinity with Immortality—
Jarring and turning space to misery—
And the infinity of endless ages,
All, all, will I dispute! And world by world,
And star by star, and universe by universe
Shall tremble in the balance, till the great
Conflict shall cease, if ever it shall cease,
Which it ne'er shall, till he or I be quenched! And what can quench our immortality,
Or mutual and irrevocable hate?
He as a conqueror will call the conquer'd
Evil; but what will be the good he gives?
Were I the Victor, his works would be deem'd
The only evil ones. And you, ye new
And scarce-born mortals, what have been his gifts?
To you already in your little world?

Cain. But few; and some of those but bitter.

Lucifer. Back
With me, then, to thine earth, and try the rest
Of his celestial boons to ye and yours,
Evil and good are things in their own essence,
And not made good or evil by the giver;
But if he gives you good—so call him; if
Evil springs from him, do not name it mine,
Till ye know better its true font: and judge
Not by words, though of spirits, but the fruits
Of your existence, such as it must be.

One good gift has the fatal apple given—
Your reason:—let it not be overweary'd
By tyrannous threats to force you into faith
'Gainst all external sense and inward feeling:
Think and endure,—and form an inner world
In your own bosom—where the outward fails;
So shall you nearer be the spiritual
Nature, and war triumphant with your own.

[They disappear.

ACT III.

SCENE I.

The Earth, near Eden, as in Act I.

Enter Cain and Adah.

Adah. Hush! tread softly, Cain.

Cain. I will! but wherefore?

Adah. Our little Enoch sleeps upon your bed
Of leaves beneath the cypress.

Cain. Cypress! 'tis
A gloomy tree, which looks as if it mourn'd.
O'er what it shadows; wherefore didst thou choose it
For our child's canopy?

Adah. Because it's branches
Shut out the sun like night, and therefore seem'd
Fitting to shadow slumber.

Cain. Ay, the last—
And longest; but no matter—lead me to him.

[They go up to the child.

How lovely he appears! his little cheeks,
In their pure incarnation, vying with
The rose leaves strewn beneath them. A la.

And his lips, too, how beautifully parted! No; you shall not

Kiss him, at least not now: he will awake soon—
His hour of mid-day rest is nearly over;
But it were pity to disturb him till
I'm closed.

Cain. You have said well: I will contain

My heart till then. He smiles, and sleeps—Sleep on.
And smile, thou little, young inheritor
Of a world scarce less young: sleep on, and smile!
Thine are the hours and days when both are cheering
And innocent! thou hast not pluck'd the fruit—
Thou know'st not thou art naked! Must the time
Come thou shalt be a merced for sins unknown,
Which were not thine nor mine? But now sleep on His cheeks are reddening into deeper smiles,
And shining lids are trembling o'er his long
Lashes, dark as the eypress which waves o'er them
Half open, from beneath them the clear blue
Laughs out, although in slumber. He must dream—
Of what? of Paradise!—Ay! dream of it,
My disinherit'd boy! 'Tis but a dream,
For never more thyself, thy sons, nor fathers
Shall walk in that forbidden place of joy!

Adah. Dear Cain! Nay, do not whisper o'er our son
Such melancholy yearnings o'er the past:
Why wilt thou always mourn for Paradise?
Can we not make another?

Cain. Where?

Adah. Here, or
Wherever thou wilt: where'er thou art, I feel not
The want of this so much regretted Eden.
Have I not thee, our boy, our sire, and brother
And Zillah—our sweet sister, and our Eve,
To whom we owe so much besides our birth?

Cain. Yes—death, too, is among the debts we owe her.

Adah. Cain! that proud spirit, who withdrew thee hence,
Hath sadden'd thine still deeper. I had hoped
The promised wonders which thou hast beheld,
Visions, thou say'st, of past and present worlds,
Would have composed thy mind into the calm
Of a contented knowledge; but I see
Thy guide hath done thee evil: still I thank him,
And can forgive him all, that he so soon
Hath given thee back to us.

Cain. So soon! Adah.

'Tis scarcely
Two hours since ye departed: two long hours
To me, but only hours upon the sun.

Cain. And yet I have approach'd that sun, and seen
Worlds which he once shone on, and never more
Shall light; and worlds he never lit: methought
Years had roll'd o'er my absence.

Adah. Hardly hours.

Cain. The mind then hath capacity of time,
And measures it by that which it beholds,
Pleasing or painful; little or almighty.
I had beheld the immemorial works
Of endless beings; skirt'd extinguish'd worlds:
And, gazing on eternity, methought
I had borrow'd more by a few drops of ages
From its immensity; but now I feel
My littleness again. Well said the spirit,
That I was nothing!

Adah. Wherefore said he so?

Jehovah said not that.

Cain. No: he contents him
With making us the nothing which we are;
And after flattering dust with glimpses of Eden and Immortality, resolves
It back to dust again—for what?

Adah. Thou know'st—
Even for our parents' error.

Cain. What is that to us? they sinn'd, then let them die?

Adah. Thou hast not spoken well, nor is that thy own, but of the spirit who was with thee. Would I could die for them, so they might live!

Cain. Why, so say I—provided that one victim might satiate the insatiable of life, and that our little rosy sleeper there might never taste of death nor human sorrow, nor hand it down to those who spring from him.

Adah. How know we that some such atonement one day may not redeem our race?

Cain. By sacrificing the harmless for the guilty? what atonement were there? why, we are innocent: what have we done that we must be victims for a deed Before our birth, or need have victims to Atone for this mysterious, nameless sin—If he be such a sin to seek for knowledge?

Adah. Alas! thou sinnest now, my Cain: thy words sound impious in mine ears.

Cain. Then leave me! Adah. Never, though thy God left thee.

Cain. Say, what have we here? Adah. Two altars, which our brother Abel made during thine absence, whereupon to offer a sacrifice to God on thy return. Cain. And how knew he that I would be so ready With the burnt offerings, which he daily brings With a meek brow, whose base humility slows more of fear than worship, as a brieve To the Creator?

Adah. Surely, 'tis well done.

Cain. One altar may suffice: I have no offering. Adah. The fruts of the earth, the early, beautiful blossom and bud, and bloom of flowers, and fruits; these are a goodly offering to the Lord, given with a gentle and a contrite spirit.

Cain. I have told'd, and till'd, and sweaten in the sun, according to the curse:—must I do more? For what should I be gentle? for a war With all the elements ere they will yield the bread we eat? For what must I be grateful? for being dust, and grovelling in the dust, till I return to dust? if I am nothing—For nothing shall I be an hypocrite, and seem well pleased with pain? For what should I be contrite? for my father's sin, already expiated with what we all have undergone, and to be more than expiated by the ages professed, upon our seed? Little dreams our young blooming sleeper, there, the germs of an eternal misery. To myriads is within him! better 'twere I snatch'd him in his sleep, and dash'd him 'gainst the rocks, than let him live to—

Adah. Oh, my God! touch not the child—my child! thy child! Oh Cain! Cain. Fear not! for all the stars, and all the power Which sway's among them, I would not secost you infant with ruder greeting than a father's kiss.

Adah. Then, why so awfully in thine speech?

Cain. Twere better that he ceased to live, than give life to so much of sorrow as he must endure, and, harder still, bequeath: but since that saying jars you, let us only say—

Twere better that he never had been born.

Adah. Oh, do not say so! Where were then the joys, the mothers joys of watching, nourishing, and loving him? Soft! he awakes. Sweet Enoch! [She goes to the child]

Oh Cain! look on him; see how full of life, of strength, of bloom, of beauty, and of joy, how like to me, how like to thee, when gentle, for then we are all alike; is not so, Cain? Mother, and sire, and son, our features are reflected in each other; as they are in the clear waters, when they are gentle, and when thou art gentle. Love us, then, my Cain! And love thyself for our sakes, for we love thee. Look! how he laughs and stretches out his arms, and opens wide his blue eyes upon thine, to hail his father; while his little form flutters as wing'd with joy. Talk not of pain; the childless cherubs well might envy thee. The pleasures of a parent! Bless him, Cain! As yet he hath no words to thank thee, but his heart will, and thine own too.

Cain. Bless thee, boy.

Adah. If that a mortal blessing may avail thee, to save thee from the serpent's curse!

Cain. It shall.

Surely a father's blessing may avert a reptile's subtlety.

Cain. Of that I doubt; but bless him ne'er the less.

Adah. Our brother Abel.

Enter Abel.

Abel. Welcome, Cain! My brother, the peace of God be on thee!

Cain. Abel, hail! Abel. Our sister tells me that thou hast been wandering in high communion with a spirit, far beyond our wonted range. Was he of those we have seen and spoken with, like to our father?

Cain. No.

Abel. Why then commune with him? he may be a foe to the Most High.

Cain. And friend to man.

Has the Most High been so—if so you term him?

Abel. Term him! your words are strange, to-day my brother. My sister Adah, leave us for awhile—We mean to sacrifice.

Adah. Farewell, my Cain; but first embrace thy son. May his soft spirit, and Abel's pious ministry, recall thee to peace and holiness!

[Exit Adah with her child]

Abel. Where hast thou been?

Cain. I know not.

Abel. Nor what thou hast seen?

Cain. The dead.

The immortal, the unbounded, the omnipotent, the overpowering mysteries of space—The innumerable worlds that were and are.
A whirlwind of such overwhelming things,
Suns, moons, and earths, upon their loud-voiced spheres
Singing in thunder round me, as have made me
Unfit for mortal converse: leave me, Abel.
Abel. Thine eyes are flashing with unnatural light.

Thy check is flush'd with an unnatural hue—
Thy words are fraught with an unnatural sound—
What may this mean?

Cain. It means—I pray thee, leave me.
Abel. Not till we have praved'nd and sacrificed together.
Cain. Abel, I pray thee, sacrifice alone—
Jehovah loves thee well.
Abel. Both well, I hope.
Cain. But thee the better: I care not for that,
Thou art fitter for his worship than I am:
Revere him, then—but let it be alone—
At least, without me.

Abel.—Brother, I should ill
Esteem the name of our great father's son,
If as my elder I revered thee not,
And in the worship of our God call'd not
On thee to join me, and precede me in
Our priesthood—tis thy place.

But I have ne'er
Asserted it.
Abel. The more my grief; I pray thee
To do so now: thy soul seems laboring in
Some strong delusion; it will calm thee.

Cain. No;
Nothing can calm me more. Cain! say I? Never Knew I what calm was in the soul, although
I have seen the elements still'd: My Abel, leave me!
Or let me leave thee to thy pious purpose.

Abel. Neither; we must perform our task together.

Spurn me not.
Cain. If it must be so—well, then,
What shall I do?
Abel. Choose one of those two altars.
Cain. Choose for me: they to me are so much turf
And stone.
Abel. Choose thou!
Cain. I have chosen.
Abel. Tis the highest,
And suits thee, as the elder. Now prepare
Thine offerings.
Cain. Where are thine?
Abel. Behold them here—
The firstlings of the flock, and fat thereof—
A shepherd's humble offering.
Cain. I have no flocks;
I am a tiller of the ground, and must
Yield what it yieldeth to my toil—its fruit:
[He gathereth fruits.
[They dress their altars, and kindle a flame upon them.

Abel. My brother, as the elder, offer first
Thy prayer and thanksgiving with sacrifice.
Cain. No—I am new to this; lead thou the way,
And I will follow—as I may.
Abel. (kneeling.) Oh God!
Who made us, and who breathed the breath of life
Within our nostrils, who hath blessed us,
And spared, despite our father's sin, to make
His children all lost, as they might have been,
Had not thy justice been so temper'd with

The mercy which is thy delight, as to Accord a pardon like a Paradise,
Compared with our great erimes—Solo Lord of light
Of good, and glory, and eternity;
Without whom all were evil, and with whom
Nothing can err, except to some good end
Of thine omnipotent benevolence—
Inscrutable, but still to be fulfilled.

Accept from out thy humble first of shepherd's
First of the first-born flock—a sacrifice,
In itself nothing—as what offering can be Aught unto thee?—but yet accept it for
The thanksgiving of him who spreads it in
The face of thy high heaven, bowing his own
Even to the dust, of which he is, in honor
Of thee, and of thy name, for evermore.

Cain, (standing erect during this speech.) Spirit:
what'er or whose'er thou art,
Omnipotent, it may be—and, if good,
Show'd in the exemption of thy deeds from evil;
Jehovah upon earth! and God in heaven!
And it may be with other names, because
Thine attributes seem many, as thy works—
If thou must be propitiated with prayers,
Take them! If thou must be induced with altars,
And soften'd with a sacrifice, receive them!
Two beings here erect them unto thee.
If thou lovest blood, the shepherd's shrine, which smokes
On my right hand, hath shed it for thy service
In the first of his flock, whose limbs now reel
In sanguine incense to thy skies;
Or if the sweet and blooming fruits of earth,
And milder seasons, which the unstart'd turf
I spread them on now offers in the face
Of the broad sun which ripen'd them, may seem Good to thee, inasmuch as they have not
Suffer'd in limb or life, and rather form
A sample of thy works, than supplication
To look on ours! If a shrine without victim,
And altar without gore, may win thy favor,
Look on it! and for him who dresseth it,
He is as much as thou mad'st him; and seeks nothing
Which must be won by kneeling: if he's evil,
Strike him! thou art omnipotent, and may'st—
For what can he oppose? If he be good,
Strike him, or spare him, as thou wilt! since all
Rests upon thee; and good and evil seem
To have no power themselves, save in thy will;
And whether that be good or ill I know not,
Not being omnipotent, nor fit to judge
Omnipotence, but merely to endure
Its mandate, which thus far I have endured.

[The fire upon the altar of Abel kindles into a column of the brightest flame, and ascends to heaven; while a whirlwind throws down the altar of Cain, and scatters the fruits abroad upon the earth.

Abel, (kneeling.) Oh, brother, pray! Jehovah's wrath with thee.

Cain. Why so?
Abel. Thy fruits are scatter'd on the earth.
Cain. From earth they came, to earth let them return.
Their seed will bear fresh fruit there ere the summer
Thy burnt flesh-off'ring prosper better, see
How Heav'n lifts up the flames, when thick with blood!
Abel. Think not upon my offering's acceptance.
Cain. Thy murderer.

Abel. Then may God forgive him. Cain, Comfort poor Zillah:—she has but one brother Now. [ABEL dies.

Cain. And I none:—Who makes me brotherless? His eyes are open! then he is not dead! Death is like sleep: and sleep shuts down our lids. His lips, too, are apart; why then he breathes; And yet I feel it not.—His heart! his heart!— Let me see, doth it beat? methinks—No!—no! This is a vision, else I am become The native of another and worse world. The earth swims round me:—what is this? 'tis wet [Puts his hand to his brow, and then looks at it And yet there are no dews! 'Tis blood—my blood— My brother’s and my own; and shed by me! Then what have I further to do with life Since I have taken life from my own flesh? But he cannot be dead!—Is silence death? No; he will wake: then let me watch by him. Life cannot be so slight, as to be quenched Thus quickly!—he hath spoken to me since— What shall I say to him?—My brother!—No: He will not answer to that name; for brethren Smite not each other. Yet—yet—speak to me. Oh! for a word more of that gentle voice, That I may hear to hear my own again!

Enter Zillah.

Zillah. I heard a heavy sound: what can it be? 'Tis Cain; and watching by my husband. What Dost thou there, brother? Doth he sleep? Oh heav’n! What means this paleness, and yon stream?—No: no! It is not blood; for who would shed his blood? Abel! what’s this?—who hath done this? He moves not; He breathes not: and his hands drop down from mine. With stony lifelessness: Ah! cruel Cain; Why can’t thou not in time to save him from This violence? Whatever hath assail’d him, Thou wert the stronger, and shouldst have stepp’d in Between him and aggression! Father!—Eve!— Adah!—come hither! Death is in the world! [Exit ZILLAH, calling on her Parents, &c Cain, (solely.) And who hath brought him there?— I—who abhor The name of Death so deeply, that the saught Impoison’d all my life, before I knew His aspect—I have led him here, and giv’n My brother to his cold and still embrace, As if he would not have asserted his Inexorable claim without my aid. I am awake at last—a dreary dream Had maddened me;—but he shall never awake! [Enter Adam, Eve, Adah, and Zillah.

Adam. A voice of wo from Zillah brings me here, — What do I see?—'Tis true!—My son!—my son! Woman, behold the serpent’s work, and thine! [To Eve

Eve. Oh! speak not of it now: the serpent’s fangs Are in my heart. My best beloved, Abel! Jehovah! this is punishment beyond A mother’s sin, to take him from me.
Adam. Who.
Or what hath done this deed?—speak, Cain, since thou
Wert present; was it some more hostile angel,
Who walks not with Jehovah? or some wild
Brute of the forest?
Eve. Ah! a livid light
Breaks through, as from a thunder-cloud! yon brand,
Masey and bloody! snatch'd from off the altar,
And black with smoke, and red with—
Adam. Speak, my son!—Speak, and assure us, wretched as we are,
That we are not more miserable still.
Adah. Speak, Cain! and say it was not thou!
Eve. It was.
I see it now—he hangs his guilty head,
And covers his ferocious eye with hands
Incarnadine.
Adah. Mother, thou dost him wrong—
Cain! clear thee from this horrible accusal,
Which grief wrings from our parent.
Eve. Hear, Jehovah! May the eternal serpent's curse be on him!
For he was fitter for his breed than ours.
May all his days be desolate! May—
Adah. Hold! Curse him not, mother, for he is thy son—
Curse him not, mother, for he is my brother,
And my betrath'd.
Eve. He hath left thee no brother—
Zillah no husband—me no son!—for thus
I curse him from my sight for evermore!
All bonds I break between us, as he broke
That of his nature, in yon—Oh death! death!
Why didst thou not take me, who first incur'd thee?
Why dost thou not so now?
Adam. Eve! let not this,
Thy natural grief, lead to impiety!
A heavy doom was long forespoken to us;
And now that it begins, let it be borne
In such sort as may show our God, that we Are faithful servants to his holy will.
Eve, (pointing to Cain.) His will!! the will of yon incarnate spirit
Of death, whom I have brought upon the earth
To strew it with the dead. May all the curses
Of life be on him! and his agenies
Drive him forth o'er the wilderness, like us
From Eden, till his children do by him
As he did by his brother! May the swords
And wings of fiery cherubim pursue him
By day and night—snakes spring up in his path—
Earth's fruits be ashes in his mouth—the leaves
On which he lays his head to sleep be strew'd
With scorpions! May his dreams be of his victim!
His waking a continual dread of death!
May the clear rivers turn to blood as he
Stoops down to stain them with his raging lip!
May every element shun or change to him!
May he live in the pangs which others die with!
And death itself wax something worse than death
To hire who first acquainted him with man!
Hence, fraticide! henceforth that word is Cain.
Through all the coming myriads of mankind,
Who is all abhor thee, though thouwert their sire!
May the gr.-ss wither from thy feet! the woods
Deny thee shelter! earth a home! the dust
A grave! the sun his light! and heaven her God!
[Exeunt Eve.

Adam. Cain! get thee forth: we dwell no more together!
Depart! and leave the dead to me—I am
Henceforth alone—we never must meet more.
Adah. Oh, part not with him thus, my father: do not Add thy deep curse to Eve's upon his head!
Adam. I curse him not: his spirit be his curse.
Come, Zillah! Zillah.
I must watch my husband's corse.
Adam. We will return again, when he is gone
Who hath provided for us this dread office.
Come, Zillah! Zillah.
Yet one kiss on yon pale clay,
And those lips once so warm—my heart! my heart
[Exeunt Adam and Zillah weeping
Adah. Cain! thou hast heard, we must go forth.
I am ready,
So shall our children be. I will bear Enoch,
And you his sister. Ere the sun declines
Let us depart, nor walk the wilderness
Under the cloud of night.—Nay, speak to me,
To me—thine own.
Cain. Leave me!
Adah. Why, all have left thee
Cain. And wherefore lingerest thou? Dost thou not fear
To dwell with one who hath done this?
Adah. I fear
Nothing except to leave thee, much as I
Shrink from the deed which leaves thee brotherless
I must not speak of this—it is between thee
And the great God.
A Voice from within exclaims, Cain! Cain!
Adah. Hear'st thou that voice? The Voice within. Cain! Cain!
Adah. It soundeth like an angel's tone
Enter the Angel of the Lord.
Angel. Where is thy brother Abel?
Cain. Am I then
My brother's keeper?
Angel. Cain! what hast thou done?
The voice of thy slain brother's blood cries out,
Even from the ground, unto the Lord!—Now art thou
Cursed from the earth, which open'd late her mouth
To drink thy brother's blood from thy rash hand.
Henceforth, when thou shalt till the ground, it shall not Yield thee her strength: a fugitive shalt thou
Be from this day, and vagabond on earth!
Adah. This punishment is more than he can bear.
Behold, thou drivest him from the face of earth,
And from the face of God shall he be hid.
A fugitive and vagabond on earth,
'Twill come to pass, that whomso findeth him
Shall slay him.
Cain. Would they could! but who are they Shall slay me? where are those on the lone earth
As yet unpeopled?
Angel. Thou hast slain thy brother,
And who shall warrant thee against thy son?
Adah. Angel of Light! be merciful, nor say
That this poor aching breast now nourisheth
A murderer in my boy, and of his father,
Angel. Then he would but be what his father is
Did not the milk of Eve give nutriment?
To him thou now see'st so bosom'd with blood?
Cain. (interrupting her.)

No! No more of threats: we have had too many of them.
Go to our children; I will follow thee.

Adah. I will not leave thee lonely with the dead.
Let us depart together.

Cain. Oh! thou dead
And everlasting witness! whose unsinking
Blood darkens earth and heaven! what thou now art
I know not! but if thou see'st what I am,
I think thou wilt forgive him, whom his God
Can no'ER forgive, nor his own soul.—Farewell!
I must not, dare not touch what I have made thee.
I, who sprung from the same womb with thee, drain'd
The same breast, clasp'd thee often to my own
In fondness brotherly and boyish, I
Can never meet thee more, nor even dare
To do that for thee, which thou should'st have done
For me—compose thy limbs into their grave—
The first grave yet dug for mortality,
But who hath dug that grave? Oh, earth! Oh, earth!
For all the fruits thou hast render'd to me,
Give thee back this.—Now for the wilderness.

[ADAH stoops down and kisses the body of Abel.

Adah. A dreary, and an early doom, my brother
Has been thy lot! Of all who mourn for thee,
I alone must weep. My office is
Henceforth to dry up tears, and not to shed them;
But yet of all who mourn, none mourn like me.
Not only for thyself, but him who slew thee.
Now, Cain! I will divide thy burden with thee.

Cain. Eastward from Eden will we take our way;
Tis the most desolate, and suits my steps.

Adah. Lead! thou shalt be my guide, and may our God
Be thine! Now let us carry forth our children.

Cain. And he who lieth there was childless. I
Have dried the fountain of a gentle race,
Which might have graced his recent marriage coucct
And might have temper'd this stern blood of mine
Uniting with our children Abel's offspring!
O Abel!

Adah. Peace be with him.

Cain. But with me—

* The "four rivers" which flowed round Eden, and consequently the only race with which Cain was acquainted upon the earth.
MARINO FALIERO, DOGE OF VENICE;
AN HISTORICAL TRAGEDY.

"Dacs incipit turbida Adriam."—Horace.

PREFACE.

The conspiracy of the Doge Marino Faliero is one of the most remarkable events in the annals of the singular government, city, and people of modern history. It occurred in the year 1355. Every thing about Venice is, or was, extraordinary—her aspect is like a dream, and her history is like a romance. The story of the Doge is to be found in all her Chronicles, and particularly detailed in the "Lives of the Doges," by Marin Sanuto, which is given in the Appendix. It is simply and clearly related, and is perhaps more dramatic in itself than any scenes which can be founded upon the subject.

Marino Faliero appears to have been a man of talents and of courage. I find him commander-in-chief of the land forces at the siege of Zara, where he beat the king of Hungary and his army of 80,000 men, killing 8000 men, and keeping the besieged at the same time in check; an exploit of which I know none similar in history except that of Caesar at Alesia, and of Prince Eugene at Belgrade. He was afterwards commander of the fleet in the same war. He took Capo d'Istria. He was ambassador at Genoa and Rome, at which last he received the news of his election to the dukedom; his absence being a proof that he sought it by no intrigue, since he was apprized of his predecessor's death and his own succession at the same moment. But he appears to have been of an ungovernable temper. A story is told by Sanuto, of his having, many years before, when podesta and captain at Treviso, box'd the ears of the bishop, who was somewhat tardy in bringing the Host. For this, honest Sanuto "saddles him with a judgment," as Thwackum did Square; but he does not tell us whether he was punished or rebuked by the Senate for this outrage at the time of its commission. He seems, indeed, to have been afterwards at peace with the church, for we find him ambassador at Rome, and invested with the fief of Val di Marino, in the march of Treviso, and with the title of Count, by Lorenzo Count-Bishop of Ceneda. For these facts my authorities are Sanuto, Vetter Sandi, Andrea Navagero, and the account of the siege of Zara, first published by the indefatigable Abate Morelli, in his "Monumenti Veneziani di varia Letteratura," printed in 1796, all of which I have looked over in the original language. The moderns, Dary, Sismondi, and Lauquier, nearly agree with the ancient chroniclers. Siamondi attributes the conspiracy to his jealousy; but I find this no where asserted by the national historians. Vetter Sandi, indeed, says, that "Altri scissero che . . . . . della golosa suspizien di esso Doge siasi fatto (Michel Steno) staccar con violenza," &c. &c.; but this appears to have been by no means the general opinion, nor is it alluded to by Sanuto or by Navagero, and Sandi himself adds, a moment after, that "per altre Veneziane memorie trapisiri, che non il solo desiderio di vendetta lo dispose alla congiura ma anche la innata abituale ambizion sua, per cui anel ava a farsi principe indipendente."

The first motive appears to have been excited by the gross affront of the words written by Michel Steno on the ducal chair, and by the light and inadequate sentence of the Forty on the offender, who was one of their "tre Capi." The attentions of Steno himself appear to have been directed towards one of her damsels, and not to the "Dogressa" herself, against whose fame not the slightest insinuation appears, while she is praised for her beauty, and remarked for her youth. Neither do I find it asserted (unless the hint of Sandi be an assertion) that the Doge was actuated by jealousy of his wife; but rather by respect for her, and for his own honor, warranted by his past services and present dignity.

I know not that the historical facts are alluded to in English, unless by Dr. Moore in his View of Italy. His account is false and flippant, full of stale jests about old men and young wives, and wondering at so great an effect from so slight a cause. How so acute and severe an observer of mankind as the author of Zelo could wonder at this is inconceivable. He knew that a basin of water split on Mrs. Masham's gown deprived the duke of Marlborough of his command, and led to the inglorious peace of Utrecht—that Louis XIV. was plunged into the most desolating wars because his minister was nettled at his finding fault with a window, and wished to give him another occupation—that Helen of Troy—that Lucretia expelled the Tarquins from Rome—and that Cava brought the Moors to Spain—that an insulted husband led the Gauls to Clusium, and thence to Rome—that a single verse of Frederick II. of Prussia on the Abbe de Bernis, and a jest on Madame de Pompadour, led to the battle of Rossbach—that the eloquence of Dearborn with Mac Murchad conducted the English to the slavery of Ireland—that a personal pique between Maria Antoinette and the duke of Orleans precipitated the first expulsion of the Bourbons—and, not to multiply instances, that Commodus, Domitian, and Caligula fell victims not to their public tyranny, but to private vengeance—and that an order to make Cromwell disembark from the ship in which he would have sailed to America destroyed both king and commonwealth. After these instances, on the least reflection, it is indeed extraordinary in Dr. Moore to seem surprised that a man used to command, who had served and swayed in the most important offices, should fiercely resent, in a fierce age, an unpunished affront, the grossest that can be offered to a man, be he prince or peasant. The age of Faliero is little to the purpose, unless to favor it.

"The young man's wrath is like a flame on fire,
But like red hot steel is the old man's ire."

"Young men soon grow and soon forget affronts,
Old age is slow at both.

Laugier's reflections are more philosophical:—

"Tale fu il fine ignominioso di un uomo, che la sua..."

My sui talenti per lungo tempo esercitati ne' maggiore impieghi, la sua capacità sperimentata ne' governi e nelle ambasciate, gli avevano acquisito la stima e la fiducia di cittadini, ed avevano uniti i suffragi per collocarlo alla testa della repubblica. Innalzato ad un grado che terminava gloriosamente la sua vita, il risentimento di un'ingiuria leggiera insinuò nel suo cuore tal veleno che bastò a corrompere le antiche sue qualità, e a condurlo al termine dei sceletteri; serio esempio, che prova non esservi età, in cui la prudenza unisce sia sicura, e che nell'uomo restano sempre possensioni capaci a dissanararlo, quando non inviti sopra se stesso."—Lawgier, Italian translation, vol. iv. page 80, 31.

Where did Dr. Moore find that Marino Faliero begged his life? I have searched the chronicles, and find nothing of the kind; it is true that he avowed all. He was conducted to the place of torture, but there is no mention made of any application for mercy on his part; and the very circumstance of their having taken him to the rack seems to argue anything but his having shown a want of firmness, which would doubtless have been also mentioned by those minute historians who by no means favor him: such, indeed, would be contrary to his character as a soldier, to the age in which he lived, and at which he died, as is to the truth of history. I know no justification at any distance of time for calumniating an historical character; surely truth belongs to the dead, and to the unfortunate, and they who have died upon a scaffold, have generally had faults enough of their own, without attributing to them that which the very incurring of the perils which conducted them to their violent death renders, of all others, the most improbable. The black veil which is painted over the place of Marino Faliero amongst the doges, and the Giants' Staircase where he was crowned, and disgraced, and decapitated, struck forcibly upon my imagination, as did his fiery character and strange story. I went in 1819, in search of his tomb more than once to the church San Giovanni e San Paolo, and as I was standing before the monument of another family, a priest came up to me and said, "I can show you finer monuments than that." I told him that I was in search of that of the Faliero family, and particularly of the Doge Marino's. "Oh," said he, "I will show it you;" and conducting me to the outside, pointed out a sarcophagus in the wall with an illegible inscription. He said that it had been in a convent adjoining, but was removed after the French came, and placed in its present situation; that he had seen the tomb opened at its removal; there were still some bones remaining, but no positive vestige of the decapitation. The equestrian statue of which I have made mention in the third act as before that church is not, however, of a Faliero, but of some other now obsolete warrior, although of a later date. There were two other Doges of this family prior to Marino: Ordelafro, who fell in battle at Zara in 1117, (where his descendant afterwards conquered the Huns,) and Vital Faliero, who reigned in 1082. The family, originally from Fano, was of the most illustrious in blood and wealth in the city of once the most wealthy and still the most ancient families in Europe. The length I have gone into on this subject will show the interest I have taken in it. Whether I have succeeded or not in the tragedy, I have at least transferred into our language an historical fact worthy of commemoration.

It is now four years that I have meditated this work, and, before I had sufficiently examined the records, I was rather disposed to have made it turn on a jealousy in Faliero. But perceiving no found ation for this in historical truth, and aware that jealousy is an exhausted passion in the drama, I have given it a more historical form. I was, besides, well advised by the late Matthew Lewis on that point, in talking with him of my intention, at Venice, in 1817. "If you make him jealous," said he, "recollect that you have to contend with established writers, to say nothing of Shakspeare, and an exhausted subject;—stick to the old fiery Doge's natural character, which will bear you out, if properly drawn; and make your plot as regular as you can."—Sir William Drummond gave me nearly the same counsel. How far I have followed these instructions, or whether they have availed me, is for me to decide. I have had no view to the stage; in its present state it is, perhaps, not a very exalted object of ambition; besides I have been too much behind the scenes to have thought it so at any time. And I cannot conceive any man of irritable feeling putting himself at the mercy of an audience:— — the sneering reader, and the loul critic and the tart review, are scattered and distant.
calamities; but the trampling of an intelligent or of an ignorant audience on a production which, be it good or bad, has been a mental labor to the writer, is a palpable and immediate grievance, heightened by a man's doubt of their competency to judge, and his certainty of his own improprieness in selecting them judges. I was capable of writing a play which could be deemed stage worthy, success would give me no pleasure, and failure great pain. It is for this reason that even during the time of being one of the committee of one of the theaters, I never made the attempt, and never will.* But surely there is dramatic power somewhere, where Joanna Baillie, and Milman, and John Wilson exist. The "City of the Plague" and the "Fall of Jerusalem" are full of the best "matter" for tragedy that has been seen since Horace Walpole, except passages of Ethwold and De Montfort. It is the fashion to underrate Horace Walpole; firstly, because he was a nobleman, and secondly, because he was a gentleman; but to say nothing of the composition of his incomparable letters, and of the Castle of Otranto, he is the "Ultimus Romanorum," the author of the Mysterious Mother, a tragedy of the higher order, and not a puling love-play. He is the father of the first romance and of the last tragedy in our language, and surely worthy of a higher place than any living writer, be he who he may.

In speaking of the drama of Marino Faliero, I forgot to mention that, the desire of preserving, though still too remote, a nearer approach to unity than the irregularity, which is the reproach of the English theatrical compositions, permits, has induced me to represent the conspiracy as already formed, and the Doge according to it, whereas, in fact, it was of his own preparation and that of Israel Bertuccio. The other characters (except that of the duchess), incidents, and almost the time, which was wonderfully short for such a design in real life, are strictly historical, except that all the consultations took place in the palace. Had I followed this, the unity would have been better preserved; but I wished to produce the Doge in the full assembly of the conspirators, instead of monotonously placing him always in dialogue with the same individuals. For the real facts, I refer to the extracts given in the Appendix in the Italian, with translation.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

An Antechamber in the Ducal Palace.

PIETRO speaks, in entering, to BATTISTA.

Pio. Is not the messenger returned?

Bat. Not yet

I have sent frequently, as you commanded,

But still the Sigorine is deep in council,
And long debate on Steuno's accusation.

Pio. Too long—at least so thinks the Doge

How bears this

These moments of suspense?

Pio. With wringing patience

Placed at the ducal table—over

With all the apparel of the state; petitions,

Deshpitches, judgments, acts, reprievés, reports,

He sits as rapt in duty; but whene'er

He hears the jarring of a distant door,

Or aught that intimates a coming step,

Or murrum of a voice, his quick eye wanders,

And he will start up from his chair, then pauseth.

And seat himself again, and fix his gaze

Upon some edict; but I have observed

For the last hour he has not turn'd a leaf.
MARINO FALIERO, DOGE OF VENICE

Scene II.

The Ducal Chamber.

MARINO FALIERO, Doge; and his Nephew, Ber- Tuccio Faliero.

Ber. F. It cannot be but they will do you justice.
Doge. Ay, such as the Avogadori did, Who sent up my appeal unto the Forty To try him by his peers, his own tribunal.
Ber. F. His peers will scarce protect him; such an act Would bring contempt on all authority.
Doge. Know you not Venice? Know you not the Forty? But we shall see anon.
Ber. F. (addressing Vincenzo, then entering.) How now—what tidings?
Vinc. I am charged to tell his highness that the court Has pass'd its resolution, and that, soon As the due forms of judgment are gone through, The sentence will be sent up to the Doge; In the mean time the Forty doth salute The Prince of the Republic, and entreat His acceptance of their duty.
Doge. Yes— They are wondrous dutiful, and ever humble. Sentence is past, you say?
Vinc. It is, your highness: The president was sealing it, when I Was call'd in, that no moment might be lost In forwarding the intimation due Not only to the Chief of the Republic, But the complainant, both in cue united.
Ber. F. Are you aware, from a sight you have perceived, Of their decision?
Vinc. No, my lord! you know The secret custom of the courts in Venice.
Ber. F. True; but there still is something given to guess, Which a shrewd gleaner and quick eye would catch at; A whisper, or a murmur, or an air More or less solemn spread o'er the tribunal. The Forty are but men—most worthy men, And wise and just, and cautious—this I grant— And secret as the grave to which they doom The guilty; but with all this, in their aspects— At least in some, the juniors of the number— A searching eye, an eye like yours, Vincenzo, Would read the sentence ere it was pronounced Vin. my lord, I came away upon the moment, And had no leisure to take note of that Which pass'd among the judges, even in seeming. My station near the accused, too, Michel Steno, Made me—

Doge, (abruptly.) And how look'd he? deliver that.
Vinc. Calm, but not overcast, he stood resign'd To the decree, whate'er it were;—but lo! It comes, for the perusal of his highness.

Enter the Secretary of the Forty.

Sec. The high tribunal of the Forty sends Health and respect to the Doge Faliero, Chief Magistrate of Venice, and requests His highness to peruse and to approve The sentence past on Michel Steno, born Patrician, and arraigned upon the charge Contain'd, together with its penalty, Within the rescript which I now present.
Doge. Retire, and wait without.

[Exeunt Secretary and Vincenzo.]

Take this paper The misty letters vanish from my eyes: I cannot fix them.
Ber. F. Patience, my dear uncle: Why do you tremble thus?—nay, doubt not, all Will be as could be wish'd.
Doge. Say on.
Ber. F. (reading.) "Decreed In council, without one dissenting voice, That Michel Steno, by his own confession, Guilty on the last night of Carnival Of having graven on the ducal throne The following words——"
Doge. Would'st thou repeat them? Would'st thou repeat them—thou, a Faliero, Harp on the deep dishonor of our house, Dishonor'd in its chief—that chief the prince Of Venice, first of cities?—To the sentence.
Ber. F. Forgive me, my good lord; I will obey—(Reads.) "That Michel Steno be detain'd a month In close arrest."
Doge. Proceed.
Ber. F. My lord, 'tis finish'd.
Doge. How say you?—finish'd! Do I dream? 'tis false—
Give me the paper—(Snatches the paper and reads)— "'Tis decreed in council That Michel Steno"—Nephew, thine arm! Ber. F. Nay.
Doge. Cheer up, be calm; this transport is uncalled for. Let me seek some assistance.

Doge. Stop, sir—Sir not—
'Tis past.
Ber. F. I cannot but agree with you The sentence is too slight for the offence— It is not honorable in the Forty To affix so slight a penalty to that Which was a foul affront to you, and even To them, as being your subjects; but 'tis not Yet without remedy: you can appeal To them once more, or to the Avogadori, Who, seeing that true justice is withheld,
BYRON’S WORKS.

Will now take up the cause they once declined,
And do you right upon the bold delinquent.
Think you not thus, good uncle? why do you stand
So still? You heed me not—I pray you, hear me!
Doge, (dashing down the ducal bonnet, and offering
To trample upon it, exclaims, as he is Witheld by his nephew,)
Oh! that the Saracens were in St. Mark’s!
Thus would I do him homage.
Ber. F. For the sake
Of Heaven and all its saints, my lord—
Doge. Away!
Oh, that the Genoese were in the port!
Oh, that the Huns whom I o’erthrew at Zara
Were ranged around the palace!
Ber. F. ‘Tis not well
Ex. Venice! Duke to say so.
Doge. Venice! Duke! Who now is Duke in Venice? let me see him,
That he may do me right.
Ber. F. If you forget
Your office, and its dignity and duty,
Remember that of man, and curb this passion.
The Duke of Venice—
Doge, (interrupting him,) There is no such thing—
It is a word—nay, worse—a worthless by-word:
The most despised, wrong’d, outraged, helpless
wretch,
Who begs his bread, if ‘tis refused by one,
May win it from another kinder heart;
But he, who is denied his right by those Whose place it is to do no wrong, is poorer
Than the rejected beggar—he’s a slave—
And that am I, and thou, and all our house,
Even from this hour; the meanest artisan
Will point the finger, and the haughty noble
May spit upon us,—where is our redress?
Ber. F. The law, my prince—
Doge, (interrupting him,) You see what it has done—
I ask’d no remedy but from the law—
I sought no vengeance but redress by law—
I call’d no judges but those named by law—
As sovereign, I appeal’d unto my subjects,
The very subjects who had made me sovereign,
And gave me thus a double right to be so.
The rights of place and choice, of birth and service,
Honors and years, these scars, these hoary hairs,
The travel, toil, the perils, the fatigues,
The blood and sweat of almost eighty years,
Were weigh’d, ’tis the balance, ’gainst the foulest stain,
The grossest insult, most contemptuous crime
Of a rank, rash patrician—and found wanting! And this is to be borne!
Ber. F. I say not that—
In case your fresh appeal should be rejected,
We will find other means to make all even.
Doge. Appeal again! art thou my brother’s son?
A scion of the house of Paliero?
The nephew of a Doge? and of that blood
Which hath already given three dukes to Venice?
But thou say’st well—we must be humble now.
Ber. F. My princely uncle! you are too much moved:
I grant it was a gross offence, and grossly
Left without fitting punishment: but still
This fury doth exceed the provocation,
Or any provocation; if we are wrong’d,
We will ask justice; if it be denied,
We’ll take it; but may do all this in calmness—
Deep Vengeance is the daughter of deep Silence
I have yet scarce a third part of your years,
I love our house, I honor you, its chief,
The guardian of my youth, and its instructor—
But though I understand your grief, and enter
In part of your disdain, it doth appall me
To see your anger, like our Adrian waves,
O’ersweep all bounds, and foam itself to air.
Doge. I tell thee—must I tell thee—what thy father
Would have required no words to comprehend?
Hast thou no feeling save the external sense
Of torture from the touch? hast thou no soul—
No pride—no passion—no deep sense of honor?
Ber. F. ’Tis the first time that honor has been doubted,
And were the last from any other skeptic.
Doge. You know the full offence of this born villain,
This creeping, coward, rank, acquitted felon,
Who threw his sting into a poisonous libel,
And on the honor of—Oh God!—my wife,
The nearest, dearest part of all men’s honor,
Left a base and mortal slur to pass from mouth to mouth
Of loose mechanics, with all coarse fool comments
And villainous jests, and blasphemies obscene,
While sneering nobles, in more polish’d guise,
Whisper’d the tale, and smiled upon the lie
Which made me look like them—a courteous wittou,
Patient—ay, proud, it may be, of dishonor.
Ber. F. But still it was a lie—you knew it false,
And so did all men.
Doge. Nephew, the high Roman
Said, ‘Caesar’s wife must not even be suspected.’
And put her from him—
Ber. F. True—but in those days—
Doge. What is it that a Roman would not suffer
That a Venetian prince must bear? Old Dandolo
Refused the diadem of all the Caesars,
And wore the ducal cap I trample on,
Because ‘tis now degraded.
Ber. F. ’Tis even so.
Doge. It is—it is:—I did not visit on
The innocent creature thus most vilely slander’d
Because she took an old man for her lord,
For that he had been long her father’s friend
And patron of her house, as if there were
No love in woman’s heart but lust of youth
And beardless faces:—I did not for this Visit the villain’s infamy on her.
But craved my country’s justice on his head,
The justice due unto the humblest being
Who hath a wife whose faith is sweet to him,
Who hath a home whose hearth is dear to him,
Who hath a name whose honor’s all to him,
When these are tainted by the accursing breath
Of calumny and scorn.
Ber. F. And what redress
Did you expect as his fit punishment?
Doge. Death! was I not the sovereign of this state—
Insulted on his very throne, and made
A mockery to the men who should obey me?
Was I not injured as a husband? scorn’d
As a man? reviled, degraded, as a prince?
Was not offence like his a complication
Of insult and of treason?—and he lives!
MARINO FALIERO,  DOGE OF VENICE.

In all things to rely upon my duty
As doth become your near and faithful kinsman
And not less loyal citizen and subject.

[Exit Bertuccio Faliero]

Doge. (solus.) Adieu my worthy nephew.—Hol low bauble!

[Taking up the ducal cap]
Beset with all the thorns that line a crown,
Without investing the insulted brow
With the all-swaying majesty of kings;
Thou idle, gilded, and degraded toy.
Let me resume thee as I would a vizer. [Puts it on]
How my brain aches beneath thee! and my temples
Throb feverish under thy dishonest weight.
Could I not turn thee to a diadem?
Could I not shatter the Briarean sceptre
Which in this hundred-handed senate rules,
Making the people nothing, and the prince
A pageant? In my life I have achieved
Tasks not less difficult—achieved for them,
Who thus repay me—Can I not requite them?
Oh for one year! Oh! but for even a day
Of my full youth, while yet my body served
My soul as serves the generous steed his lord,
I would have dash'd among them, asking few
In aid to overthrow these swell'n patricians;
But now I must look round for other hands
To serve this hoary head;—but it shall plan
In such a sort as will not leave the task
Herculean, though as yet it is but a chaos
Of darkly brooding thoughts: my fancy is
In her first work, more nearly to the light
Holding the sleeping images of things
For the selection of the pausing judgment.—
The troops are few in—

Enter Vincenzo.

Vin. There is one without Craves audience of your highness.

Doge. I'm unwell—
I can see no one, not even a patrician—
Let him refer his business to the council.

Vin. My lord, I will deliver your reply;
It cannot much import—he's a plebeian,
The master of a galley, I believe.

Doge. How! did you say the patron of a galley?
That is—I mean—a servant of the state:
Admit him, he may be on public service.

[Exit Vincenzo]

Doge, (solus.) This patron may be sounded; I will try him.

I know the people to be discontented;
They have cause, since Sapienza's adverse day,
When Genoa conquer'd; they have further cause,
Since they are nothing in the state, and in
The city worse than nothing—mere machines,
To serve the nobles' most patrician pleasure.
The troops have long arrears of pay, oft promised
And murmured deeply—any hope of change
Will draw them forward: they shall pay themselves
With plunder:—but the priests—I doubt the priesthood
Will not be with us; they have hated me
Since that rash hour, when, madd'n'd with the dronc
I smote the tardy bishop at Treviso,
Quickening his holy march; yet, ne'ertheless,
They may be won, at least their chief at Rome,
By some well-timed concessions; but, above
All things, I must be speedy; at my hour
Of twilight little light of life remains.
Could I free Venice, and avenge my wrongs,
I had lived too long, and willingly would sleep
Next moment with my sires; and, wanting this,
Better that sixty of my fourscore years
Had been already where—how soon, I care not—
The whole must be extinguish'd;—better that
They ne'er had been, than drag me on to be
The thing these arch-oppressors fain would make me.
Let me consider,—of efficient troops
There are three thousand posted at——

\[ \text{Enter Vincenzo and Israel Bertuccio.} \]

\[ \text{Vin.} \]
May it please
Your highness, the same patron whom I spake of
Is here to crave your patience.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Leave the chamber,
\[ \text{Vincenzo.} \]
Sir, you may advance—what would you?
\[ \text{I. Ber. Redress.} \]
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Of whom?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Of God and of the Doge.
\[ \text{Doge. Alas! my friend, you seek it of the twin} \]
Of least respect and interest in Venice.
You must address the council.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Twere in vain;
For he who injured me is one of them.
\[ \text{Doge. There's blood upon thy face—how came it} \]
there?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
'Tis mine, and not the first I've shed for Venice,
But the first shed by a Venetian hand:
A noble smote me.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Doth he live?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Not long—
But for the hope I had and have, that you,
My prince, yourself a soldier, will redress
Him whom the laws of discipline and Venice
Permit not to protect himself;—if not—
I say no more.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
But something you would do—
Is it not so?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
I am a man, my lord.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Why so is he who smote you.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
He is call'd so:
Nay, more, a noble one—at least, in Venice:
But since he hath forgotten that I am one,
And treats me like a brute, the brute may turn—
'Tis said the worm will.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Say—his name and lineage?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Barbaro.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
What was the cause? or the pretext?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
I am the chief of the arsenal, employ'd
At present in repairing certain galleys
But roughly used by the Genoese last year.
This morning comes the noble Barbaro
Full of reproof, because our artisans
Had left some frivolous order of his house,
To execute the state's decree; I dared
To justify the men—he raised his hand—
Behold my blood! the first time it e'er flow'd Dishonorably.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Have you long time served?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
So long as to remember Zara's siege,
And fight beneath the chief who beat the Huns
there,
Sometimes my general, now the Doge Falliero.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
How! are we comrades?—the state's ducal robes

\[ \text{Sit newly on me, and you were appointed} \]
Chief of the arsenal ere I came from Rome;
So that I recognized you not. Who placed you?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
The late Doge keeping still my off command
As patron of a galley: my new office
Was given as a reward of certain scars,
(\text{So was your predecessor pleased to say;} \)
I little thought this bounty would conduct me
To his successor as a helpless plaintiff;
At least, in such a case.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Are you much hurt?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Irrecoverably in my self-esteem.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Speak out; fear nothing: being stung at heart,
What would you do to be revenged on this man?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
That which I dare not name, and yet will do.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Then wherefore came you here?
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
I come for justice,
Because my general is Doge, and will not See his old soldier trampled on. Had any,
Save Falliero, fill'd the ducal throne,
This blood had been wash'd out in other blood.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
You come to me for justice—unto me?
The Doge of Venice, and I cannot give it;
I cannot even obtain it—"Twas denied
To me most solemnly an hour ago.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
How says your highness?
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Steno is condemn'd
To a month's confinement.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
What! the same who dared
To stain the ducal throne with those foul words,
That have cried shame to every ear in Venice?
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Ay, doubtless they have echo'd o'er the arsenal,
Keeping due time with every hammer's clink,
As a good jest to jolly artisans;
Or making chorus to the creaking oar,
In the vile tone of every galley-slave,
Who, as he sung the merry stave, exulted
He was not a shamed dotard like the Doge.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Is't possible? a month's imprisonment.
No more for Steno?
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
You have heard the offence,
And now you know his punishment; and then
You ask redress of me! Go to the Forty,
Who pass'd the sentence upon Michel Steno;
They'll do much as Barbaro, no doubt.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Ah! dared I speak my feelings!
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Give them breath.
Mine have no further outrage to endure.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Then, in a word, it rests but on your word
To punish and avenge—I will not say
My petty wrong, for what is a mere blow,
However vile, to such a thing as I am?
But the base insult done your state and person.
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
You overrate my power, which is a pageant.
This cap is not the monarch's crown; these robes
Might move compassion, like a beggar's rags;
Nay, more, a beggar's are his own, and these
But lent to the poor puppet, who must play
Its part with all its empire in this errne.
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Wouldst thou be king?
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Yes—of a happy people
\[ \text{I. Ber.} \]
Wouldst thou be sovereign lord of Venice?
\[ \text{Doge.} \]
Ay,
If that the people shared that sovereignty.
So that nor they nor I were further slaves
To this o'ergrown aristocratic Hydra,
The poisonous heads of whose envenom'd body
Have breathed a pestilence upon us all.

I. Ber. Yet, thou wast born and still hast lived patrician.

Doge. In evil hour was I so born; my birth
Had made me Doge to be insulted: but
I lived and told a soldier and a servant
Of Venice and her people, not the senate;
Their good and my own honor were my gourdon.
I have fought and bled; commanded, ay, and conquered:
Have made and marr'd peace oft in embassies,
As it might chance to be our country's vantage;
Have traversed land and sea in constant duty,
Through almost sixty years, and still for Venice,
My fathers' and my birthplace, whose dear sires,
Rising at distance o'er the blue Lagoon,
It was reward enough for me to view
One more; but not for any knot of men,
Nor sect, nor faction, did I bleed or sweat!
But would you know why I have done all this?
Ask of the bleeding pelican why she Hath ripp'd her bosom? Had the bird a voice,
She'd tell thee 'twas for all her little ones.

I. Ber. And yet they made thee duke.

Doge. They made me so:
I sought it not, the flattering fritters met me
Returning from my Roman embassy,
And never having hitherto refused
Toil, charge, or duty for the state, I did not,
At these late years decline what was the highest
Of all in seeming, but of all most base
In what we have to do and to endure:
Bear witness for me thou, my injured subject,
When I can neither right myself nor thee.

I. Ber. You shall do both, if you possess the will,
And many thousands more not less oppress'd,
Who wait but for a signal—will you give it?
Doge. You speak in riddles.

I. Ber. Which shall soon be read
At peril of my life; if you disdain not
To lend a patient ear.

Doge. Say on.

I. Ber. Not thou,
Nor I alone, are injured and abused,
Contemned and trampled on; but the whole people
Grown with the strong conception of their wrongs.
The foreign soldiers in the senate's pay
Are discontented for their long arrears;
The native mariners, and civic troops,
Feel with their friends; for who is he among them
Whose brethren, parents, children, wives, or sisters,
Have not partook oppression, or pollution,
From the patricians? And the hopeless war
Against the Genoese, which is still maintain'd
With the plebian blood, and treasure wrung
From their hard earnings, has inflamed them further;
Even now—but, I forget that speaking thus,
Perhaps I pass the sentence of my death!

Doge. And suffering what thou hast done—fear'st thou death?
Be silent then, and live on, to be beaten
By those for whom thou hast bled.

I. Ber. No, I will speak at every hazard; and if Venice' Doge
Should turn delator, be the shame on him,
And woe too; for he will lose far more

Than I.

I. Doge. From me fear nothing; out with it!

I. Ber. Know, then, that there are met and sworn in secret
A band of brethren, valiant hearts and true;
Men who have proved all fortunes, and have long
Grieved over that of Venice, and have right
To do so; having served her in all climes,
And having rescued her from foreign foes,
Would do the same from those within her walls.
They are not numerous, nor yet too few
For their great purpose; they have arms, and means.
And hearts, and hopes, and faith, and patient courage.

Doge. For what then do they pause?

I. Ber. An hour to strike.

Doge. (aside,) Saint Mark's shall strike that hour!

I. Ber. I now have placed
My life, my honor, all my earthly hopes
Within thy power, but in the firm belief
That injuries like ours, sprung from one cause,
Will generate one vengeance: should it be so,
Le our chief now—our sovereign hereafter.

Doge. How many are ye?

I. Ber. I'll not answer that Till I am answer'd.

Doge. How, sir! do you menace

I. Ber. No; I affirm. I have betray'd myself,
But there's no torture in the mystic wows
Which undermine your palace, nor in those
Not less appalling cells, the "leaden roofs,"
To force a single name from me of others.
The Pozzi and the Pioemi were in vain;
They might wring blood from me, but treachery never,
And I would pass the fearful "Bridge of Sigia,"
Joyous that mine must be the last that e'er
Would echo o'er the Stygian wave which flows
Between the murderers and the murder'd, washing
The prison and the palace walls: there are Those who would live to think on't, and avenge me.

Doge. If such your power and purpose, why come here
To sue for justice, being in the course
To do yourself due right?

I. Ber. Because the man,
Who claims protection from authority,
Showing his confidence and his submission
To that authority, can hardly be
Suspected of combining to destroy it.
Had I sate down too humbly with this blow,
A moody brow and mutter'd threats had made me
A mark'd man to the Forty's inquisition
But loud complaint, however angrily
It shapes its phrase, is little to be fear’d,
And less distracted. But, besides all this,
I had another reason.

Doge. What was that?

I. Ber. Some rumors that the Doge was greatly moved
By the reference of the Avogadori
Of Michel Steno's sentence to the Forty
Had reached me. I had serv'd you, honor'd you
And felt that you were dangerously insulted,
Being of an order of such spirits, as
Require the tenfold both good and evil: 'twas
My wish to prove and urge you to redress.

Now you know all: and that I speak the truth,
My peril be the proof.

Doge. You have deeply ventured.
But all must do so who would greatly win:
That I'll answer you—your secret's safe.
I. Ber. And is this all?

Doge. Unless with all intrusted,
What would you have me answer?
I. Ber. I would have you
Trust him who leaves his life in trust with you.
Doge. But I must know your plan, your names, and numbers;
The list may then be doubled, and the former Matured and strengthened.
I. Ber. We're enough already;
You are the sole ally we covet now.
Doge. But bring me to the knowledge of your chiefs.
I. Ber. That shall be done upon your formal pledge
To keep the faith that we will pledge to you.
Doge. When? where?
I. Ber. This night I'll bring to your apartments
Two of the principals; a great number
Were in our service.
Doge. Stay, I must think of this.
What if I were to trust myself among you,
And leave the palace?
I. Ber. You must come alone.
Doge. But with my nephew.
I. Ber. Not were he your son.
Doge. Wretched! darest thou name my son? He died in arms
At Sapienza for this faithless state.
Oh! that he were alive, and I in ashes!
Or that he were alive ere I be ashes!
I. Ber. Not one of all those strangers whom thou doubtest
But will regard thee with a filial feeling,
So that thou keep'st a father's faith with them.
Doge. The die is cast. Where is the place of meeting?
I. Ber. At midnight I will be alone and mask'd
Where'er your highness please to direct me,
To wait your coming, and conduct you where
You shall receive our homage, and pronounce
Upon our project.
Doge. At what hour arises
The moon?
I. Ber. Late, but the atmosphere is thick and dusky;
'Tis a sirocco.
Doge. At the midnight hour, then,
Near to the church where sleep my sires; the same,
Twin-named from the apostles John and Paul;
A gondola, with one oar only, will
Lurk in the narrow channel which glides by.
Be there.
I. Ber. I will not fail.
Doge. And now retire—
I. Ber. In full hope your highness will not falter in your great purpose. Prince, I take my leave.

[Exit ISRAEL BEHUCCTO.

Doge, (salut.) At midnight, by the church Saints
John and Paul,
Where sleep my noble fathers, I repair—
To what? to hold a council in the dark
With common ruffians leagued to ruin states!
And will not my great sires leap from the vault,
Where lie two doges who preceded me,
And pluck me down among them? Would they could,
For I should rest in honor with the honor'd
Alas! I must not think of them, but those Who have made me thus unworthy of a name
Noble and brave as aught of consular
On Roman marbles; but I will redeem it
Back to its antique lustre in our annals,
By sweet revenge on all that's base in Venice
And freedom to the rest, or leave it black
To all the growing calamities of time,
Which never spare the fame of him who falls,
But try the Caesar, or the Catiline,
By the true touchstone of desert—success.

ACT II.

SCENE I.

An Apartment in the Ducale Palace.

ANGIOLINA (wife of the DOGE) and MARIANNA.

Ang. What was the Doge's answer?
Mar. That he was
That moment summon'd to a conference:
But 'tis by this time ended. I perceived
Not long ago the senators embarking;
And the last gondola may now be seen
Gliding into the throng of barks which stud
The glittering waters.
Ang. Would he were return'd!
He has been much disquieted of late;
And Time, which has not tamed his fiery spirit,
Nor yet enfolds even his mortal frame,
Which seems to be more nourished by a soul
So quick and restless that it would consume
Less hardy clay—Time has but little power
On his resentments or his griefs. Unlike
To other spirits of his order, who,
In the first burst of passion, pour away
Their wrath or sorrow, all things wear in him
An aspect of eternity: his thoughts,
His feelings, passions, good or evil, all
Have nothing of old age; and his bold brow
Bears but the scars of mind, the thoughts of years
Not their deceptibility: and he of late
Has been more agitated than his wont.
Would he were come! for I alone have power
Upon his troubled spirit.

Mar. It is true,
His highness has of late been greatly moved
By the affront of Steho, and with cause;
But the offender doubtless even now
Is doom'd to expiate his rash insult with Such chastisement as will enforce respect
To female virtue, and to noble blood.
Ang. "Twas a great insult; but I heed it not
For the rash scornier's falsehood in itself,
But for the effect, the deadly deep impression
Which it has made upon Faliero's soul,
The proud, the fiery, the austere—
To all save me! I tremble when I think
To what it may conduct.

Mar. Assuredly
The Doge cannot suspect you?

Ang. Suspect not:
Why Steno dared not: when he scrawl'd his ris
3rd telling by stealth in the moon's glimmering light,
His own still conscience smote him for the act,
And every shadow on the walls frown'd shame
Upon his coward calumny.
Mar. 'Twere fit
He should be punish'd grievously.
Ang. He is so.
Mar. What! is the sentence pass'd? is he condemn'd?
Ang. I know not that, but he has been detected.
Mar. And deem you this enough for such foul scorn?
Ang. I would not be a judge in my own cause,
Nor do I know what sense of punishment
May reach the soul of ribalds such as Steno;
But if 's his insults sink no deeper in
The minds of the inquisitors than they
Have ruffled mine, he will, for all acquittance,
Be left to his own shamelessness or shame.
Mar. Some sacrifice is due to slander'd virtue.
Ang. Why, what is virtue if it needs a victim?
Or if it must depend upon men's words?
The dying Roman said, 'twas but a name:
It was indeed no more, if human breath
Could make or mar it.
Mar. Yet full many a dame,
Stainless and faithful, would feel all the wrong
Of such a slander; and less rigid ladies,
Such as abound in Venice, would be loud
And all-inexorable in their cry:
For justice.
Ang. This but proves it is the name
And not the quality they prize: the first
Have found it a hard task to hold their honor,
If they require it to be blazon'd forth;
And those who have not kept it, seek its seeming
As they would look out for an ornament
Of which they feel the want, but not because
They think it so; they live in others' thoughts,
And would seem honest as they must seem fair.
Mar. You have strange thoughts for a patrician dame.
Ang. And yet they were my father's; with his name
The sole inheritance he left.
Mar. You want none.
Wife to a prince, the chief of the Republic.
Ang. I should have sought none though a peasant's bride,
But feel not less the love and gratitude
Due to my father, who bestow'd my hand
Upon his early, tried, and trusted friend,
The Count Val di Marino, now our doge.
Mar. And with that hand did he bestow your heart?
Ang He did so; or it had not been bestow'd.
Mar. Yet this strange disproportion in your years,
And, let me add, disparity of tempers,
Might make the world doubt whether such an union
Could make you wisely, permanently happy.
Ang. The world will think with worldings; but my heart
Has still been in my duties, which are many,
But never difficult.
Mar. And do you love him?
Ang. I love all noble qualities which merit love, and I loved my father, who first taught me
To single out what we should love in others,
And to subdue all tendency to lend
The best and purest feelings of our nature
To baser passions. He bestow'd my hand
Upon Faliero: he had known him noble,
Brave, generous, rich in all the qualities
Of soldier, citizen, and friend; in all
Such have I found him as my father said.
His faults are those that dwell in the high bosoms
Of men who have commanded: too much pride,
And the deep passions fiercely foster'd by
The uses of patricians, and a life
Spent in the storms of state and war; and also
From the quick sense of honor, which becomes
A duty to a certain sign, a vice
When overstrain'd, and this I fear in him.
And then he has been rash from his youth upwards
Yet temper'd by redeeming nobleness
In such sort, that the wariest of republics
Has lavish'd all its chief employs upon him,
From his first fight to his last embassy,
From which on his return the dukedom met him.
Mar. But previous to this marriage, had your heart
Ne'er beat for any of the noble youth,
Such as in years had been more meet to match
Beauty like yours? or since have you ne'er seen
One, who, if your fair hand were still to give,
Might now pretend to Loredano's daughter?
Ang. I answer'd your first question when I said
I married.
Mar. And the second?
Ang. Needs no answer.
Mar. I pray your pardon, if I have offended.
Ang. I feel no wrath, but some surprise: I knew
not
That wedded bosoms could permit themselves
To ponder upon what they now might choose, or Aught save their past choice.
Mar. 'Tis their past choice
That far too often makes them deem they would
Now choose more wisely, could they cancel it.
Ang. It may be so. I knew not of such thoughts.
Mar. Here comes the Doge—shall I retire?
Ang. It may
Be better you should quit me; he seems rapt
In thought.—How pensively he takes his way!
[Exit MARIAFNA.

Enter the DOGE and PIETRO.

Doge. (musing.) There is a certain Philip Calen-daro
Now in the arsenal, who holds command
Of eighty men, and has great influence
Besides on all the spirits of his comrades:
This man, I hear, is bold and popular,
Sudden and daring, and yet secret; 'twould
Be well that he were won: I needs must hope
That Israel Bertuccio has secured him,
But fain would be—
Pie. My lord, pray pardon me
For breaking in upon your meditation;
The Senator Bertuccio, your kinsman,
Charged me to follow and inquire your pleasure
To fix an hour when he may speak with you.
Doge. At sunset.—Stay a moment—let me see—
Say in the second hour of night. [Exit PIETRO.
Ang. My lord!
Doge. My dearest child, forgive me—why delay
So long approaching me?—I saw you not.
Ang. You were absorb'd in thought, and he who now
Has parted from you might have words of weight
To bear you from the senate.
Doge. From the senate?
Ang. I would not interrupt him in his duty
And theirs.
Doge. The senate’s duty! you mistake;
’Tis we who owe all service to the senate.
Ang. I thought the Duke had held command in Venice.
Doge. He shall.—But let that pass.—We will be ound.
How fares it with you? have you been abroad?
The day is overcast, but the calm wave
Favors the gondolier’s light skimming oar;
Or have you held a levee of your friends?
Or has your music made you solitary?
Say—is there aught that you would will within
The little sway now left the Duke? or aught
Of fitting splendor, or of honest pleasure,
Social or lonely, that would glad your heart,
To compensate for many a droll hour, wasted
On an old man oft moved with many cares?
Speak, and ’tis done.
Ang. You’re ever kind to me—
I have nothing to desire, or to request,
Except to see you oftener and calmer.
Doge. Calmer?
Ang. Ay, calmer, my good lord.—Ah, why
Do you still keep apart, and walk alone,
And let such strong emotions stamp your brow,
As not betraying their full import, yet
Disclose too much?
Doge. Disclose too much!—of what?
What is there to disclose?
Ang. A heart so ill
At ease.
Doge. ’Tis nothing, child.—But in the state
You know what daily cares oppress all those
Who govern this precarious commonwealth;
Now suffering from Genoese without,
And malcontents within—’tis this which makes me
More pensive and less tranquil than my wont.
Ang. Yet this existed long before, and never Till in these late days did I see you thus.
Forgive me; there is something at your heart
More than the mere discharge of public duties,
Which long use and a talent like yours
Have rendered light, nay, a necessity,
To keep your mind from stagnating. ’Tis not
In hostile states, nor perils, thus to shake you;
You, who have stood all storms and never sunk,
And climb’d up to the pinnacle of power
And never fainted by the way, and stand
Upon it, and can look down steadily
Along the depth beneath, and ne’er feel dizzy.
Were Genoa’s galleys riding in the port,
Were civil fury raging in St. Mark’s,
You are not to be wrought on, but would fall,
As you have risen, with an unalter’d brow—
Your feelings now are of a different kind;
Something has stung your pride, not patriotism.
Doge. Pride! Angiolina? Alas! none is left me.
Ang. Yes—the same sin that overthrew the angels,
And of all sins more easily besets
Mortals the nearest to the angelic nature:
The vile are only vain; the great are proud.
Doge. I had the pride of honor, of your honor
Deep at my heart—But let us change the theme.
Ang. Ah no!—As I have ever shared your kindness
In all things else, let me not be shut out
From your distress: were it of public import,
You know I never sought, would never seek
To win a word from you; but feeling now
Your grief is private, it belongs to me
To lighten or divide it. Since the day
When foolish Steno’s ribaldry detected
Unfix’d your quiet, you are greatly changed,
And I would soothe you back to what you were.
Doge. To what I was!—have you heard Steno’s sentence?
Ang. No.
Doge. A month’s arrest.
Ang. Is it not enough?
Doge. Enough!—yes, for a drunken galley slave
Who, stung by stripes, may murmur at his master;
But not for a deliberate, false, cool villain,
Who stains a lady’s and a prince’s honor
Even on the throne of his authority.
Ang. There seems to me enough in the conviction
Of a patrician guilty of a falsehood:
All other punishment were light unto
His loss of honor.
Doge. Such men have no honor,
They have but their vile lives—and these are spared.
Ang. You would not have him die for this offence?
Doge. Not now.—being still alive, I’d have him live
Long as he can; he has ceased to merit death;
The guilty saved hath damn’d his hundred judges.
And he is pure, for now his crime is theirs.
Ang. Oh! had this false and flippant libeller
Shed his young blood for his absurd lampoon, Ne’re from that moment could this breast have knows?
A joyless hour, or dreamless slumber more.
Doge. Does not the law of heaven say blood for blood?
And he who taints kills more than he who sheds it;
Is it the pain of blows, or shame of blows,
That makes such deadly to the sense of man?
Do not the laws of man say blood for honor?
And, less than honor, for a little gold?
Say not the laws of nations blood for treason?
Is’t nothing to have fill’d these veins with poison
For their once healthful current? is it nothing
To have stain’d your name and mine—the, noblest names?
Is’t nothing to have brought into contempt
A prince before his people? to have fail’d
In the respect accorded by mankind?
To youth in woman, and old age in man?
To virtue in your sex, and dignity
In ours?—but let them look to it who have saved
Ang. Heaven bids us to forgive our enemies.
Doge. Doth Heaven forgive her own? Is Satan saved
From wrath eternal?
Ang. Do not speak thus wildly—
Heaven will alike forgive you and your foes.
Doge. Amen! May Heaven forgive them!
Ang. And will you?
Doge. Yes, when they are in heaven!
Ang. And not till then?
Doge. What matters my forgiveness? an old man’s.
Wor! out, scorn'd, spurn'd, abused; what matters then?
My pardon more than my resentment, both
Being weak and worthless? I have lived too long,—
But let us change the argument.—My child,
My injured wife, the child of Loredano,
The brave, the chivalrous, how little deem'd
Thy father, wedding thee unto his friend,
'That he was linking thee to shame?—Alas!
Shame without sin, for thou art faultless! Hadst thou
But had a different husband, any husband
In Venice save the Doge, this blight, this brand,
This blasphemy had never fallen upon thee.
So young, so beautiful, so good, so pure,
To suffer this, and yet be unavenged!
Ang. I am too well avenged, for you still love me,
And trust, and honor me; and all men know
That you are just, and I am true: what more
Could I require, or you command?
Doge. 'Tis well,
And may be better; but whate'er betide,
Be thou at least kind to my memory.
Ang. Why speak you thus?
Doge. It is no matter why:
But I would still, whatever others think,
Have your respect both now and in my grave.
Ang. Why should you doubt it? has it ever fail'd?
Doge. Come hither, child; I would a word with you.
Your father was my friend; unequal fortune
Made him my debtor for some courtesies
Which bind the good more firmly: when, oppress
With his last malady, he will'd our union,
It was not to repay me, long repaid
Before by his great loyalty in friendship;
His object was to place your orphan beauty
In honorable safety from the perils,
Which, in this scorpion nest of vice, assail
A lonely and undower'd maid. I did not Think with him, but would not oppose the thought
Which soothed his death-bed.
Ang. I have not forgotten
The nobleness with which you bade me speak
If my young heart held any preference
Which would have made me happier; nor your offer
To make my dowry equal to the rank
Of ought in Venice, andforego all claim
My father's last injunction gave you.
Doge. Thus,
'Twas not a foolish dotard's vile caprice,
Nor the false edge of aged appetite,
Which made me covetous of girlish beauty,
And a young bride: for in my fiercest youth
I swayed such passions; nor was this my age
Infected with that leprosy of lust
Which taints the hoariest years of veteran men,
Making them ransack to the very last
The dregs of pleasure for their vanished joys;
Or buy in selfish marriage some young victim,
Too helpless to refuse a state that's honest,
Too feeling not to know herself a wretch.
Our wedlock was not of this sort; you had Freedom from me to choose; and urged in answer
Your father's choice.
Ang. I did so; I would so do
In face of earth and heaven; for I have never Repealed for my sake; sometimes for yours,
In pondering o'er your late disquietudes.

Doge. I knew my heart would never treat you harshly;
I knew my days could not disturb you long;
And then the daughter of my earliest friend,
His worthy daughter, free to choose again,
Wealthier and wiser, in the ripest bloom
Of womanhood, more skilful to select
By passing these probationary years,
Inheriting a prince's name and riches,
Secured, by the short penance of enduring
An old man for some summers, against all
That law's chicanes or envious kinsmen might
Have urged against her right; my best friend's child
Would choose more fitly in respect of years,
And not less truly in a faithful heart.
Ang. My lord, I look'd but to my father's wishes.
Hallow'd by his last words, and to my heart
For doing all its duties, and replying
With faith to him with whom I was affianced.
Ambitious hopes ne'er cross'd my dreams; and should
The hour you speak of come, it will be seen so.
Doge. I do believe you; and I know you true:
For love, romantic love, which in my youth
I knew to be illusion, and ne'er saw Lasting, but often fatal, it had been
No lure for me, in my most passionate days,
And could not be so now, did such exist.
But such respect, and mildly paid regard
As a true feeling for your welfare, and
A free compliance with all honest wishes
A kindness to your virtues, watchfulness
Not shown, but shadowing o'er such little failings
As youth is apt in, so as not to check
Rashly, but win you from them ere you knew
You had been won, but thought the change you chose,
A pride not in your beauty, but your conduct,—
A trust in you—a patriarchal love,
And not a doting homage—friendship, faith—
Such estimation in your eyes as these Might claim, I hoped for.
Ang. And have ever had.
Doge. I think so. For the difference in our years
You knew it, choosing me, and chose: I trusted
Not to my qualities, nor would have faith
In such, nor outward ornaments of nature,
Were I still in my five and twentieth spring;
I trusted to the blood of Loredano
Pure in your veins; I trusted to the soul
God gave you—to the truths your father taught you—
To your belief in heaven—to your mild virtues—
To your own faith and honor, for my own.
Ang. You have done well.—I thank you for that trust,
Which I have never for one moment ceased
To honor you the more for.
Doge. Where is honor,
Innate and precept-strengthen'd, 'tis the rock
Of faith consumm'd: where it is not—where
Light thoughts are lurking, or the vanities
Of worldly pleasure rankle in the heart,
Or sensual throbs convulse it, well I know
'Twere hopeless for humanity to dream
Of honesty in such infected blood.
Although 'twere wed to him it covets most:
An incarnation of the poet's god
In all his marble-chisell'd beauty, or
The demi-deity Alcides, in
His majesty of superhuman manhood,
Would not suffice to bind where virtue is not;
It is consistency which forms and proves it:
Vice cannot fix, and virtue cannot change.
The once full'rn woman must for ever full;
For vice must have variety, while virtue
Stands like the sun, and all which rolls around
Drinks life, and light, and glory from her aspect.
Ang. And seeing feeling thus this truth in others,
I pray you pardon me;) but wherefore yield you
To the most fierce of fatal passions, and Blow your great thoughts with restless hate
Of such a thing as Steno?
Doge. You mistake me
It is not Steno who could move me thus;
Had it been so, he should—but let that pass.
Ang. What is't you feel so deeply, then, even now?
Doge. The violated majesty of Venice,
At once insulted in her lord and laws.
Ang. Alas! why will you thus consider it?
Doge. I have thought on't till—but let me lead you back.
To what I urged: all these things being noted,
I wedded you; the world then did me justice
Upon the motive, and my conduct proved
They did me right, while yours was all to praise:
You had all freedom—all respect—all trust
From me and mine; and, born of those who made Princes at home, and swept kings from their thrones
On foreign shores, in all these things you appear'd
Worthy to be our first of native dames.
Ang. To what does this conduct?
Doge. To such much—that
A miscreant's angry breath may blast it all—
A villain, whom for his unbroided bearing,
Even in the midst of our great festival,
I caused to be conducted forth, and taught
How to demean himself in ducal chambers;
A wretch like this may leave upon the wall
The blighting venom of his sweltering heart,
And this shall spread itself in general poison;
And woman's innocence, man's honor, pass
Into a by-word; and the doubly felon
(Who first insulted virgin modesty
By a gross affront to your attendant damsel
Amidst the noblest of our dames in public)
Requite himself for his most just expulsion,
By blackening publicly his sovereign's consort,
And be absolved by his upright compeers.
Ang. But he has been condemn'd into captivity.
Doge. For such as him a dungeon were acquital;
And his brief term of mock-arrest will pass
Within a palace. But I've done with him;
The rest must be with you.
Ang. You back. With me, my lord?
Doge. You, Angiolina. Do not marvel; I
Have let this prey upon me till I feel
My life cannot be long; and fate would have you
Regard the injunctions you will find within This scroll. (Giving her a paper) Fear not; they are for your advantage:
Read them hereafter at the fitting hour.
Ang. My lord, in life, and after life, you shall
Be honor'd still by me: but may your days
Be many yet—and happier than the present!

This passion will give way, and you will be Sensible, and what you should be—what you were.
Doge. I will be what I should be, or be nothing.
But never more—oh! never, never more.
O'er the few days or hours which yet await
The blighted old age of Faliero, shall Sweet Quiet shed her sunset! Never more
Those summer shadows rising from the past
Of a not ill-spent nor inglorious life,
Mellowing the last hours as the night approaches,
Shall soothe me to my moment of long rest.
I had but little more to task, or hope,
Save the regards due to the blood and sweat,
And the soul's labor—among which I had toil'd
To make my country honor'd. As her servant—
Her servant, though her chief—I would have gone
Down to my fathers with a name serene
And pure as theirs; but this has been denied me—
Would I had died at Zara!

Ang. There you saved
The state; then live to save her still. A day,
Another day like that would be the best
Reproof to them, and sole revenge for you.
Doge. But one such day occurs within an age;
My life is little less than one, and 'tis
Enough for Fortune to have granted once,
That which scarce one most favor'd citizen
May win in many states and years. But why
Thus speak I? Venice has forgot that day—
Then why should I remember it?—Farewell,
Sweet Angiolina! I must to my cabinet;
There's much for me to do—and the hour hastens.
Ang. Remember what you were.
Doge. It were in vain!
Joy's recollection is no longer joy,
While Sorrow's memory is a sorrow still.
Ang. At least, what'er may urge, let me implore
That you will take some little pause of rest:
Your sleep for many nights has been so turbid
That it had been relief to have awakened you,
Had I not hoped that Nature would o'erpower
At length the thoughts which shook your slumber;
An hour of rest will give you to your toils
With fitter thoughts and freshen'd strength.
Doge. I cannot—
I must not, if I could; for never was Such reason to be watchful: yet a few—
Yet a few days and dream-perturbed nights,
And I shall slumber well—but where?—no matter,
Adieu, my Angiolina.
Ang. Let me be
An instant—yet an instant your companion
I cannot bear to leave you thus.
Doge. Come then,
My gentle child—forgive me; thouwert made
For better uses than to share in mine,
Now darkling in their close toward the deep vale
Where Death sits robed in his all-sweeping shadow.
When I am gone—it may be sooner than Even these years warrant, for there is that stirring
Within—above—around, that in this city
Will make the cemeteries populous
As o'er they were by pestilence or war—
When I am nothing, let that which I was
Be still sometimes a name on thy sweet lips.
A shadow in thy fancy, of a thing
SCENE II.

A retired Spot near the Arsenal.

ISRAEL BERTUCCIO and PHILIP CALENDARIO.

Cal. How spied you, Israel, in your late complaint?

I. Ber. Why, well.

Cal. Is't possible! will he be punish'd?

I. Ber. Yes.

Cal. With what? a mullet or an arrest?

I. Ber. With death!—

Cal. Now you rave, or must intend revenge, such as I counsel'd you, with your own hand.

I. Ber. Yes; and for one sole draught of hate,

The great redress we meditate for Venice,
And change a life of hope for one of exile;
Leaving one scorpion crush'd, and thousands stinging
My friends, my family, my countrymen!
No, Calendario; these same drops of blood,
Shed shamefully, shall have the whole of his
For their requital—but not only his;
We will not strike for private wrongs alone:
Such are for selfish passions and rash men,
But are unworthy a tyrannicide.

Cal. You have more patience than I care to bestow.

Had I been present when you bore this insult,
I must have slain him, or expired myself
In the vain effort to repress my wrath.

I. Ber. Thank Heaven, you were not—all had else been marr'd:
As 'tis, our cause looks prosperous still.

Cal. You saw
The Doge—what answer gave he?

I. Ber. That there was
No punishment for such as Barbaro.

Cal. I told you so before, and that 'twas idle
To think of justice from such hands.

I. Ber. At least,
It lul'd suspicion, showing confidence.
Had I been silent, not a stab but
Had kept me in his eye, as meditating
A silent, solitary, deep revenge.

Cal. But wherefore not address you to the Council?

The Doge is a mere puppet, who can scarce
Obtain right for himself. Why speak to him?

I. Ber. You shall know that hereafter.

Cal. Forego
Why not now?

I. Ber. Be patient but till midnight. Get your musters,
And bid your friends prepare their companies:
Set all in readiness to strike the blow,
Perhaps in a few hours; we have long waited
For a fit time—that hour is on the dial,
It may be, of to-morrow's sun; delay
Beyond may breed us double danger. See
That all be punctual at our place of meeting,
And arm'd, excepting those of the Sixteen,
Who will remain among the troops to wait

The signal.

Cal. These brave words have breathed new life
Into my veins; I am sick of these protracted
And hesitating councils: day on day
Crawl'd on, and added but another link
To our long fetters, and some fresher wrong
Inflicted on our brethren or ourselves,
Helping to swell our tyrants' bloated strength
Let us but deal upon them, and I care not
For the result, which must be death or freedom!
I'm weary to the heart of finding neither.

I. Ber. We will be free in life or death! the grapple
Is chainless. Have you all the musters ready?
And are the sixteen companies completed to sixty?

Cal. All save two, in which there are Twenty-five wanting to make up the number.

I. Ber. No matter; we can do without. Whose are they?

Cal. Bertram's and old Soranzo's, both of whom Appear less forward in the cause than we are.

I. Ber. Your fiery nature makes you deem all those Who are not restless, cold: but there exists
Oft in concentrated spirits not less daring
Than in more loud avengers. Do not doubt them.

Cal. I do not doubt the elder; but in Bertram
There is a hesitating softness, fatal
To enterprise like ours: I've seen that man
Weep like an infant o'er the misery
Of others, heedless of his own, though greater;
And in a recent quarrel I beheld him
Turn sick at sight of blood, although a villain's.

I. Ber. The truly brave are soft of heart and eyes,
And feel for what their duty bids them do.
I have known Bertram long; there doth not breathe
A soul more full of honor.

Cal. It may be so:
I apprehend less treachery than weakness;
Yet as he has no mistress, and no wife,
To work upon his milkiness of spirit,
He may go through the ordeal; it is well
He is an orphan, friendless save in us:
A woman or a child had made him less
Than other in resolve.

I. Ber. Such ties are not
For those who are call'd to the high destinies
Which purify corrupted commonwealths:
We must forget all feelings save the one—
We must resign all passions save our purpose—
We must behold no object save our country—
And only look on death as beautiful,
So that the sacrifice ascend to heaven
And draw down freedom on her evermore.

Cal. But if we fail—

I. Ber. They never fall who die
In a great cause: the block may soak their gore;
Their heads may sodden in the sun; their limbs
Be strung to city gates and castle walls—
But still their spirit walks abroad. Though years
Elapse, and others share as dark a doom,
They but augment the deep and sweeping thoughts
Which overpower all others, and conduct
The world at last to freedom: What were we,
If Brutus had not lived? He died in giving
Rome liberty, but left a deathless lesson—
A name which is a virtue, and a soul
Which multiplies itself thoughtout all time,
When wicked men wax mighty, and a state
Turns servile: he and his high friend were styled
BYRON'S WORKS.

'The last of Romans!' Let us be the first Of true Venetians, sprung from Roman sires.

Cal. Our fathers did not fly from Attila Into these isles, where palaces have sprung On banks redeem'd from the rude ocean's ooze, To own a thousand despot's in his place.

Better bow down before the Hun, and call A Tartar lord, than these swolu silkworms masters! The first at least was man, and used his sword
As sceptre: these unmanly creeping things Command our swords, and rule them with a word As with a spell.

I. Ber. It shall be broken soon. You say that all things are in readiness; To-day I have not been the usual round, And why thou knowest; but thy vigilance Will better have supplied my care: these orders In recent council to redouble now Our efforts to repair the galleys, have Lent a fair color to the introduction Of many of our cause into the arsenal, As new artificers for their equipment, Or fresh recruits obtain'd in haste to man The hoped-for fleet.—Are all supplied with arms?

Cal. All who were deem'd trustworthy: there are some Whom it were well to keep in ignorance Till it be time to strike, and then supply them: When in the heat and hurry of the hour They have no opportunity to pause, But needs must on with those who will surround them.

I. Ber. You have said well. Have you remark'd all such?

Cal. I've noted most; and caused the other chiefs To use like caution with their companies. As far as I have seen, we are enough To make the enterprise secure, if 'tis commenced to-morrow; but, till 'tis begun, Each hour is pregnant with a thousand perils.

I. Ber. Let the Sixteen meet at the wonted hour, Except Soranzo, Nicoletto Blondo, And Marco Giuda, who will keep their watch Within the arsenal, and hold all ready, Expectant of the signal we will fix on.

Cal. We will not fail.

I. Ber. Let all the rest be there; I have a stranger to present to them.

Cal. A stranger! doth he know the secret?

I. Ber. Yes.

Cal. And have you dared to peril your friends' lives On a rash confidence in one we know not?

I. Ber. I have risk'd no man's life except myself— Of that be certain: he is one who may Make our assurance doubly sure, according His aid; and if reluctant, he no less Is in our power: he comes alone with me, And cannot escape us; but he will not swerve.

Cal. I cannot judge of this until I know him: Is he one of our order?

I. Ber. Ay, in spirit, Although a child of greatness; he is one Who would become a throne, or overthrow one— One who has done great deeds, and seen great changes;

No tyrant, though bred up to tyranny; Valiant in war, and sage in council; noble In nature, although haughty; quick, though wary; Yet for all this, so full of certain passions, That if once stir'd and baffled, as he has been Upon the tenderest points, there is no Fury In Grecian story like to that which wrings His vitals with her burning hands, till he Grows capable of all things for revenge; And add too, that his mind is liberal,

He sees and feels the people are oppress'd, And shares their sufferings. Take him all in all, We have need of such, and such have need of us.

Cal. And what part would you have him take with us?

I. Ber. It may be, that of chief.

Cal. What; and resign Your own command as leader?

I. Ber. Even so. My object is to make your cause end well, And not to push myself to power. Experience, Some skill, and your own choice, had mark'd me out To act in trust as your commander, till Some worthier should appear: if I have found such As you yourselves shall own more worthy, think you That I would hesitate from selfishness, And, covetous of brief authority, Stake our deep interest on my single thoughts, Rather than yield to one above me in All leading qualities? No, Calendario, Know your friend better; but you all shall judge— Away! and let us meet at the fix'd hour.

Be vigilant, and all will yet go well.

Cal. Worthy Bertuccio, I have known you ever Trusty and brave, with head and heart to plan What I have still been prompt to execute For my own part, I seek no other chief; What the rest will decide I know not, but I am with you, as I have ever been, In all our undertakings. Now farewell, Until the hour of midnight sees us meet. [Exeunt]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Scene, the Space between the Canal and the Church of San Giovanni e San Paolo. An equestrian Statue before it.—A Gondola lies in the Canal at some distance.

Enter the Doge alone, disguised.

Doge, (solus.) I am before the hour, the hour whose voice,
Pealing into the arch of night, might strike These palaces with ominous tottering,
And rock their marbles to the corner-stone,
Waking the sleepers from some hideous dream Of indistinct but awful augury
Of that which will befal them. Yes, proud city! Thou must be cleansed of the black blood which makes thee.

A lazaret-house of tyranny: the task Is forced upon me, I have sought it not; And therefore was I punish'd, seeing this Patrician-pestilence spread on and on, Until at length it smote me in my slumbers, And I am tainted, and must wash away The plague-spots in the healing wave. Tall fame
Where sleep my fathers, whose dim statues shadow
The floor which doth divide us from the dead,
Where all the pregnant hearts of our bold blood,
Moulder'd into a mite of ashes, hold
In one shrunken heap, what once made many heroes,
When what is now a handful shook the earth—
Fane of the tutelar saints who guard our house!
Vault where two doges rest—my sire's! who died
The one of toil, the other in the field,
With a long race of other lineal chiefs
And sages, whose great labors, wounds, and state
I have inherited,—let the graves gape,
Fill all thine aisles be peopled with the dead,
And pour from them thy portals to gaze on me!
I call them up, and them and thee to witness
What it hath been which put me to this task—
Their pure high blood, their blazon roll of glories,
Their mighty name dishonor'd all in me,
Not by me, but by the ungrateful nobles
We fought to make our equals, not our lords:—
And chiefly thou, Ordelaf the brave,
Who perish'd in the field, where I since conquer'd,
Battling at Zara, did the hecatombs
Of thine and Venice's foes, there offer'd up
By thy descendant, merit such acquittance?
Spirits! smile down upon me; for my cause
Is yours, in all life now can be of yours,
Your fame, your name, all mingled up in mine,
And in the future fortunes of our race!
Let me but prosper, and I make this city
Free and immortal, and our house's name
Worthy of what you were, now and hereafter!

Enter Israel Beruccio.

I. Ber. Who goes there?

Doge. A friend to Venice.
I. Ber. 'Tis he.

Welcome, my lord,—you are before the time.

Doge. I am ready to proceed to your assembly.
I. Ber. Have with you,—I am proud and pleased to see
Such confident alacrity. Your doubts
Since our last meeting, then, are all dispell'd?

Doge. Not so—but I have set my little left
Of life upon this cast: the die was thrown
When I first listen'd to your treason—Start not!
That is the word: I cannot shape my tongue
To syllable black deeds into smooth names,
Though I be wrought on to commit them. When
I heard you tempt your sovereign, and forborne
To have you dragg'd to prison, I became
Your guilest accomplice: now you may,
If it so please you, do as much by me.
I. Ber. Strange words, my lord, and most unmerited:
I am no spy, and neither are we traitors.

Doge. We see!—no matter—you have earn'd the right
To talk of us.—But to the point.—If this Attempt succeeds, and Venice, render'd free
And flourishing, when we are in our graves,
Conducts her generations to our tombs,
And makes her children with their little hands
Strew flowers o'er their deliverers' ashes then
The consequence will sanctify the deed,
And we shall be like the two Brutt in
The annals of hereafter; but if not,
If we should fail, employing bloody means
And secret plot, although to a good end,
Still we are traitors, honest Israel:—thou
No less than he who was thy sovereign
Six hours ago, and now thy brother rebel.

I. Ber. 'Tis not the moment to consider thus,
Else I could answer.—Let us to the meeting,
Or we may be observed in lingering here.

Doge. We are observed, and have been.
I. Ber. We observed
Let me discover—and this steel—

Doge. Put up.
Here are no human witnesses: look there—
What see you?
I. Ber. Only a tall warrior's statue
Bestriding a proud steed, in the dim light
Of the dull moon.

Doge. That warrior was the sire
Of my sire's fathers, and that statue was Decreed to him by the twice rescued city:—
Think you that he looks down on us or no?
I. Ber. My lord, these are mere phantasties; there are No eyes in marble.

Doge. But there are in Death.
I tell thee man, there is a spirit in Such things that acts and sees, unseen, though felt.
And, if there be a spell to stir the dead,
'Tis in such deeds as we are now upon.
Deem'st thou the souls of such a race as mine
Can rest, when he, their last descendant chief,
Stands plotting on the brink of their pure graves
With stung plebeians?

I. Ber. It had been as well
To have ponder'd this before,—are you embark'd
In our great enterprise.—Do you repent?

Doge. No—but I feel, and shall do to the last
I cannot quench a glorious life at once,
Nor dwindle to the thing I now must be,
And take men's lives by stealth, without some pause:
Yet doubt me not; it is this very feeling,
And knowing what has wrung me to be thus,
Which is your best security. There's not
A roused mechanics in your busy plot
So wrong'd as I, so fall'n, so loudly call'd
To his redress: the very means I am forced
By these fell tyrants to adopt is such,
That I abhor them doubly for the deeds
Which I must do to pay them back for theirs.
I. Ber. Let us away—hark—the hour strikes
Doge. On—on
It is our knell, or that of Venice—On.
I. Ber. Say rather, 'tis her freedom's rising pezi
Of triumph—This way—we are near the place.

SCENE II.

The House where the Conspirators meet.

DAGOLINO, DOGR, BERTRAM, FEDELE TREVISANO,
CaLendaro, Antonio delle BenDe, &c., &c.

Cal. (entering.) Are all here?

Dag. All with you; except the three
On duty, and our leader Israel,
Who is expected momentarily.

Cal. Where's Bertram?
Ber. Here?

Cal. Have you not been able to complete
The number wanting in your company?
To be of your chief comrades? but no less
I own my natural weakness; I have not Yet learn’d to think of indiscriminate murder
Without some sense of shuddering; and the sight
Of blood which spouts through hoary scalps is not
To me a thing of triumph, nor the death
Of men surprised a glory. Well—too well
I know that we must do such things on those Whose acts have raised up such avengers; but
If there were some of these who could be saved
From out this sweeping fate, for our own sakes
And for our honor, to take off some stain
Of meanness, which else pollutes it wholly
I had been glad; and see no cause in this
For snore, nor for suspicion!

Dog.
Calm thee, Bertram; For we suspect thee not, and take good heart.
It is the cause, and not our will, which asks
Such actions from our hands: we’ll wash away
All stains in Freedom’s fountain!

Enter ISAIAH BERTUCCIO, and the DOGE, disguised.

Dog. Welcome, Israel.

Ber. Most welcome.—Brave Bertuccio, thou art late—

Who is this stranger?

Cal. It is time to name him,
Our comrades are even now prepared to greet him
In brotherhood, as I have made it known
That thou wouldst add a brother to our cause
Approved by thee, and thus approved by all,
Such is our trust in all thine actions. Now
Let him unfold himself.

I. Ber. Stranger, step forth!

Ber. No, what is it that thou say’st?

I. Ber. Let them advance and strike at their own bosoms,
Ungrateful suicides! for on our lives
Depend their own, their fortunes, and their hopes.

Dog. Strike!—If I dreaded death, a death more fearful
Than any your rash weapons can inflict.
I should not now be here:—Oh, noble Courage!
The eldest born of Fear, which makes you brave
Against this solitary hoary head!
See the bold chiefs, who would reform a state
And shake down senates, mad with wrath and dread
At sight of one patrician!—Butcher me,
You can; I care not. —Israel, are these men
The mighty hearts you spoke of? look upon them

Cal. Faith! he has shamed us, and deservedly.

Was this your trust in your true Chief Bertuccio,
To turn your swords against him and his guest?
Sheathe them, and hear him.

I. Ber. I disdain to speak.

They might and must have known a heart like mine
Incapable of treachery; and the power
They gave me to adopt all fitting means
To further their design was ne’er abused.
They might be certain that who’er was brought
By me into this council had been led
To take his choice—as brother, or as victim.

_Doge._ And which am I to be? your actions leave
Some cause to doubt the freedom of the choice.

_I. Ber._ My lord, we would have perished'd here together,
Had these rash men proceeded; but, behold,
They are ashamed of that mad moment's impulse,
And droop their heads; believe me, they are such
As I described them—Speak to them.

_Cal._ Ay, speak; we are all listening in wonder.

_I. Ber. (addressing the conspirators._ You are safe,
Nay, more, almost triumphant—listen, then,
And know my words for truth.

_Doge._ You see me here,
As one of you hast said, an old, unarm'd,
Defenceless man; and yesterday you saw me
Presiding in the hall of ducal state,
Apparent sovereign of our hundred isles,
Robed in official purple, dealing out
The edicts of a power which is not mine,
Nor yours, but of our masters—the patricians.
Why I was there you know or think you know;
Why I am here, he who hath been most wronged,
He who among you hath been most insulted,
Outraged and trodden on, until he doubt
If he be worm or no, may answer for me,
Asking of his own heart what brought him here?
You know my recent story, all men know it,
And judg'd of it far differently from those
Who sat in judgment to heap scorn on scorn.

But spare me the recital—it is here,
Here at my heart the outrage—but my words,
Already said in unavailing plains,
Would only show my feebleness the more,
And I come here to strengthen even the strong,
And urge them on to deeds, and not to war
With woman's weapons; but I need not urge you.
Our private wrongs have sprung from public vices
In this—I cannot call it commonwealth
Nor kingdom, which hath neither prince nor people,
But all the sins of the old Spartan state
Without its virtues—temperance and valor.
The lords of Lacedemon were true soldiers,
But ours are Sybarites, while we are Helots,
Of whom I am the lowest, most enslaved;
Although drift out to head a pageant, as
The Greeks of yore made drunk their slaves to form
A pastime for their children. You are met
To overthrow this monster of a state,
This mockery of a government, this spectre,
Which must be exorcised with blood, and then
We will renew the times of truth and justice,
Condensing in a fair free commonwealth
Not rash equality but equal rights,
Proportion'd like the columns to the temple,
Giving and taking strength reciprocal,
And making firm the whole with grace and beauty,
So that no part could be removed without
Infringement of the general symmetry.
In operating this great change, I claim
To be one of you—if you trust in me;
If not, strike home,—my life is compromised,
And I would rather fall by freemen's hands
Than live another day to act the tyrant,
As delegate of tyrants; such I am not,
And never have been—read it in our annals;
I can appeal to my past government
In many lands and cities; they can, tell you
If I were an oppressor, or a man
Feeling and thinking for my fellow men.
Happy had I been what the senate sought,
A thing of robes and trinkets, dizen'd out
To sit in state as for a sovereign's picture;
A popular scourge, a ready sentence-signer,
A stickler for the Senate and "the Forty,"
A skeptic of all measures which had not
The sanction of "the Ten," a council-fawner,
A tool, a fool, a puppet,—they had ne'er
Foster'd the wretch who stung me. What I suffer
Has reach'd me through my pity for the people;
That many know, and who know not yet
Will one day learn: meantime I do devote,
Whate'er the issue, my last days of life—
My present power such as it is, not that
Of Doge, but of a man who has been great
Before he was degraded to a Doge,
And still has individual means and mind;
I stake my fame (and I had fame)—my breath—
(The least of all, for its last hours are high)—
My heart—my hope—my soul—upon this cast!
Such as I am, I offer you to you
And to your chiefs—accept me or reject me
A prince who fain would be a citizen
Or nothing, and who has left his throne to be so
_Cal._ Long live Faliero!—Venice shall be free!
_Consp._ Long live Faliero!

_I. Ber._ Comrades! did I well?
Is not this man a host in such a cause?

_Doge._ This is no time for eulogies, nor place
For exultation. Am I one of you?

_Cal._ Ay, and the first among us, as thou hast been
Of Venice—be our general and chief.

_Doge._ Chief!—general!—I was general at Zara,
And chief in Rhodes and Cyprus, prince in Venice
I cannot stoop—that is, I am not fit
To lead a band of—patriots; when I lay
Aside the dignities which I have borne,
'Tis not to put on others, but to be
Mate to my fellows—but now to the point:
Israel has stated to me your whole plan—
'Tis bold, but feasible if I assist it,
And must be set in motion instantly.

_Cal._ Even when thou wilt—is it not so, my friends?
I have disposed all for a sudden blow;
When shall it be then?

_Doge._ At sunrise.

_Ber._ So soon?

_Doge._ So soon? so late?—each hour accumulates
Peril on peril, and the more so now
Since I have mingled with you; know you not
The Council, and "the Ten—" the spies, the eyes
Of the patricians dubious of their slaves,
And now more dubious of the prince they had made one?
I tell you you must strike, and suddenly,
Full to the Hydra's heart,—its heads will follow.

_Cal._ With all my soul and sword I yield assent.
Our companies are ready, sixty each,
And all now under arms by Israel's order;
Each at their different place of rendezvous,
And vigilant, expectant of some blow;
Let each repair for action to his post
And now, my lord, the signal?

_Doge._ When you hear
The great bell of St. Mark's, which may not be Struck without special order of the Doge,
(To whom, without special privilege they leave their prince,) March on Saint Mark's!
I. Ber. And there—
Doge. By different routes.
Let your march be directed, every sixty
Entering a separate avenue, and still
Upon the way let your cry be of war
And of the Genoese fleet, by the first dawn
Discern'd before the port; form round the palace,
Within whose court will be drawn out in arms
My nephew and the clients of our house,
Many and martial; while the bell tolls on,
Shout ye, "Saint Mark!—the foe is on our waters!"
Cal. I see it now—but on, my noble lord.

Doge. All the patricians flocking to the Council, (Which they dare not refuse, at the dread signal Pealing from out their patron saint's proud tower,) Will then be gather'd in unto the harvest,
And we will reap them with the sword for sickle.
If some few should be tardy or absent them,
'Twill be but to be taken faint and single,
When the majority are put to rest.
Cal. Would that the hour were come! we will not
But kill.
B. Ber. Once more, sir, with your pardon, I
Would now repeat the question which I ask'd
Before Bertuccio added to our cause
This great ally who renders it more sure,
And therefore safer, and as such admits
Some dawn of mercy to a portion of
Our victims—must all perish in this slaughter?
Cal. All who encounter me and mine, be sure,
The mercy they have shown, I show.

Consp. All! all!
Is this a time to talk of pity? when
Have they e'er shown, or felt, or sign'd it?
I. Ber. Bertram,
This false compassion is a folly, and
Injustice to thy comrades and thy cause!
Dost thou not see, that if we single out
Some for escape, they live but to avenge
The fallen? and, how distinguish now the innocent
From out the guilty? all their acts are one—
A single emanation from one body,
Together knit for our oppression! 'Tis
Much that we let their children live; I doubt
If all of these even should be set apart.
The hunter may reserve some single cub
From out the tiger's litter, but who'er
Would seek to save the spotted sire or dam,
Unless to perish by their fangs? however,
I will abide by Doge Faliero's counsel:
Let him decide if any should be saved
Doge. Ask me not—tempt me not with such a question—
Decide yourselves.
I. Ber. You know their private virtues
Far better than we can, to whom alone
Their public vices, and most foul oppression,
Have made them deadly; if there be among them
One who deserves to be repeal'd, pronounce
Doge. Dolfino's father was my friend, and Lando
Fought by my side, and Marc Cornaro shared
My Genoese embassy: I saved the life
Of Veniero—shall I save it twice?
Would that I could save them and Venice also!

All these men, or their fathers, were my friends
Till they became my subjects; then fell from me
As faithless leaves drop from the o'erblown flower,
And left me a lone blighted thorny stall,
Which, in its solitude, can shelter nothing;
So, as they let me wither, let them perish!

Cal. They cannot coexist with Venice' freedom
Doge. Ye, though you know and feel our mutua mass
Of many wrongs, even ye are ignorant
What fatal poison to the springs of life,
To human ties, and all that's good and dear.
Lurks in the present institutes of Venice:
All these men were my friends: I loved them, they Requested honorably my regards;
We served and fought; we smiled and wept in concert;
We revell'd or we sorrow'd side by side;
We made alliances of blood and marriage;
We grew in years and honors fairly, till
Their own desire, not my ambition, made
Them choose me for their prince, and then farewell!
Farewell all social memory! all thoughts
In common! and sweet bonds which link old friends

When the survivors of long years and actions.
Which now belong to history, soothe the days
Which yet remain by treasuring each other,
And never meet, but each beholds the mirror
Of half a century on his brother's brow,
And sees a hundred beings, now in earth
Plit round them whispering of the days gone by,
And seeming not all dead, as long as two
Of the brave, joyous, reckless, glorious boys,
Which once were one and many, still reta
A breath to sigh for them, a tongue to speak
Of deeds that else were silent, save on m.nole.
Ome! Ome! and must I do this deed?
I. Ber. My lord, you are much moved: it is not now
That such things must be dwelt upon.
Doge. Your patience
A moment—I recede not: mark with me
The gloomy vices of this government.
From the hour that made me Doge, the Doge they made me—
Farewell the past! I died to all that had been,
Oh these they were my friends: no friends, no kindness,
No privacy of life—all were cut off:
They came not near me, such approach gave wrang.
They could not love me, such was not the law;
They thwarted me, 'twas the state's policy;
They baffled me, 'twas a patrician's duty;
They wrong'd me, for such was to right the state;
They could not right me, that would give suspicion.
So that I was a slave to my own subjects;
So that I was a foe to my own friends;
Begirt with spies for guards—with robes for power—
With pomp for freedom—gauders for a council—
Inquisitors for friends—and hell for life!
I had one only fount of quiet left,
And that they poisoned! My pure household gods
Were shiver'd on my heart, and o'er their shrine
Sad grinning Ribaldry and sneering Scorn.
I. Ber. You have been deeply wrong'd, and now shall be
Nobly avenged before another night.
Doge. I had borne all—it hurt me, but I bore it—ill! this last running over of the cup
Of bitterness—until this last loud insult,
Not only unredress'd, but sanction'd; then,
And thus, I cast all further feelings from me—
The feelings which they crush'd for me, long, long
Before, even in their oath of false allegiance!
Even in that very hour and vow, they abjured
Their friend and made a sovereign, as boys make Playthings, to do their pleasure and be broken!
I from that hour have seen but senators
In dark suspicious conflict with the Doge,
Bringing with him in mutual hate and fear;
They dreading he should snatch the tyranny
From out their grasp, and he abhorring tyrants.
To me, then, these men have no private life,
Nor claim to ties they have cut off from others,
As senators for arbitrary acts
Amenable, I look on them—as such Lest them be dealt upon.
Cal. And now to action! Hence, brethern, to our posts, and may this be
The last night of mere words: I'd fain be doing!
Saint Mark's great bell at dawn shall find me wakeful!
I. Ber. Disperse then to your posts: be firm and vigilant;
Think on the wrongs we bear, the rights we claim.
This day and night shall be the last of peril!
Watch for the signal, and then march.
I go to join my band; let each be prompt to marshal
His separate charge: the Doge will now return
To the palace to prepare all for the blow,
We part to meet in freedom and in glory!
Cal. Doge, when I greet you next, my homage to you
Shall be the head of Steno on this sword!
Doge. No; let him be reserved unto the last,
Nor turn aside to strike at such a prey,
Till nobler game is quarr'd: his offence
Was a mere ebullition of the vice,
The general corruption generated
By the foul aristocracy; he could not—
He dared not in more honorable days
Have risk'd it! I have merged all private wrath
Against him in the thought of our great purpose.
A slave insults me—I require his punishment
From his proud master's hands; if he refuse it,
The offence grows his, and let him answer it.
Cal. Yet, as the immediate cause of the alliance
Which consecrates our undertaking more,
I owe him such deep gratitude, that fain
I would repay him as he merits; may I?
Doge. You would but lol the hand, and I the head;
You would but smite the scholar, I the master;
You would but punish Steno, I the senate.
I cannot pause on individual hate,
In the absorbing, sweeping, whole revenge,
Which, like the shrieking fire from heaven, must blast
Without distinction, as it fell of yore,
Where the Dead Sea hath quench'd two cities' ashes.
I. Ber. Away, then, to your posts! I but remain
A mement to accompany the Doge
To our late place of tryst, to see no spies
Have been upon the scout, and thence I hasten
To where my allotted band is under arms.
Cal. Farewell, then, until dawn!
I. Ber. Success go with you!
Consul. We will not fail!—away! My lord, farewell!
Bertuccio, and retire, headed by Philip Calendario. The Doge and Israel Bertuccio remain.
I. Ber. We have them in the toil—it cannot fail!
Now thou'lt indeed a sovereign, and wilt make
A name immortal greater than the greatest:
Free citizens have struck at kings ere now;
Caesars have fallen, and even patrician hands
Have crush'd dictators, as the popular steel
Has reach'd patricians; but until this hour,
What prince has plotted for his people's freedom?
Or risk'd a life to liberate his subjects?
For ever, and for ever, they conspire
Against the people, to abuse their hands
To chains, but laid aside to carry weapons
Against the fellow nations, so that yoke
On yoke, and slavery and death may whet,
Not glut, the never-gorged Leviathan!
Now, my lord, to our enterprise; 'tis great,
And greater the reward; why stand you raft?
A moment back, and you were all impatient!
Doge. And it is then decided! must they die?
I. Ber. Who?
Doge. My own friends by blood and courtesy
And many deeds and days—the senators.
I. Ber. You pass'd their sentence, and it is a just one.
Doge. Ay, so it seems; and so it is to you;
You are a patriot, a plebeian Gracchus—
The rebel's oracle, the people's tribune—
I blame you not, you act in your vocation;
They smote you, and oppress'd you, and despised you;
So they have me; but you ne'er spake with them;
You never broke their bread, nor shared their salt;
You never had their wine-cup at your lips;
You grew not up with them, nor laugh'd, nor wept;
Nor held a revel in their company;
Ne'er smiled to see them smile, nor claim'd their smile
In social interchange for yours, nor trusted
Nor wore them in your heart of hearts, as I have:
These hairs of mine are gray, and so are theirs,
The elders of the council: I remember
When all our locks were like the raven's wing,
As we went forth to take our prey around
The isles wrung from the false Mahometan;
And I can see them dabbled o'er with blood!
Each stab to them will seem my suicide.
I. Ber. Doge! Doge! this vacillation is unworthy
A child; if you are not in second childhood,
Call back your nerves to your own purpose, nor Thus shame yourself and me. By heavens! I'd rather Forego even now, or fall in our intent,
Than see the man I venerate subside
From high resolves into such shallow weakness!
You have seen blood in battle, shed it, both
Your own and that of others; can you shrink then
From a few drops from veins of hoary vampires.
Who but give back what they have drain'd from millions?
Doge. Bear with me! Step by step, and blow on blow
I will divide with you; think not I waver:
Ah! no; it is the certainty of all
Which I must do: but make me tremble thus.
But let these last and lingering thoughts have way
To which you only and the Night are conscious,
And both regardless; when the hour arrives

The conspirators salute the Doge and Israel.
"Tis mine to sound the knell, and strike the blow,
Which shall unpeople many palaces,
And hew the highest genealogic trees
Down to the earth, strew'd with their bleeding fruit,
And crush their blossoms into barrenness:
This will I—must I—have I sworn to do,
Nor aught can turn me from my destiny;
But still I quiver to behold what I
Must be, and think what I have been! Bear with me.

I. Ber. Re-man your breast; I feel no such remorse,
I understand it not: why should I change?
You acted, and you act on your free will.

Doge. Ay, there it is—you feel not, nor do I,
Else I should stab thee on the spot, to save
A thousand lives, and, killing, do no murder;
You feel not—you go to this butcher-work
As if these high-born men were steers for shambles!
When all is over, you'll be free and merry,
And calmly wash those hands incarnadine;
But I, outgoing thee and all thy fellows
In this surpassing massacre, shall be,
Shall see and feel—oh God! oh God! 'tis true
And thou dost well to answer that it was
"My own free will and act," and yet you err,
For I will do this! Doubt not—fear I
Will be your most unmerciful accomplice!
And yet I act no more on my free will,
Nor my own feelings—both compel me back;
But there is hell within me and around,
And like the demon who believes and trembles
Must I abhor and do. Away! away!
Get thee unto thy fellows, I will he me
To gather the retainers of our house,
Doubt not, Saint Mark's great bell shall wake all
Venice,
Except her slaughter'd senate: ere the sun
Be broad upon the Adriatic there
Shall be a voice of weeping, which shall drown
The roar of waters in the cry of blood!
I am resolved—come on.

I. Ber. With all my soul!
Keep a firm rem in upon these bursts of passion;
Remember what these men have dealt to thee,
And that this sacrifice will be succeeded
By ages of prosperity and freedom
To this unshackled city: a true tyrant
Would have depopulated empires, nor Have felt the strange compunction which hath wrung
you
To punish a few traitors to the people!
Trust me, such were a pity more misplaced
Than the late mercy of the state to Steno.

Doge. Man, thou hast struck upon the chord which jars
All nature from my heart. Hence to our task!

[Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

'Anzzo of the Patrician Lion. Lioni laying aside the mask and cloak which the Venetian Nobles wore in public, attended by a Domestic.

Lioni. I will to rest, right weazy of this reve
The gayest we have held for many moons,
And yet, I know not why, it cheer'd me not;
There came a heaviness across my heart,
Which, in the lightest movement of the dance,
Though eye to eye, and hand in hand united
Even with the lady of my love, oppress'd me,
And through my spirit chill'd my blood, until
A damp like death rose o'er my brow; I strove
To laugh the thought away, but 'twould not be Through all the music ringing in my ears
A knell was sounding as distinct and clear,
Though low and far, as e'er the Adrian wave
Rose o'er the city's murmur in the night,
Lashing against the outward Lido's bulwark:
So that I left the festival before
It reach'd its zenith, and will woo my pillow
For thoughts more tranquil, or forgetfulness.
Antonio, take my mask and cloak, and light
The lamp within my chamber.

Ant. Command you no refreshment?
Lioni. Nought, save sleep
Which will not be commanded. Let me hope it,

[Exit Antonio.

Though my breast feels too anxious; I will try
Whether the air will calm my spirits: 'ca
A goodly night; the cloudy wind which blew
From the Levant hath crept into its cave,
And the broad moon has brighter'd. What a stillness!

[ Goes to an open lattice.

And what a contrast with the scene I left,
Where the tall torches gleam, and silver lamps
More pallid gleam along the tapestried walls,
Spread over the reluctant gloom which haunts
Those vast and dimly-latticed galleries.
A dazzling mass of artificial light,
Which show'd all things, but nothing as they were
There Age essaying to recall the past,
After long striving for the hues of youth
At the sad labor of the toilet, and
Full many a glance at the too faithful mirror,
Frankt forth in all the pride of ornament,
Forgot itself, and trusting to the falsehood
Of the ingrateful beams, which show, yet hide,
Believed itself forgotten, and was fool'd.
There Youth, which needed not, nor thought of such Vain adjuncts, lavish'd its true bloom, and health,
And bridal beauty, in the unwholesome press
Of flash'd and crowded wassailers; and wasted
Its hours of rest in dreaming this was pleasure,
And so shall waste them till the sunrise streams
On sallow cheeks and sunken eyes which should not
Have worn this aspect yet for many a year.
The music, and the banquet, and the wine—
The garlands, the rose odors, and the flowers—
The sparkling eyes, and flashing ornaments—
The white arms and the raven hair—the braids
And bracelets; swanlike bosoms, and the necklace,
An India in itself, yet dazzling not
The eye like what it circled; the thin robes,
Floating like light clouds 'twixt our gaze and heaven;
The many-twinkling feet so small and sylphlike,
Suggesting the more secret symmetry
Of the fair forms which terminate so well—
All the delusion of the dazy scene.
MARINO FALIERO, DOGE OF VENICE.

Its false and true enchantments—art and nature,
Which swarm before my giddy eyes, that drank
The sight of beauty as the parch'd pilgrim's
On Arab sands the false mirage, which offers
A lucid lake to his eluded thirst,
Are gone.—Around me are the stars and waters—
Words mock'd in the ocean, goodlier sight
Than torches glare'd back by a gaudy glass;
And the great element, which is to space
What ocean is to earth, spreads its blue depths,
Soften'd with the first breathings of the spriug;
The high moon sails upon her beauteous way,
Serenely smoothing o'er the lofty walls
Of those tall piles and sea-girt palaces,
Whose porphyry pillars, and whose costly fronts,
Fraught with the orient spoil of many marbles,
Like altars ranged along the broad canal,
Seem each a trophy of some mighty deed
Rear'd up from out the waters, scarce less strangely
Than those more massy and mysterious giants
Of architecture, those Titanian fabrics,
Which point in Egypt's plains to times that have No other record. All is gentie: nought
Stirs rudely; but, congenial with the night,
Whatever walks is gliding like a spirit.
The tinklings of some vigilant guitars
Of sleepless lovers to a wakeful mistress,
And cautious opening of the casement, showing
That he is not unheard; while her young hand,
Fair as the moonlight of which it seems a part,
So delicately, it trembles in
The act of opening the forbidden lattice,
To let in love through bashful means his heart
Thrive like his lyre-strings at the sight;—the dash
Phosphoric of the oar, or rapid twinkle
Of the far lights of skimming gondolas,
And the responsive voices of the choir
Of boatmen answering back with verse for verse;
Some dusky shadow chequer'd the Rialto;
Some glistening palace roof, or tapering spire,
Are all the sights and sounds which here pervade
The ocean-born and earth-commanding city—
How sweet and soothing is this hour of calm!
I thank thee, Night! for thou hast chased away
Those horrid bodesments which, amidst the throng,
I could not dissipate; and with the blessing
Of thy benign and quiet influence,—
Now will I to my couch, although to rest
Is alms: woun'g such a night as this—
[A knocking is heard from without.
Hark! what is that? or who at such a moment?

Enter ANTONIO.

ANT. My lord, a man without, on urgent business,
Implies to be admitted.

BER. Is he a stranger?

ANT. His face is muzzled in his cloak, but both
His voice and gestures seem'd familiar to me;
I craved his name, but this he seem'd reluctant
To trust, save to yourself; most earnestly
He sue's to be permitted to approach you.

LION. 'Tis a strange hour, and a suspicious bearing!
And yet there is slight peril: 'tis not in
Their houses noblemen are struck at; still,
Although I know not that I have a foe.
In Venice 'twill be wise to use some caution.
Admit him, and retire; but call up quickly
Sons of thy followers, who may wait without.—

Who can this man be?

[Exit ANTONIO, and returns with BERTRAM muzzled.

BER. My good lord Lion,
I have no time to lose, nor thou—dismiss
This menial hence; I would be private with you.

LION. It seems the voice of Bertram—Go, Antony.

Now, stranger, what would you at such an hour?

BER. (discovering himself.) A born, my noble patron; you have granted
Many to your poor client, Bertram; add
This one, and make him happy.

LION. Thou hast known me
From boyhood, ever ready to assist thee
In all fair objects of advancement, which Beseen one of thy station; I would promise
Ere thy request was heard, but that the hour,
Thy bearing, and this strange and hurried mode
Of suing, gives me to suspect this visit
Hath some mysterious import—but say on—
What has occurred, some rash and sudden broil?
A cup too much, a scuffle, and a stab?
Mere things of every day; so that thou hast not Split noble blood, I guarantee thy safety;
But then thou must withdraw, for angry friends
And relatives, in the first burst of vengeance,
Are things in Venice deadlier than the laws.

BER. My lord, I thank you; but—

LION. But what? You have not Raised a rash hand against one of our order?
If so, withdraw and fly, and own it not;
I would not slay—but then I must not save thee!
He who has shed patrician blood—

BER. I come to save patrician blood, and not to shed it!
And thereunto I must be speedy, for Each minute lost may lose a life; since Time
Has changed his slow scythe for the two-edged sword,
And is about to take, instead of sand,
The dust from sepulchres to fill his hour-glass!—
Go not thus forth to-morrow!

LION. Wherefore not?

BER. What means this menace?

LION. Do not seek its meaning.
But do as I implore thee;—stir not forth,
Whate'er be stirring; through the rear of crowds—
The cry of women, and the shrieks of babes—
The groans of men—the clash of arms—the sound
Of rolling drum, shrill trumpet, and hollow bell,
Peal in one wide alarum!—Go not forth
Until the tocsin's silent, nor even then
Till I return!

LION. Again, what does this mean?

BER. Again, I tell thee, ask not; but by all
Thou holdest dear on earth or heaven—by all
The souls of thy great fathers, and thy hope
To emulate them, and to leave behind
Descendants worthy both of them and thee—
By all thou hast of blest in hope or memory—
By all thou hast to fear here or hereafter—
By all the good deeds thou hast done to me,
Good I would now repay with greater good,
Remain within, trust to thy household gods,
And to my word for safety, if thou dost
As now I counsel—but if not, thou art lost!

LION. I am indeed already lost in wonder;
Surely thou ravest! what have I to dread?
BYRON'S WORKS.

Who are my foes? or if there be such, why
Art thou leagued with them?—thou! or if so leagued,
Why comest thou to tell me at this hour,
And not before?

Ber. I cannot answer this.
Wilt thou go forth in spite of this true warning?

Lioni. I was not born to shrink from idle threats,
The cause of which I know not: at the hour
Of council, be it soon or late, I shall not
Be found among the absent.

Ber. Say not so!

Once more, art thou determined to go forth?

Lioni. I am. Nor is thereught which shall Impede me!

Ber. Then Heaven have mercy on thy soul!—

Lioni. Stay—there is more in this than my own Safety
Which makes me call thee back: we must not part

thus.

Bertram, I have known thee long.

Ber. From childhood, signor,
You have been my protector; in the days
Of reckless infancy, when rank forgets,
Or, rather, is not yet taught to remember
Its cold prerogative, we play'd together;
Our sports, our smiles, our tears, were mingled oft;
My father was your father's client, I
His son's scarce less than foster-brother; years
Saw us together—happy, heart-full hours!
Oh God! the difference 'twixt those hours and this!

Lioni. Bertram, 'tis thou who hast forgotten them.

Ber. Nor now, nor ever; whatsoever betide,
I would have saved you: when'to manhood's growth
We sprung, and you, devoted to the state,
As suits your station, the more humble Bertram
Was left unto the labors of the humble,
Still you forsook me not: and if my fortunes
Have not been towering, 'twas no fault of him
Who ofttimes rescued and supported me
When struggling with the tides of circumstance
Which bear away the weaker: noble blood
Ne'er mantled in a nobler heart than thine
Has proved to me, the poor plebeian Bertram.
Would that thy fellow senators were like thee?

Lioni. Why, what hast thou to say against the Senate?

Ber. Nothing.

Lioni. I know that there are angry spirits
And turbulent mutterers of stifled treason,
Who lurk in narrow places, and walk out
Muffled to whisper curses to the night;
Disbanded soldiers, discontented ruffians,
And desperate libertines who brawl in taverns;

Thou herdest not with such; 'tis true, of late
I have lost sight of thee, but thou wert wont
To lead a temperate life, and break thy bread
With honest mates, and bear a cheerful aspect.
What has come to thee? in thy hollow eye
And bloodshot cheek, and thine unquiet motions,
Sorrow and shame and conscience seem at war
To waste thee.

Ber. Rather shame and sorrow light
On the accursed tyranny which rides
The very air in Venice, and makes men
Madden as in the last hours of the plague
Which sweeps the soul deliriously from life!

Lioni. Some villains have been tampering with Thee, Bertram:

This is not thy own language nor own thoughts;
Some wretch has made thee drunk with disaffection
But thou must not be lost; thy wretch good
And kind, and art not fit for such base acts
As vice and villany would put thee too:
Confess—confide in me—thou know'st my nature—
What is it thou and thine are bound to do,
Which should prevent thy friend, the only son
Of him who was a friend unto thy father,
So that our good-will is a heritage
We should bequeath to our posterity
Such as ourselves received it, or augmented;
I must, what is it thou must do, that I
Should deem thee dangerous, and keep the house
Like a sick girl?

Ber. Nay, question me no further.

Lioni. I must be gone.

Ber. Who talks of murder? what said I of murder?

'Tis false! I did not utter such a word.

Lioni. Thou didst not; but from out thy wolfish eye,
So changed from what I knew it, there glares forth
The gladiator. If my life's thine object,
Take it—I am unarmed,—and then away!
I would not hold my breath on such a tenure
As the capricious mercy of such things
As thou and those who have set thee to thy task work.

Ber. Sooner than spill thy blood, I peril mine;
Sooner than harm a hair of thine, I place
In jeopardy a thousand heads, and some
As noble, nay, even nobler than thine own.

Lioni. Ay, is it even so? Excuse me, Bertram;
I am not worthy to be singled out
From such exalted her-tombs—who are they
That are in danger, and that make the danger?

Ber. Venice, and all that she inherits, are Divided like a house against itself,
And so will perish ere to-morrow's twilight!

Lioni. More mysteries, and awful ones! But
now,
Or thou, or I, or both, it may be, are
Upon the verge of ruin; speak once out,
And thou art safe and glorious; for 'tis more
Glorious to save than slay, and slay i' the dark

Fie, Bertram! that was not a craft for thee!
How would it look to see upon a spear
The head of him whose heart was open to thee,
Borne by thy hand before the shrieking people,
And such may be my doom; for here I swear,
What'ere the peril or the penalty
Of thy denunciation, I go forth,
Unless thou dost detail the cause, and show
The consequence of all which led thee here.

Ber. Is there no way to save thee? minutes fly,
And thou art lost! thou! my sole benefactor,
The only being who was constant to me
Through every change. Yet, make me not a traitor!

Let me save thee—but spare my honor!

Lioni. Where
Can lie the honor in a league of murder?
And who are traitors save unto the state?

Ber. A league is still a compact, and more binding
In honest hearts when words must stand for law
And in my mind, there is no traitor like
Him whose domestic treason plants the poniard
With in the breast which trusted to his truth.
Lion. And who will strike the steel to mine?
Ber. Not I;
I could have wound my soul up to all things
Save this. Thou must not die! and think how dear
Thy life is, when I risk so many lives,
Nay, more, the life of lives, the liberty
Of future generations, not to be
The assassin thou miscall'st me;—once, once more
I do adjure thee, pass not o'er thy threshold!
Lion. It is in vain—this moment I go forth.
Ber. Then perish Venice rather than my friend!
I will disclose—unsure—betray—destroy—
Oh, what a villain I become for thee!
Lion. Say, rather thy friends' savior and the state's—
Speak—pause not—all rewards, all pledges for Thy safety and thy welfare; wealth such as
The state accords her worthiest servants; nay,
Nobility itself I guarantee thee,
So that thou art sincere and penitent.
Ber. I have thought again: it must not be—
Thou knowest it—that I stand here is the proof,
Not least though last; but having done my duty
By thee, I now must do it to my country!
Farewell—we meet no more in life!—farewell!
Lion. What, ho!—Antonio—Pedro—to the door!
See that none pass—arrest this man!—

Enter Antonio and other armed Domestics, who seize Bertram.

Lion. (continues.) Take care
He hath no harm; bring me my sword and cloak,
And man the gondola with four oars—quick—

[Exit Antonio.

We will unto Giovannì Gradengio's,
Ad'ed for Marc Carnaro:—fear not, Bertram;
This needful violence is for thy safety,
No less than for the general weal.
Ber. Where wouldst thou
Bear me a prisoner?
Lion. Firstly to the Ten;
Next to the Doge.
Ber. To the Doge?
Lion. Assuredly:
Is he not chief of the state?
Ber. Perhaps at sunrise
Lion. What mean you?—but we'll know anon,
Ber. Art sure?
Lion. Sure as all gentle means can make; and if They fail, you know "the Ten" and their tribunal,
And that Saint Mark's has dungeons, and the dungeons
A rack.
Ber. Apply it then before the dawn
Now hastening into heaven.—One more such word,
And you shall perish piecemeal, by the death
You think to doom to me.

Re-enter Antonio.

Ant. The bark is ready,
My lord, and all prepared
Lion. Look to the prisoner.
Bertram, I'll reason with thee as we go
To the Magnifico's, sage Gradengio.

[Exit.
Of blood to crowds begets the thirst of more,
As the first wine-cup leads to the long revel;
And you will find a harder task to quell
Than urge them when they have commenced, but

That moment a mere voice, a straw, a shadow,
Are capable of turning them aside.—
How goes the night?
Ber. F.
Almost upon the dawn.

Doge. Then it is time to strike upon the bell.
Are the men posted?
Ber. F.
By this time they are;
But they have orders not to strike, until
They have command from you through me in person.

Doge. 'Tis well.—Will the morn never put to rest
These stars which twinkle yet o'er all the heavens?
I am settled and bound up, and being so,
The very effort which it cost me to Resolve to cleanse this commonwealth with fire,
Now leaves my mind more steady. I have wept,
And trembled at the thought of this dread duty,
But now I have put down all idle passion,
And look the growing tempest in the face,
As doth the pilot of an admiral galley:
Yet (wouldst thou think it, kinman?) it hath been
A greater struggle to me, than when nations
Beheld their fate merged in the approaching fight
Where I was leader of a phalanx, where Thousands were sure to perish—Yes, to spill
The rank polluted current from the veins
Of a few boastful despots needed more
To steel me to a purpose such as made
Timoleon immortal, than to face
The toils and dangers of a life of war.
Ber. F. It gladdens me to see your former wisdom
Subdue the furies which so wrong you are
You were decided.

Doge.
It was ever thus
With me; the hour of agitation came
In the first-glimmerings of a purpose, when Passion had too much room to sway; but in
The hour of action I have stood as calm
As were the dead who lay around me; this
They knew who made me what I am, and trusted
To the subduing power which I preserved
Over my mood, when its first burst was spent.
But they were not aware that there are things
Which make revenge a virtue by reflection,
And not an impulse of mere anger; though
The laws sleep, justice wakes, and injured souls
Oft do a public right with private wrong,
And justify their deeds unto themselves.—
Methinks the day breaks—is it not so? look,
Thine eyes are clear with youth;—the air puts on
A morning freshness, and, at least to me,
The sea looks grafter through the lattice.
Ber. F. True,
The morn is dappling in the sky.

Doge.
Away then!
See that they strike without delay, and with
The first toll from St. Mark's, march on the palace
With all our house's strength; here I will meet you—

The Sixteen and their companies will move
In separate columns at the self-same moment—
Be sure you post yourself by the great gate;
I would not trust "the Ten," except to us—
The rest, the rabble of patricians, may

Glut the more careless swords of those leagued with us.
Remember that the cry is still "Saint Mark!
The Genoese are come—he! to the rescue!
Saint Mark and liberty!"—Now—now to action.
Ber. F. Farewell then, noble uncle! we will meet
In freedom and true sovereignty, or never!
Doge. Come hither, my Bertuccio—one embrace—
Speed, for the day grows broader—Send me soon
A messenger to tell me how all goes
When you rejoin our troops, and then sound—

The storm-bell from Saint Mark's!

[Exit BERTECCIO FALIERO.]

Doge, (solus.)
He is gone,
And on each footstep moves a life.—'Tis done.
Now the destroying Angel hovers o'er
Venice, and pauses ere he pours the vial,
Even as the eagle overlooks his prey,
And for a moment, poised in middle air,
Suspends the motion of his mighty wings,
Then swoops with its unerring beak.—Thou day!
That slowly walk'st the waters! march—march on—
I would not smite i' the dark, but rather see
That no stroke errs. And you, ye kine sea-waves!
I have seen you dyed ere now, and deeply too,
With Genoese, Saracen, and Hunnish gore,
While that of Venice flow'd too, but victorious;
Now thou must wear an unmix'd crimson; no
Barbaric blood can reconcile us now
Unto that horrible incandine,
But friend or foe will roll in civic slaughter.
And have I lived to fourscore years for this?
I, who was named Preserver of the City?
I, at whose name the million's capes were flung
Into the air, and cries from tens of thousands
Rose up, imploring Heaven to send me blessings,
And fame, and length of days—to see this day?
But this day, blank within the calendar,
Shall be succeeded by a bright millennium.
Doge Dandolo survived to ninety summers
To vanquish empires, and refuse their crown.
I will resign a crown, and make the state
Renew its freedom—but oh! by what means?
The noble end must justify them.—What
Are a few drops of human blood? 'tis false,
The blood of tyrants is not human; they,
Like to incarnate Molochs, feed on ours
Until 'tis time to give them to the tombs
Which they have made so populous.—Oh world!
Oh men! what are ye, and our best designs,
That we must work by crime to punish crime?
And slay as if Death had but this one gate,
When a few years would make the sword super fluous?
And I, upon the verge of th' unknown realm
Yet send so many heralds on before me?—
I must not ponder this.

[A pause]

Hark! was there not
A murmur as of distant voices, and
The trump of feet in martial unison?
What phantoms even of sound our wishes raise!
It cannot be—the signal hath not rung—
Why pauses it? My nephew's messenger
Should be upon his way to me, and he Himself perhaps even now draws grating back
Upon its ponderous hinge the steep tower portal,
Where swings the sullen huge crucial bell,
Which never knells but for a princely death.
MARINO FALIERO, DOGE OF VENICE. 303

Or for a state in peril, pearing forth
Tremendous bedomens; let it do its office,
And be this peal its awfulllest and last.
Sound till the strong tower rock!—What! silent still?
I would go forth, but that my post is here,
To be the centre of reunion to
The oft discordant elements which form
Leagues of this nature, and to keep compact
The wavering of the weak, in case of conflict;
For if they should do battle, 'twill be here,
Within the palace, that the strife will thicken;
Them here must be my station, as becomes
The master-mover. —Hark! he comes—he comes.
My nephew, brave Bertuccio's messenger.—
What tidings? Is he marching? hath he sped?—
They here! all's lost—yet will I make an effort.

Enter a Signor of the Night, &c. with Guards, &c., &c.

Sig. Doge, I arrest thee of high treason!
Doge. Me! Thy prince, of treason!—Who are they that dare Cloak their own treason under such an order? Sig. (showing his order.) Behold my order from the assembled Ten.

Doge. And where are they, and why assembled? no Such council can be lawful, till the prince Preside there, and that duty's mine: on thine I charge thee, give me way, or marshal me To the council chamber.

Sig. Duke! it may not be; Nor are they in the wond't Hall of Council, But sitting in the convent of Saint Saviour's.

Doge. You dare to disobey me then?

Sig. I serve The state, and needs must serve it faithfully; My warrant is the will of those who rule it.

Doge. And till that warrant has my signature It is illegal, and, as now applied, Rebellious—Hast thou weigh'd well thy life's worth, That thus you dare assume a lawless function? Sig. 'Tis not my office to reply, but act— I am placed here as guard upon thy person, And not as judge to hear or to decide.

Doge, (aside.) I must gain time—So that the storm-bell sound All may be well yet.—Kinsman, speed—speed—speed!—
Our fate is trembling in the balance, and W's to the vanquish'd! be thy prince and people,
O slaves and senate—
[The great bell of St. Mark's tolls.] Lo! it sounds—it tolls.

Doge, (standing.) Hark, Signor of the Night! and you, ye hirelings, Who wield your mercenary staves in fear, It is your knell—Swell on, thou lusty peal! Now, knaves, what ransom for your lives?

Sig. Confusion! Stand to your arms, and guard the door—all's lost Unless that fearful bell be silenced soon.
The officer hath miss'd his path or purpose, Or met some unforseen and hideous obstacle.
Anselmo, with thy company proceed Straight to the tower; the rest remain with me.

[Exit a part of the Guard.

Doge. Wretch! if thou wouldest have thy vile life, implore it.

It is not now a lease of sixty seconds. Ay, send thy miserable ruffians forth; They never shall return.

Sig. So let it be! They die then in their duty, as will I.

Doge. Fool! the high eagle flies at nobler game Than thou and thy base myrmidons,—live on, So thou provok'st not peril by resistance, And learn (if souls so much obscured can bear To gaze upon the sunbeams) to be free.

Sig. And learn thou to be captive—It hath ceased.
[The bell ceases to toll.

The traitorous signal, which was to have set The bloodhound mob on their patrician prey— The knell hath rung, but it is not the senate's.

Doge, (after a pause.) All's silent, and all's lost!

Sig. Now, Doge, denomine me As rebel slave of a revolted council!

Have I not done my duty?

Doge. Peace, thou thing! Thou hast done a worthy deed, and earn'd the price Of blood, and they who use thee will reward thee. But thou wert sent to watch, and not to prate, As thou said'st even now—then do thine office But let it be in silence, as behoves thee, Since, though thy prisoner, I am thy prince.

Sig. I did not mean to fail in the respect Due to your rank: in this I shall obey you.

Doge, (aside.) There now is nothing left me save to die;
And yet how near success! I would have fallen, And proudly, in the hour of triumph, but To miss it thus!—

Enter other Signors of the Night, with Bertuccio Faliero prisoner.

2d. Sig. We took him in the act Of issuing from the tower, where, at his order As delegated from the Doge, the signal Had thus begun to sound.

1st. Sig. Are all the passes Which lead up to the palace well secured?

2d. Sig. They are—besides, it matters not; the chiefs Are all in chains, and some even now on trial— Their followers are dispersed, and many taken.

Ber. F. Uncle!—

Doge. It is in vain to war with Fortune,
The glory hath departed from our house.

Ber. F. Who would have deemed it?—Ah! one moment sooner!

Doge. That moment would have changed the face of ages;

This gives us to eternify—We'll meet it As men whose triumph is not in success, But who can make their own minds all in all, Equal to every fortune. Droop not, 'tis But a brief passage—I would go alone, Yet if they send us, as 'tis like, together Let us go worthy of our sires and selves.

Ber. F. I shall not shame you, uncle.

1st. Sig. Lords, our orders Are to keep guard on both in separate chambers, Until the council call ye to your trial.

Doge. Our trial! will they keep their mockery up. Even to the last? but let them deal upon us, As we had dealt on them, but with less pomp.

'Tis but a game of mutual homicides.

Who have cast lots for the first death, and they Have won with false dice.—Who hath been our Judas?
Ist. Sig. I am not warranted to answer that.
Ber. F. I'll answer for thee—'tis a certain
Bertram,
Even now depositing to the secret giunta.
Doge. Bertram, the Bergamask! With what vile tools

We operate to slay or save! This creature,
Black with a double treason, now will earn
Rewards and honors, and be stamp'd in story
With the geese in the Capitol, which gabbled
Till Horne awoke, and had an annual triumph,
While Manlius, who hurl'd down the Gauls, was cast
From the Tarpeian.
Ist. Sig. He aspired to treason,
And sought to rule the state.
Doge. He saved the state,
And sought but to reform what he reviv'd—
But this is idle—Come, sirs, do your work.
Ist. Sig. Noble Bertuccio, we must now remove
you
Into an inner chamber.
Ber. F. Farewell, uncle!
If we shall meet again in life I know not,
But they perhaps will let our ashes mingle.
Doge. Yes, and our spirits, which shall yet go forth,
And do what our frail clay, thus clogg'd, hath ful'd in!
They cannot quench the memory of those Who would have hurl'd them from their guilty
thrones,
And such examples will find heirs, though distant.

ACT V.

SCENE I.

The Hall of the Council of Ten assembled with the additional Senators, who, on the Trials of the Conspirators for the Treason of Marino Faliero, composed what was called the Giunta.—
Guards, Officers, &c., &c.—Israel Bertuccio and Philip Calendaro as Prisoners.—Bertram, Lion, and Witnesses, &c.

The Chief of the Ten, BENINTENDE.

Ben. There now rests, after such conviction of Their manifold and manifest offences,
But to pronounce on these obdurate men
The sentence of the law: a grievous task
To those who hear, and those who speak. Alas!
That it should fall to me! and that my days
Of office should be stigmatised through all
The years of coming time, as bearing record
To this most foul and complicated treason
Against a just and free state, known to all
The earth as being the Christian bulwark 'gainst
The Saracen, and the schismatic Greek;
The savage Hun, and not less barbarous Frak:
A city which has open'd India's wealth
To Europe; the last Roman refuge from Overwhelming Attila; the Ocean's queen

Proud Genoa's prouder rival. 'Tis to sap
The throne of such a city these lost men
Have risk'd and forfeited their worthless lives—
So let them die the death.
I. Ber. We are prepared;
Your racks have done that for us. Let us die.
Ben. If ye have that to say which would obtain
Abatement of your punishment, the Giunta
Will hear you; if you have sought to confess,
Now is your time, perhaps it may avail ye.
I. Ber. We stand to hear, and not to speak.
Ben. Your crimes
Are fully proved by your accomplices,
And all which circumstance can add to them;
Yet we would hear from your own lips complete
Avowal of your treason: on the verge
Of that dread gulf which none repass, the truth
Alone can profit you on earth or heaven—
Say, then, what was your motive?
I. Ber. Justice!

Ben. What
Your object?
Ben. You are liæf, sir.
I. Ber. So my life grows: I
Was bred a soldier, not a senator.
Ben. Perhaps you think by this blunt brevity
To brave your judges to postpone the sentence?
I. Ber. Do you be brief as I am, and believe me,
I shall prefer that mercy to your pardon.
Ben. Is this your sole reply to the tribunal?
I. Ber. Go, ask your racks what they have wrung from us,
Or place us there again; we have still some blood left,
And some slight sense of pain in these wrenched limbs:
But this ye dare not do; for if we die there—
And you have left us little life to spend
Upon your engines, gorged with pangs already—
Ye lose the public spectacle, with which
Ye would appall your slaves to further slavery!
Groans are not words, nor agony an assent,
Nor affirmation truth, if nature's sense
Should overcome the soul into a lie,
For a short respite—must we bear or die?
Ben. Say, who were your accomplices?
I. Ber. The senate.
Ben. What do you mean?
I. Ber. Ask of the suffering people
Whom your patrician crimes have driven to crime.
Ben. You know the Doge.
I. Ber. I served him at Zara
In the field, when you were pleading here your way
To present office; we exposed our lives,
While you but hazarded the lives of others,
Alike by accusation or defence;
And, for the rest, all Venice knows her Doge,
Through his great actions, and the Senate's insults.
Ben. You have held conference with him?
I. Ber. I am weary,
Even wearier of your questions than your tortures:
I pray you pass to judgment.
Ben. It is coming—
And you, too, Philip Calendaro, what
Have you to say why you should not be doom'd?
Cal. I never was a man of many words,
And now have few left worth the utterance.
Ben. A further application of your engine.
May change your tone. Cal. Most true; it will do so.
A former application did so; but it will not change my words, or, if it did—
Ben. What then?
Cal. Will my avowal on you rack stand good in law?
Ben. Assuredly.
Cal. Whoe'er the culprit be whom I accuse of treason?
Ben. Without doubt, he will be brought up to trial.
Cal. And on this testimony would he perish?
Ben. So your confession be detail'd and full, he will stand here in peril of his life.
Cal. Then look well to thy proud self, President, for by the eternity which yawns before me, I swear that thou, and only thou, shalt be the traitor I denounce upon that rack, if I be stretched there for the second time.
One of the Giants. Lord President, twere best proceed to judgment;
There is no more to be drawn from these men.
The nature of your crime—our law—and peril the state now stands in, leave not an hour's respite—Guards! lead them forth, and upon the balcony of the red columns, where, on festal Thursday, the Doge stands to behold the chase of bulls, let them be justif'd; and leave exposed their wavering relents, in the place of judgment, to the full view of the assembled people—
And heaven have mercy on their souls.
The Giants. Amen!
I. Ber. Signors, farewell! we shall not all again meet in one place.
Ben. And lest they should essay to stir up the distracted multitude—Guards! let their mouths be gagged, even in the act of execution. Lead them hence!
Cal. What! must we not even say farewell to some fond friend, nor leave a last word with our confessor?
Ben. A priest is waiting in the antechamber; but, for your friends, such interviews would be painful to them, and useless all to you.
Cal. I knew that we were gagged in life; at least all those who had not heart to risk their lives upon their open thoughts; but still I deem'd that, in the last few moments, the same idle freedom of speech accorded to the dying, would not now be denied to us; but since—
I. Ber. Even let them have their way, brave Calendario!
What matter a few syllables? let's die without the slightest show of favor from them; so shall our blood more readily arise to heaven against them, and more testify to their atrocities, than could a volume Spoken or written of our dying words? They tremble at our voices—nay, they dread our very silence—let them live in fear!—Leave them unto their thoughts, and let us now address our own above!—Lead on; we are ready. Cal. Israel, hadst thou but hearken'd unto me it had not now been thus; and yon pale villain, the coward Bertram, would—
Ber. Alas! I sain you died in peace with me: I did not seek this task; 'twas forced upon me: Say, you forgive me, though I never can retrieve my own forgiveness—frown not thus!
I. Ber. I die and pardon thee!
Cal. (spitting at him.) I die and scorn thee (Exeunt Israel Bertuccio and Philip Cal. Endaro, Guards, &c. Ben. Now that these criminals have been disposed of, 'Tis time that we proceed to pass our sentence Upon the greatest traitor upon record In any annals, the Doge Faliere! The proofs and process are complete; the time And crime require a quick procedure: shall He now be call'd in to receive the award? The Giunta. Ay, ay.
Ben. The Avogadori, order that the Doge Be brought before the Council.
One of the Giunta. And the rest, When shall they be brought up?
Ben. When all the chiefs have been disposed of. Some have fled to Chiozza but there are thousands in pursuit of them, and such precaution ta'en on terra firma As well as in the islands, that we hope None will escape to utter in strange lands His libellous tale of treason 'gainst the senate.
Enter the Doge as Prisoner, with Guards, &c., &c.
Ben. Doge—for such still you are, and by the law Must be consider'd, till the hour shall come When you must doff the ducal bonnet from that head, which could not wear a crown more noble Than empires can confer, in quiet honor, But it must plot to overthrow your peers, Who made you what you are, and quench in blood A city's glory—we have laid already Before you in your chamber at full length, By the Avogadori, all the proofs Which have appeared against you; and more ample Ne'er rear'd their sanguine shadows to confront a traitor. What have you to say in your defence?
Doge. What shall I say to ye, since my defence must be your condemnation? You are at once offenders and accusers, Judges and executioners!—Proceed Upon your power.
Ben. Your chief accomplices Having confess'd, there is no hope for you. Doge. And who be they?
Ben. The first now stands before you in the court, Bertram, of Bergamo,—would you question him? Doge, (looking at him contemptuously.) No.
Ben. And two others, Israel Bertuccio, and Philip Calendario, have admitted their fellowship in treason with the Doge.
Doge. And where are they?
Ben. Gone to their place, and now answering to Heaven for what they did on earth. Doge. Ah! the plebeian Brutus, is he gone? And the quick Cassius of the arsenal?—How did they meet their doom?
Ben. Think of your own It is approaching. You decline to plead, then?
Doge. I cannot plead to my inferiors, nor Can recognize your legal power to try me
Show me the law!

Ben. On great emergencies,
The law must be remodell'd or amended:
Our fathers had not fix'd the punishment
Of such a crime, as on the old Roman tables
The sentence against parricide was left
In pure forgetfulness; they could not render
That penal, which had neither name nor thought
In their great bosoms: who would have foreseen
That nature could be filed to such a crime
As sons 'gainst sires, and princes 'gainst their realms?
Your sin hath made us make a law which will Become a precedent 'gainst such haughty traitors,
As would with treason mount to tyranny;
Not even contented with a sceptre, till
They can convert it to a two-edged sword!
Was not the place of Doge sufficient for ye?
Where was the signory of Venice?
Doge. The signory of Venice! You betray'd me—
You—you, who sit there, traitors as ye are!
From my equality with you in birth,
And my superiority in action,
You drew me from my honorable toils
In distant lands—on flood—in field—in cities—
You singled me out like a victim to Stand crown'd, but bound and helpless, at the altar
Where you alone could minister. I knew not—
I sought not—wish'd not—dream'd not the election,
Which reach'd me first at Rome, and I obey'd;
But found on my arrival, that, besides
The jealous vigilance which always led you
To mock and mar your sovereign's best intents,
You had, even in the interregnum of
My journey to the capital, curtail'd
And mutilated the few privileges
Yet left the duke: all this I bore, and would Have borne, until my very heart was stain'd
By the pollution of your ribaldry,
And he, the ribald, whom I see among you—
Fit judge in such tribunal!
Ben. (interrupting him.) Michel Steno
Is here in virtue of his office, as
One of the Forty; "the Ten" having crave'd
A Giunta of patricians from the senate
To aid our judgment in a trial arduous
And novel as the present: he was set
Free from the penalty pronounced upon him,
Because the Doge, who should protect the law,
Seeking to abrogate all law, can claim
No punishment of others by the statutes
Which he himself denies and violates!

Doge. His punishment! I rather see him there,
Where he now sits, to glut him with my death,
Than in the mockery of castigation,
Which your foul, outward, juggling show of justice
Decreed as sentence! Base as was his crime,
Was purity compar'd with your protection.

Ben. And can it be, that the great Doge of Venice,
With three parts of a century of years
And honors on his head, could thus allow
His fury, like an angry boy's, to master
All feeling, wisdom, faith, and fear; or such
A provocation as a young man's petulance?

Doge. A spark creates the flame—tis the last drop
Which makes the cup run over, and mine was full
Already: you oppress'd the prince and people;
I would have freed both and have fail'd in both:
The price of suc't success would have been glor,
Vengeance, and victory, and such a name
As would have made Venetian history
Rival to that of Greece and Syracuse
When they were freed, and flourish'd ages after,
And mine to Gelon and to Thrasybulus:—
Failing, I know the penalty of failure
Is present infamy and death—the future
Will judge, when Venice is no more or free;
Till then the truth is in abeyance. Pause not;
I would have shown no mercy, and I seek none;
My life is staked upon a mighty hazard,
And, being lost, take what I would have taken:
I would have stood alone amidst your tombs;
Now you may flock round mine, and trample on it,
As you have done upon my heart while living.

Ben. You do confess, then, and admit the justice
Of our tribunal?

Doge. I confess to have fail'd;
Fortune is female: from my youth her favors
Were not withheld; the fault was mine to hope
Her former smiles again at this late hour.

Ben. You do not then in aught arraign our equity?

Doge. Noble Venetians! stir me not with questions.
I am resign'd to the worst; but in me still
Have something of the blood of brighter days,
And am not over-patient. Pray you, spare me
Further interrogation, which boots nothing,
Except to turn a trial to debate.
I shall but answer that which will offend you,
And please your enemies—a host already;
'Tis true, these sullen walls should yield no echo;
But walls have ears—nay, more, they have tongues;
and if
There were no other way for truth to o'erspell them,
You who condemn me, you who fear and slay me,
Yet could not bear in silence to your graves
What you would hear from me of good or evil;
The secret were too mighty for your souls:
Then let it sleep in mine, unless you court
A danger which would double that you escape.
Such my defence would be, had I full scope
To make it famous; for true words are things,
And dying men's are things which long outlive,
And oftentimes avenge them; bury mine,
If ye would fain survive me: take this counsel,
And though too oft ye made me live in wrath,
Let me die calmly; you may grant me this:—
I deny nothing—defend nothing—nothing
I ask of you but silence for myself,
And sentence from the court!

Ben. This full admission
Spare us the harsh necessity of ordering
The torture to elicit the whole truth.

Doge. The torture! you have put me there already Daily since I was Doge; but if you will Add the corporeal rack, you may: these limbs
Will yield with age to crushing iron; but There's that within my heart shall strain your engines.

Enter an OFFICER.

Officer. Noble Venetians! Duchess Falliero
Requests admission to the Giunta's presence.

Ben. Say, conscript fathers,* shall she be ad mitted?

One of the Giunta. She may have revelations of importance
Unto the state, to justify compliance
With her request.

Ben. Is this the general will?

All. It is.

Doge. Oh, admirable laws of Venice! Which would admit the wife, in the full hope That she might testify against the husband. What glory to the chaste Venetian dames! But such blasphemies 'gainst all honor, as Sit here, do well to act in their vocation.

Now, villain Steno! if this woman fail, I'll pardon thee thy lie, and thy escape, And my own violent death, and thy vile life.

The DUCHESS enters.

Ben. Lady! this just tribunal has resolved, Though the request be strange, to grant it, and Whatever be its purport, to accord A patient hearing with the due respect Which fits thy ancestry, thy rank, and virtues: But you turn pale—ho! there, look to the lady! Place a chair instantly.

Ang. A moment's faintness—

Tis past; I pray you pardon me, I sit not In presence of my prince and of my husband, While he is on his feet.

Ben. Your pleasure, lady?

Ang. Strange rumors, but most true, if all I hear And see be sooth, have reach'd me, and I come To know the worst, even at the worst; forgive The abruptness of my entrance and my hearing. Is it—I cannot speak—I cannot shape The question—but you answer it ere spoken, With eyes averted, and with gloomy brows— Oh God! this is the silence of the grave!

Ben. (after a pause.) Spare us, and spare thyself the repetition Of our most awful, but inexorable Duty to heaven and man!

Ang. Yet speak; I cannot—I cannot—no even now believe these things. Is he condemn'd?

Ben. Alas! And was he guilty?

Ben. Lady! the natural distraction of Thy thoughts at such a moment makes the question Merit forgiveness; else a doubt like this Against a just and paramount tribunal Were deep offence. But question even the Doge, And if he can deny the proofs believe him Guiltless as thy own bosom.

Ang. Is it so?

My lord—my sovereign—my poor father's friend— The mighty in the field, the sage in council; Unsay the words of this man!—Thou art silent! Ben. He hath already own'd to his own guilt, Nor, as thou seest, doth he deny it now.

Ang. Ay, but he must not die! Spare his few years, Which grief and shame will soon cut down to days! One day of balled crime must not efface Near sixteen lustres crowded with brave acts.

Ben. His doom must be fulfill'd without remission Of tire or penalty—tis a decree.

Ang. He hath been guilty, but there may be mercy.

Ben. Not in this case with justice.

Ang. Alas! signor, He who is only just is cruel; who

Upon the earth would live were all judged justly?

Ben. His punishment is safety to the state.

Ang. He was a subject, and hath serv'd the state He was your general, and hath saved the state; He is your sovereign, and hath ruled the state

One of the Council. He is a traitor, and betray'd the state.

Ang. And, but for him, there now had been no state To save or to destroy; and you who sit There to pronounce the death of your deliverer, Had now been groaning at a Moslem oar, Or digging in the Hanish mines in fetters!

One of the Council. No, lady, there are others who would die Rather than breathe in slavery!

Ang. If there are so Within these walls, thou art not of the number: The truly brave are generous to the fallen!— Is there no hope?

Ben. Lady, it cannot be.

Ang. (turning to the Doge.) Then die, Faliero since it must be so;

But with the spirit of my father's friend. Thou hast been guilty of a great offence, Half cancelld by the harshness of these men. I would have sued to them—have pray'd to them— Have begg'd as famish'd mendicants for bread— Have wept as they will cry unto their God For mercy, and be answer'd as they answer Had it been fitting for thy name or mine, And if the cruelty in their cold eyes Had not announced the heartless wrath within Then, as a prince, address thee to thy doom!

Doge. I have lived too long not to know how to die!

Thy suing to these men were but the bleating Of the lamb to the butcher, or the cry Of seamen to the surge: I would not take A life eternal, granted at the hands Of wretches, from whose monstrous villainies I sought to free the groaning nations!

M. Steno. A word with thee, and with this noble lady, Whom I have grievously offended. Would Sorrow, or shame, or penance on my part, Could cancel the inexcusable past!

But since that cannot be, as Christians let us Say farewell, and in peace: with full contrition I crave, not pardon, but compassion from you, And give, however weak, my prayers for both.

Ang. Sage Beantene, now chief judge of Venice I speak to thee in answer to your signor.

Inform the ribald Steno, that his words No'er weigh'd in mind with Lorendaz's daughter Further than to create a moment's pity For such as he is: would that others had Despised him as I pity! I prefer My honor to a thousand lives, could such Be multiplied in mine, but would not have A single life of others lost for that Which nothing human can impugn—the sense Of virtue, looking not to what is call'd A good name for reward, but to itself. To me the scorners words were as the wind Unto the rock: but as there are—alas! Spirits more sensitive, on which such things Light as the whirlwind on the waters; souls To whom dishonor's shadow is a substance more terrible than death here and hereafter;
Men whose vice is to start at vice's scoffing,
And who, though proof against all blandishments
Of pleasure, and all pangs of pain, are feeble
When the proud name on which they pinnacled
Their hopes is breathed on, jealous as the eagle
Of her high fury; let what we now
Behold, and feel, and suffer, be a lesson
To wretches how they tamper in their spleen
With beings of a higher order. Insects
Have made the lion mad ere now; a shaft
I' the heel o'fethrow the bravest of the brave;
A wife's dishonor was the bane of Troy;
A wife's dishonor unking'd Rome for ever;
An injured husband brought the Gauls to Clusium,
And thence to Rome, which perish'd for a time;
An obscene gesture cost Caligula
His life, while Earth yet bore his cruelties;
A virgin's wrong made Spain a Moorish province;
And Steno's lie, couched in two worthless lines,
Hath decimated Venice, put in peril
A senate which hath stood eight hundred years,
Discrewn'd a prince, cut off his crownless head,
And forged new fetters for a groaning people!
Let the poor wretch, like to the courteous
Who fired Persepolis, be proud of this,
If it so please him—twere a pride fit for him!
But let him not insult the last hours of
Him, who, what'er he now is, seas a hero,
By the intrusion of his very prayers:
Nothing of good can come from such a source,
Nor would we aught with him, nor now, nor ever:
We leave him to himself, that lowest depth
Of human baseness. Pardon is for men,
And not for reptiles—we have none for Steno,
And no resentment: things like him must sting,
And higher beings suffer; 'tis the charter
Of life. The man who dies by the adder's fang
May have the crawler crush'd, but feels no anger:
'Twas the worm's nature; and some men are worms
In soul, more than the living things of tombs.

Doge, (to Ben.) Signor! complete that which you depend your duty.

Ben. Before we can proceed upon that duty,
We would request the princess to withdraw;
'Twill move her too much to be witness to it.

Ang. I know it will, and yet I must endure it,
For 'tis a part of mine—I will not quit,
Except by force, my husband's side.—Proceed!
Nay, fear not either shriek, or sigh, or tear;
Though my heart burst, it shall be silent.—Speak!
I have that within which shall o'ermaster all.

Ben. Marino Faliero, Doge of Venice,
Count of Val di Marino, Senator,
And sometime General of the Fleet and Army,
Noble Venetian, many times and oft
Intrusted by the state with high employments,
Even to the highest, listen to the sentence.
Convict by many witnesses and proofs,
And by thine own confession, of the guilt
Of treachery and treason, yet unheard of
Until this trial—the decree is death.
Thy goods are confiscate unto the state,
Thy name is rased from out her records, save
Upon a public day of thanksgiving
For this our most miraculous deliverance,
When thou art noted in our calendar.
With earthquakes, pestilence, and foreign foes,
And the great eneny of man, as subject
Of grateful masses for Heaven's grace in snatching
Our lives and country from thy wickedness.
The place wherein as Doge thou shouldst be painted
With thine illustrious predecessors, is
To be left vacant, with a death-black veil
Plung over these dim words engraved beneath,
"This place is of Marino Faliero, Decapitated for his crimes."

Doge. "His crimes!
But let it be so—it will be in vain.
The veil which blackens o'er this blighted name,
And hides, or seems to hide, these lineaments,
Shall draw more gazers than the thousand portraits
Which glitter round in their pictured trappings—
Your delegated slaves—the people's tyrants!
"Decapitated for his crimes!"—What crimes?
Were it not better to record the facts,
So that the contemplator might approve,
Or at the least learn whence the crimes arose?
When the beholder knows a page,
Let him be told the cause—it is your history.

Ben. Time must reply to that: our sons will judge
Their fathers' judgment, which I now pronounce.
As Doge, clad in the ducal robes and cap,
Thou shalt be led hence to the Giant's Staircase,
Where thou and all our princes are invested;
And there, the ducal crown being first resumed
Upon the spot where it was first assumed,
Thy head shall be struck off; and Heaven have mercy
Upon thy soul!

Doge. Is this the Giunta's sentence?
Ben. It is.

Doge. I can endure it—And the time?
Ben. Must be immediate.—Make thy peace with God;
Within an hour thou must be in his presence.
Doge. I am already; and my blood will rise
To Heaven before the souls of those who shed it.
Are all my lands confiscated?
Ben. They are;
And goods, and jewels, and all kind of treasure,
Except two thousand duetats—these dispose of.
Doge. That's harsh—I would have lain reserved the lands.
Near to Treviso, which I hold by investment
From Laurence the Count-bishop of Ceneda,
In sef perpetual to myself and heirs,
To portion them (leaving my city spoil,
My palace and my treasures, to your forfeit)
Between my consort and my kinsmen.

Ben. Lie under the state's ban; their chief, thy nephew
In peril of his own life; but the council
Postpones his trial for the present. If Thou wilt a state unto thy widow'd princess,
Fear not, for we will do her justice.

Ang. Signors,
I share not in your spoils! From henceforth, know
I am devoted unto God alone,
And take my refuge in the cloister.

Doge. Come!
The hour may be a hard one, but 'twill end.
Have I sought else to undergo save death?
Ben. You have nought to do, except confess and die.
The priest is robed, the scimitar is bare,
And both await without.—But, above all,
Think not to speak unto the people; they
Are now by thousands swarming at the gates.
But these are closed; the Ten, the Aragonari, the Ginni, and the chief men of the Forty, alone will be beholders of thy doom, and they are ready to attend the Doge.

Doge. The Doge!

Ben. Yes, Doge, thou hast lived and thou shalt die a sovereign; till the moment which precedeth the secession of that head and trunk, that ducal crown and head shall be united. Thou hast forgot thy dignity in deceiving To plot with petty traitors; not so we, who in the very punishment acknowledge the prince. Thy vile accomplices have died the dog's death, and the wolf's; but thou shalt fall As falls the lion by the hunters, girl, By those who feel a proud compassion for thee, and mourn even the inevitable death Provoked by thy wild wrath, and regal fierceness. Now we remit thee to thy preparation: Let it be brief, and we ourselves will be thy guides unto the place where first we were united to thee as thy subjects, and thy senate; and must now be parted from thee as such for ever, on the self-same spot.—Guards! form the Doge's escort to his chamber.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.
The Doge's Apartment.

The Doge as Prisoner, and the Duchess attending him.

Doge. Now, that the priest is gone, 'twere useless all To linger out the miserable minutes; But one pang more, the pang of parting from thee, And I will leave the few last grains of sand, Which yet remain of the accorded hour, Still falling—I have done with Time.

Ang. Alas! And I have been the cause, the unconscious cause; And for this funeral marriage, this black union, Which thou, compliant with my father's wish, Didst promise at his death, thou hast seal'd thine own.

Doge. Not so: there was that in my spirit ever Which shaped out for itself some great reverse: The marvel is, it came not until now— And yet it was foretold me.

Ang. How foretold you? Doge. Long years ago—so long, they are a doubt in memory, and yet they live in annals: When I was in my youth and serv'd the senate And signory as podesta and captain Of the town of Treviso, on a day Of festival, the sluggish bishop who Convey'd the Host arose my rash young anger, By strange delay, and arrogant reply To my reproof: I raised my hand and smote him 'Till he reel'd beneath his holy burden; And as he rose from earth again, he raised his tremulous hands in pious wrath towards heaven, Thence pointing to the Host, which had fallen from him, He turn'd to me, and said, 'The hour will come When thou hast o'erthrown shall o'erthrow thee: The glory shall depart from out thy house, The wisdom shall be shaken from thy soul, And in thy best maturity of mind A madness of the heart shall seize upon thee: Passion shall tear thee when all passions cease In other men, or mellow into virtues; And majesty, which decks all other heads, Shall crown to leave thee headless; honors shall But prove to thee the heralds of destruction, And hoary hairs of shame, and both of death, But not such death as fits an aged man.'" Thus saying he pass'd on.—That hour is come Ang. And with this warning couldst thou not have striven To avert the fatal moment, and stone By penitence for that which thou hast done?

Doge. I own the words went to my heart, so much That I remember'd them amid the maze Of life, as if they form'd a spectral voice, Which shook me in a supernatural dream; And I repented; but 'twas not for me To pull in resolution: what must be I could not change, and would nor fear.—Nay more Than cannot have forgot, what all remember, That on my day of landing here as Doge, On my return from Rome, a mist of such Unwonted density went on before The bucentaur like the columnal cloud Which usher'd Israel out of Egypt, till The pilot was misled, and disembark'd us Between the pillars of Saint Mark's, where 'tis The custom of the state to put to death Its criminals, instead of touching at The Riva bellagi Paglia, as the wont is,—So that all Venice shudder'd at the omen, Ang. Ah! little boots it now to recollect Such things.

Doge. And yet I find a comfort in The thought that these things are the work of Fate. For I would rather yield to gods than men, Or cling to any creed of destiny, Rather than deem these mortals, most of whom I know to be as worthless as the dust, And weak as worthless, more than instruments Of an o'er ruling power; they in themselves Were all incapable—they could not be Victors of him who oft had conquer'd for them! Ang. Employ the minutes left in aspirations Of a more healing nature, and in peace Even with these wretches take thy flight to Heaven. Doge. I am at peace: the peace of certainty That a sure hour will come, when their sons' sons, And this proud city, and these azure waters, And all which makes them eminent and bright Shall be a desolation; and a curse, A hissing and a scoff unto the nations; A Carthage, and a Tyre, an Ocean Babel. Ang. Speak not thus now; the surge of passion still Sweeps o'er thee to the last; thou dost deceive Thyself, and canst not injure them—be calmer.

Doge. I stand within eternity, and see Into eternity, and I behold— Ay! palpable as I see thy sweet face —For the last time—the days which I denounce Unto all time against these wave-girt walls, And they who are indwellers. Guard, (coming forward,) Doge of Venice The Ten are in attendance on your highness.

Doge. Then farewell, Angiolina!—one embrace— Forgive the old man who hath been to thee
A fond, but fatal husband—love my memory—
I would not ask so much for me still living,
But thou canst judge of me more kindly now,
Beating my evil feelings are at rest.
Besides, of all the fruit of these long years,
Glory, and wealth, and power, and fame, and name,
Which generally leave some flowers to bloom
Even o'er the grave, I have nothing left, not even
A little love, or friendship, or esteem,
No not enough to extract an epitaph
From ostentatious kinsmen; in one hour
I have uprooted all my former life,
And outlived every thing, except thy heart,
The pure, the good, the gentle, which will oft
With unimpaired but not a clamorous grief
Still keep—thou turn'st so pale!—Alas! she faints,
She hath no breath, no pulse!—Guards lend your aid—
I cannot leave her thus, and yet 'tis better,
Since every lifeless moment spares a pang.
When she shakes off this temporary death,
I shall be with the Eternal.—Call her women
One look!—how cold her hand!—as cold as mine
Shall be ere she recovers.—Gently tend her,
And take my last thanks!—I am ready now.

To utter or to do?

Doge. May I speak?
Ben. Thou mayst:

But recollect the people are without,
Beyond the compass of the human voice.
Doge. I speak to Time and to Eternity,
Of which I grow a portion, not to man.
Ye elements! in which to be resolved,
I hasten, let my voice be as a spirit
Upon you! Ye blue waves! which bore my banes!
Ye winds! which flutter'd o'er as if you loved it,
And fill'd my swelling sails as they were wait'd
To many a triumph! Thou, my native earth,
Which I have bled for, and thou foreign earth,
Which drank this willing blood from many a wound
Ye stones, in which my gore will not shik, but Reek up to Heaven! Ye skies, which will receive it
Thou sun! which shinest on these 'hinges, and Thou
Who kindlest and who quenchest sins!—Attest! I am not innocent—but are these guiltless?
I perish, but not unavenged; far ages
Float up from the abyss of time to be,
And show these eyes, before they close, the doom
Of this proud city, and I leave my curse
On her and hers for ever!—Yes, the hours
Are silenced by the universal end of the day.
When she, who built 'gainst Attila a bulwark,
Shall yield, and bloodlessly and basely yield
Upto a bastard Attila, without
Shredding so much blood in her last defence
As these old veins, oft drain'd in shielding her,
Shall pour in sacrifice.—She shall be bought
And sold, and be an appanage to those Who shall despire her!—She shall stoop to be
A province for an empire, petty town
In lieu of capital, with slaves for senators,
Beggars for nobles, panders for a people! 10
Then when the Hebrew's in thy palaces, 11
The Hun in thy high places, and the Greek
Walks o'er thy mart, and smiles on it for his!
When thy patricians beg their bitter bread
In narrow streets, and in their shameful need
Make their nobility a plea for pity!
Then, when the few who still retain a wrench
Of their great fathers' heritage shall fawn
Round a barbarian Vice of Kings' Vicegerent,
Even in the palace where they sway'd as sovereigns,
Even in the palace where they slew their sovereign,
Proud of some name they have disgraced, or sprung
From an adulteress boastful of her guilt,
With some large gondolier or foreign soldier,
Shall bear about their bastardy in triumph
To the third spurious generation;—when
Thy sons are in the lowest scale of being,
Slaves turn'd o'er to the vanquish'd by the victors,
Despised by cowards for greater cowardice,
And scorn'd even by the vicious for such vices
As in the monstrous grasp of their conception
Defy all codes to image or to name them;
Then, when of Cyprus, now thy subject kingdom,
All thing inheritance shall be her shame
Entail'd on thy less virtuous daughters, grown
A wider proverb for worse prostitution;—
When all the ills of conquer'd states shall cling these Vice without splendor, sin without relief
Even from the gloss of love to smooth it o'er,
But in its stead coarse lusts of habitude,
Prurient yet passionless, cold studied lewdness,
Depraving nature's frailty to an art—
When these and more are heavy on thee, when Smiles without mirth, and pastimes without pleasure,
Youth without honor, age without respect,
Meanness and weakness, and a sense of wo
'Gainst which thou wilt not strive, and darst not murmur,
Have made thee last and worst of peopled deserts,
Then, in the last gasp of thine agony,
Amidst thy many murders, think of mine!
Thou den of drunkards with the blood of princes! 15
Gehenna of the waters! thou sea Sodom!
Thus I devote thee to the infernal gods!
Thee and thy serpent seed!
[Hers the Doge turns, and addresses the Executioner.
Slave, do thine office!
Strike as I struck the foe! Strike as I would Have struck those tyrants! Strike deep as my curse!
Strike—and but once!
[The Doge throws himself upon his knees, and the Executioner raises his sword, the scene expires.]

SCENE IV.
The Piazza and Piazzetta of Saint Mark's.—The People in crowds gathered round the grated gates of the Ducal Palace, which are shut.

First Citizen. I have gain'd the gate, and can discern the Ten,
Robed in their gowns of state, ranged round the
Doge.

Second Cit. I cannot reach thee with mine utmost effort.
How is it? let us hear at least, since sight
Is thus prohibited unto the people,
Except the occupiers of those bars.

First Cit. One has approach'd the Doge, and now they strip
The ducal bonnet from his head—and now

He raises his keen eyes to heaven; I see Them glitter, and his lips move—Hush! hush!—no
'Twas but a murmur—Curse upon the distance!
His words are inarticulate, but the voice
Swells up like mudder'd thunder; would we could
But gather a sole sentence!

Second Cit. Hush! we perhaps may catch the sound.

First Cit.

'I tis vain,
I cannot hear him.—How his hoary hair
Streams on the wind like foam upon the wave!
Now—now—he kneels—and now they form a circle
Round him, and all is hidden—but I see
The lifted sword in air—Ah! Hark! it falls!

[The people murmur.

Third Cit. Then they have murder'd him who would have freed us.

Fourth Cit. He was a kind man to the commons ever.

Fifth Cit. Wisely they did to keep their portals barr'd.

Would we had known the work they were preparing Ere we were summon'd here, we would have brought Weapons and forced them!

Sixth Cit. Are you sure he's dead?
First Cit. I saw the sword fall—Lo! what have we here?

Enter on the Balcony of the Palace which fronts
Saint Mark's Place, a Chief of the Ten, 15 with a bloody sword. He waves it thrice before the People, and exclaims,

"Justice hath dealt upon the mighty Traitor!"

[The gates are opened; the populace rush in towards the "Giant's Staircase," where the execution has taken place. The foremost of them exclaims to those behind,
The gory head rolls down the "Giants' Steps!"

MARINO FALIERO DOGE XLIX.

"Fu eletto da quarantuno Elettori, il quale era Cavaliere e conte di Valdemarino in Trivigliana, ed era rieco, e si trovava ambasciadore a Roma. E a di 9, di Settembre, dopo sepoltol il suo predecessore, fu chiamato il gran Consiglio, e fu preso di fare il Doge giusta il solito. E furono fatti i cinque Correttori, Ser Bernardo Giustiniani Procuratore, Ser Paolo Lordano, Ser Filippo Aurio, Ser Pietro Trivisano, a Ser Tommaso Viadro. I quali a di 10, misero queste correzioni alla promozione del Doge: che i Consiglieri non odano cii Oratori e Nunzi de' Signori, senza i Capi de' quaranta, ne possono rispon- dere ad alcuno, se non saranno quattro Consiglieri e due Capi de' Quaranta. E che osservino la forma del suo Capitolare. E che Messer lo Doge si metta nella miglior parte, quando i giudici tra loro non fussero d'accordo. E ch'egli non possa far vendere i suoi imprestiti, salvo con legittima causa, e col voleo di cinque Consigliere, di due Capi de' Quaranta, e delle due parti del Consiglio de' Pregati. Item, che in luogo di tre mila pelli de' Conigli, che debbon dare l'Zaratini per regali al Doge, non tro vandosi tante pelli, gli diano Ducati ottanta l'anno. E poi a di 11, detto, minore etiam altre correzioni, che se il Doge, che sarà eletto, fosse fuori de' Venezia, i savvissano provvedere del suo ritorno. E quando fosse il Doge ammalato, sia Vicedoge uno de' Consiglieri, da essere eletto tra loro. E che il detto sia nominato Viceudogotene di Messer lo Doge, quando i giudici faranno i suoi atti. "Il Doge mandò a chiamare Ser Bertuccio Faliero suo nipote, il quale stava con lui in Palazzo, e entran- naro in questa macchinazione. Ne si parirono di lì, che mandarono per Filippo Calendario, uomo marittimo e di gran seguito, e per Bertuccio Israel- lo, ingegnoso e uomo astottissimo. E consigliati dissero ete' ordine di chiamarli alcuni altri. E così per alcuni giorni la notte si riducevano insieme in Palazzo in casa del Doge. E chiamarono a parte a parte altri, videlicet Niccolò Fagninolo, Giovanni da Corfo, Stefano Biondo, Stefano Trivisano, Niccolò Biondo, e Stefano Trivisano. E ordino di fare sedici o diciassette Capì in diversi luoghi della Terra, i qualiavessero cadam di loro guarant' uomini provvigioni, preparati; non dicendo a' detti suoi guarant' quello, che volessero fare. Ma che il giorno stabilito si mostrasse di far quistione tra loro in di- versi luoghi, acciocché il Doge facesse sonare a San Marco le campane, le quali non si possono anuare, s' egli volle comanda. E al suono delle campane questi sedici o diciassette co' suoi uomini venissero a San Marco alle strade, che buttano l' rima. E così i nobili e primarj cittadini, che venissero in Pi azza, per sapere del romore ciò ch' era, li tagliassero a pezzi. E seguirono il detto Signore Messer Marino Faliero Doge. E fermate le cose tra loro, stabilito fu, che questo dovesse esse- sere a' 15 d'Aprile del 1355 in giorno di Mercoledì. La quale macchinazione tratta fu tra loro tascato segretamente, che mai ne puse se non la sorvegli, e che se ne sapesse cos' alcuna. Ma il Signor' Idöü, che ha sempre ajutato questa gloriosissima città e che per le santimonie e giustizie sue mai non l' ha abbandonata, insieme tutti que' dottorati, che al detto fu messo Capì di guarant' uomini per uno di' detti coniugari (il quale intese qualche parola, sicché' comprese l'effetto, che deveva succedere, e il quale è stato di Ser Michele Steno, di Signore di Lioni di di' lioni) de' 15 d'Aprile preso in detto del Ser Niccolò Lioni. Ed egli diede la mia lettera, e la firmata, in presenza di una camera. Ed esso andò a casa di M. Giovanni Gradenigo Nasone, il quale fu poi Doge, che stava anch'egli a Sant' Stefanò e dissi loro la cosa. La quale cosa venne notata da Gradenigo, e da Sanzio del grandoissimo importanza, tutta e due andarono a casa di Ser Marco Cornaro, che stava a San Felice. E dettagliò il tutto tutti e tre deliberarono di venire a casa del detto Ser Nicolò; ed essi inviarono a Ser Bertuccio. E quello esaminato, intese le cose, fece starle sorte. E andarono tutti e tre a San Salvatore in sacristia, emandarono il loro famiglii a chiare i Consigliergi, gli Avvogadorgi, i Cape de' Dii, e del Consiglio dei Regordi. E ridisseti insieme dissero loro le cose. I quali rimasero morti. Ed deliberarono di mandare pel detto Bertuccio, e fattolo venire cautamente, ed esaminatolo, e verificate le cose, ancorché ne sennissero gran passione, pure pensarono la provvisione. E mandarono pe' Cape de' Quaranta, pe' Signori di notte, pe' Cape de' Sestieri, ed pe' Cinque del Pace. E fu conceputo al detto Doge, tutti lor entrarono dentro con gran furia a vedere il Doge, ch'era stato giustiziato.

E' da saperlo, che a fare la detta giustizia non fu ser Giovanni Sanudo il Consigliere, perché era andato a casa per difetto della persona, sicche furono quattro di soli, che ballot furono, cioè cinque Consigliergi, e nove del Consiglio de' Dii. E fu preso, che tutti i beni del Doge fossero confiscati nel Comune, e così degli altri traditori, dove' fu condotto al detto Doge, tutti e' loro stati a fare la detta sentenza del Doge, e d'altre, avessero licenza di portar' arme di e di note in Venezia e da Grado fino a Gavarezzo, ch'è sotto il Dogato, con due fanti in vita loro, stando i fendi in casa al suo paio e al suo voler, che non avesse fanti, potesse dar tal licenza a' suoi figlioli ovvero fratelli, due però e non più. APPENDIX TO MARINO FALIERO.

On the eleventh day of September, in the year of our Lord 1354, Marino Faliero was elected and chosen to be the Duke of the Commonwealth of Venice. He was Count of Valdemarino, in the marches of Treviso, and a Knight and a wealthy man to boot. As soon as the election was completed, it was resolved in the Great Council, that a deputation of twelve should be despatched to Marino Faliero, the Duke, who was then on his way from Rome; and when the deputies arrived, the Duke himself was present to receive them, who, after the usual ceremonies, conducted them to his palace, where they were entertained with a splendid feast. The Duke, in his presiding over the council, was so modest and unassuming, that his lordship was considered as being the most suitable man for the highest offices. However, the Duke was soon forced to resign his office, and to retire to the monastery of S. Maria della Carita, where he spent the remainder of his life, reading and contemplating the affairs of the state. He was succeeded by his son, who continued to reign for a short time, until his death in 1358. met with the Duke at home in his palace. And the following men were called in singly; to wit: — Nicco del Palio, de' Girolami, Niccoli dalle Bende, Niccolo Biondo and Stefano Trivisano. It was concerted that sixteen or seventeen leaders should be stationed in various parts of the city, or else, as many as the hundred men, armed and prepared; but the followers were not to know their destination. On the appointed day they were to make affrays among themselves here and there, in order that the Duke might have a pretence, for told them that the Duke bade the bells of San Marco be never rung but by the order of the Duke. And at the sound of the bells, these sixteen or seventeen, with their followers, were to come to San Marco, through the streets which open upon the Piazza. And when the noble and leading citizens should come into the Piazza, to know the cause of the riot, then the conspirators were to cut them in pieces; and this work being finished, my Lord Marino Falerio the Duke was to be proclaimed the Lord of Venice. Things having been thus settled, they agreed to fulfil their intent on Wednesday, the fifteenth day of April, in the year 1355. So coyly did — that no one ever dreamt of their machinations.

But the Lord, who hath always helped this most glorious city, and who, loving its righteousness and holiness, hath never forsaken it, inspired one Beltramo, to be the captain of the commission of bringing the plot to light in the following manner. This Beltramo, who belonged to Ser Niccolo Lioni of Santo Stefano, had heard a word or two of what was to take place; and so, in the before-mentioned month of April, he went to the house of the aforesaid Ser Niccolo Lioni, and told him all the particulars of the plot. Ser Niccolo, when he heard all these things, was struck dead, as it were, with affliction. But all the matter seemed to him to be of the very greatest importance, as indeed it was; and they two went to the house of Ser Marco Cornaro, who lived at San Felice; and, having spoken with him, gave him the order to go betimes to the house of Ser Niccolo Lioni, to examine the said Beltramo; and having questioned him, and heard all that he had to say, they left him in confinement. And then they all three went into the sacristy of San Salvador, and sent their men to summon the Councillors, the Avvogadori, the Capi de' Dieci, and those of the Great Council.

When all were assembled, the whole story was told them. They were struck dead, as it were, with affliction. They determined to send for Beltramo. He was brought in before them. They examined him, and ascertained that the matter was true; and, although they were exceedingly troubled, yet they determined upon their measures. And they sent for the Capi de' Quaranta, the Signori di Notte, the Capi de' Sestieri, and the Cinque della Pace; and they were ordered to associate to them all the nobles and gentlemen of the city. And so, when they were proceeded to the houses of the ring leaders of the conspiracy and secure them. And they secured the foreman of the arsenal, in order that the conspirators might, in no wise, gather themselves together. They assembled in the palace. When they were assembled in the palace, they caused the gates of the quadrangle of the palace to be shut. And they sent to the keeper of the bell tower, and forbade the tolling of the bells for that day. And this was the manner of consultation and deliberation, but that they should not be allowed to ballot.

The councillors were the following: Ser Giovanni Mocenigo, Ser Giovanni Foscariner, Ser Marco de' Moro Veniero da Santa Marina, of the Sestiero of Castello; Ser Tommaso Viadro, of the Sestiero of Camerigo; Ser Giovanni Sanudo, of the Sestiero of Santa Croce; Ser Pietro Trivisano, of the Sestiero of San Felice; Ser Andrea Trivisano, of the Sestiero of Ossoduro. The Avvogadori of the Commonwealth were Zufredo Morosini, and Ser Orio Pasquialgo; and these did not ballot. These of the Council of Ten were Ser Giovanni Marcello, Ser Tommaso Sanudo, and Ser Micheleotto Dolfinó, the heads of the aforesaid Council of Ten. Ser Luca da Legge, and Ser Pietro da Mosto, inquisitors of the aforesaid Council. And Ser Marco Feletti, Ser Marino Veniero, Ser Lando Lambardo, and Ser Niccolò Trivisano, of Sant'Agelo.

Late in the night, just before the dawning, they chose a junta of twenty noblemen of Venice from among their own, to understand the plot. They were to give counsel, but not to ballot. And they would not admit any one of Cà Falerio. And Niccolo Falerio, and another Niccolo Falerio, of San "mmaso, were expelled from the Council, because they belonged to the party of the plot; and the resolution of creating the junta of twenty was much praised throughout the state. The following were the members of the junta of twenty: — Ser Marco Giustinian, Procuratore, Ser' Andrea Erizzo, Procuratore, Ser' Leonardo Giustinian, Procuratore, Ser' Andrea Contarini, Ser' Simone Dandolo, Ser' Niccolo Volpe, Ser Giovanni Lorendo, Ser Marco Diedo, Ser Giovanni Gradenigo, Ser' Andrea Cornaro, Ser' Giovanni Sanzio, Ser' Giovanni Sanzio, Ser' Gianfranco, Ser' Rinieri da Mosto, Ser' Gazano Marcello, Ser' Marinò Morosini, Ser Stefano Belegno, Ser Niccolo Lioni, Ser' Filippo Orio, Ser' Marco Trivisano, Ser' Jacopo Bragadin, Ser Giovanni Foscari.

These twenty were accordingly called into the Council of Ten; and they sent for my Lord Marino Falerio the Duke: and my Lord Marino was then consisting in the palace with people of great estate, gentlemen and other good men, none of whom knew yet how the fact stood.

At the same time Bertuccio Israello, who, as one of the ringleaders, was to head the conspirators in the San Zaccaria, San Santerno, and San Samo, before the Council. Zanello del Brin, Nicoletto di Rosa, Nicoletto Alberto, and the Guardiaga, were also taken together, with several seamen, and people of various ranks. These were examined, and the truth of the plot was ascertained.

On the sixteenth of April, judgment was given in the Council of Ten, that Filippo Calendario and Bertuccio Israello should be hanged upon the red pillars of the balconnies of the palace, from which the Duke is wont to look at the bull-hunt: and they were hanged with gags in their mouths.

The next day the following were condemned: — Niccolo Zucucole, Nicoletto Blondo, Nicoletto Doro da Marco Giuda, Jacoletto Dalgutino, Nicoletto Fidel, the son of Philip Calendario, Marco Terello, called Israello, Stefano Trivisano, the money-changer of Santa Margherita, and Antonio dalle Bende. They were executed, after the Council of Ten were endeavoring to escape. Afterwards, by virtue of the sentence which was passed upon them in the Council of Ten, they were hanged on successive days, some being hanged by daylight; they were all brought to the palace; and as the Council of Ten saw that the Duke was in the plot, they resolved that twenty of the leading men of the state should be executed, and on the morrow, for that of consultation and deliberation, but that they should not be allowed to ballot.
APPENDIX TO MARINO FALIERO.

vico of the state, and in order to secure certain criminals, and they knew nothing else, Captolotto, Alberto, the Guardiaga, and Bartolommeo Cinthia, and his son, and several others, who were not guilty, were discharged.

On Friday, the sixteenth day of April, judgment was also given, in the aforesaid Council of Ten, that my Lord Marino Faliero, the Duke, should have his head cut off, and that the execution should be done on the landing-place of the stone staircase, where the Duke sate and paid his oath when they first enter the palace. On the following day, the seventeenth of April, the doors of the palace being shut, the Duke had his head cut off, about the hour of noon. And the cap of earth was taken from the Duke’s head before he came down stairs. Which execution was over, it is said that one of the Council of Ten went to the columns of the palace over against the place of St. Mark, and that he showed the bloody sword unto the people, crying out with a loud voice — ‘The terrible doom hath fallen upon the traitor!’ and the doors were opened, and the people all rushed in, to see the corpse of the Duke who had been beheaded.

It must be known, that Ser Giovanni Sanudo, the cancellor, was not present when the aforesaid sentence was pronounced; because he was unwell and remained at home. So that only fourteen ballotted; this is to say, to seven of the cancellors and seven of the Council of Ten. And it was adjudged that all the lands and chattels of the Duke, as well as of the other traitors, should be forfeited to the state. And, as a grace to the Duke, it was resolved in the Council of Ten, that he should be allowed to dispose of two thousand ducats out of his own property. And it was resolved, that all the councillors and all the Avogadori of the commonwealth, those of the Council of Ten, and the members of the junta who had assisted in passing sentence of death on the Duke and the other traitors, should have the privilege of carrying arms both by day and by night in Venice, and from Grado to Cavazzare. And they were also to be allowed two footmen carrying arms, the aforesaid footmen living and boarding with them in their own houses. And he who did not keep two footmen might transfer the privilege to his sons or his brothers; but only to two. Permission of carrying arms was also granted to the heads of the Chancery, that is to say, of the Supreme Court, who took the depositions; and they were Amedio, Niccolotto di Lorino, Stefanello, and Pietro de Compostella, and the avogadori of the commonwealth.

After the traitors had been hanged, and the Duke had his head cut off, the state remained in great tranquility and peace. And, as I have read in a chronicle, the corpse of the Duke was removed in a barge, with eight torches, to his tomb in the church San Giovanni e Paolo, where it was buried. The tomb is now in that aisle in the middle of the little church of Santa Maria della Pace, which was built by Bishop Gabriel of Bergamo. It is a coffin of stone, with these words engraved thereon: Heic jacet Dominus Marinus Faletero Dux. — And they did not paint his portrait in the hall of the Great Council, as is the case where it is no longer been, you see these words: — ‘Hic est locus Marini Fatleri, decapitati proruminibus’ — and it is thought that his house was granted to the church of Sant’ Apostol; it was that great one near the bridge.

To this we will say, that the aforesaid spoliation was made by the aforesaid: — ‘Marinus Faleto Dux, temeritas me egxit, pronus lui, decapitatus prorominibus.’ Others, also, indited a couplet, worthy of being ascribed upon his tomb.

I am entitled for this excellent avowation of the old chart to Mr. J. F. Folles, to whom I am indebted for a version that could not unsympathetically rise from many years’ intercourse with the Italians, have given by many means so purely and so skilfully.'
of Petrarca: "antica dimostichezza," old intimacy, is the phrase of the poet.

2idy. That Petrarca thought that he had more courage than conduct, "piu di coraggio che di senso,"

3idy. That there was some jealousy on the part of Petrarca; for he says that Marino Faliero was treating of the peace which he himself had "vainly attempted to conclude."

4thly, That the honor of the dukedom was conferred on him, which he neither sought nor expected, "che non chiedeva ne' aspirava," and which had never been granted to any other in like circumstances, "e che non si concedette a nessun altro," "proof of his esteem in which he must have been held."

5thly, That he had a reputation for wisdom, only forfeited by the last enterprise of his life, "si super tanti annii una falsa fama di sapienza." - "He had earned for so many years a false name of wisdom;" rather a difficult task, I should think.

People are generally found out before eighty years of age, at least in a republic.

But immense, and the other historical notes which I have collected, it may be inferred that Marino Faliero possessed many of the qualities, but not the success of a hero; and that his passions were too violent. The palsy and ignorant account of Dr. Moore falls to the ground. Petrarca says, "that there had been no greater event in his times" (our times literally,) "nostri tempi," in Italy. He also differs from the historian in saying that Faliero was "on the banks of the Rhone," instead of at Rome, when elected; the other accounts say, that the deputies of the Venetian senate met him at Ravenna. How this may have been, it is not for me to decide, and is of no great importance. Had the man succeeded, he would have changed the face of Venice, and perhaps of Italy. As it is, what are they both?

"A ces attaques si fréquentes que le gouvernement dirigeait contre le clergé à ces luttes établies entre les divers corps constitués, à ces entreprises de la masse de la noblesse contre les dépositaires du pouvoir, à toutes ces propositions d'innovation qui se terminaient toujours par des corps d'état; il faut ajouter une autre cause, non moins propre à propager le même des anciennes doctrines, c'était l'excès de la corruption.

Cette liberté de mœurs, qu'on avait long-temps vantée comme le charme principal de la société de Venise, était devenue un dard scandalux; le lieu du mariage était moins sacré dans ce pays catholique que dans ceux où les lois civiles et religieuses permettent de le disséquer. Faut-il pouvoir rompre le contrat, on supposait qu'il n'avait jamais existé, et les moyens de nullité, allégres avec impudeur par les époux, étaient admises avec la même facilité; ils étaient en concubinat, et les prêtres et religieux des cloîtres et des ermites. Ces divorces colorés d'un autre nom devinrent si fréquents, que l'acte le plus important de la société civile se trouva de la compétence d'un tribunal d'exception, et que ce fut à la police de réprimer le scandale. Le conseil des dix hormonaires, en 1782, que toute femme qui intenterait une demande en disolution de mariage serait obligée d'en attendre le jugement dans un couvent, que le tribunal dessigné."

Bien tout de même, devant lui toutes les causes de cette nature.* Ce Bénédicte est saluatoir sur la jurisprudence ecclésiastique ayant occasion des réclamations de la part de la cour de Rome le conseil se reservait le droit de débiter des époques de leur demande; et consent à le renvoyer à l'officielle, toutes les fois qu'il ne l'aurait pas rejeté.†

"Il y eut un moment où sans doute le renversement des fortunes, la peste des jeunes gens, les discordes domestiques, à s'exciser des maintes que s'attait faites sur la liberté de mœurs qu'il permettait à ses sujets; on chassa de Venise toutes les courtisanes. Mais leur absence ne suffisait pas pour ramener aux bonnes mœurs toute une population élevée dans la plus honteuse licence. Le desordre pénétra dans l'intérieur des familles, dans les cloîtres; et l'on se crut, obligé de rappeler, d'indemniser même des femmes qui suptraient quelquefois d'importants secrets, et qu'on pouvait employer utilement à ruiner des hommes que leur fortune aurait pu rendre dangereux. Depuis, la licence est toujours allée croissant, et l'on a vu non seulement des mères trafiquer de la virginité de leurs filles, mais encore des époux, laquelle y entretint soigneusement un grand nombre de surveillants, étaient les seuls points de réunion de la société de Venise, et dans ces deux endroits si divers on était également libre. La musique, les collations, la galanterie, n'étaient pas plus interdites dans les paroles que dans les casins. Il y avait un grand nombre de casins destinés aux réunions publique, où le jeu était la principale occupation de la société. C'était un singulier spectacle de voir autant d'une table des personnes des deux sexes en masque, et de gravas personnages en robe de magistrature, implorant le hasard, passant des angoisses désespérer aux illusions de l'espoirance, et cela sans proférer une parole.

"Les riches avaient des casins particuliers; mais ils y vivaient avec mystère; leurs femmes dédaillées trouvaient un dédommagement dans la liberté dont elles jouissaient; la corruption des mœurs les avait privés de tout leur empire; on vient de parler toute l'histoire de Venise, et on ne les a pas vus une seule fois exercer la moindre influence."*

Extract from the History of the Republic of Venice by P. Daru, Member of the French Academy, vol. v. b. xxxv. p. 95, &c. Paris Ed. 1819.

"To these attacks, so frequently pointed by the government against the clergy,—to the continual struggles between the different constituted bodies,—to these enterprises carried on by the mass of the nobles against the depositaries of power,—to all these projects of innovation, which always ended by a stroke of state policy; we must add a cause not less fitted to spread contempt for ancient doctrines; this was the excess of corruption."

"That freedom of manners which had been long boasted as the principal charm of Venetian society, had degenerated into scandalous licentiousness:

the tie of marriage was less sacred in that Catholic country, than among those nations where the laws and religion admit of its being dissolved. Because these were the head:ulators in 1790; vol. I came home in the squadron with the prizes in 1811, and recollect to have heard Sir William Hoste, and the other officers engaged in that glorious conflict, to speak in the highest terms of Pasquiglio's behavior. There is the Abate Morelli. There is Alziva Querini, who, after a long and honorable diplomatic career, finds some consolation for the wrongs of the country, in the pursuits of literature, with his disciples, and in personal friendships. There is a certain protectress of liberty, the heroine of "La Biantina in Gond-letta." There are the patrician poet Moretini and the poet Lamberti, the author of the "Bondman, &c., and many other estimable productions; and not least in an Englishman's estimation, M. Nivio Michelli, the translator of Shakspeare. There are the young Dandolo, and the improvisatore Carer, and Giuseppe Albrici, the accomplished son of a noble family. There is Aglietti, and were there nothing else, there is the immortality of Cavena. Ciegnara, Mustozithi, Bucati, &c., &c., I do not reckon, because the one is a Greek, and the others were born at least a hundred miles off, which, though they do not belong to a foreigner at least a stranger, (forestiere.)

"Il y une prédiction fort singulière sur Venise : Si tu ne changes pas, dit elle à cette république altière, 'ta liberté,' qui déjà s'enfuit, ne comptera pas un siècle après la millième année.

"En faisant rencontrer le peuple de la Venise Venitiennes jusqu'à l'établissement du gouvernement sous lequel la republique a fleuri, on trouvera que l'élection du premier Doge date de 697, et si l'on y ajoute un siècle après mille, c'est-à-dire onze cents ans, on trouvera encore que le sens de la prédiction littrairement celui-ci : 'Ta liberté ne comptera pas jusqu'à l'an 1797. Rappelez-vous maintenant que Venise a cessé d'être libre en l'an cinquante de la République Francaise, on en 1799; mais vous verrez qu'il n'y eut jamais de prédiction plus précise et plus ponctuellement suivie de l'effet. Vous notez donc comme très remarquables ces trois vers de l'Alamani, adressés à Venise, que personne pourtant n'a remarqués :"

"Se non cangiar prestit, Pan secol solo
Non conterà un milleanno senza
Tuo liberar, che va soggiogato a vo'*

Bien des prophéties ont passé pour telles, et bien des gens ont été appelés prophètes à meilleur marché."

"There is one very singular prophecy concerning Venice: 'If thou dost not change,' it says to that proud republic, 'thy liberty, which is already on the wing, will not reckon a century more than the thousandth year.'

"If we carry back the epocha of Venetian freedom to the establishment of the government under which the republic flourished, we shall find that the date of the election of the first Doge is 697; and if we add one century to a thousand, that is, twenty hundred years, we shall find the sense of the pre diction to be literally this: 'Thy liberty will not last till 1797.' Recollect that Venice ceased to be free in the year 1796, the fifth year of the French republic; and you will perceive that there never was prediction more pointed, or more exactly followed by the event. You will, therefore, note as very remarkable the three lines of Alamanni, addressed to Venice, which, however, no one has pointed out:

"So non omnis senserit, non sequerat solo
Non concert supps, 'I millionem anno
Tur Liberti, qui va fuggereso a vulo."

Many prophecies have passed for such, and many men have been called prophets for much less."

The Doge's prophecy seem remarkable, look to the above, made by Alani two hundred and seventy years ago.

THE TWO FOSCARI:

AN HISTORICAL TRAGEDY.

DRAMATIS PERSONAE.

Men.—Francis Foscarì, Doge of Venice.
Jacopo Foscarì, Son of the Doge.
James Lorendano, a Patrician.
Marco Memmo, a Chief of the Forty.
Barbarigo, a Senator.
Other Senators, the Council of Ten, Guards, Attendants, &c., &c.

Woman.—Marini, Wife of young Foscarì.

Scene.—the Ducal Palace, Venice.

ACT 1.

SCENE I.

A Hall in the Ducal Palace.

Enter Lorendano and Barbarigo, meeting.

Lor. Where is the prisoner?

Bar. Reposing from the Question.

Lor. The hour's past—six o'clock yesterday.

For the resumption of his trial.—Let us

Rejoin our colleagues in the council, and Urgè als recall.

Bar. Nay, let him profit by
A few brief minutes for his tortured limbs;
He was o'erwrung by the Question yesterday,
And may die under it if now repeated.

Lor. Well!

Bar. I yield not to you in love of justice,
Or hate of the ambitious Foscari,
Father and son, and all their noxious race;
But the poor wretch has sufferr'd beyond nature's
Most stoical endurance.

Lor. Without owning
His crime?

Bar. Perhaps without committing any.
But he avow'd the letter to the Duke
Of Milan, and his sufferings half atone for Such weakness.

Lor. We shall see.

Bar. You, Loredano,
Pursue hereditary hate too far.
Lor. How far?

Bar. To extirmination.

Lor. When they are
Extinct, you may say this.—Let's in to council.
Bar. Yet pause—the number of our colleagues is not Complete yet; two are wanting ere we can Proceed.

Lor. And the chief judge, the Doge?

Bar. No—he

With more than Roman fortitude, is ever
First at the board in this unhappy process
Against his last and only son.

Lor. True—true—

His last.

Bar. Will nothing move you?

Lor. Feels he, think you?

Bar. He shows it not.

Lor. I have mark'd that—the wretch!
Bar. But yesterday, I hear, on his return
To the ducal chambers, as he pass'd the threshold,
The old man faint'd.

Lor. It begins to work, then.

Bar. The work is half your own.

Lor. And should be all mine—

My father and my uncle are no more.

Bar. I have read their epitaph, which says they died
By poison.

Lor. When the Doge declared that he Should never deem himself a sovereign till
The death of Peter Loredano, both
The brothers sicken'd shortly;—he is sovereign.

Bar. A wre'ched one.

Lor. What should they be who make Orphans?

Bar. But did the Doge make you so?

Lor. Yes.

Bar. What solid proofs?

Lor. When princes set themselves to work in secret, proofs and process are Alike made difficult; but I have such
Of the first, as shall make the second needless.

Bar. But you will move by law?

Lor. By all the laws which he would leave us.

Bar. They are such in this

Our state as render retribution easier
Than mongst remoter actions. It is true

That you have written in your books of commerce,
(2) The wealthy practice of our highest nobles,
"Doge Foscari, my debtor for the deaths
Of Marco and Pietro Loredano,
My sire and uncle?")

Lor. It is written thus.

Bar. And will you leave unerased?

Lor. Till balanced

Bar. And how?

[Two Senators pass over the stage, as in their way to "the Hall of the Council of Ten."]

Lor. You see the number is complete
Follow me. [Exit Loredano]

Bar. (solus.) Follow thee! I have follow'd long
Thy path of desolation, as the wave
Sweeps after that before it, alike whelming
The wreck that creaks to the wild winds, and wretch
Who shrikes within its riven ribs, as gush
The waters through them; but this son and sire
 Might move the elements to pause, and yet
Must I on hardly like them—Oh! would
I could as blindly and remorselessly—
Lo, where he comes!—Be still, my heart! they are Thy foes, must be thy victims: wilt thou beat
For those who almost broke thee?

Enter Guards, with young Foscari as prisoner, &c.

Guard. Let him rest.

Signor, take time.

Jac. Fos. I thank thee, friend, I'm feeble;
But thou may'st stand reproved.

Guard. I'll stand the hazard.

Jac. Fos. That's kind;—I meet some pity, but no mercy:

This is the first,

Guard. And might be the last, did they

Who rule behold us.

Bar. (advancing to the Guard.) There is one who does:

Yet fear not; I will neither be thy judge
Nor thy accuser; though the hour is past,
Wait their last summons—I am of "the Tei."
And waiting for that summons, sanction you
Even by my presence: when the last call sounds,
We'll in together.—Look well to the prisoner!

Jac. Fos. What voice is that?—'Tis Barbarigo's

Ah! our house's foe, and one of my few judges.

Bar. To balance such a foe, if such there be:

Thy father sits among thy judges.

Jac. Fos. True

He judges.

Bar. Then deem not the laws too harsh
Which yield so much indulgence to a sire
As to allow his voice in such high matter
As the state's safety—

Jac. Fos. And his son's. I'm faint
Let me approach; I pray you, for a breath
Of air, you window which o'erlooks the waters.

Enter an Officer who whispers Barbarigo.

Bar. (to the Guard.) Let him approach. I man not speak with him
Further than thus; I have transgress'd my duty
In this brief parley, and must now redeem it
Within the Council Chamber. [Exit Barbarigo]

[Guard conducting Jacopo Foscari to the window]

Guard. There, sir, 'tis
Open—How feel you?

Jac. Fos.  Like a boy—Oh Venice!

Guard. And your limbs?

Jac. Fos. Limbs! how often have they borne me

Bounding o'er the blue tide, as I have skim'm'd

The gondola along in childish race,

And, masqued as a young gondolier, amidst

My gay competitors, noble as I,

Raced for our pleasure, in the pride of strength:

While the fair populace of crowding beauties,

Pleasant as patrician, cheer'd us on

With dazzling smiles, and wishes audible,

And waving kerchiefs, and applauding hands,

Even to the goal!—How many a time have I

Clenched with arm still luster, breast more daring,

The wave all roun'g'd; with a swimmer's stroke

Flinging the billows back from my drench'd hair,

And laughing from my lip the audacious brine,

Which kiss'd it like a wine-cup, rising o'er

The waves as they arose, and pronder still

The loftier they uplifted me; and oft,

In wantonness of spirit, plunging down

Into their green and glassy gulfs, and making

My way to shells and sea-weed, all unseen

By those above, till they wax'd fearful; then

Returning with my grasp full of such tokens

As shov'd that I had search'd the deep: exulting,

With a far-dashing stroke, and drawing deep

The long-suspended breath, again I spurn'd

The foam which broke around me, and pursued

My track like a sea-bird.—I was a boy then.

Guard. Be a man now: there never was more need

Of manhood's strength.

Jac. Fos. (looking from the lattice.) My beautiful,

my own,

My only Venice—this is breath! Thy breeze,

Thine Adrian sea-breeze, how it fans my face!

The very winds feel native to my veins,

And cool them into calmness! How unlike

The hot gales of the horrid Cyclades,

Which howl'd about my Candiote dungeon, and Made my heart sick.

Guard. I see the color comes

Back to your cheek: Heaven send you strength to bear

What more may be imposed!—I dread to think on't.

Jac. Fos. They will not banish me again?—No—

Let them wring on; I am strong yet.

Guard. And the rack will be spared you.

Jac. Fos. I confess'd

Once—twice before: both times they exiled me.

Guard. And the third time will slay you.

Jac. Fos. Let them do so,

So I be buried in my birthplace: better

Be ashes here than aught that lives elsewhere.

Guard. And can you so much love the soil which hates you?

Jac. Fos. The soil!—Oh no, it is the seed of the soil

Which persecutes me; but my native earth

Will take me as a mother to her arms.

I ask no more than a Venetian grave,

A dungeon, what they will, so it be here.

Enter an Officer

Off! Bring in the prisoner!

---

Guard. Signor, you hear the order,

Jac. Fos. Ay, I am used to such a summons: 'tis

The third time they have torture'd me—then lend me

Thine arm.

[To the Guard]

Offi. Take mine, sir; 'tis my duty to

Be nearest to your person.

Jac Fos.

You!—you are he

Who yesterday presided o'er my pangs—

Away!—I'll walk alone.

Offi. As you please, signor:

The sentence was not of my signing, but

I dared not disobey the Council when

They—

Jac. Fos. Bade thee stretch me on their harsh engine.

I pray thee touch me not—that is, just now;

The time will come they will renew that order,

But keep off from me till 'tis issued. As

I look upon thy hands my curdling limbs

Quiver with the anticipated wrenching,

And the cold drops stream through my brow, as if—

But onward—I have borne it—I can hear it.—

How looks my father?

Offi. With his wonted aspect.

Jac. Fos. So does the earth, and sky, the blue of ocean,

The brightness of our city, and her domes,

The mirth of her Piazzas, even now

Its merry hum of nations pieces here,

Even here, into these chambers of the unknown

Who govern, and the unknown and the unnumber'd

Judged and destroy'd in silence,—all things wear

The self-same aspect, to my very sire!

Nothing can sympathise with Foscarì,

Not even a Foscarì.—Sir I attend you.

[EscoNT Jacopo Foscarì, Officer, &c.]

Enter MEMMO and another Senator.

Mem. He's gone—we are too late—think you

"the Ten"

Will sit for any length of time to-day?

Sen. They say the prisoner is most obdurate.

Persisting in his first avowal; but

More I know not.

Mem. And that is much; the secrets

Of your terrible chamber are as hidden

From us, the premier nobles of the state,

As from the people.

Sen. Save the wounded rumors,

Which (like the tales of spectres that are rife

Near ruin'd buildings) never have been proved,

Nor wholly disbelieved: men know as little

Of the state's real acts as of the grave's

Unfathom'd mysteries.

Mem. But with length of time

We gain a step in knowledge, and I look Forward to be one day of the demecurs.

Sen. Or Doge?

Mem. Why, no; not if I can avoid it

Sen. 'Tis the first station of the state, and may

Be lawfully desired, and lawfully

Attain'd by noble aspirants.

Mem. To such

I leave it; though born noble, my ambition

Is limited: I'd rather be an unit

Of an united and imperial "Ten,"

Than shine a lonely, though a gilded cypher.—

Whom have we here? the wife of Foscarì?
Enter Marina, with a female Attendant.

Mar. What, no one?—I am wrong, there still are two;

But they are senators.

Mem. Most noble lady, Command us.

Mar. I command!—Alas! my life
Has been one long entreaty, and a vain one.

Mem. I understand thee, but I must not answer.

Mar. (Ferocely.) True—none dare answer here save on the rack,

Question, save those—

Mem. (interrupting her.) High-born dame! be think thee

Were thou now art

Mar. Where I now am!—It was husband's father's palace.

Mem. The Duke's palace.

Mar. And his son's prison;—true, I have not for-got it;

And if there were no other nearer, bitterer Remembrances, would thank the illustrious Memmo

For pointing out the pleasures of the place.

Mem. Be calm!

Mar. (looking up towards heaven.) I am; but oh, thou eternal God!

Canst thou continue so, with such a world?

Mem. Thy husband yet may be absolved.

Mar. He is, in Heaven. I pray you, signor senator,

Speak not of that; you are a man of office,
So is the Doge; he has a son at stake
Now, at this moment, and I have a husband,
Or had; they are there within, or were at least
An hour since, face to face, as judge and culprit;

Will he condemn him?

Mem. I trust not.

Mar. But if he does not, there are those will sentence both.

Mem. They can.

Mar. And with them power and will are one in wickedness:—my husband's lost!

Mem. Not so;

Justice is judge in Venice.

Mar. If it were so, there now would be no Venice. But let it live on, so the good die not, till the hour

Of nature's summons; but "the Ten's" is quicker,

And we must wait on't. Ah! a voice of wail!

[Exit Officer.]

Sen. Hark!

Mem. 'Twas a cry of—

No, no; not my husband's—

Not Foscari's.

Mem. The voice was—

Mar. Not his: no.

He shriek! No; that should be his father's part,
Not his—not his—he'll die in silence.

[Exit Officer.]

Mem. What!

Again?

Mar. His voice! it seem'd so: I will not Believe it. Should he shriek, I cannot cease
To love; but — no — no — no — it must have been
A fearful pang, which wrung a groan from him.

Sen. And, feeling for thy husband's wrongs,
Wouldest thou

Have him bear more than mortal pain, in silence?

Mar. We all must bear our tortures. I have not

Left barren the great house of Foscari,
Though they sweep both the Doge and son from life;
I have endured as much in giving life
To those who will succeed them, as they can
In leaving it: but mine were joyful pangs;
And yet they wrung me till I could have shriek'd
But did not, for my hope was to bring forth
Heroes, and would not welcome them with tears.

Mem. All's silent now.

Mar. Perhaps all's over; but

I will not deem it: he hath served Himself,
And now defies them.

Enter an Officer hastily.

Mem. How now, friend, what seek you?

Offi. A leech. The prisoner has fainted.

[Exit Officer.]

Mem. 'Twere better to retire.

Sen. (offering to assist her.) I pray thee do so.

Mar. Off! I will tend him.

Mem. You! Remember, lady.

Ingress is given to none within those chambers,

Except "the Ten," and their familiars.

Mar. Well, I know that none who enter there return

As they have enter'd—many never; but

They shall not balk my entrance.

Mem. Alas! this Is but to expose yourself to harsh repulse,

And worse suspense.

Mar. Who shall oppose me?

Mem. They Whose duty 'tis to do so.

Mar. 'Tis their duty

To trample on all human feelings, all Ties which bind man to man, to emulate

The fiends, who will one day requite them in Variety of torturing! Yet I'll pass.

Mem. It is impossible.

Mar. That shall be tried Despair defies even despotism: there is

That in my heart would make its way through hosts With levell'd spears; and think you a few jailers

Shall put me from my path? Give me, then, way

This is the Doge's palace; I am wife
Of the Duke's son, the innocent Duke's son, And they shall hear this!

Mem. It will only serve

More to exasperate his judges.

Mar. What

Are judges who give way to anger? they Who do so are assassins. Give me way.

[Exit Marina.]

Sen. Poor lady!

Mem. 'Tis mere desperation; she Will not be admitted o'er the threshold.

Sen. And Even if she be so, cannot save her husband. But, see, the officer returns.

[The Officer passes over the stage with another person]

Mem. I hardly Thought that "the Ten" had even this touch of pity Or would permit assistance to the sufferer.

Sen. I ty! Is't pity to recall to feeling

The wret' h too happy to escape to death By the compassionate trance, poor nature's last Resource against the tyranny of pain?
Mem. I marvel they condemn him not at once.

Sen. That's not their policy; they'd have him live.

Because he fears not death; and banish him,
Because all earth, except his native land,
To him is one wide prison, and each breath
Of foreign air he draws seems a slow poison,
Consuming but not killing.

Mem.     Circumstance

Confirms his crimes, but he avows them not.

Sen. None, save the letter, which he says was written

Address'd to Milan's duke, in the full knowledge
That it would fall into the senate's hands,
And thus he should be reconveyed to Venice.

Mem. But as a culprit.

Sen. Yes, but to his country;
And that was all he sought, so he avouches.

Mem. The accusation of the bribes was proved.

Sen. Not clearly, and the charge of homicide
Has been annul'd by the death-bed confession
Of Nicolas Erizzo, who slew the late
Chief of "the Ten."

Mem. Then why not clear him?

Sen. They ought to answer; for it is well known
That Almoro Donato, as I said, was slain by Erizzo for private vengeance.

Mem. There must be more in this strange process than

The apparent crimes of the accused disclose—
But here come two of "the Ten"; let us retire.

[Exeunt MEMO and SENATOR.]

Exeunt LOREDANO and BARBARINO.

Bar. (addressing Lor.) That were too much, believe me, twas not meet
The trial should go further at this moment.

Lor. And so the Council must break up, and Justice
Pause in her full career, because a woman
Breaks in on our deliberations?

Bar. No,

That's not the cause; you saw the prisoner's state.

Lor. And had he not recover'd?

Bar. To relapse
Upon the least renewal.

Lor. Twas not tried.

Bar. 'Tis vain to murmur; the majority
In council were against you.

Lor. Thanks to you, sir,

And the old ducal dotard, who combined
The worthy voices which o'erruled my own.

Bar. I am a judge; but must confess that part
Of our stern duty, which prescribes the Question,
And bids us sit and see its sharp infliction,
Makes me wish

Lor. What?

Bar. That you would sometimes feel,

As I do always.

Lor. Go to, you're a child,
Infirm of feeling as of purpose, blown
About by every breath, shock by a sigh,
And melted by a tear—a precious judge
For Venice! and a worthy statesman? be partner in my policy!

Bar. He shed
40 tears

Lor. He crie: out twice.

Bar. A sain' had done so, now, or postpone it till to-morrow?

Even with the crown of glory in his eye,
At such inhuman artefact of pain
As was forced on him; but he did not cry
For pity; not a word nor groan escaped him,
And those two shrieks were not in supplication,
But wrung from pangs, and follow'd by no prayers.

Lor. He mutter'd many times between his teeth
But inarticulately.

Bar. That I heard not,
You stood more near him.

Lor. I did so.

Bar. Methought,
To my surprise too, you were touch'd with mercy,
And were the first to call out for assistance
When he was failing.

Lor. I believed that scon

His last.

Bar. And have I not oft heard thee name
His and his father's death your nearest wish?

Lor. If he dies innocent, that is to say,
With his guilt unavow'd, he'll be lamented.

Bar. What, wouldst thou slay his memory?

Lor. Wouldst thou have

His state descend to his children, as it must,
If he die unattainted?

Bar. War with them too?

Lor. With all their house, till theirs or mine are nothing.

Bar. And the deep agony of his pale wife,
And the repress'd convulsion of the high
And princely brow of his old father, which Broke forth in a slight shuddering, though rarely,
Or in some clammy drops, soon wiped away
In stern serenity; these moved you not?

[Exit LOREDANO]

He's silent in his hate, as Foscarì
Was in his suffering; and the poor wretch moved me
More by his silence than a thousand outcry's
Could have affected. 'Twas a dreadful sight
When his distracted wife broke through into
The hall of our tribunal, and beheld
What we could scarcely look upon, long used
To such sights. I must think no more of this Lest I forget in this compassion for
Our foes their former injuries, and lose
The hold of vengeance Loredano plans
For him and me; but mine would be content
With lesser retribution than he thirsts for,
And I would mitigate his deeper hatred
To milder thoughts; but for the present, Foscarì
Has a short hourly respite, granted at
The instance of the elders of the Council,
Moved doubtless by his wife's appearance in
The hall, and his own sufferings. —Lo! they come
How feeble and forlorn! I cannot bear
To look on them again in this extremity:
I'll hence, and try to soften Loredano.

[Exit BARBARINO]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

A Hall in the Doge's Palace

The Doge and a Senator.

Sen. Is it your pleasure to sign the report

Now, or postpone it till to-morrow?
THE TWO FOSCARI.

Dog. I overlook'd it yesterday: it wants
Men't the signature. Give me the pen—

[The Doge sits down and signs the paper.

There, signor.

Sen. (looking at the paper.) You have forgot; it is not sign'd.

Dog. Not sign'd? Ah, I perceive my eyes begin
To wax more weak with age. I did not see
That I had dipp'd the pen without effect.

Sen. (dipping the pen into the ink, and placing the paper before the Doge.) Your hand, too, shakes, my lord: allow me, thus—

Dog. 'Tis done, I thank you.

Sen. Thus the act confirm'd
By you and by the "Ten," gives peace to Venice.

Dog. 'Tis long since she enjoy'd it: may it be
As long ere she resume her arms!

Sen. Thirty-four years of nearly ceaseless warfare
With the Turk, or the powers of Italy;
The state had need of some repose.

Dog. No doubt: I found her queen of ocean, and I leave her
Lady of Loubardy: it is a comfort
That I have added to her diadem
The gems of Breccia and Ravenna; Crema
And Bergamo no less are hers; her realm
By law has grown by thus much in my reign,
While her sea-sway has not shrunk.

Sen. 'Tis most true, and merits all our country's gratitude.

Dog. Perhaps so.

Sen. Which should be made manifest.

Dog. I have not complain'd, sir.

Sen. My good lord, forgive me.

Dog. For what?

Sen. My heart bleeds for you.

Dog. For me, signor?

Sen. And for your—

Dog. Stop! It must have way, my lord.

I have too many duties towards you
And all your house, for past and present kindness,
Not to feel deeply for your son.

Dog. Was this
In your commission?

Sen. What, my lord?

Dog. This prattle
Of things you know not: but the treaty's signed;
Return with it to them who sent you.

Sen. I Obey. I had in charge, too, from the Council
That you would fix an hour for their reunion.

Dog. Say, when they will—now, even at this moment,
If it so please them I am the state's servant.

Sen. They would cord some time for your repose.

Dog. I have no pose, that is, none which shall cause
The loss of an hour's time unto the state.
Let them meet when they will, I shall be found
Where I should be, and what I have been ever.

[Exit Senator.

Enter an Attendant.

Att. Prince

Dog. Say on.

Att. The illustrious lady Foscari
Requests an audience.

Dog. Bid her enter. Poor Marina!

[Enter Attendant with letter.

Mar. I have ventured, father, on Your privacy.

Dog. I have none from you, my child.
Command my time, when not commanded by
The state.

Mar. I wish'd to speak to you of him.

Dog. Your husband?

Mar. And your son.

Dog. Proceed, my daughter!

Mar. I had obtain'd permission from the "Ten"
To attend my husband for a limited number
Of hours.

Dog. You had so.

Mar. 'Tis revoked.

Dog. By whom?

Mar. "The Ten."—When we had reach'd "the Bridge of Sighs,"

Which I prepared to pass with Foscari,
The gloomy guardian of that passage first Demurr'd: a messenger was sent back to
"The Ten;" but as the court no longer sate,
And no permission had been given in writing,
I was thrust back, with the assurance that
Until that high tribunal had reassembled,
The dungeon walls would still divide us.

Dog. True, the form has been omitted in the haste
With which the court adjourn'd, and till it meets,
'Tis dubious.

Mar. Till it meets! and when it meets,
They'll torture him again; and he and I
Must purchase by renewal of the rack
The interview of husband and of wife,
The holiest tie beneath the heavens—Oh God!
Dost thou see this?

Dog. Child—child—

Mar. (abruptly.) Call me not "child!"
You soon will have no children—you deserve none—
You, who can talk thus calmly of a son
In circumstances which would call forth tears
Of blood from Spartans! Though these did not weep
Their boys who died in battle, is it written
That they beheld them perish piecemeal, nor Stretch'd forth a hand to save them?

Dog. You behold me:
I cannot weep—I would I could; but if
Each white hair on this head were a young life,
This ducal cap the diadem of earth,
This ducal ring with which I wed the waves
A talisman to still them—I'd give all
For him.

Mar. With less he surely might be saved.

Dog. That answer only shows you know no
Venice.

Alas! how should you? she knows not herself,
In all her mystery. Hear me—they who aim
At Foscari, aim no less at his father;
The sire's destruction would not save the son;
They work by different means to the same end,
And that is—but they have not conquer'd yet.

Mar. But they have crush'd.

Dog. Nor crush'd as yet—I live.
Mar. And your son,—how long will he live?
Doge. I trust,
For all that yet is past, as many years
And happier than his father. The rash boy
With womanish impatience to return,
Hath ruin'd all by that detected letter:
A high crime which I neither can deny
Nor palliate, as parent or as Duke:
Had he but borne a little, little longer
His Canioto exile, I had hopes—he has quench'd them—

He must return.
Mar. To exile?
Doge. I have said it.
Mar. And can I not go with him?
Doge. You well know,
This prayer of yours was twice denied before
By the assembled "Ten," and hardly now
Will be accorded to a third request,
Since aggravated errors on the part
Of your lord renders them still more austere.

Mar. Austere? Atrocius! The old human fiends,
With one foot in the grave, with dim eyes, strange
To tears save drops of dotage, with long white
And scanty hairs, and shaking hands, and heads
As palsied as their hearts are hard, they council,
Cabal, and put men's lives out, as if life
Were no more than the feelings long extinguish'd
In their accursed bosoms.

Doge. You know not—
Mar. I do—I do—and so should you, methinks—
That these are demons: could it be else that Men, who have been of women born and suckled—
Who have loved, or talk'd at least of love—have Given
Their hands in sacred vows—have danced their babes
Upon their knees, perhaps have mournd' above them
In pain, in peril, or in death—who are,
Or were at least in seeming human, could
Do so they have done by yours, and you yourself,
You, who abet them?

Doge. I forgive this, for
You know not what you say.

Mar. You know it well,
And feel it nothing.

Doge. I have borne so much,
That words have ceased to shake me.

Mar. Oh, no doubt
You have seen your son's blood flow, and your flesh
Shook not;
And after that what are a woman's words?
No more than woman's tears, that should they shake you.

Doge. Woman, this clamorous grief of thine, I tell thee,
Is no more in the balance weigh'd with that
Which—but I pity thee, my poor Marina!

Mar. Pity my husband, or I cast it from me;
Pity thy son! Thou pity!—'tis a word
Strange to thy heart—how came it on thy lips?
Doge. I must bear these reproaches, though they Wrong me.

Couldst thou but read—

Mar. 'Tis not upon thy brow,
Nor in thine eyes, nor in thine acts,—where then
Should I behold this sympathy! or shall?

Doge. (pointing downwards.) There!

Mar. In the earth?

Doge. To which I am tending: when

It lies upon this heart, 'tis lighter, though
Loaded with marble, than the thoughts which press
it
Now, you will know me better.

Mar. Indeed, thus to be pitied?

Doge. Pity'd! None shall Ever use that base word, with which men
Cloak their soul's hoarded triumph, as a fit one
To mingle with my name: that name shall be,
As far as I have borne it, what it was
When I received it.

Mar. But for the poor children
Of him thou canst not, or thou wilt not save,
You were the last to bear it.

Doge. Would it were so.
Better for him he never had been born,
Better for me,—I have seen our house dishonor'd.

Mar. That's false! a truer, nobler, truster heart,
More loving, or more loyal, never beat
Within a human breast. I would not change
My exiled, persecuted, mangled husband,
Oppress'd but not disgraced, crush'd, overwhelmed,
Alive, or dead, for prince or paladin
In story or in fable, with a world
To back his suit. Dishonor'd!—he dishonor'd!
I tell thee, Doge, 'tis Venice is dishonor'd;
His name shall be her foulest, worst reproach,
For what he suffers, not for what he did.
'Tis ye who are all traitors, tyrant—ye!
Did you but love your country like this victim
Who totters back in chains to tortures, and Submits to all things rather than to exile,
You'd fling yourselves before him, and implore
His grace for your enormous guilt.

Doge. Hu was Indeed all you have said. I better bore
The deaths of the two sons Heaven took from me
Than Jacopo's disgrace.

Mar. That word again?

Doge. Has he not been condemn'd?

Mar. Is none but guilt so?

Doge. Time may restore his memory—I would hope so.

He was my pride, my—but 'tis useless now—
I am not given to tears, but wept for joy
When he was born; those drops were ominous

Mar. I say he's innocent! And were he not so,
Is our own blood and kin to shrink from us
In fatal moments?

Doge. I shrink not from him:
But I have other duties than a father's;
The state would not dispense me from those duties;
Twice I demanded it, but was refused:
They must then be fulfill'd.

Enter an Attendant.

Att. A message from

"The Ten."

Doge. Who bears it?

Att. le Lorelano.

Doge. He—he admit him. [Exit Attendant.

Mar. Must I then retire?

Doge. Perhaps it is not requisite, if this Concerns your husband, and if not—Well, signor,
Your pleasure! To Lorelano entering

Lor. I bear that of "the Ten."

Doge. They

Have chosen well their envoy.
"Tis their choice

Lor.
Which leads me here.

Doge.
It does their wisdom honor,

And no less to their courtesy.—Proceed.

Lor.
We have decided.

Doge.
We?

Lor.
"The Ten" in council.

Doge.
What! have they met again, and met without

Apprising me?

Lor.
They wish'd to spare your feelings, no less than age.

Doge.
That's new—when spared they either? I thank them, notwithstanding.

Lor.
You know well

That they have power to act at their discretion,

With or without the presence of the Doge.

Doge.
"Tis some years since I learn'd this, long before

I became Doge, or dream'd of such advancement.

You need not school me, signor: I sate in

That council when you were a young patrician.

Lor.
True, in my father's time; I have heard him and

The admiral, his brother, say as much.

Your highness may remember them; they both

Died suddenly.

Doge.
And if they did so, better /

So die than to be on lingeringly in pain.

Lor.
No doubt; yet most men like to live their days out.

Doge.
And did not they?

Lor.
The grave knows best: they died,

As I said, suddenly.

Doge.
Is that so strange,

That you repeat the word emphatically?

Lor.
So far from strange, that never was there death

In my mind half so natural as theirs.

Think you not so?

Doge.
What should I think of mortals?

Lor.
That they have mortal foes.

Doge.
I understand you;

Your sires were mine, and you are heir in all things.

Lor.
You best know if I should be so.

Doge.
I do.

Your fathers were my foes, and I have-heard

Foul rumors were abroad; I have also read

Their epitaph, attributing their deaths

To poison. "Tis perhaps as true as most

Inscriptions upon tombs, and yet no less

A fable.

Lor.
Who dare say so?

Doge.
I!—"Tis true.

Your fathers were mine enemies, as bitter

As their son e'er can be, and I no less

Was theirs; but I was openly their foe:

I never work'd by plot in council, nor

Cabal in commonwealth, nor secret means

Of practice against life by steel or drug.

The proof is, your existence.

Lor.
I fear not.

Doge.
You have no cause, being what I am; but

I that you would have me thought, you long ere now

Were past the sense of fear. Hate on; I care not.

Lor.
I never yet knew that a noble's life

In Venice had to dread a Doge's frown,

That is, by open means.

Doge.
But I, good signor,

Am, or at least was, more than a mere duke,

In blood, in mind, in means; and that they know

Who dreaded to elect me, and have since

Striven all they dare to weigh me down: be sure,

Before or since that period, had I held you

At so much price as to require your absence,

A word of mine had set such spirits to work

As would have made you nothing. But in all things

I have observed the strictest reverence;

Not for the laws alone, for those you have strain'd

(I do not speak of you but as a single Voice of the many) somewhat beyond what

I could enforce for my authority,

Were I disposed to brawl; but, as I said,

I have observed with veneration, like

A priest's for the high altar, even unto

The sacrifice of my own blood and quiet,

Safety, and all save honor, the decrees,

The health, the pride, and welfare of the state.

And now, sit, to your business.

Lor.
"Tis decreed.

That, without further repetition of

The Question, or continuance of the trial,

Which only tends to show how stubborn guilt is,

(\"The Ten,\" dispensing with the stricter law

Which still prescribes the Question, till a full

Confession, and the prisoner partly having

Avow'd his crime in not denying that

The letter to the Duke of Milan's his,) JAMES FOSCAI return to banishment,

And sail in the same galley which convey'd him.

Mar.
Thank God! At least they will not drag him more

Before that horrible tribunal. Would he

But think so, to my mind the happiest doom,

Not he alone, but all who dwell here, could

Desire, were to escape from such a land.

Doge.
That is not a Venetian thought, my daughter.

Mar.
No, 'twas too human. May I share his exile?

Lor.
Of this "the Ten" said nothing.

Mar.
So I thought.

That were too human, also. But it was not Inhibited?

Lor.
It was not named.

Mar.
(to the Doge.)

Then, father,

Surely you can obtain or grant me thus much:

[To LORDAR.

And you, sir, not oppose my prayer to be Permitted to accompany my husband.

Doge.
I will endeavor.

Mar.
And you, signor?

Lor.
Lady

"Tis not for me to anticipate the pleasure

Of the tribunal.

Mar.
Pleasure! what a word

To use for the decrees of——

Doge.
Daughter, know you

In what a presence you pronounce these things?

Mar.
A prince's and his subject's.

Lor.
Subject! Oh

It galls you:—well, you are his equal, as

You think; but that you are not, nor would be.

Were he a peasant:—well, then, you're a prince.

A princely noble; and what then am I?

Lor.
The offspring of a noble house.
And wedded

To one as noble. What or whose, then is
The presence that should silence my free thoughts?

LOR. The presence of your husband's judges.

DOGE. And false, and hollow—clay from first to last,
The prince's urn no less than potter's vessel.
Our fame is in men's breath, our lives upon
Less than their breath; our durance upon days,
Our days on seasons; our whole being on Something which is not us!—So, we are slaves.
The greatest as the meanest—nothing rests
Upon our will; the will itself no less
Depends upon a straw than on a storm;
And when we think we lead, we are most led,
And still towards death, a thing which comes so much
Without our act or choice as birth, so that
Methinks we must have sinn'd in some old world,
And this is hell: the best is, that it is not Eternal.

MAR. These are things we cannot judge
On earth.

DOGE. And how then shall we judge each other
Who are all earth, and I, who am call'd upon
To judge my son? I have administer'd
My country faithully—victoriously—
I dare them to the proof, the chart of what
She was and is: my reign has doubled realms;
And, in reward, the gratitude of Venice
Has left, or is about to leave, me single.

MAR. And Foscari? I do not think of such things,
So I be left with him.

DOGE. You shall be so:
Thick much they cannot well deny.

MAR. And if
They should, I will fly with him.

DOGE. That can no't be.

MAR. I know not, reck no't—
To Syria, Egypt, to the Ottoman—
Any where, where we might respire unfetter'd,
And live nor girt by spiles, nor liable
To edicts of inquisitors of state.

DOGE. What, wouldnst thou have a refuge for
The husband,
And turn him into traitor?

MAR. He is none!
The country is the traitress, which thrusts forth
Her best and bravest from her. Tyranny
Is far the worst of treasons. Dost thou deem None rebels except subjects? The prince who Neglects or violates his trust is more
A brigand than the robber-chief.

DOGE. I cannot
Charge me with such a breach of faith.

MAR. No; thou
Observe'st, obey'st, such laws as make old Draco's
A code of mercy by comparison.

DOGE. I found the law; I did not make it. Were I
A subject, still I might find parts and portions Fit for amendment; but as prince, I never Would change, for the sake of my house, the charter
Left by our fathers.

MAR. Did they make 't for
The ruin of their children?

DOGE. Under such laws, Venice
Has risen to what she is—a state to gival
In deeds, and days, and sway, and, let me add,
In glory, (for we have had Roman spirits
Among us,) all that history has bequethed
Of Rome and Carthage in their best times, when
The people sway'd by senates.

MAR. Rather say
THE TWO FOSCARIS.

ACT III.

SCENE I.

The Prison of Jacopo Foscarì.

JAC. FOS. (solo.) No light, save you faint gleam, which shows me walls
Which never echo'd but to sorrow's sounds,
The sigh of long imprisonment, the step
Of feet on which the iron clank'd, the groan
Of death, the imprecation of despair!
And yet for this I have return'd to Venice,
With some faint hope, 'tis true, that time, which wears
The marble down, had worn away the hate
Of men's hearts, but I knew them not, and here
Must I consume my own, which never beat
For Venice but with such a yearning as
The dove has for her distant nest, when wheeiling
High in the air on her return to greet
Her callow brood. What letters are these which [Approaching the wall.

Are sorrow'd along the inexorable wall?
Will the c'sean let me trace them? Ah! the name
Of my sad predecessors, in this place,
The dates of their despair, the brief words of
A grief too great for many. This stone page
Holds like an epitaph their history,
And the poor captive's tale is graven on
His dungeon barrier, like the lover's record
Upon the bark of some tall tree, which bears
His own and his beloved's name. Alas!
I recognize some names familiar to me,
And blighted like to mine, which I will add,
Fittest for such a chronicle as this,
Which only can be read, as writ, by wretches.
[He engraves his name.

Enter a Familiar of "the Ten."

FAM. I bring you food.

JAC. FOS. (after drinking.) I thank you: I am better.

FAM. I am commanded to inform you
That your further trial is postponed.

JAC. FOS. Ah! they relent, then—I had ceased to hope it:
'Twas time.

FAM. (Enact.) Enter MARINA.

JAC. FOS. Wouldst thou share a dungeon?

MAR. My best beloved!

JAC. FOS. (embracing her.) My true wife,
And only friend! What happiness!
We'll part
No more.

JAC. FOS. How! wouldst thou share a dungeon?

MAR. Ay, the rack, the grave, all—anything with thee,
But the tomb last of all, for there we shall Be ignorant of each other, yet I will Share that—all things except new separation;
It is too much to have survived the first.
How dost thou? How are those worn limbs? Alas!
Why do I ask? Thy paleness—

JAC. FOS. 'Tis the joy
Of seeing thee again so soon, and so
Without expectancy, has sent the blood
Back to my heart, and left my cheeks like thine.
For thou art pale, too, my Marina.

MAR. 'Tis
The gloom of this eternal cell, which never Knew sunbeam, and the sallow sullen glare
Of the familiar's torch, which seems akin
To darkness more than light, by lending to
The dungeon vaporits bituminous smoke,
Which cloud what'er we gaze on, even thine eyes—
No, not thine eyes—they sparkle—how they sparkle!

JAC. FOS. And thine?—but I am blinded by the torch.

MAR. As I had been without it. Couldst thou see here?

JAC. FOS. Nothing at first; but use and time has taught me
Familiarity with what was darkness;
And the gray twilight of such glimmerings as
Glide through the crevices made by the winds.
Was kinder to mine eyes than the full sun,
When gorgeously o'er-gilding any towers
Save those of Venice; but a moment ere
Thou cam'st hither I was busy writing.

Mar. Y' What?

Jac. Fos. My name: look, 'tis there—recorded
The name of him who here preceded me,
If dungeon dates say true.

Mar. And what of him?

Jac. Fos. These walls are silent of men's ends;
they only
Seem to hint shrewdly of them. Such stern walls
Were never piled on high save o'er the dead,
Or those who soon must be so—What of him?
Thou ask'st.—What of me? may soon be ask'd,
With the like answer—doubt and dreadful surmise—
Unless thou tell'st my tale.

Mar. I speak of thee!

Jac. Fos. And wherefore not? All then shall speak of me:
The tyranny of silence is not lasting,
And, though events be hidden, just men's groans
Will burst all cement, even a living grave's!
I do not doubt my memory, but my life;
And neither do I fear.

Mar. Thy life is safe.

Jac. Fos. And liberty?

Mar. The mind should make its own.

Jac. Fos. That has a noble sound; but 'tis a sound,
A music most impressive, but too transient:
The mind is much, but is not all. The mind
Hath nerv'd me to endure the risk of death,
And torture positive, far worse than death,
(If death be a deep sleep,) without a groan,
Or with a cry which rather shamed my judges
Than me; but 'tis not all, for there are things
More woful, such as this small dungeon, where
I may breathe many years.

Mar. Alas! and this Small dungeon is all that belongs to thee
Of this wide realm, of which thy sire is prince.

Jac. Fos. That thought would scarcely aid me to endure it.
My doom is common, many are in dungeons,
But none like mine, so near their father's palace;
But then my heart is sometimes high, and hope
Will stream along those moted rays of light
Peopled with dusty atoms, which afford
Our only day; for, save the jailor's torch,
And a strange fire-fly, which was quickly caught
Last night in yon enormous spider's net,
I ne'er saw aught here like a ray. Alas!
I know if mind may bear us up, or no,
For I have such, and shown it before men;
It slaks in solitude: my soul is social.

Mar. I will be with thee.

Jac. Fos. Ah! if it were so!
But that they never granted—nor will grant,
And I shall be alone: no men—no books—
Those lying likenesses of lying men.
I ask'd for even those outlines of their kind,
Which they term annals, history, what you will,
Which men bequeath as portraits, and they were Refused me, so these walls have been my study,
More faithful pictures of Venetian story,
With all their blank, or dismal stains, than is
The hall not: far from hence, which bears on high

Hundreds of dogs, and their deeds and dates

Mar. I come to tell thee the result of their Last council on thy doom.

Jac. Fos. I know it—look!

[He points to his limbs, as referring to the toes which he had undergone.

Mar. No—no—no more of that: even they relen
From that atrocity.

Jac. Fos. What then?

Mar. That you
Return to Candia.

Jac. Fos. Then my last hope's gone.
I could endure my dungeon, for 'twas Venice;
I could support the torture, there was something
In my native air that buoy'd my spirits up
Like a ship on the ocean toss'd by storms,
But proudly still bestriding the high waves,
And holding on its course; but there, afar,
In that accursed isle of slaves, and captives,
And unbelievers, like a stranded wreck,
My very soul seem'd mouldering in my bosom,
And piecemeal I shall perish, if remanded.

Mar. And here?

Jac. Fos. At once—by better means, as briefer
What? would they even deny me sire's sepulchre,
As well as home and heritage?

Mar. My husband! I have sued to accompany thee hence,
And not so hopelessly. This love of thine
For an ungrateful and tyrannic soil
Is passion, and not patriotism; for me,
So I could see thee with a quiet aspect,
And the sweet freedom of the earth and air,
I would not cavil about climes or regions,
This crowd of palaces and prisons is not
A paradise; its first inhabitants
Were wretched exiles.

Jac. Fos. Well I know now wretched!

Mar. And yet you see how from their banishment
Before the Tartar into these salt isles,
Their antique energy of mind, all that
Remain'd of Rome for their inheritance,
Created by degrees an ocean-Rome;
And shall an evil, which so often leads
To good, depress thee thus?

Jac. Fos. Had I gone forth
From my own land, like the old patriarchs, seeking
Another region, with their flocks and herds,
Had I been cast out like the Jews from Zion,
Or like our fathers, driven by Attila
From fertile Italy, to barren islets,
I would have given some tears to my late country,
And many thoughts; but afterwards address'd
Myself, with those about me, to create
A new home and fresh state: perhaps I could
Have borne this—though I know not.

Mar. Wherefore unt
It was the lot of millions, and must be
The fate of myriads more.

Jac. Fos. Ay—we but hear
Of the survivors' toil in their new lands,
Their numbers and success; but who can number
The hearts which broke in silence at that parting
Or after their departure; of that malady *
Which calls up green and native fields to view
From the rough deep, with such identity
To the poor exile's fever'd eye, that he

* The coloures.
Can scarcely be restrained from treading them?
That melody, which out of tones and tunes
Collects such pasture for the longing sorrow
Of the sad mountaineer, when far away
From his snow canopy of cliffs and clouds,
That he feeds on the sweet, but poisonous thought,
And dies. You call this weakness! It is strength, say—the parent of all honest feeling.
He who loves not his country, can love nothing.
Mar. Obey her, then: 'tis she that puts thee forth.
Jac. Fos. Ay, there it is; 'tis like a mother's curse
Upon my soul—the mark is set upon me.
he exiles you speak of went forth by nations,
'eer hands upheld each other by the way,
Their tents were pitch'd together—I'm alone.
Mar. You shall be so no more—I will go with thee.
Jac. Fos. My best Marina!—and our children?
Mar. They,
I fear, by the prevention of the state's Abhorrent policy, (which holds all ties
As threads, which may be broken at her pleasure,)
Will not be suffer'd to proceed with us.
Jac. Fos. And canst thou leave them?
Mar. Yes. With many a pang.
But—I can leave them, children as they are,
To teach you to be less a child. From this
Learn you to sway your feelings, when exacted
By duties paramount; and 'tis our first
On earth to bear.
Jac. Fos. Have I not borne?
Mar. Too much
From tyrannous injustice, and enough
To teach you not to shrink now from a lot,
Which, as compared with what you have undergone
Of late, is mercy.
Jac. Fos. Ah! you never yet
Were far away from Venice, never saw
Her beautiful towers in the receding distance,
While every furrow of the vessel's track
Seem'd ploughing deep into your heart; you never Saw day go down upon your native spires
So calmly with its gold and crimson glory,
And after dreaming a disturbed vision
Of them and theirs, awoke and found them not.
Mar. I will divide this with you. Let us think
Of our departure from this much-loved city,
(Since you must love it as it seems,) and this Chamber of state, her gratitude allots you.
Our children will be cared for by the Doge,
And by my uncles: we must sail ere night.
Jac. Fos. That's sudden. Shall I not behold my father?
Mar. You will.
Jac. Fos. Where?
Mar. Here or in the ducal chamber—
He said not which. I would that you could bear
Your exile as he bears it.
Jac. Fos. Blame him not.
I sometimes murmur for a moment: but
He could not now act otherwise. A show
Of feeling or compassion on his part
Would have but drawn upon his aged head
Suspicion from "the Ten," and upon mine,
Accumulated ills.
Mar. Accumulated!
What pangs are those they have spared you?
Jac. Fos. That of leaving
Venice without beholding him or you,
Which might have been forbidden now, as twas
Upon my former exile.
Mar. That is true,
And thus far I am also the state's debtor,
And shall be more so when I see us both
Floating on the free wave—away—away—
Be it to the earth's end, from this abhor'd,
Unjust, and—
Jac. Fos. Curse it not. If I am silent,
Who dares accuse my country?
Mar. Men and Angels
The blood of myriads reeking up to heaven,
The groans of slaves in chains, and men in dungeons
Mothers, and wives, and sons, and sires, and subjects,
Held in the bondage of ten bald-heads; and Though last, not least, thy silence. Couldst thou say
Aught in its favor, who would praise like thee?
Jac. Fos. Let us address us then, since so it must be,
To our departure. Who comes here?
Enter Loredano, attended by Familiaris.
Lor. (to the Familiaris.) Retire,
But leave the torch. (Excuse the two Familiaris)
Jac. Fos. Most welcome, noble signor
I did not deem this poor place could have drawn
Such presence hither.
Lor. 'Tis not the first time
I have visited these places.
Mar. Nor would be
The last, were all men's merits well rewarded
Came you here to insult us, or remain
As spy upon us, or as hostage for us?
Lor. Neither are of my office, noble lady
I am sent hither to your husband, to Announce "the Ten's" decree.
Mar. That tenderness
Has been anticipated: it is known.
Lor. As how?
Mar. I have inform'd him, not so gentry,
Doubtless, as your nice feelings would prescribe,
The indulgence of your colleagues; but he knew it
If you come for our thanks, take them, and hence
The dungeon gloom is deep enough without you,
And full of reptiles, not less loathsome, though
Their sting is honest.
Jac. Fos. I pray you, look at me
What can avail such words?
Mar. To let him know
That he is known.
Lor. Let the fair dame preserve
Her sex's privilege.
Mar. I have some sons, sir,
Will one day thank you better.
Lor. You do well
To nurse them wisely. Foscarini—you know
Your sentence, then?
Jac. Fos. Return to Candia?
Lor. True—
For life.
Jac. Fos. Not long.
Lor. I said—for life.
Jac. Fos. And I
Repeat—not long.
Lor. A year's imprisonment
In Carcer—afterwards the freedom of The whole isle.

Jac. Fos. Both the same to me; the after Freedom as is the first imprisonment. Is't true my wife accompanies me?

Lor. Yes, she so wills it.

Mar. Who obtain'd that justice?

Lor. One who wars not with women.

Mar. But oppress;

Men: howsoever let him have my thanks For the only boon I would have asked or taken From him or such as he is.

Lor. He receives them As they are offer'd.

Mar. May they thrive with him So much!—no more.

Jac. Fos. Is this, sir, your whole mission, Because we have brief: time for preparation, And you perceive your presence doth disquiet This lady, of a house noble as yours.

Mar. Nobler!

Lor. How nobler?

Mar. As more generous! We say the "generous stem" to express the purity Of his high blood. Thus much I've learnt, although Venetian, (who see few steeds save of bronze,) From those Venetians who have skimm'd the coasts Of Egypt, and her neighbor Araby: And why not say as soon the "generous man?" If race be aught, it is in qualities More than in years; and mine, which is as old As yours, is better in its product, say— Look not so stern—but get you back, and pore Upon your genealogic trees most green Of leaves and most mature of fruits, and there Blush to find ancestors, who would have blush'd For such a son—thou cold inveterate hater!

Jac. Fos. Again, Marina!

Mar. Again! still, Marina!

See you not, he comes here to glut his hate With a last look upon our misery? Let him partake it!

Jac. Fos. That were difficult.

Mar. Nothing more easy. He partakes it now— Ay, he may veil beneath a marble brow And sneering lip the pang, but he partakes it. A few brief words of truth shame the devil's servants No less than master; I have prob'd his soul A moment, as the eternal fire, ere long, Will reach it always. See how he shrinks from me! With death, and chains, and exile in his hand To scatter o'er his kind as he thinks fit: They are his weapons, not his armor, for I have pierced him to the core of his cold heart. I care not for his frowns! We can but die, And he but live, for him the very worst Of destinies; each day secures him more His temp'ler's.

Jac. Fos. This is mere insanity.

Mar. It may be so; and who hath made us mad?

Lor. Let her go on; it irks not me.

Mar. That's false!

You came here to enjoy a heartless triumph Of cold looks upon manifold griefs! You came To be seduced to vain—to mark our tears, And hoard our groans—to gaze upon the wreck Which you have made a prince's son—my husband; In short, to trample on the fallen—an office The hangman shrinks from, as all men from him!

How have you sped? We are wretched, signor; Your plots could make, and vengeance could deserve us, And how feel you?

Lor. As rocks.

Mar. By thunder blasted. They feel not, but no less are shiver'd. Come, Foscari; now let us go, and leave this felon, The sole fit habitant of such a cell, Which he has peopled often, but ne'er fitly Till he himself shall brood in it alone.

Enter the Dux.

Jac. Fos. My father!

Doge, (embracing him.) Jacopo! my son—my son. Jac. Fos. My father still! How long it is since! Have heard thee name my name—our name!

Doge. My boy! Couldst thou but know

Jac. Fos. I rarely, sir, have murmur'd.

Doge. I feel too much thou hast not.

Mar. Doge, look there!

[She points to Loredano.]

Doge. Daughter, it is superfurious; I have long Known Loredano.

Lor. You may know him better.

Mar. Yes; worse he could not.

Jac. Fos. Father, let not these Our parting hours be lost in listening to Reproachses, which boot nothing. Is it—is it, Indeed, our last of meetings?

Doge. You behold These white hairs!

Jac. Fos. And I feel, besides, that mine Will never be so white. Embrace me, father! I loved you ever—never more than now. Look to my children—to your last child's children Let them be all to you which he was once, And never be to you what I am now.

May I not see them also?

Mar. No—not here.

Jac. Fos. They might behold their parent any where.

Mar. I would that they beheld their father in A place which would not mingle fear with love, To freeze their young blood in its natural current They have fed well, slept soft, and knew not that Their sire was a mere hunted outlaw. Well, I know his fate may one day be their heritage, But let it only be their heritage, And not their present fee. Their senses, though Alive to love are yet awake to terror; And these "chains, too, and thou thick green waves Which floats above the place where we now stand— A cell so far below the water's level, Sending its pestilence through every crevice, Might strike them: this is not their atmosphere However you—and you—and, most of all, As worthiest—you, sir, noble Loredano!
May breathe it without prejudice.

Jac. Fos. I had not
Reflected upon this, but acquiesce.

I shall depart, then, without meeting them?

Doge. Not so: they shall await you in my chamber.

Jac. Fos. And must I leave them all?

Lor. You must.

Jac. Fos. Not one?

Lor. They are the state’s.

Mar. I thought they had been mine.

Lor. They are, in all maternal things.

Mar. That is, in all things painful. If they’re sick, they will

Be left to me to tend them; should they die,

To me to bury and to mourn; but if

They live, they’ll make you soldiers, senators,

Slaves, exiles—what you will; or if they are

Females with portions, brides and brides for nobles!

Behold the state’s care for its sons and mothers!

Lor. The hour approaches, and the wind is fair.

Jac. Fos. How know you that here, where the genial wind

Ne’er blows in all its blistering freedom?

Lor. ’Twas so

When I came here. The galley floats within

A bow-shot of the “Riva di Schiavoni.”

Jac. Fos. Father! I pray you to precede me, and Prepare my children to behold their father.

Dog. Be firm, my son!—

Jac. Fos. I will do my endeavor.

Mar. Farewell! at least to this detested dungeon,

And to whose good offices you owe

In part your past imprisonment.

Lor. And present

Liberation.

Dog. He speaks truth.

Jac. Fos. No doubt! but ’tis

Exchange of chains for heavier chains I owe him.

He knows this, or he had not sought to change

them—

But I reproach not.

Lor. The time narrows, signor.

Jac. Fos. Alas! I little thought so languishingly

To leave abodes like this: but when I feel

That every step I take, even from this cell,

Is one away from Venice, I look back

Even on these dull damp walls, and—

Dog. Boy! no tears.

Mar. Let them flow on: he wept not on the rack

To shame him, and they cannot shame him now.

They will relieve his heart—that too kind heart—

And I will find an hour to wipe away

Those tears, or add my own. I could weep now,

But would not gratify you wretch so far:

Let us proceed. Doge, lead the way.

Lor. To the Familiarities. The torch, there!

Mar. Yes, light us on, as to a funeral pyre.

Joth. Loredano mourning like an heir.

Dog. My son, you are feeble; take this hand.

Jac. Fos. Alas!

Must youth support itself on age, and I

Who ought to be the prop of yours?

Lor. Take mine.

Mar. Touch it not, Foscari! ’twill sting you.

Signor, stand off! be sure, that if a grasp of yours

Would raise us from the gulf wherein we are plunged

No hand of ours would stretch itself to meet it.

Come, Foscari, take the hand the altar gave you,

It could not save, but will support you ever.

[Exeunt]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

A Hall in the Ducal Palace.

Enter LORDELANO and BARBAROSSO.

Bar. And have you confidence in such a project

Lor. I have.

Bar. ’Tis hard upon his years.

Lor. Say rather

Kind to relieve him from the cares of state.

Bar. ’Twill break his heart.

Lor. Age has no heart to break.

He has seen his son’s half broken, and, except

A start of feeling in his dungeon, never Swerved.

Bar. In his countenance, I grant you, never

But I have seen him sometimes in a calm

So desolate, that the most clamorous grief

Had nought to envy him within.

Where is he

Lor. In his own portion of the palace, with

His son, and the whole race of Foscaris.

Bar. Bidding farewell.

Lor. A last. As soon he shal.

Bid to his dukedom.

Bar. When embarks the son?

Lor. Forthwith—when this long leave is taken

’Tis

Time to admonish them again.

Bar. Retrench not from their moments.

Lor. Not I, now

We have higher business for our own. This day

Shall be the last of the old Doge’s reign,

As the first of his son’s last banishment.

And that is vengeance.

Bar. In my mind, too deep.

Lor. ’Tis moderate—not even life for life, the Denounced of retribution from all time;

They owe me still my father’s and my uncle’s.

Bar. Did not the Doge deny this strongly?

Lor. Doubtless.

Bar. And did not this shake your suspicion?

Lor. No.

Bar. But if this deposition should take place

By our united influence in the Council.

It must be done with all the deference

Due to his years, his station, and his deeds.

Lor. As much of ceremony as you will,

So that the thing be done. You may, for

I care, depute the Council on their knees,

Like Barbarossa to the Pope,) to beg him

To have the courtesy to abdicate.

Bar. What, if he will not?

Lor. We’ll elect another

And make him null.

Bar. But will the laws uphold us?

Lor. What laws?—“The Ten” are laws; and if they were not,

I will be legislator in this business.
BYRON'S WORKS.

Bar. At your own peril?

Lor. There is none, I tell you.

Our powers are such.

Bar. But he has twice already

Solicited permission to retire,

And twice it was refused.

Lor. The better reason

To grant it the third time.

Bar. Unask'd?

Lor. It shows

The impression of his former instances:
If they were from his heart, he may be thankful:
If not, 'twill punish his hypocrisy.
Come, they are met by this time; let us join them,
And be thou fix'd in purpose for this once.
I have prepared such arguments as will not Fail to move them, and to remove him: since
Their thoughts, their objects, have been sounded, do not
You, with your wonted serpules, teach us pause,
And all will prosper.

Bar. Could I but be certain
This is no prelude to such persecution
Of the sire as has fallen upon the son,
I would support you.

Lor. He is safe, I tell you;
His fourscore years and five may linger on
As long as he can drag them: 'tis his throne
Alone is aim'd at.

Bar. But discarded princes
Are seldom long of life.

Lor. And men of eighty
More seldom still.

Bar. And why not wait these few years?

Lor. Because we have waited long enough, and he Lived longer than enough. Hence! In to council!

[Exeunt LOREDANO and BARBARIGO.

Enter MEMMO and a Senator.

Sen. A summons to "the Ten!" Why so?

Mem. A summons to "the Ten!" Why so?

Sen. Alone can answer; they are rarely wont

To let their thoughts anticipate their purpose
By previous proclamation. We are summon'd—

That is enough.

Sen. For them, but not for us;

I would know why.

Mem. You will know why anon,
If you obey; and, if not, you no less
Will know why you should have obey'd.

Sen. I mean not
To oppose them, but—

Mem. In Venice "but" 's a traitor.

But me no "but" unless you would pass o'er

The Bridge which few repass.

Sen. I am silent.

Mem. Why

Thus hesitate? "The Ten" have call'd in aid
Of their deliberation five and twenty
Patricians of the senate—you are one,

And I another; and it seems to me
Both honor'd by the choice or chance which leads us
To mingle with a body so august.

Sen. Most true. I say no more.

Mem. As we hope, signor,

And all may honestly (that is, all those
Of noble blood may) one day hope to be Decemvir, it is surely for the senate's Chosen delegates, a school of wisdom, to

Be thus admitted, though as novices,

To view the mysteries.

Sen. Let us view them: they

No doubt, are worth it.

Mem. Being worth our lives,

If we divulge them, doubtless they are worth

Something, at least to you or me.

Sen. I sought not

A place within the sanctuary; but being Chosen, however reluctantly so chosen,
I shall fulfil my office.

Mem. Let us not

Be latest in obeying "The Ten's" summons.

Sen. All are not met—'tis of your thought
So far—let's in.

Mem. Most of us—most are welcome

In earnest. Hence—we will not be long so.

[Exeunt.

Enter the DOGE, Jacopo Foscari, and MARINA.

Jac. Fos. Ah, father! though I must and will depart,

Yet—no—I pray you to obtain for me
That I once more return unto my home,

Hover're remote the period, Let there be
A point of time as beacon to my heart,
With any penalty annex'd they please,

But let me still return.

Doge. Son Jacopo,
Go and obey our country's will: 'tis not

For us to look beyond.

Jac. Fos. But still I must

Look back. I pray you think of me.

Doge. Alas!

You ever were my dearest offspring, when

They were more numerous, nor can be less so

Now you are last; but did the state demand

The exile of the disinterred ashes

Of your three goodly brothers, now in earth,

And their desponding shapes came flitting round
To impede the act, I must no less obey

A duty, paramount to every duty.

Mar. My husband! let us on: this b'lt prolongs

Our sorrow.

Jac. Fos. But we are not summon'd yet;

The galleys sails are not unfurl'd:—who knows?

The wind may change.

Mar. And if it do, it will not Change their hearts, or your lot: the galleys' oars

Will quickly clear the harbor.

Jac. Fos. O ye elements!

Where are your storms?

Mar. In human breasts. Alas

Will nothing calm you?

Jac. Fos. Never yet did mariner

Put up to patron saint such prayers for prosperous

And pleasant breezes, as I call upon you,
Ye tutelar saints of my own city! which

Ye love not with more holy love than I.

To lash up from the deep the Adrian waves,

And waken Auster, sovereign of the tempest!

Till the sea dash me back on my own shore

A broken corse upon the barren Lido,

Where I may mingle with the sands which skim

The land I love, and never shall see more!

Mar. And wish you this with me beside you?

Jac. Fos. No—

Not for thee, too good, too kind! May'st thou

Live long to be a mother to those children
THE TWO FOSCARI.

Thy fond fidelity for a time deprives
Of such support! But for myself alone,
May all the winds of heaven howl down the Gulf,
And tear the vessel, till the mariners,
Appall'd, turn their despairing eyes on me,
As the Phenicians did on Jonah, then
Cast me out from among them, as an offering
To appease the waves. The billow which destroys me
Will be more merciful than man, and bear me,
Dead, but still bear me to a native grave,
From fisher's hands upon the desolate strand,
Which, of its thousand wrecks, hath ne'er received
One lacerated like the heart which then
Will be—but wherefore breaks it not? why live I?
Mar. To man thyself, I trust, with time, to master
Such useless passion. Until now thou wart
A sufferer, but not a loud one: why
What is this to the things thou hast borne in silence—
Imprisonment and actual torture?
Jac. Fos. Double, Triplie, and tenfold torture! But you are right,
It must be borne. Father, your blessing.
Doge. Would it could avail thee! but no less thou hast it.
Jac. Fos. Forgive—
Doge. What? Jac. Fos. My poor mother, for my birth,
And me for having lived, and you yourself
(As I forgive you) for the gift of life,
Which you bestow'd upon me as my sire.
Mar. What hast thou done?
Jac. Fos. Nothing. I cannot charge
My memory with much save sorrow: but
I have been so beyond the common lot
Chasten'd and visited. I needs must think
That I was wicked. If it be so, may
What I have undergone here keep me from
A like hereafter!
Mar. Fear not: that's reserved
For your oppressors. Jac. Fos. Let me hope not.
Mar. Hope not?
Jac. Fos. I cannot wish them all they have inficted.
Mar. All! the consummate fiends! A thousand fold
May the worm which ne'er dieth, feed upon them!
Jac. Fos. They may repent.
Mar. And if they do, Heaven will not Accept the tardy penitence of demons.

Enter an Officer and Guards.
Offi. Signer! the boat is at the shore—the wind
Is rising—we are ready to attend you.
Ja. Fos. And I to be attended. Once more, father,
I'm sure.
Doge. Take it. Alas! how thine own trembles!
Jac. Fos. No—you mistake; 'tis yours that shakes, my father.
Farewell! Doge. Farewell! Is there aught else?
Jac. Fos. No—nothing. [To the Officer.
Lend me your arm, good signor.
Offi. You turn pale—
Let me support you—paler—ho! some aid there!
Some water!
Mar. Ah, he is dying!

Jac. Fos. Now, I'm ready—
My eyes swim strangely—where's the door?
Mar. Away
Let me support him—my best love! Oh, God.
How faintly beats this heart—this pulse!
Jac. Fos. The light
Is it the light?—I am faint.
[Officer presents him with water
Offi. He will be better,
Perhaps in the air.
Jac. Fos. I doubt not. Father—wife—
Your hands!
Mar. There's death in that damp, clammy grasp
Oh God!—My Foscarì, how sure you?
Jac. Fos. Well! [He dies
Offi. He's gone!
Doge. He's free.
Mar. No—no, he is not dead
There must be life yet in that heart—he could not
Thus leave me,
Doge. Daughter!
Mar. Hold thy peace, old man.
I am no daughter now—thou hast no son.
Oh, Foscarì!
Offi. We must remove the body.
Mar. Touch it not, dungeon miscreants! your base office
Ends with his life, and goes not beyond murder,
Even by your murderous laws. Leave his remains
To those who know to honor them.
Offi. I must
Inform the signory, and learn their pleasure.
Doge. Inform the signory from me, the Doge,
They have no further power upon those ashes:
While he lived, he was theirs, as fits a subject—
Now he is mine—my broken-hearted boy!
[Exit Offici
Mar. And I must live!
Doge. Your children live, Marina.
Mar. My children! true—they live, and I must live
To bring them up to serve the state, and die
As died their father. Oh! what best of blessings
Were bareness in Venice! Would my mother
Had been so!
Doge. My unhappy children!
Mar. What! You feel it then at last—you!—Where is now
The stoic of the state?
Doge, (throwing himself down by the body.) Here,
Mar. Ay, weep on
I thought you had no tears—you hoarded them
Until they are useless; but weep on! he never Shall weep more—never, never more.

Enter Loredano and Barbarigo
Lor. What's here! Mar. Ah! the devil come to insult the dead
Avaunt!
Incarnate Lucifer! 'tis holy ground.
A martyr's ashes now lie there, which make it
A shrine. Get thee back to thy place of torrent
Bar. Lady, we knew not of this sad event.
But pass'd here merely on our path from council
Mar. Pass on.
Lor. We sought the Doge.
Mar. (pointing to the Doge, who is still on the ground by his son's body.) He's busy, look
About the business you provided for him.
Are ye content?
Bar.  We will not interrupt.
A parent’s sorrows.
Mor. No, ye only make them,
Then leave them.
Doge. (rising.) Sirs, I am ready.
Bar. No—not now.
Lor. Yet 'twas important.
Doge. If 'twas so, I can Only repeat—I am ready.
Bar. It shall not be
Just as, though Venice totter’d o’er the deep
Like a frail vessel. I respect your griefs.
Doge. I thank you. If the tidings which you bring
Are evil, you may say them; nothing further
Can: such me more than thou look’st on there,
If they be good, say on; you need not fear
That they can comfort me.
Bar. I would they could.
Doge. I spoke not to you, but to Loredano.
He understands me.
Mar. Ah! I thought it would be so.
Doge. What mean you?
Mar. Lo! there is the blood beginning
To flow through the dead lips of Foscarì—
The body bleeds in presence of the assassin.
[To LOREDANO.
Thou cowardly murderer by law, behold
How death itself bears witness to thy deeds!
Doge. My child! this is a phantasy of grief.
Bear hence the body. [To his Attendants.] Signors,
if it please you,
Within an hour I’ll hear you.
[Exeunt DOGE, MARINA, and ATTENDANTS with the body.
[Manent LOREDANO and BARBARIGO.
Bar. He must not
Be troubled now.
Lor. He said himself that nought
Could give him trouble further.
Bar. These are words;
But grief is lonely, and the breaking in
Upon it barbarous.
Lor. Sorrow preys upon
Its solitude, and nothing more diverts it
From its sad visions of the other world
Than calling it at moments back to this.
The busy have no time for tears.
Bar. And therefore
You would deprive this old man of all business?
Lor. The thing’s decreed. The Giunta and “the Ten”
Have made it law—who shall oppose that law?
Bar. Humanity.
Lor. Because his son is dead?
Bar. And yet unburied.
Lor. Had we known this when
The act was passing, it might have suspended
Its passage, but impedes it not—once past.
Bar. I’ll not consent.
Lor. You have consented to
All that’s essential—leave the rest to me.
Bar. Why press his abdication now?
Lor. The feelings
Of private passion may not interrupt
The public benefit; and what the state
Decides to-day must not give way before
To-morrow for a natural accident.

Bar. You have a son.
Lor. I have—and had a father.
Bar. Still so inexorable?
Lor. Still.
Bar. But let him
Inter his son before we press upon him
This edict.
Lor. Let him call up into life
My sire and uncle—I consent. Men may,
Even aged men, be, or appear to be,
Sires of a hundred sons, but cannot kindle
An atom of their ancestors from earth.
The victims are not equal: he has seen
His sons expire by natural deaths, and I
My sires by violent and mysterious maladies.
I used no poison, bribed no subtle master
Of the destructive art of healing, to Shorten the path to the eternal cure.
His sons, and he had four, are dead, without
My dabbling in vilo drugs.
Bar. And art thou sure
He dealt in such?
Lor. Most sure.
Bar. And yet he seems
All openness,
Lor. And so he seem’d not long Ago to Carmagnuola.
Bar. The attained
And foreign traitor?
Lor. Even so: when he,
After the very night in which “the Ten”
(Join’d with the Doge) decided his destruction,
Met the great Duke at daybreak with a jest,
Demanding whether he should augur him
“The good day or good night?” his Doge-ship answered,
“That he in truth had pass’d a night of vigil
In which (he added with a gracious smile)
There often has been question about you.”
“Twas untrue; the question was the death resolved
Of Carmagnuola, eight months he died;
And the old Doge, who knew him doom’d, smiles on him
With deadly cozenage, eight long mouths before hand—
Eight months of such hypocrisy as is Learn’d but in eighty years. Brake Carmagnuola
Is dead; so is young Foscarì and his brethren—
I never smiled on them.
Bar. Was Carmagnuola
Your friend?
Lor. He was the safeguard of the city
In early life its foe, but, in his manhood,
Its savior first, then victim.
Bar. Ah! that seems
The penalty of saving cities. He
Whom we now act against not only saved
Our own, but added others to her sway.
Lor. The Romans (and we suppose) gave a crown
To him who took a city: and they gave a crown to him who saved a citizen
In battle: the rewards are equal. Now
If we should measure forth the cities taken
By the Doge Foscarì, with citizens
Destroy’d by him, or through him, the account
Were fearfully against him, although narrow’d
To private havoc, such as between him

* An historical fact.
And my dead father.

Bar. Are you then thus fix'd?

Lor. Why, what should change me?

Bar. That which changes me:

But you, I know, are marble to retain
A feud. But when all is accomplish'd, when
The old man is depos'd, his name degrad'd,
His sons all dead, his family depress'd,
And you and yours triumphant, shall you sleep?

Lor. More soundly.

Bar. That's an error and you'll find it,
Bere you sleep with your fathers.

Lor. They sleep not
In their accelerated graves, nor will
Till Foscar'i fills his. Each night I see them
Stalk frowning round my couch, and, pointing Towards
The ducal palace, marshal me to vengeance.

Bar. Fancy's distemperature! There is no passion
More spectral or fantastical than hate;
Not ever its opposite, love, so peoples air
With phantoms, as this madness of the heart.

Enter an Officer.

Lor. Wha e' go you, sirrah?

Off. By the ducal order To forward the preparatory-rites
For the late Foscar'i's interment.

Bar. Their

Vault has been open'd of late years.

Bar. 'Twill be full soon, and may be closed for ever.

Off. May I pass on?

Lor. You may.

Bar. How bears the doge
This last calamity?

Off. With desperate firmness;
In presence of another he says little,
But I perceive his lips move now and then;
And once or twice I heard him, from the adjoining
Apartment, mutter forth the words—"my son!"
Searcely audibly. I must proceed. [Exit Officer.

Bar. This stroke
Will move all Venice in his favor.

Lor. Right!

We must be speedy; let us call together
The delegates appointed to convey
The council's resolution.

Bar. I protest
Against it at this moment.

Lor. As you please—
I'll take their voices on it nevertheless,
And see whose most may sway them, yours or mine. [Exit Barberigo and Loredano.

ACT V.

SCENE I.

The Doge's Apartment.

The Doge and Attendants.

Att. My lord, the deputation is in waiting;
But add, that if another hour would better
Accord with your will, they will make it theirs.

Doge. To me all hours are like. Let them approach. [Exit Attendant

An Officer. Prince! I have done your bidding.

Doge. What command?

Off. A melancholy one—to call the attendance
Of—

Doge. True—true—true! I crave your pardon.
I begin to fall in apprehension, and
Wax very old—old almost as my years.
Till now I fought them off, but they begin
To overtake me.

Enter the Deputation, consisting of six of the Signory, and the Chief of the Ten.

Noble men, your pleasure!

Chief of the Ten. In the first place the Council doth condole
With the Doge on his late and private grief.

Doge. No more—no more of that.

Chief of the Ten. Will not the Duke
Accept the homage of respect?

Doge. I do
Accept it as 'tis given—proceed.

Chief of the Ten. "The Ten,"
With a selected junta from the senate
Of twenty-five of the best born patricians,
Of the republic, and the overwhelming cares
Which at this moment, doubly must oppress
Your years, so long devoted to your country,
Have judged it fitting, with all reverence,
Now to solicit from your wisdom, (which Upon reflection must accord in this,)
The resignation of the ducal ring
Which you have worn so long and venerably;
And to prove that they are not ungrateful nor Cold to your years and services, they add
An appanage of twenty hundred golden
Ducats, to make retirement not less splendid
Than should become a sovereign's retreat.

Doge. Did I hear rightly?

Chief of the Ten. Need I say again?

Doge. No.—Have you done?

Chief of the Ten. I have spoken Twenty four Hours are accorded you to give an answer.

Doge. I shall not need so many seconds.

Chief of the Ten. We Will now retire.

Doge. Stay! Four and twenty hours
Will alter nothing which I have to say.

Chief of the Ten. Speak!

Doge. When I twice before exculpated
My wish to abdicate, it was refused me;
And not alone refused, but ye exacted
An oath from me that I would never more
Renew this instance. I have sworn to die
In full exertion of the functions, which
My country call'd me here to exercise,
According to my honor and my conscience—
I cannot break my oath.

Chief of the Ten. Reduce us not
To the alternative of a decree,
Instead of your compliance.

Doge. Providence
Prolongs my days to prove and chaste me;
But ye have no right to reproach my length
Of days, since every hour has been the country's
I am ready to lay down my life for her,
As I have laid down deader things than life:
But for my dignity—I hold it of

The whole republic; when the general will is manifest, then you shall all be answer'd.

Chieft of the Ten. We grieve for such an answer; but it cannot Avail you aught.

Doge. I can submit to all things,
But nothing will advance; no, not a moment.
What you desire—desire.

Chieft of the Ten. With this, then, must we Return to those who sent us?

Doge. You have heard me.

Chieft of the Ten. With all due reverence we retire.

[Exeunt the Deputation, &c.

Enter an Attendant.

Att. My lord,
The noble dame Marina craves an audience.

Doge. My time is hers.

Enter Marina.

Mar. My lord, if I intrude—
Perchance you fain would be alone?

Doge. Alone!

 alone, come all the world around me, I Am now and evermore. But we will bear it.

Mar. We will; and for the sake of those who are,
Endeavor—Oh my husband!

Doge. Give it way;
I cannot comfort thee.

Mar. He might have lived,
So form'd for gentle privacy of life,
So loving, so beloved; the native of Another land, and who so blest and blessing
As my poor Foscari? Nothing was wanting Unto his happiness and mine, save not To be Venetian.

Doge. Or a prince's son.

Mar. Yes; all things which conduce to other men's imperfect happiness or high ambition,
By some strange destiny, to him proved deadly.
The country and the people whom he loved,
The prince of whom he was the elder born,
And—

Doge. Soon may a prince no longer.

Mar. How?

Doge. They have taken my son from me, and now aim
At my too long worn diadem and ring.
Let them resume the gawgs!

Mar. Oh, the twarts!

In such an hour, too!

Doge. This is the fittest time:
An hour ago I should have felt it.

Mar. And

Will you not now resent it?—Oh for vengeance!
But he who, had he been enough protected,
Might have repaid protection in this moment,
Cannot assist his father

Doge. Nor should do so
Against his country, had he a thousand lives
Instead of that—

Mar. They tortured from him. This
May be pure patriotism. I am a woman:
To me my husband and my children were
Country and home. I loved him—how I loved him!
I have seen him, pass through such an ordeal as
The old heart would have shrunk from: he is gone,
And I, who would have given my blood for him,
Have nought to give but tears! But could I compass

The retribution of his wrongs!—Well, well;
I have sons who shall be men.

Doge. Your grief distresses you.

Mar. I thought I could have borne it, when I saw him.
But all is down by such oppression: yes, I thought
That I would rather look upon his corpse
Than his prolong'd captivity:—I am punish'd
For that thought now. Would I were in his grave.

Doge. I must look on him once more.

Mar. Come with me

Doge. Is he—

Mar. Our bridal bed is now his bier.

Doge. And he is in his shroud

[Exeunt the Doge and Marina.

Enter Barbarigo and Loredano.

Bar. (to an Attendant.) Where is the Doge?

Att. This instant retired hence
With the illustrious lady his son's widow.

Lor. Where?

Att. To the chamber where the body lies.

Lor. Let us return, then.

Bar. You forget, you cannot.
We have the implicit order of the Giunta
To await their coming here, and join them in Their office: they'll be here soon after us.

Bar. And will they press their answer on the Doge?

Lor. 'Twas his own wish that all should be done promptly.

He answer'd quickly, and must so be answer'd;
His dignity is look'd to, his estate
Cared for—what would he more?

Bar. Die in his robes:
He could not have lived long; but I have done
My best to save his honors, and opposed
This proposition to the last, though vainly.
Why would the general vote compel me hither?

Lor. 'Twas fit that some one of such different thoughts
Of ours should be a witness, lest false tongues
Should whisper that a harsh majority
Dreaded to have its acts beheld by others.

Bar. And not less, I must needs think, for the sake
Of humbling me for my vain opposition.
You are ingenious, Loredano, in
Your modes of vengeance, nay, poetical,
A very Ovid in the art of hatred;
'Tis thus (although a secondary object,
Yet hate has microscopic eyes) to you
I owe, by way of foil to the more zealous,
This undesired association in Your Giunta's duties.

Lor. How!—my Giunta!

Bar. Yours!

They speak your language, watch your nod, approve
Your plans, and do your work. Are they not yours?

Lor. You talk unwarily. 'Twere best they hear
not
This from you.

Bar. Oh! they'll hear as much one day
From louder tongues than mine; they have gone beyond
Even their exorbitance of power: and when
This happens in the most contemn'd and abject
States, stung humanity will rise to check it.

Lor. You talk but idly.

Bar. That remains for proof
Here come our colleagues.

Enter the Deputation as before.

Chief of the Ten. Is the Duke aware
We seek his presence?

Att. He shall be inform'd.

[Exit Attendant.

Bar. The Duke is with his son.
Chief of the Ten. If it be so,
We will remit him till the rites are over.
Let us return. 'Tis time enough to-morrow.
Lor. (aside to Bar.) Now the rich man's hell-fire upon your tongue.
Unquench'd, unquenchable! I'll have it torn
From its vile babbling roots, till you shall utter Nothing but sobs through blood, for this! Sage signors,
I pray ye be not hasty. [Aloud to the others.
Bar. But be human.
Lor. See, the Duke comes!

Enter the Doge.

Doge. I have obey'd your summons.
Chief of the Ten. We come once more to urge our past request.
Doge. And I to answer.
Chief of the Ten. What?
Doge. My only answer.
You have heard it.
Chief of the Ten. Hear you then the last decree,
Definitive and absolute!
Doge. To the point—
To the point! I know of old the forms of office,
And gentle preludes to strong acts—Go on!
Chief of the Ten. You are no longer Doge; you are released
From your imperial oath as sovereign;
Your ducal robes must be put off; but for
Your services, the state allots the appanage
Already mention'd in our former congress.
Three days are left you to remove from hence,
Under the penalty to see confiscated
All your own private fortune.
Doge. That last clause,
I am proud to say, would not enrich the treasury.
Chief of the Ten. Your answer, Duke!
Lor. Your answer, Francis Foscari!
Doge. If I could have foreseen that my old age
Was prejudicial to the state, the chief
Of the Republic never would have shown
Himself so far ungrateful, as to place
His own high dignity before his country;
But this life having been so many years
Not useless to that country, I would fain
Have consecrated my last moments to her.
But the decree being render'd, I obey.
Chief of the Ten. If you would have the three days named extended,
We willingly will lengthen them to eight,
As sign of our esteem.
Doge. Not eight hours, signor,
Nor even eight minutes—There's the ducal ring,
[Taking off his ring and cap.
And there the ducal diadem. And so
The Adriatic's free to wed another.
Chief of the Ten. Yet go not forth so quickly.
Doge. I am old, sir,
And even to move but slowly must begin
To move betimes. Methinks I see among you

A face I know not—Senator! your name,
You, by your garb, Chief of the Forty.

Mem. I am the son of Marco Memmo.
Doge. Ah!
Your father was my friend—but sons and fathers—
What, ho! my servants there!

Att. My prince!
Doge. No prince—
There are the princes of the prince! [Pointing to the Ten's deputation.]—Prepare
To part from hence upon the instant.
Chief of the Ten. So rashly? 'twill give scandal.
Doge. Answer that;
[To the Ten
It is your province.—Sirs, bestir yourselves:

[To the Servants
There is one burden which I beg you bear
With care, although 'tis past all farther harm—
But I will look to that myself.
Bar. He means
The body of his son.

Doge. And call Marina,
My daughter!

Enter Marina.

Doge. Get thee ready; we must mourn
Elsewhere.
Mar. And every where.
Doge. True; but in freedom,
Without these jealous spies upon the great.
Signors, you may depart: what would you more?
We are going: do you fear that we shall bear
The palace with us? Its old walls ten times
As old as I am, and I'm very old,
Have served you, so have I, and I and they Could tell a tale; but I invoke them not
To fall upon you! else they would, as erst
The pillars of stone Dagni's temple on
The Israelite and the Philistine's foes.
Such power—I do believe there might exist
In such a race as mine, provoked by such
As you; but I curse not. Adieu, good signors
May the next duke be better than the present.
Lor. The present duke is Paschal Malipiero.
Doge. Not till I pass the threshold of these doors
Lor. Saint Mark's great bell is soon about to tell
For his inauguration.
Doge. Earth and heaven!
Ye will reverberate this peal; and I
Live to hear this!—the first doge who e'er heard
Such sound for his successor! Happier he,
My attained predecessor, stern Faliero—
This insult at the least was spared him.
Lor. What!
Do you regret a traitor?
Doge. No—I merely
Envy the dead.
Chief of the Ten. My lord, if you indeed
Are bent upon this rash abandonment
Of the state's palace, at the least retire
By the private staircase, which conductus you towards
The landing-place of the canal.
Doge. No. I
Will now descend the stairs by which I mounted
To sovereignty—the Giants' Stairs, on whose Broad eminence I was invested duke.
My services have called me up those steps.
The malice of my foes will drive me down them.
There live and thirty years ago was I
Install'd, and traversed these same halls, from which I never thought to be divorced except
A corse—a corse, it might be, fighting for them
But not push'd hence by fellow-citizens.
But come; my son and I will go together—
He to his grave, and I to pray for mine.
Chief of the Ten. What! thus in public?
Doge. I was publicly
Elected, and so will I be deposed.
Marina! art thou willing?
Mar. Here's my arm!
Doge. And here my staff: thus propp'd will I go forth.
Chief of the Ten. It must not be—the people will perceive it.
Doge. The people!—There's no people, you well know it,
Else you dare not deal thus by them or me.
There is a populace, perhaps, whose looks
May shame you; but they dare not groan nor curse you,
Save with their hearts and eyes.
Chief of the Ten. You speak in passion,
Elise—
Doge. You have reason. I have spoken much
More than my wont: it is a foible which
Was not of mine, but more excuses you,
Inasmuch as it shows that I approach
A dotage which may justify this deed
Of yours, although the law does not, nor will.
Farewell, sirs!
Bar. You shall not depart without
An escort fitting past and present rank.
We will accompany, with due respect,
The Doge unto his private palace. Say!
My brethren, will we not?
Different Voices. Ay!—Ay!
Doge. You shall not
Stir—in my train, at least. I enter'd here
As sovereign—I go out as citizen
By the same portals, but as citizen.
All these vain ceremonies are base insults,
Which only ulcerate the heart more,
Applying poisons there as antidotes.
Pomp is for princes—I am none!—That's false,
I am, but only to these gates.—Ah!
Lor.
[The great bell of St. Mark's tolls.
Bar. The bell!
Chief of the Ten. St. Mark's which tolls for the election
Of Malipiero.
Doge. Well I recognize
The sound! I heard it once, but once before,
And that is five and thirty years ago,
Even then I was not young.
Bar. Sit down, my lord!
You tremble.
Doge. 'Tis the knell of my poor boy!
My heart aches bitterly.
Bar. I pray you sit.
Doge. No; my seat here has been a throne till now.
Marina! let us go.
Mar. Most readily.
Doge. (walks a few steps, then stops.) I feel
As thirst—will no one bring me here
A cup of water?
Bar.
Mar. I—
And I—
Lor.
[The Doge takes a goblet from the hana of Loredano.
Doge. I take yours, Loredano, from the hand
Most fit for such an hour as this.
Lor. Why so?
Doge. 'Tis said that our Venetian crystal has Such pure antipathy to poisons as
To burst, if aught of venom touches it.
You bore this goblet, and it is not broken.
Lor. Well, sir!
Then it is false, or you are true.
For my own part, I credit neither; 'tis
An idle legend.
Mar. You talk wildly, and
Had better now be seated, nor as yet
Depart. Ah! now you look as look'd my husband!
Bar. He sinks!—support him!—quick—a chair—support him!
Doge. The bell tolls on!—lets hence—my brain's on fire!
Bar. I do beseech you, lean upon us!
Doge. No.
A sovereign should die standing. My poor boy!
Off with your arms!—That bell!
[The Doge drops down and dies.
Mar. (to Lor.) Behold! your work's completed!
Chief of the Ten. Is there then
No aid? Call in assistance!
Att. 'Tis all over.
Chief of the Ten. If it be so, at least his obsequies
Shall be such as befits his name and nation,
His rank and his devotion to the duties
Of the realm, while his age permitted him
To do himself and them full justice. Brethren.
Say, shall it not be so?
Bar. He has not had
The misery to die a subject where
He reign'd: then let his funeral rites be princely.
Chief of the Ten. We are agreed, then?
All, except Lor., answer,
Yes.
Chief of the Ten. Heaven's peace be with him!
Mar. Signors, your pardon: this is mockery.
Juggle no more with that poor remnant, which,
A moment since, while yet it had a soul,
(A soul by whom you have increased your empire,
And made your power as proud as was his glory;)
And banish'd from his palace, and tore down
From his high place, with such relentless coldness;
And now, when he can neither know these honors,
Nor would accept them if he could, you, signors,
Purpose, with an idle and superfluous pomp
To make a pageant over what you trampled.
A princely funeral will be your reproach,
And not his honor.
Chief of the Ten. Lady, we revoke not
Our purposes so readily.
Mar. I know it,
As far as touches torturing the living.
I thought the dead had been beyond even you,
Though (some, no doubt) consign'd to power which may
Resemble that you exercise on earth.
Leave him to me; you would have done so for
His dregs of life, which you have kindly shorten'd.
It is my last of duties, and may prove
A dreary comfort in my desolation.
Grief is fantastical, and loves the dead,
And the apparel of the grave.

Chief of the Ten.

Do you

Pretend still to this office?

Mar.

I do, signor.

Though his possessions have been all consumed
In the state's service, I have still my dowry,
Which shall be consecrated to his rites,
And those of— [She stops with agitation.
Chief of the Ten. Best retain it for your children.
Mar. Ay, they are fatherless, I thank you.
Chief of the Ten.

We

Cannot comply with your request. His relics
Shall be exposed with wonted pomp, and follow'd
Unto their home by the new Doge, not clad
As Doge, but simply as a senator.

Mar. I have heard of murderers, who have inter'd
Their victims; but ne'er heard, until this hour,
Of so much splendor in hypocrisy
O'er those they slew. I've heard of widow's tears—
Alas! I have shed some—always thanks to you!

I've heard of heirs in sables—you have left none
To the deceased, so you would act the part
Of such. Well, sirs, your will be done! as one day
I trust Heaven's will be done too!

Chief of the Ten. Know you, lady,
To whom you speak, and perils of such speech?
Mar. I know the former better than yourselves;
The latter—like yourselves; and can face both.

Wish you more funerals?

Bar. Heen not her rash words,
Her circumstances must excuse her bearing.

Chief of the Ten. We will not note them down.

Bar. (turning to Lor., who is writing upon his tablets.) What art thou writing

With such an earnest brow, upon thy tablets?

Lor. (pointing to the Doge's body.) That he has paid me!

Chief of the Ten. What debt did he owe you?

Lor. A long and just one; Nature's debt and mine.

[Curtain falls.]

APPENDIX TO THE TWO FOSCARI.

Extrait de l'Histoire de la République de Venise par
P. Daru, de l'Académie Française, tom. II.

Depuis trente ans, la république n'avait pas déposé les armes. Elle avait acquis les provinces de Brescia, de Bergame, de Crème, et la principauté de Ravenne.

Mais ces guerres continues faisaient beaucoup de malheureux et de mécontents. Le doge Francçois Foscari, a qui on ne pouvait pardonner d'en avoir été le promoteur, manifesta une seconde fois, e 1442, et probablement avec plus de sincerité que la première, l'intention d'abjurer sa dignité. Le conseil s'y refusa encore. Ou avait exige de lui le serment de ne plus quitter le dogat. Il était déjà avancé dans la vieillesse, conservant cependant beaucoup de force de tête et de caractère, et jouschant de la gloire d'avoir vu la république endurer au lieu des limites de ses domaines pendant son administration.

Au milieu de ces prospérités, de grands chagrin
vinrent mettre à l'épreuve la fermeté de son âme.

Son fils, Jacques Foscari, fut acquise, en 1446, d'avoir reçu des présents de quelques princes on seigneurs étrangers, notamment, disait-on, du duc de Milan, Philippe Visconti. C'était non seulement une bassesse, mais une infraction des lois posite à la république.

Le conseil des dix traita cette affaire comme s'il
ne fut agi d'un delit commis par un particulier obèse. L'accusé fut amené devant ses juges, devant le doge, qui ne crut pas pouvoir s'abstenir de présider le tribunal. Là, il fut interrogé, appliqué à la question,* d'claré coupable, et il entendit, de la bouche de son père, l'arrêt qui le condamnait à un bannissement perpetuelle et le reléguait à Naples de Venise, pour y finir ses jours.

Embarqué sur une galère pour se rendre au lieu de son exil, il tomba malade à Trieste. Les solicitations du doge obtinrent, non sans difficulté, qu'on lui assignât une autre résidence. Enfin, le conseil des dix lui permit de se retirer à Tévise, en lui imposant l'obligation d'y rester sous peine de mort, de se présenter tous les jours devant le gouverneur.
Il y était depuis cinq ans, lorsqu'un des chefs du conseil des dix assassina. Les soupçons se portèrent sur lui; un de ses domestiques qu'on avait vu à Venise fut arrêté et subit la torture. Les bour reau ne purent lui arracher aucun avou. Ce terrible tribunal se fit amener le maître, le soumit daux mêmes épreuves; il résista à tous les tourments, ne cessant d'attester son innocence; mais on ne

viv dans cette constance que de l'obéissance; de ce qu'il faisait c'est, on conclut que ce fait existait; on attribuait sa ferveur à la magie, et on lui relevait à la Censure. De ce temps lointain, le béarn, disparu, après un quelconque pitre, ne cessait d'errer à son père, à ses amis, pour obtenir quelque adoucissement à sa brutalité. N'obtenant rien, et sachant que la terreur qu'inspirait le conseil des dix ne lui permettait pas d'espérer de réverber dans l'honneur une seule voix qui s'élève en sa faveur; il fit une lettre pour le nouveau due de Milan, par laquelle, au nom des bons offices que Sforce avait reçus du chef de la république, il lui prit son intervention en faveur d'insécurité, du fils du doge.

Cette lettre, selon quelques historiens, fut confiée à un marchand, qui avait promis de la faire parvenir au due; mais qui, trop averti de ce qu'il avait à craindre en se rendant l'intermédiaire d'une pareille correspondance, se hâta, en débarquant à Venise, de la remettre au chef du tribunal. Une autre version, qui paraît plus juste, rapporte que la lettre fut détenue par un espion, attaché au paà de l'exilé.

Ce fut un nouveau d'ail dont on eut à punir Jacques Foscari. Réclamer la protection d'un prince étranger était un crime, dans un sujet de la république; il y avait un grand parti pour l'arrêter dans les prisons de Venise. A son arrivée il fut soumis à l'extradition. C'était une singulière destination, pour le citoyen d'une république et pour les marchands de trois autres. Sa vie avait été trahie au service de la question. Cette fois la torture était d'autant plus odieuse, qu'elle n'avait point d'objet, le fait qu'on avait à lui reprocher, étant inconnu.

Quand on demanda à l'accusé, dans les intervalles que les bourreaux lui accordaient, pourquoi il avait écrit la lettre qu'on lui prodiguait, il répondit qu'il croyait être innocent parce qu'il ne doutait pas qu'elle ne soit due aux mains du tribunal, que toute autre voix lui avait été formée pour faire parvenir ses réclamations, qu'il s'attendait bien qu'on le ferait amener à Venise; mais qu'il avait tout risque pour avoir la consoliation de voir sa femme, son père, et sa mère, encore une fois. Sur cette naïve déclaration, on confirma sa sentence d'exil; mais on l'aggrava, en y ajoutant qu'il serait reconnu en prison pendant un an. Cette rigueur, dont on sait qu'elle causa un malheur de plus, était sans doute odieuse; mais cette politique, qui défendait à tous les citoyens de faire intervenir les étrangers dans les affaires intérieures de la république, était sage. Elle se faisait dans le même esprit et dans la même inflexibilité. L'historien Paul Morosini a conté que l'empereur Frédéric III. pendant qu'il était l'hôte des Venitiens, demanda, comme une faveur particulière, l'admission d'un citoyen dans le grand conseil, et la grâce d'un ancien gouverneur de Candie, gendre du doge, et banni pour sa mauvaise administration, sans pouvoir obtenir ni l'une ni l'autre. Cependant, on ne put refuser au condamné la permission de voir sa femme, ses enfants, ses parents, qu'il allait quitter pour toujours. Cette dernière entente même fut accompagnée de cruauté par la sévère circonstance, qui retenait les émancipations de la douleur paternelle et conjugale.

Ce ne fut pas dans l'intérieur de leur appartement, mais dans une des grandes salles du palais, qu'une femme, accompagnée de ces quatre fritz, vint faire le tour de la pièce, se serrant dans les bras de l'assassin, et lui assurant ses plus tendres résolutions, ses plus récits, et son doge naître et le dogaressa accablée d'infortunes, firent un moment de la triste consolation de mêler leurs larmes à celles de leur exilé. Il s'jeta à leurs genoux en leur tendant des mains disloquées par la torture, pour les supplier de solliciter quelque secours auprès de la sentence qui venait d'être prononcée contre lui. Son père eut le courage de lui répondre: "Non, mon fils, respectez votre arzt, et obéissez dans le silence et dans la seigneurie." À ces mots il se sépara, de l'infortuné, qui fut sur-le-champ embarqué pour Candie.

D'antiquité vit avec autant d'horreur que d'admiration un pareille condamnation de ses fils évidemment nuisibles. Elle hésita pour qualifier de vertu sublime de ferocité cet effort qui paraît au-dessus de la nature humaine; mais ici, où la première faute n'était qu'une faiblesse, où la seconde n'était pas une provocation, on la troisième n'était rien de criminel, on se souvint de concevoir la constance d'un père, qui voulait que trois fois ses fils simples, qui l'entendent condamner sans peure, et qui n'écrit pas en peine; qui ne l'aborde pour lui montrer un visage plus apaisé. Ce père voulait se refaire pour son fils, l'arrêter pour jamais, lui interdire les murmures et jusqu'à l'espoir? Comment expliquer une croche circonstance, si ce n'est en avouant, à notre regret, que le père se laissa emporter par la nature humaine les mêmes efforts que la vertu? La servitude aurait-elle son horreur comme la liberté?

Quelque temps après ce jugement, ou découvert une véritable aventure de l'escamoteur, dont Jacques Foscari, portait le pinceau; mais il n'était plus temps de réparer cette atroce injustice, le malheureux était mort dans sa prison.

Il me reste à raconter la suite de malheurs qui m'attendirent. Ce fut un moment pour l'empire de Rome, et la décadence de Venise. Foscari, fils, est mort dans la prison de Venise. Je ne sache plus en dire. Il est mort dans le silence et dans la seigneurie. Il est mort dans la gloire, et n'a cessé d'errer, le crime sur le cœur et sans erreur. Le doge me fit dire: "Jacques, ne t'obstine point à cela que vivre la vertu, et nous croyons pieusement." Je ne pus pas m'y résoudre, pour le malheur de ma vie, et être mort sans avoir d'objets. Je ne pus pas m'y résoudre, pour le malheur de ma vie, et être mort sans avoir d'objets. Je ne pus pas m'y résoudre. Je ne pus pas m'y résoudre. Je ne pus pas...
imprima un procès contre André Donato, garde du doge, accusé de pêcheur. De tous les livres de comptes (car il faisait le commerce, comme à cette époque presque tous les patriciens,) il avait inscrit de sa propre main le doge au nombre de ses débiteurs, pour la mort, y était dit, de mon père et de mon oncle.† De l'autre côté du registre, il avait laissé avec page en blanc, pour y faire mention du reconven- ment de cette dette, et, en effet, après la partie du doge, il écrivit sur son registre, il me la paye—

Ce disque n'exprime que de timides contradictions; cependant, la délibération dura huit jours. L'assemblée, ne se jugeant pas sûre de l'approbation universelle que l'acte voulait le lieu faire croire, désirait que le doge donnât lui-même sa désmission. Il avait déjà proposé deux fois, et on n'avait pas voulu l'accepter.

Aucune loi n'aurait imposé que le prince fut révoqué; il était au contraire à vie et les exemples qu'on pouvait citer de plusieurs doges déposés, prouvaient que de telles revolutions avaient toujours été le résultat d'un mouvement populaire.

Mais d'ailleurs, si le doge pouvait être déposé, ce n'était pas assurément par un tribunal composé d'un petit nombre de membres, inutile pour punir les crimes, et nullement investi du droit de revoyer ce que le corps souverain de l'état avait fait.

Cependant, le tribunal arrêta que les six conseillers de la seigneurie, et les chefs du conseil des dix se transperterovaient auprès du doge pour lui signifir, que l'excellente considération qu'il avait convenablement établie, qu'il abandonnerait la charge du doge, leur fussent plus de remplir les fonctions. On lui donnait 1500 ducats d'or pour son entretien vingt-quatre heures pour se débider.*

Foscarì posa sur le champ avec beaucoup de gravité, que deux fois il avait voulu se démettre de sa charge; qu'au lieu de le lui permettre, ou avait exigé de lui le serment de ne plus réitérer cette demande; que la providence avait prolongé ses jours pour l'assister, que cependant on n'était pas en droit de reprocher sa longue vie à un homme qui avait employé quatre-vingt-quatre ans au service de la république; qu'il était prêt encore à lui sacrifier sa vie; mais que, pour sa dignité, il tenait de la république cet office, et qu'il se réservait de répondre sur ce sujet, quand la volonté générale se serait légalement manifestée.

Le lendemain, à l'heure indiquée, les conseillers et les chefs du conseil présent rent. Il ne s'ouvrit pas leur donner d'autre réponse. Cassini semblait sur-le-champ, lui envoyant demander encore une fois sa résolution comme tenant, et, la réponse ayant été la même, on prononça que le doge était à la tête de son palais, et devait sans délai se séparer. Le doge lui assignait une pension de 1500 ducats d'or, en lui enjoignant de sortir du palais dans huit jours, sous peine de voir tous ses biens confisqués.†

Le lendemain, ce décret fut porté au doge, et ce fut Jacques Loredan qui eut la cruelle joie de le lui présenter en personne. Si j'avais pu prouver que ma vieillesse fut préjudiciable à l'État, le chef de la république ne se serait pas montré assez ingrat, pour prêter son digne à la patrie; mais cette vie lui ayant été utile pendant tant d'ann'es, je voulus lui faire un présent, qui lui serait d'un grand secours. Le décret est rendu, je m'y conformerai." Après avoir parle ainsi, il se dépouilla des marques de sa dignité, remit l'anneau ducale, qui fut prise en sa possession, et de ce fait, il quitta Vénétie, qu'il avait habitude pendant trente-cinq ans, accompagné de son frère, de ses parents, et de ses amis. Un secrétaire, qui se trouva sur le perron, l'invita à descendre par un escalier dérobé, afin d'éviter la foule du peuple rassemblé chez lui, mais il s'y refusa, disant qu'il voulait descendre par où il était monté; et quand il fut au bas de l'escalier des géants, il se retournant, appuya sur la brûliss, vers le palais en profitant ces paroles: "Mes services m'avaient appelée, la malice de mes ennemis m'en fait sortir."

La foule qui s'ouvrait sur son passage, et qui avait peut-être désiré sa mort, était venue de respect et d'étonnement. * Rentre donc chez vous, la maison, qui la recommanda à sa famille d'oublier les injures de ses ennemis. Personne dans les divers corps de l'État ne se crut en droit de s'étomner, qu'un prince inconsolable se dignait engrâter l'État, et lui reprocher rien; que l'État eût perdu son chef, à l'insu du sénat et du corps souverain lui-même. Le peuple seut n'aisa rechanger quelques regrets; une proclamation du conseil des dix prescrivit le silence le plus absolu sur cette affaire, sous peine de mort. Avant de donner un successeur à François Foscarí, une nouvelle loi fut rendue, qui défendait au doge d'ouvrir et de lire autrement qu'en présence de ses conseillers, les d'pèches des ambassadeurs de la république l'état, de ses successeurs. Les électeurs entrèrent au concile et nommèrent au dogat Paschal Mallipier le 30 Octobre, 1467. La cloche de Sainte-Marc, qui annonçait à Venise son nouveau prince, vint frapper l'oreille de François Foscarí; cette fois sa fermete s'abandonna, il prouva un tel saisissement, qu'il mourut le lendemain.

La république arrêtat qu'on lui rendrait les mêmes honneurs funèbres que s'il fut mort dans l'exercice de sa dignité; mais lorsqu'on se présenta pour cultiver ses restes, sa veuve, qui de son nom était Marie Nani, d' clara qu'elle ne le souffrirait point; qu'on ne devait pas traiter en prince après sa mort celui qu'il avait dépossédé de la couronne, et que puisqu'il avait cousu ses bien au service de l'État, elle saurait, consacrer sa dot à lui faire rendre les derniers honneurs. On ne tint aucun compte de cette résistance, et malgré les protestations de l'ancienne dogaresse, le corps fut enlevé; revêtu des orna¬ ments ducale, exposé en public; et les obéres furent célébrées avec la pompe accou¬ tumee. Le nouveau doge assista au convok en robe de victoire.

La pitie qu'avait inspiré e le malheur de ce vieille¬ rard, ne fut pas tout-—îl—l'etre de. Un an après, on osa dire que le conseil des dix avait outrepasé ses pouvoirs, et il lui fut défendu par une loi du grand concile de Venise, de l'avancer de juger le prince, à moins que ce ne fût pour cause de délonie."

Un acte d'autorité tel que la d position d'un doge inamovible de sa nature, aurait pu exciter un soullevement general, au moins une occasionner une division dans une r publique autrui constituent que Venise. Mais depuis trois ans, il existait dans celle-ci une magistrature, ou plutôt une autorité, devant laquelle tout devait se faire.

Le Doge de Venise, qui avait prouvé par ce traité une guerre non moins dangereuse que celle qu'il avait terminée presque en même temps par le traité de Lodi, ayant obtenu par long d'année, une vieillesse. François Foscarí occupait cette première dignité de l'État dès le 15 Avril, 1423. Quoi qu'il fût déjà âgé de plus décimante-un ans à l'époque de son élection, il était cependant le plus jeune des quarante-un électeurs. Il avait eu un coup de peine à parvenir au rang qu'il convoitait, et son élection avait été conduite avec beaucoup d'adresse. Pendant plusieurs jours de scrutin res amis les élections, ils se furent abstenus de lui donner leur suffrage, pour que les autres ne le considé¬ rent pas comme un concurrent redoutable. * Le conseil des dix craignait son crédit parmi la noblesse paure, parce qu'il avait cherché à se la rendre favorable, tandis qu'il était procureur de Saint¬ Marie, en faisant employer plus de trente mille ducats à doter des jeunes filles de bonne maison, ou à établir de jeunes gentilshommes. On craignait aussi de lui faire remettre les dix ducats, que on avait enlevé, quatre ans qu'il détenait son ambition et son goât pour la guerre. L'opinion que ses adversaires s'entraînt formée de lui par suite de sa conduite, et de son ambition de quatre ans que Foscarí fut à la tête de la république, elle ne cessa point de combattre. Si les hostilités étaient suspendues durant quelques mois, c'était pour recommencer bientôt avec plus de vigueur.

Le fut l'époque où Venise de la colline de Brescia, Bergame, Ravenne, et Crème; où elle fonda sa domination de Lombardie, et pirat sans cesse sur le point d'asservir toute cette province.

Profond, courageux, incommensurables à sa personne, Foscarí comme un homme de caractère, et ses talents lui furent obtenir plus d'influence sur le républic qui n'avait exercer la plupart des présidents. Mais si son ambition avait eu pour l'agrandissement de sa famille, elle lui eut cruellement trompée; trois de ses fils moururent dans les huit années qui suivirent son élection; le quatrième, Jacob, par lequel la maison Foscarí s'est perpétuée, fut victime de la jalouseie du conseil des dix, et l'opposa par ses malheurs les jours de son père. * En effet, le conseil des dix, redoutant de défaire envers le chef de l'État, lorsqu'il le voyait plus fort par eux par la dévouation, veillait sans cesse sur Foscarí, pour le punir de son crédit, et de sa gloire. Au mois de Fèvrier, 1445, Michel Bevilacqua, Florentin, exilé à Venise, accusa en secret Jacques Foscarí, auprès des enquis de l'État, d'avoir du sud Philippe Visconti, des présens d'argent et de joyaux, par les mains des gens de sa maison. Telle était l'odieuse procédure adoptée à Venise, que sur cette accusation secrète les fils du doge se représentaient de la majesté de la république, fut mis à la torture. On lui arracha par l'estrappade l'aveu, des charges portées contre lui; il fut relâché pour le reste de ses jours à Napoli de Rome, la plus vive, de se présenter contre la maison de la place. * Cependant, le vaisseau qui le portait ayant touché à Trieste, Jacob, gravement malade des suites de la torture, et plus encore de l'humiliation qu'il avait éprouvée, demanda en vain quelque médicament de la terre du lépreux, le sauver; il obéit cette faveur, par une d libration du 28 Décembre, 1446; il fut rappelé à Trieste; et eut la liberté d'habiter tout le Tévenian indifférem¬ment. * Il était en paix à Trieste; et la fille de Léonard

Contarini, qu'il avait épousé le 10 Février, 1441, était venue le joindre dans son exil, lorsque le 5 Novembre, 1449, Almorò Donato, chef du conseil des tenailles de la justice, et ayant médiocrement l'état, Triadano Griitti et Antonio Venieri, portèrent leur souci contre Jacob Foscarì, parce qu'un domestique à lui, nommé Olivier, avait été vu ce soir à Venise, avec quelques autres inquisiteurs d'état, qui portaient le bec devant lui. Olivier fut reconnu à la torture, mais il nia jusqu'à la fin, avec un courage insurpassable, le crime dont on l'accusait, quoique ses juges fussent la barbarie de lui faire rendre toute ses aveux, en main de fer. Cependant, comme Jacob Foscarì avait de puissants motifs d'inimitié contre le conseil des dix, qu'il avait connu, et qui témoinaient de la haine au doge son père, on essaya de mettre à son tour Jacob à la torture, et l'on prolongea contre lui ces affreux tourments, sans réussir à en tirer aucune confession. Malgré sa décision, le conseil des dix le condamna à être transporté à la Cané, et accorda une recompense à son déletour. Mais les horribles douleurs que Jacob Foscarì avait éprouvées avaient trouvé son médecin, ses persécuteurs touchés de ce dernier malheur, permirent qu'on le ramenât à Venise le 25 Mars. Sa peine à la main, il prit dans ses exécutions quelques coups violents de malheur, et il fut reconduit immédiatement à la Cané. Sur ces entretiens, Nicholas Erizzo, homme déjà note pour un précédent crime, confessa, en mourant, de s'être lui-même au temps que Jacob avait eu dont Almorò Donato.

Le malheureux doge, Francesco Foscarì, avait déjà cherché à plusieurs reprises, à abdiquer une dignité si funeste à lui-même et à sa famille. Il lui semblait que, redescendant au rang de simple citoyen, comme il n'inspirerait plus de crainte ou de jalousie, on n'accablerait plus ses fils par ces effroyables persécutions. Abattu par la mort de ses premiers enfants, il avait voulu, dès le 20 Juin, 1453, déposer une dignité, durant l'exercice de laquelle sa patrie avait été tourmentée par la guerre, par la peste, et par des malheurs de tout genre. Il renouvela cette proposition après que les juges rendus contre son fils : mais le conseil des dix le retenait fortement sur le trône, comme il retenait ses fils dans les fers.

En vain Jacob Foscarì, obligé de se présenter chaque jour au gouverneur de la Cané, résistait contre l'injustice de sa dernière sentence, sur laquelle la confession d'Erizzo ne lassait plus de doutes. En vain il demandait grâce au farouché conseil des dix ; il ne pouvait obtenir aucune réponse. Le conseil des dix, entré dans la possession du pouvoir, voulut ainsi tout à la fois à la patrie et à la Constance, et ordonna de rentrer tous deux au dernier terme de la vieillesse, le désir de revoir une patrie dont la cruauté ne meritait pas un si tendre amour, se changeant en lui en une vraie haine. Ne pouvant retourner à Venise pour y vivre libre, il voulut du moins y aller chercher un suppliant. Il crut au duc de Milan à la fin de Mai, 1456, pour incomber à sa protection auprés de lui et sachant qu'une telle lettre serait considérée comme un cordon de sa part et de son roi dans un lieu où il était sûr qu'elle serait saisie par les esprits qui l'entouraient. En effet, la lettre fut tenue de confiance des dix, on l'envoya chercher à Jacob, et il fut reconduit à Venise le 10 Juillet, 1456.

Jacob Foscarì ne nia point sa lettre, il raconta en même temps dans quel but il l'avait écrite et comment il l'avait emmené en les mains de son délateur. Malgré ces aveux, Foscarì fut relevé à la torture, et on lui donna trente tours d'estrapade, pour voir s'il confirmerait ensuite ses dépositions. Quand on le détacha de la corde, on le trouva \( \text{déchiré par ces horribles secousses. Les juges } \) permirent alors à son père, à sa mère, à sa femme et à ses fils, d'aller le voir dans sa prison. Le vieux doge, qui était patriote de la ville de Venise, quand sa peine, dans la chambre où son fils unique était pâsé de ses blessures. Ce fils demandait encore la grâce de mourir dans sa maison. — "Retourne à ton exil, lui dit le doge, "et soumet-toi à ta volonté." Mais en rentrant dans son palais, ce malheureux vieillard s'évanouit, épuisé par la violence qu'il s'était faite. Jacob devait encore passer une année en prison à la Cané, avant qu'on lui rendît la même liberté limitée à laquelle il était réduit avant cet événement ; mais a peine fut-il débarqué sur cette terre d'exil, qu'il y mourut de déprime.

Des-lors, et pendant quinze mois, le vieux doge, accablé d'années et de chagrins, ne recouvra plus la force de son corps ou celle de son âme ; il n'assistait plus à aucun des conseils, et il ne pouvait plus remplir aucune des fonctions de sa dignité. Il était entré dans sa quatrième-vingt-sixième année, et si le conseil des dix avait été susceptible de quelque pitié, il aurait attendu en silence la fin, sans doute à peine, d'un âge de cent ans, comme il en avait tant de malheurs. Mais le chef du conseil des dix était alors Jacques Loredano, fils de Marc, et veuve de Pierre, le grand amiral, qui touteleur vie avaient été les ennemis acharnés du vieux doge. Ils avaient transmis leurs fonctions à leurs fils, et l'un de ces l'encourageait. Le rancunieux n'eût pas été moins satisfait. A l'instigation de Loredano, Jerome Barbarigo, inquisiteur d'état, proposa au conseil des dix, au mois d'Octobre, 1457, de soumettre Foscarì à une nouvelle humiliation. Des que ce magistrat ne pouvait plus remplir ses fonctions, Barbarigo demanda qu'on nommât un autre doge. Le conseil, qui refusa par deux fois l'abdicatìon de Foscarì, parce que la représentant, lui permit d'abdiquer, se plaçant devant de se mettre en contradiction avec ses propres d'érver. Les discussions dans le conseil et la junta se prolongèrent pendant huit jours, jusqu'à la fin de l'année. Cependant, on fit entrer dans l'assemblée Marco Foscarì, procurateur de Saint-Marc, et frère du doge, pour qu'il fit, par le redoutable serment du secret, et qu'il ne put arrêter les menées de ses ennemis. Enfin, le conseil transmettra ce serment auprès de lui et lui réclamera volontairement un emploi qu'il ne pouvait plus exercer. "J'ai juré," répondit le vieillard, "de remplir jusqu'à ma mort, selon mon honneur et ma conscience, les fonctions auxquelles ma patrie m'a appelé. Je ne puis mediller moi-même de mon serment; qu'un ordre des conseils dispose de moi, je m'y soumettrai, mais je ne le devancerai pas. Alors une nouvelle délégation du conseil delia Francesco Foscarì de son serment dual, lui assura une pension de deux mille ducats pour le reste de sa vie, et lui ordonna d'évacuer en trois jours le palais, et de déposer les ornements de sa dignité. Le doge ayant remarqué parmi les conseillers qui venaient de porter ce serment, un cheval de quatre ans, il ne connaissait pas demanda son nom : "Je suis le fils de Marco Memmo," lui dit le conseiller. — "Ah ! ton père était mon ami," lui dit le vieux doge, et en souriant. Il y donna aussitôt des ordres pour qu'on transportât ses effets dans une maison à lui; et le lendemain 23 Octobre on le vit, se soutenant à peine, et appuyé sur son vieux frère, redescendre ces mêmes escaliers sur lesquels, quatre-vingt ans auparavant, il avait vu, sur son bâton, le même exil, et traverser ces mêmes salles où la republique avait reçu serments. Le peuple entier parut indigné de tant de dureté exercée contre un vieillard qu'il avait toujours soutenu, et qui se taisait, en réclamant que le conseil des dix fût publié une défense de parler de cette révolution, sous peine d'être traduit devant les inquisiteurs d'état. Le 20 Octobre, Pasqual Malipieri, procureur de Saint-Marc, fut lui pour sauver Augustin Verocari; celui-ci, pour lui éviter l'humiliation de vivre sujet, le où il avait régné. En entendant le son des cloches, qui sonnaient en actions de grâces pour cette élection, il mourut subitement d'une hémorragie causée par une veine qui s'éclata dans sa poitrine.

"Le doge, blessé de trouver constamment un contradicteur et un censeur si amer dans son frère, lui dit un jour en plein conseil: "Messire Augustin, vous faites tout votre possible pour hâter ma mort; vous vous hâtez de me succéder; mais, si les autres vous connaissent aussi bien que je vous connais, ils n'auront garde de vous éclipser."

La-dessus il se leva, enleva le corona, rentra dans son appartement, et mourut quelques jours après. Ce frère, contre lequel il s'était emporté, fut précisément le successeur de lui demander. C'était un miracle dont on aimait à tenir compte; surtout un parent, de s'être mis en opposition avec le chef de la république."

In Lady Morgan's fearless and excellent work upon "Italy," I perceive the expression of "Rome of the Ocean" applied to Venice. The same phrase occurs in the "Two Foscari." My publisher can vouch for me that my tragedy was written and sent to England some time before I had seen Lady Morgan's work, which I only received on the 16th of August. I hasten, however, to notice the coincidence, and to yield the originality of the phrase to her who first placed it before the public. I am the more anxious to do this, as I am informed (for I have seen but few of the specimens, and those accidentally) that there have lately been brought against me charges of plagiarism. I have also had an anonymous sort of threatening intimation of the same kind, apparently with the intent of extorting from me such charges, but no answer to make. One of them is ludicrous enough. I am reproached for having formed the description of a shipwreck in verse from the narrative of many actual shipwrecks in prose, selecting such materials as were most striking. Gibbon makes it a merit in Tasso "to have copied the minutest details of the Siege of Jerusalem from the Chronicles." In me it may be a demerit, I presume: let it remain so. Whilst I have been occupied in defending Pope's character, the lower orders of Grub street appear to have been visiting mine: this is as it should be, both in them and in me. One of the accusations in the nameless epistle alluded to is still more laughable: it states seriously that I "received five hundred pounds for writing advertisements for Day and Martin's patent blacking!" This is the highest compliment to my literary powers which I ever received. It states also "that a person has been trying to make the acquaintance of Mr. Townsend, a gentleman of the law, who was with me on another occasion; that he is not unacquainted with the purpose of obtaining any defamatory particulars of my life from this occasional visitor." Mr. Townsend is welcome to say what he knows. I mention these particulars merely to show what general what the literary lower world contains, and their way of setting to work. Another charge, made, I am told, in the "Literary Gazette" is, that I wrote the notes to "Queen Mab:" a work which I never saw till some time after its publication, and which I recollect showing to Mr. Southey as a poem of great power and imagination. I never wrote a line of the notes, nor ever saw them except in their published form. No one knows better than the real author, that his opinions and mine differ materially upon the metaphysical portion of that work; though in common with all who are not blinded by baseness and bigotry, I highly admire the poetry of that and his other publications.

Mr. Southey, too, in his pious preface to a poem whose blasphemy is as harmless as the sedition of Wat Tyler, because it is equally absurd with that crime, he deliberately calls upon the "legislature, to look to it," as the toleration of such writings led to the French Revolution: "not such writings as Wat Tyler, but as those of the "Satanic School." This is not true, and Mr. Southey knows it to be not true. Every French writer of any freedom was persecuted; Voltaire and Rousseau were exiles, Marmontel and Diderot were sent to the Bastile, and a perpetual war was waged with the whole class by the existing despots. In the next place the French Revolution was not occasioned by any writings whatsoever, but must have occurred had no such writers ever existed. It is the fashion to attribute every thing to the French Revolution, and the French Revolution to every thing but its real cause. That cause is obvious—the government exacted too much, and the people could neither give nor bear more. Without this, the Encyclopedists might have written their fingers off without the occurrence of a single alteration. And the English Revolution—(the first, I mean)—what was it occasioned by? The Puritans were surely as pious and moral as Wesley or his biographer. Acts—acts of an unjust nature were followed by the people, and not writings against them, have caused the past convulsions, and are tending to the future.

I look upon such as inevitable, though no revolutionist; I wish to see the English constitution restored, but it is destroyed, and naturally one by one, with the greater part of my present property in the funds, what have I to gain by a revolution? Perhaps, I have more to lose in every way than Mr. Southey, with all his places and presents for panegyris and abuse into the bargain. But that a revolution is inevitable, I repeat. The government may exult over the repres- sion of petty tumults; these are but the receding waves of a great wave, and broken for a moment on the shore, while the great tide is still rolling on and gaining ground with every breaker. Mr. Southey accuses us of attacking the religion of the country, and he is amusing it by writing lives of Heavens! One merit of worship is merely destroyed by another. There never was, nor ever will be, a country without a religion. We shall be told of France again; but it was only Paris and the Frago- party, which did their dogmatic nonsense of thephilanthropy. The church of Eng- land, if overthrown, will be swept away by the sectarians, and not by the skeptics. People are too wise to fall for the ill-willed. One notion of their own immense importance in the realms of space, ever to submit to the impiety of doubt. There may be a few such diffident speculators like water in the pale sunbeam of human reason, but they are very few; and their opinions, without enthusiasm or appeal to the passions, can never gain proselytes—unless, indeed, they are persecuted—that, to be sure, will increase anything.

Mr. S. with a cowardly ferocity, exults over the anticipated "death-bed repentance" of the objects of his dislike; and indulges himself in a pleasant "Vision of Judgment," in prose as well as verse, full of impious impudence. What Mr. S.'s sensations or ours may be in the awful moment of leaving this state of existence neither he nor we can pretend to decide. In common, I presume, with most men of any reflection, I have not waited for a "death-bed" to repent of many of my actions, notwithstanding the "diabolical pride" which this pitiful renegade in his rancour would impute to those who scorn him. Whether upon the whole the good or evil of my deeds may preponderate is not for me to ascertain; but, as my means and opportunities have been greater, I shall limit my present defence to an assertion (easily proved, if necessary), that I, "in my degree," have done a more real good in any one given year, since I was twenty, than Mr. Southey in the whole course of his shifting and turn-coat existence. There are several actions to which I can look back with an honest pride, not to be damped by the calumnies of a hireling. There are others to which I recur with sorrow and repentance; but the only act of my life of which Mr. Southey can have any real knowledge, as it was one which brought me in contact with a near connexion of his own, did no dishonor to that connexion nor to me.

I am not ignorant of Mr. Southey's calumnies on a different occasion, knowing them to be such which he scattered abroad on his return from Switzerland against me and others: they have done him no good in this world, and, if his creed be the right one, they will do less in the next. What his "death-bed" may be, it is not my province to predicate: let him settle it with his Maker, as I must do with mine. There is something at once ludicrous and blasphemous in this arrogant scribbler of all work sitting down to deal damnation and destruction upon his fellow-creatures, with Wat Tyler, the Apotheosis of George the Third, and the Elegy on Martin the regicide, all shuffled together in his writing-desk. One of his consolations appears to be a Latin note from the work of a Mr. Landor, the author of "Gebir," whose friendship for Robert Southey will, it seems, "be an honor to him when the ephemeral disputes and ephemeral reputations of the day are forgotten." I for one neither envy him "the friendship," nor the glory in reversion which is to accrue from it, like Mr. Thalinson's fortune in the third and fourth generation. This friendship will probably be as memorable as his own epics, which (as I quoted to him ten or twelve years ago in "English Bards") Person said "would be remembered when Homer and Virgil are forgotten, and not till then." For the present, I leave him.

SARDANAPALUS.

PREFACE.

In publishing the tragedies of Sardanapalus and the Two Foscari, I have only to repeat that they were not composed with the most remote view to the stage.

On the attempt made by the Managers in a former instance, the public opinion has been already expressed.

With regard to my own private feelings, as it seems that they are to stand for nothing, I shall say nothing.

For the historical foundation of the compositions in question, the reader is referred to the Notes.

The Author has in one instance attempted to preserve, and in the other to approach the "unities;" conceiving that with any very distant departure from them, there may be poetry, but can be no drama. He is aware of the unpopularity of this notion in present English literature; but it is not a system of his own, being merely an opinion, which, not very long ago, was the law of literature throughout the world, and is still so in the more civilized parts of it. But "Nous avons change tout cela," and are reaping the advantages of the change. The writer is far from conceiving that any thing he can adduce by personal precept or example can at all approach his regular, or even irregular predecessors; he is merely giving a reason why he preferred the more regular formation of a structure however feeble, to an entire abandonment of all rules whatsoever. Where he has failed the failure is in the architect, and not in the art.

In this tragedy it has been my intention to follow the account of Diodorus Siculus: reducing it, however, to such dramatic regularity as I best could, and trying to approach the unities. I therefore suppose the rebellion to explode and succeed in one day by a sudden conspiracy instead of the long war of the history.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

MYRRIHA, an Ionian female Slave, and the Favorite of SARDANAPALUS.

Women composing the Harem of SARDANAPALUS, Guards, Attendants, Chaldean Priests, Mages, &c., &c.

Scene—a Hall in the Royal Palace of Nineveh.
ACT I.

SCENE I.

A Hall in the Palace.

SAIEMENES, (faux.) He hath wrong'd his queen, but still he is her lord;
He hath wrong'd my sister, still he is my brother;
He hath wrong'd his people, still he is their sovereign,
And I must be his friend as well as subject;
He must not perish thus. I will not see
The blood of Nimrod and Semiramis
Sink in the earth, and thirteen hundred years
Of empire ending like a shepherd's tale;
He must be roused. In his effeminate heart
There is a careess courage which corrosion
Has not all quench'd, and latent energies,
Repress'd by circumstance, but not destroy'd—
Steep'd, but not drown'd, in deep voluptuousness.
If born a peasant, he had been a man
To have reach'd an empire; to an empire born,
He will bequeath none; nothing but a name,
Which his sons will not prize in heritage:—
Yet, not all lost, even yet he may redeem
His aloth and shame, by only being that
Which he should be, as easily as the thing
He should not be and is. Were it less toil
To sway his nations than consume his life?
To head an army than to rule a harem?
He sweats in palling pleasures, dulls his soul,
And saps his goodly strength, in toils which yield
not
Health like the chase, nor glory like the war—
He must be roused. Alas! there is no sound [Sound of soft music heard from within.
To rouse him short of thunder. Hark! the lute,
The lyre, the timbrel; the lascivious tinklings
Of lulling instruments, the softening voices
Of women, and of beings less than women,
Must chime in to the echo of his revel;
While the great king of all we know of earth
Lolls crown'd with roses, and his diadem
Lies negligently by to be caught up
By the first manly hand which dares to snatch it.
Lo, where they come! already I perceive
The reeking odors of the perfumed trains,
And see the bright gems of the glittering girls,
At once his chorus and his council, flash
Along the gallery, and amidst the damsels,
As femininely garb'd, and scarce less female,
The grandson of Semiramis, the man-queen.
He comes! Shall I await him? yes, and front him,
And tell him what all good men tell each other,
Speaking of him and his. They come, the slaves,
Led by the monarch subject to his slaves.

SCENE II.

Enter SARDANAPALUS effemintly dressed, his head crown'd with flowers, and his robe negligently flowing, attended by a train of women and young slaves.

Sar. (speaking to some of his attendants.) Let the pavilion over the Euphrates be unlanded and lit, and furnish'd forth

For an especial banquet; at the hour
Of midnight we will sup there; see nought wanting
And bid the gallery be prepared. There is
A cooling breeze which crisps the broad clear river
We will embark anon. Fair nymphs, who deign
To share the soft hours of Sardanapalus,
We'll meet again in that the sweetest hour,
When we shall gather like the stars above us,
And you will form a heaven as bright as theirs;
Till then, let each be in vers of her time,
And thou, my own Ionian Myrrha,1 choose,
Wilt thou along with them or me? Myr.
My lord—
Sar. My lord, my life! why answerest thou so coldly?
It is the curse of kings to be so answer'd.
Rule thy own hours, thou rulest mine—say, wouldst thou
Accompany our guests, or charm away
The moments from me?
Myr. The king's choice is mine.
Sar. I pray thee say not so: my chiefest joy
Is to contribute to thine every wish.
I do not dare to breathe my own desire,
Lest it should clash with thine; for thou art still Too prompt to sacrifice thy thoughts for others.
Myr. I would remain: I have no happiness
Save in beholding thine; yet—
Sar. Yet! what yet?
Thy own sweet will shall be the only barrier
Which ever rises betwixt thee and me.
Myr. I think the present is the wonted hour
Of council; I will retire. I
SAL. (comes forward and says,) The Ionian slave says well; let her retire.
Sar. Who answers? How now, brother?
Sal. The queen's brother,
And your most faithful vassal, royal lord.
Sar. (addressing his train.) As I have said, let all dispose their hours
Till midnight, when again we pray your presence.
(The court retiring)
(To MYRRHA, who is going.) Myrrha! I thought thou wouldst remain.
Myr. Great king,
Thou didst not say so.
Sar. But thou lookedst it;
I know each glance of those Ionic eyes,
Which said thou wouldst not leave me.
Myr. Sire! your brother—
Sal. His consort's brother, minion of Ionia!
How darest thou name me and not blush?
Sar. Not blush!
Thou hast no more eyes than heart to make her crimson
Like to the dying day on Caucasus,
Where sunset tints the snow with rosy shadows,
And then reproach her with thine own cold blindness,
Which will not see it. What, in tears, my Myrrha?
Sal. Let them flow on; she weeps for more than one,
And is herself the cause of bitter tears.
Sar. Cursed be he who caused those tears to flow.
Sal. Curse not thyself—millions do that already
Sar. Thou dost forget thee: make me not remember
I am a monarch.
Sal. Would thou couldst!
BYRON'S WORKS.

Myr. My sovereign, I pray and thou, too, prince, permit my absence. Sar. Since it must be so, and this churl has check'd Thy gentle spirit, go; but recollect That we must forthwith meet: I had rather lose An empire than thy presence. [Exit MYRRHA. Sar. It may be, Thou wilt lose both, and both for ever! Sar. Brother, I can at least command myself, who listen To language such as this: yet urge me not Beyond my easy nature. Sar. 'Tis beyond That easy, far too easy, idle nature, Which I would urge thee. O that I could rouse thee!

Though 'twere against myself. Sar. By the god Baal: Thy man would make me tyrant. Sar. So thou art. Think'st thou there is no tyranny but that Of blood and chains? the despotism of vice— The weakness and the wickedness of luxury— The negligence—the apathy—the evils Of sensual sloth—produce ten thousand tyrants, Whose delegated cruelty surpasses The worst acts of one energetic master, However harsh and hard in his own bearing. The false and fond examples of thy lusts Corrupt no less than they oppress, and sap In the same moment all thy pageant power And those who should sustain it; so that whether A foreign foe invade, or civil broil Distract within, both will alike prove fatal: The first thy subjects have no heart to conquer; The last they rather would assist than vanquish. Sar. Why what makes thee the mouth-piece of the people?

Sal. Forgiveness of the queen, my sister's wrongs; A natural love unto my infant nephews; Faith to the king, a faith he may need shortly, In more than words; respect for Nimrod's line; Also, another thing thou knowest not. Sar. What's that? Sal. To thee an unknown word. Sar. Yet speak it; I love to learn. Sal. Virtue. Sar. Not know the word! Never was word yet rung so in my ears— Worse than the rabble's shout, or splitting trumpet; I've heard thy sister talk of nothing else. Sal. To change the irksome theme, then, hear of vice. Sar. From whom? Sal. Even from the winds, if thou couldst listen Unto the echoes of the nation's voice. Sar. Come, I'm indulgent, as thou knowest, patient, As thou hast often proved—speak out, what moves thee?

Sal. Thy peril. Sar. Say on. Sal. Thus, then: all the nations, For they are many, whom thy father left In heritage, are loud in wrath against thee. Sar. 'Gainst me! What would the slaves say?

Sal. A king.
SARDANAPALUS.

Sal. What means the king?

Sar. To worship your new god
And ancient conqueror. Some wine, I say.

Enter Cupbearer.

Sar. (addressing the Cupbearer.) Bring me the golden goblet thick with gems,
Which bears the name of Nimrod's chalice. Hence!
Fill full, and bear it quickly. [Exit Cupbearer.

Sal. Is this moment
A fitting one for the(resumption of)
Thy yet unslept-off revels?

Re-enter Cupbearer, with wine.

Sar. (taking the cup from him.) Noble kinsman,
If these barbarian Greeks of the far shores
And skirts of these our realms lie not, this Bacchus
Conquered the whole of India, did he not?

Sal. He did, and thence was deem'd a deity.

Sar. Not so:—of all his conquests a few columns
Which may be his, and might be mine, if I Thought them worth purchase and conveyance, are
The landmarks of the seas of gore he shed,
The realms he wasted, and the hearts he broke.
But here, here in this goblet is the title
To immortality—the immortal grape
From which he first express'd the soul, and gave
To gladden that of man, as some atonement
For the victorious mischief he had done.
Had it not been for this, he would have been
A mortal still in name as in his grave;
And, like my ancestor Semiramis,
A sort of semi-glorious human monster.
Here's that which defined him—let it now
Humanize thee; my sunder, chiding brother,
Pledge me to the Greek god!

Sal. For all thy realms
I would not so blasphome our country's creed.

Sar. That is to say, thou thinkest him a hero,
That he shed blood by oceans; and no god,
Because he turn'd a fruit to an enchantment,
Which cheers the sad, revives the old, inspires
The young, makes Weariness forget his toil,
And Fear her danger; opens a new world.
When this, the present, falls. Well, then I pledge thee
And him as a true man, who did his utmost
In good or evil to surprise mankind. [Drinks.

Sal. Wilt thou resume a revel at this hour?

Sar. And if I did, 'twere better than a trophy,
Being bought without a tear. But that is not
My present purpose: since thou wilt not pledge me,
Continue what thou pleasest.

[To the Cupbearer.) Boy, retire. [Exit Cupbearer.

Sal. I would but have recall'd thee from thy dream:
Better by me awaken'd than rebellion.

Sar. Who should rebel? or why? what cause?
What pretext?

I am the lawful king, descended from
A race of kings who knew no predecessors.
What have I done to thee, or to the people,
That thou shouldst rail, or they rise up against me?

Sal. Of what thou hast done to me, I speak not.

Sar. But thou think'st that I have wrong'd the queen: is't not so?

Sal. Think! Thou hast wrong'd her!

Sar. Patience, prince, and hear me.

She has all power and splendor of her station,
Respect, the tutelage of Assyria's heirs,
The homage and the appanage of sovereignty.
I married her as monarchs wed—for state,
And loved her as most husbands love their wives.
If she or thou supposedst I couldlink me
Like a Chaldæan peasant to his mate,
He knew nor me, nor monarchs, nor mankind.

Sal. I pray thee, change the theme: my blood dissains
Complaint, and Salemenes' sister seeks not
Reluctant love even from Assyria's lord!
Nor would she deign to accept divided passion
With foreign strumpets and Ionian slaves.
The queen is silent.

Sar. And why not her brother?

Sal. I only echo thee the voice of empires,
Which he who long neglects not long will govern.

Sar. The ungrateful and ungracious slaves! they murmur
Because I have not shed their blood, nor led them
To dry into the desert's dust by myriads,
Or whiten with their bones the banks of Gangis,
Nor dehast them with savage laws,
Nor sweated them to build up pyramids,
Or Babylonian walls.

Sal. Yet these are trophies
More worthy of a people and their prince
Than songs, and lutes, and feasts, and concubines,
And lavish'd treasures, and comtedum virtus.

Sar. Or for my trophies I have founded cities
There's Tarsus and Anchialus, both built
In one day—what could that blood-loving beldame,
My martial grandam, chase Semiramis,
Do more, except destroy them?

Sal. 'Tis most true;
I own thy merit in those Founded cities,
Built for a whim, recorded with a verse
Which shame both them and thee to coming ages.

Sar. Shame me! By Baal, the cities, though well built,
Are not more goodly than the verse! Say what
Thou wilt 'gainst me, my mode of life and rule,
But nothing 'gainst the truth of that brief record.
Why, those few lines contain the history
Of all things human; hear—"Sardanapalus,
The king, and son of Anacyndaraxes,
In one day built Anchialus and Tarsus.
Eat, drink, and love; the rest's not worth a fillip." 4

Sal. A worthy moral, and a wise inscription,
For a king to put up before his subjects!

Sar. Oh, thou wouldst have me doubtless set up edicts—
"Obey the king—contribute to his treasure—
Recruit his phalanx—spoil your blood at bidding—
Fall down and worship, or get up and toil."
Or thus—"Sardanapalus on this spot
Slew fifty thousand of his enemies.
These are their sepulchres, and this his trophy.'
I leave such things to conquerors; enough
For me, if I can make my subjects feel
The weight of human misery less, and glide
Unroaming to the tomb; I take no license
Which I deny to them. We all are men.

Sal. Thy sires have been revered as gods—

Sar. In dust
And death, where they are neither gods nor men!
Tale not of such to me! The worms are gods;
At least they banquet upon your gods.
And died for lack of farther nutriment.
Those gods were merely men; look to their issue—
I feel a thousand mortal things about me,
But nothing godlike, unless it may be
The thing which you condemn, a disposition
To love and to be merciful, to pardon
The follies of my species, and (that's human)
To be indulgent to my own.
Sal. Alas!

The doom of Nineveh is seal'd.—Wo—Wo—
"o the unrival'd city!

Sar. What dost dread?
Sal. Thou art guarded by thy foes; in a few hours
The tempest may break out which overwhelms thee,
And thine and mine; and in another day
What shall be the past of Belus' race.
Sar. What must we dread?

Sal. Ambitious treachery,
Which has environ'd thee with snares; but yet
There is resource: empower me with thy signet
To quell the machinations, and I lay
The heads of thy chief foes before thy feet.
Sar. The heads—how many?

Sal. Must I stay to number,
When even thine own's in peril? Let me go;
Give me thy signet—trust me with the rest.
Sar. I will trust no man with unlimited lives.
When we take those from others, we nor know
What we have taken, nor the thing we give.
Sal. Wouldst thou not take their lives who seek for thine?
Sar. That's a hard question—but, I answer, Yes.
Cannot the thing be done without? Who are they Whom thou suspectest?—Let them be arrested.
Sal. I would thou wouldst not ask me: the next moment
Will send my answer through thy babbling troop
Of paramours, and thence fly o'er the palace,
Even to the city, and so baffle all.—
Trust me.

Sar. Thou knowest I have done so ever:
Take thou the signet. [Gives the signet.]
Sal. I have one more request.—

Sar. Name it.

Sal. That thou this night forbear the banquet
In the pavilion over the Euphrates.

Sar. Forbear the banquet! Not for all the plotters
That ever shook a kingdom! Let them come,
And do their worst: I shall not bleech for them;
Nor rise the sooner; nor forbear the goblet;
Nor crown me with a single rose the less;
Nor lose one joyous hour.—I fear them not.

Sar. But thou wouldst arm thee, wouldst thou not,

If needful?

Sar. Perhaps. I have the goodliest armor, and
A sword of such a temper; and a bow
And javelin, which might furnish Nimrod forth:
A little heavy, but yet not unwieldy.
And now I think on't, 'tis long since I've used them,
Even in the chase. Hast ever seen them, brother?
Sal. Is this a time for such fantastic trifling?—

If need be, wilt thou wear them?

Sar. Will I not?

Oh! if it must be so, and these rash slaves
Will not be ruled with less, I'll use the sword
Fill they shall wish it turn'd into a distaff.
Sal. They say, thy sceptre's turn'd to that already?

Sar. That's false! but let them say so; the old

Greeks,

Of whom our captives often sing, related
The same of their chief hero, Hercules,
Because he loved a Lydian queen: thou seest
The populace of all the nations seize
Each calamity they can to sink their sovereigns.
Sal. They did not speak thus of thy fathers.

Sar. They dared not. They were kept to toil and combat,
And never changed their chains but for their armor
Now they have peace and pastime, and the license
To revel and to rail; it irks me not.
I would not give the smile of one fair girl
For all the popular breath that e'er divided
A name from nothing. What are the rank
Of this vile herd, grown insolent with feeding,
That I should prize their noisy praise, or dread
Their noisome clamor?

You have said they are men
As such their hearts are something.

Sar. So my dogs are
And better, as more faithful—but, proceed;
Thou hast my signet:—since they are tumultuous,
Let them be temper'd, yet not roughly, till
Necessity enforce it. I hate all pain,
Given or received; we have enough within us,
The meanest vassal as the loftiest monarch,
Not to add to each other's natural burden
Of mortal misery, but rather lessen,
By mild reciprocal alleviation,
The fatal penalties imposed on life:
But this they know not, or they will not know.

I have, by Baal! done all I could to soothe them:
I made no wars, I added no new imposts,
I interfered not with their civic lives,
I let them pass their days as best might suit them,
Passing my own as suited me.

Sal. Thou stopp'd short
Of the duties of a king; and therefore
They say thou art unfit to be a monarch
Sar. They lie.—Unhappily, I am unfit
To be aught save a monarch; else for me
The meanest Mede might be the king instead.
Sal. There is one Mede, at least, who seeks to be so.

Sar. What mean'st thou?—'tis thy secret, thou desirest
Few questions, and I'm not of curious nature.
Take the fit steps; and, since necessity
Requires, I sanction and support thee. Ne'er

Was man who more desired to rule in peace
The peaceful only; if they rouse me, better
They had conjured up stern Nimrod from his ashes,
"The mighty hunter." I will turn these realms
To one wide desert chase of brutes, who were,
But would no more, by their own choice, be human.
What they have found me, they believe; that which They yet may find me—shall defy their wish
To speak it worse; and let them thank themselves.

Sal. Then thou at last canst feel?

Sar. Feel! who feels not Ingratitude?

Sal. I will not pause to answer
With words, but deeds. Keep thou awake that energy

Which sleeps at times, but is not dead within thee,
And thou may'st yet be glorious in thy reign,
As powerful in thy realm. Farewell!!

Exit Salemehm

Farewell
SARDANAPALUS.

Can see a smile, unless in some broad banquet's
Intoxicating glare, when the buffoons
Have gorged themselves up to equality
Or I have quaff'd me down to their abasement.
Myrrha, I can hear all these things, these names,
Lord—king—sire—monarch—nay, time was I prized them,
That is, I suffer'd them from—slaves and nobles;
But when they falter from the lips I love,
The lips which have been press'd to mine, a chill
Comes o'er my heart, a cold sense of the falsehood
Of this my station, which represses feeling
In those for whom I have felt most, and makes me
Wish that I could lay down the dull tiara,
And share a cottage on the Caucasus
With thee, and wear no crowns but those of flowers.

Myr. Would that we could!
Sar. And dost thou feel this?—Why?
Myr. Then thou wouldst know what thou canst never know.
Sar. And that is—

The true value of a heart;
At least, a woman's.

Myr. I have proved a thousand—
A thousand, and a thousand.

Hearts?
Sar. I think so.
Myr. Not one! the time may come thou may'st.

It will Hear, Myrrha! Satemenes has declared—
Or why or how he hath divined it, Belus,
Who founded our great realm, knows more than I—
But Satemenes hath declared my throne
In peril.

Myr. He did well.
Sar. And say'st thou so?
Thou whom he spurn'd so harshly, and now dared
Drive from our presence with his savage jeers,
And made thee weep and blush?

Myr. I should do both
More frequently, and he did well to call me
Back to my duty. But thou speakest of peril—
Peril to thee—
Sar. Ay, from dark plots and snares
From Medes—and discontented troops and nations.
I know not what—a labyrinth of things—
A maze of mutter'd threats and mysteries:
Thou know'st the man—it is his usual custom.
But he is honest. Come, we'll think no more on't—
But of the midnight festival.

Myr. 'Tis time
To think of aught save festivals. Thou hast not Spurn'd his sage cautions?
Sar. What?—and dost thou fear
Myr. Fear?—I'm a Greek, and how should I fear death?
A slave, and wherefore should I dread my freedom!
Sar. Then wherefore dost thou turn so pale?

Myr. I love.
Sar. And do not I? I love thee far—far more
Than either the brief life or the wide realm,
Which, it may be, is menaced—yet I blench not.
Myr. That means thou lovest nor thyself nor me
For he who loves another loves himself,
Even for that other's sake. This is too rash—
Kingdoms and lives are not to be so lost.
Sar. Lost!—why who is the aspiring chief who dared
Assume to win them?
BYRON'S

Works.

Who is he should dread
To try so much? When he who is their ruler
Forgets himself, will they remember him?

Sar. Myrrha!

Myr. Frown not upon me: you have smiled
Too often on me not to make those frowns
Bitterer to bear than any punishment
Which they may augur.—King, I am ye. a subject!
Master, I am your slave! Man, I have loved you—
Loved you, I know not by what fatal weakness,
Although a Greek, and born a foe to monarchs—
A slave, and-hating fetters—an Ionian,
And, therefore, when I love a stranger, more
Degraded by that passion than by chains!
Still I have loved you. If that love were strong Enough to overcome all former nature,
Shall it not claim the privilege to save you?

Sar. Save me, my beauty! Thou art very fair,
And I seek of thee love—not safety.

Myr. And without love where dwells security?

Sar. I speak of woman's love.

Myr. The very first
Of human life must spring from woman's breast,
Your first small words are taught you from her lips,
Your first tears quenched by her, and your last sighs
Too often breathed out in woman's hearing,
When men have shrunk from the ignoble care
Of watching the last hour of him who led them.

Sar. My eloquent Ionian! thou speakest music;
The very chorus of the tragic song
I have heard thee talk of as the favorite pastime
Of thy far father-land. Nay, weep not—calm thee.

Myr. I weep not.—But I pray thee, do not speak
About my fathers or their land.

Sar. Yet oft
Thou speakest of them.

Myr. True—true: constant thought
Will overflow in words unconsciously;
But when another speaks of Greece, it wounds me.

Sar. Well, then, how wouldst thou save me, as Thou saidst?

Myr. By teaching thee to save thyself, and not Thyself alone, but these vast realms, from all
The rage of the worst war—the war of brethren.

Sar. Why, child, I lose all war, and warriors—
I live in peace and pleasure: what can man
Do more?

Myr. Alas! my lord, with common men
There needs too oft the show of war to keep
The substance of sweet peace; and for a king,
'Tis sometimes better to be feared than loved.

Sar. And I have never sought but for the last.

Myr. And now art neither.

Sar. Dost thou say so, Myrrha?

Myr. I speak of civic popular love, self-love,
Which means that men are kept in awe and law,
Yet not oppress'd—at least they must not think so;
Or if they think so, deem it necessary,
To ward off worse oppression, their own passions.
A king of feasts, and flowers, and wine, and revel,
And love, and mirth, was never king of glory.

Sar. Glory! what's that?

Myr. Ask of the gods thy fathers.

Sar. They cannot answer; when the priests speak
For them,

For some small addition to the temple.

Myr. Look to the annals of thine empire's founders.

Sar. They are so blotted o'er with blood, I cannot,

But what wouldst have? the empire has been founded
I cannot go on multiplying empires.

Myr. Preserve thine own.

Sar. At least I will enjoy it.

Come, Myrrha, let us on to the Euphrates,
The hour invites, the galley is prepared,
And the pavilion, deck'd for our return,
In fit adornment for the evening banquet,
Shall blaze with beauty and with light, until
It seems unto the stars which are above us
Itself an opposite star; and we will sit
Crown'd with fresh flowers like—

Myr. Victims.

Sar. No, like sovereigns,
The shepherd kings of patriarchal times,
Who knew no brighter gems than summer wreaths
And none but fearless triumphs. Let us on

Enter Pania.

Pan. May the king live for ever!

Sar. Not an hour
Longer than he can love. How my soul hates
This language, which makes life itself a lie,
Flattering dust with eternity. Well, Pania!
Be brief.

Pan. I am charged by Salamenes to Reiterate his prayer unto the king,
That for this day, at least, he will not quit
The palace; when the general returns,
He will adduce such reasons as will warrant
His daring, and perhaps obtain the pardon
Of his presumption.

Sar. What! am I then coo'd?

Pan. Already captive? can I not even breathe
The breath of heaven? Tell prince Salamenes,
Were all Assyria raging round the walls
In mutinous myriads, I would still go forth.

Pan. I must obey, and yet—

Myr. Oh, monarch, listen.
How many a day and moon thou hast reclined
Within these palace walls in silken dalliance,
And never shown thee to thy people's longing;
Leaving thy subjects' eyes ungratified,
The satraps uncontroll'd, the gods unworship'd,
And all things in the anarchy of sloth,
Till all, save evil, slumber'd through the realm
And wilt thou not now tardy for a day,
A day which may redeem thee? Will thou not Yield to the few still faithful a few hours,
For them, for thee, for thy past father's race,
And for thy son's inheritance?

Pan. 'Tis true!
From the deep urgency with which the prince
Despatch'd me to your sacred presence, I
Must dare to add my feeble voice to that
Which now has spoken.

Sar. No, it must not be

Myr. For the sake of thy realm!

Sar. Away!

Pan. For thou
Of all thy faithful subjects, who will rally
Round thee and thine.

Sar. These are mere phantasies;
There is no peril: 'tis a sullen scheme
Of Salamenes to approve his zeal,
And show himself more necessary to us.

Myr. By all that's good and glorious take this Counsel.

Sar. Business to-morrow
SARDANAPALUS.

M yr. Ay, or death to-night.
Ser. W hy let t come then unexpectedly
Midst joy and gentleness, and mirth and love;
So let me fall like the pluck'd rose!—far better
Than thus to be w ith'er'd.
M yr. Then thou wilt not yield,
Even for the sake of all that ever stirr'd
A monarch into action, to forego
A trifling revel.
S er. No.
M yr. Then yield for mine;
For my sake!
S er. Thine, my Myrrha!
M yr. 'Tis the first
Boon which I ever ask'd Assyria's king.
S er. That's true, and we'rt my kingdom must be granted.
Well, for thy sake, I yield me. Pania, hence!
Thou hear'st me.
Pan. And obey. [E xit Pania.
S er. I marvel at thee.
What is thy motive Myrrha, thus to urge me?
M yr. Thy safety; and the certainty that nought
Could urge the prince thy kinsman to require
Thus much from thee, but some impending danger.
S er. And if I do not dread it, why shouldst thou?
M yr. Because thou dost not fear, I fear for thee.
S er. To-morrow thou wilt smile at these vain fancies.
M yr. If the worst come, I shall be where none weep,
And that is better than the power to smile.
And thou?
S er. I shall be king, as heretofore.
M yr. Where?
S er. With Baal, Nimrod, and Semiramis,
Sole in Assyria, or with them elsewhere.
Fate made me what I am—may make me nothing—
But either that or nothing must I be;
I will not live degraded.
M yr. Hadst thou felt
Thus always, none would ever dare degrade thee.
S er. And who will do so now?
M yr. Dost thou suspect none?
S er. Suspect!—that's a spy's office. Oh! we lose
Ten thousand precious moments in vain words,
And rainer fears. Within there,—ye slaves, deck
The hall of Nimrod for the evening revel:
If I must make a prison of our palace,
At least we'll wear our fetters jocundly;
If the Ephratus be forbid us, and
The summer dwelling on its beauteous border,
Here we are still unmenaced. Ho! within there!
[Exit Sardanapalus.
M yr. [solus.] Why do I love this man? My country's daughters
Love none but heroes. But I have no country!
The slave hath lost all save her bonds. I love him;
And that's the heaviest link of the long chain—
To love whom we esteem not. Be it so:
The hour is coming when he'll need all,
And find none. To fall from him now were baser
Than to have stabb'd him on his throne when highest
Would have been noble in my country's creed:
I was not made for either. Could I save him,
I should not love him better, but myself;
And I have need of the last, for I have fallen
In my own thoughts, by loving this soft stranger:
And yet methinks I love him more, perceiving

That he is hated of his own barbarians,
The natural foes of all the blood of Greece.
Could I but wake a single thought like those Which even the Phrygians felt when battling long
'Twixt Ilion and the sea, within his heart,
He would tread down the barbarous crowds, and triumph.
He loves me, and I love him; the slave loves
Her master, and would free him from his vices.
If not, I have a means of freedom still,
And if I cannot teach him how to reign,
May show him how alone a king can leave
His throne. I must not lose him from my sight [Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.
The Portal of the same Hall of the Palace.

Bel es es, [solus.] The sun goes down: methinks
he sets more slowly,
Taking his last look of Assyria's empire;
How red he glares amongst those deepening clouds
Like the blood he predicts. If not in vain,
Thou sun that sinkest, and ye stars which rise,
I have outwatch'd ye, reading ray by ray
The edicts of thy orbs, which make Time tremble.
For what he brings the nations, 'tis the further
Hour of Assyria's years. And yet how calm!
An earthquake should announce so great a fall
A summer's sun discloses it. Yon disk,
To the star-read Chaldean, bears upon
Its everlasting page the end of what
Seem'd everlasting; but oh! thou true sun
The burning oracle of all that live,
As fountain of all life, and symbol of
Him who bestows it, wherefore dost thou limit
Thy lore unto calamity? Why not
Unfold the rise of days more worthy thin
All glorious burst from ocean? why not dart
A beam of hope atwixt the future years,
As of wrath to its days? Hear me! oh! hea me
I am thy worshipper, thy priest, thy servant—
I have gazed on thee at thy rise and fall,
And bow'd my head beneath thy mid-day beams,
When my eye dared not meet thee. I have watch'd
For thee, and after thee, and pray'd to thee,
And sacrificed to thee, and read, and fear'd thee,
And ask'd of thee, and thou hast answer'd—but
Only to thus much: while I speak, he sinks—
Is gone—and leaves his beauty, not his knowledge
To the delighted west, which revels in Its hues of dying glory. Yet what is Death, so it be but glorious? 'Tis a sunset;
And mortals may be happy to resemble
The gods but in decay.

Enter ARBACES, by an inner door.

Arb. Bel es es, why
So rapt in thy devotions? Dost thou stand
Gazing to trace thy disappearing god
Into some realm of undiscover'd day?
Our business is with night—'tis come.
Bel. Gone.

But aon
Arb. Let it roll on—we are ready.
Bel. Yes.
Arb. Would it were over.
Arb. Does the prophet doubt,
To whom the very stars shine victory?
Bel. I do not doubt of victory—but the victor.
Arb. Well, let thy science settle that. Meantime
I have prepared as many glittering spears
As will out-sparkle our allies—your planets.
There is no more to thwart us. The she-king,
That less than woman, is even now upon
The waters with his female mates. The order
Is issued for the feast in the pavilion.
The first cup which he drinks will be the last
Quaid'd by the line of Nimrod.
Bel. Twas a brave one.
Arb. And is a weak one—'tis worn out—we'll mend it.
Bel. Art sure of that?
Arb. Its founder was a hunter—
I am a soldier—what is there to fear?
Bel. The soldier.
Arb. And the priest, it may be; but If you thought thus, or think, why not retain
Your kind of connexions? why stir me up?
Why spur me to this enterprise? your own
No less than mine?
Bel. Look to the sky.
Arb. I look.
Bel. What seest thou?
Arb. A fair summer's twilight, and
The gathering of the stars.
Bel. And midst them, mark
You earliest, and the brightest which so quivers,
As it would quit its place in the blue ether.
Arb. Well?
Bel. 'Tis thy natal rader—thy birth planet.
Arb. (touching his scabbard.) My star is in this scabbard: when it shines,
It shall out-dazzle comets. Let us think
Of what is to be done to justify
Thy planets and their portents. When we conquer,
They shall have temples—ay, and priests—and thou
Shalt be the pontiff of what gods thou wilt;
For I observe that they are ever just,
And own the bravest for the most devout.
Bel. Ay, and the most devout for brave—thou hast not Seen me turn back from battle.

Arb. No; I own thee
As firm in sight as Babylonia's captain,
As skilful in Chaldea's worship; now,
Will it but please thee to forget the priest,
And be the warrior?
Bel. Why not both?
Arb. The better;
And yet it almost shames me, we shall have
So little to effect. This woman's warfare
Degrazes the very conqueror. To have pluck'd
A bold and bloody despot from his throne,
And grappled with him, clashing steel with steel,
That were heroic or to win or fall;
But to upraise my sword against this silkworm,
And hear him whine, it may be—
Bel. Do not deem it:
He has that in him which may make you strive yet;
And were he all you think, his guards are hardy,
And headed by the cool, stern Salemenes.
Arb. They'll not resist.
Bel. Why not? they are soldiers
Arb. True.
And therefore need a soldier to command them.
Bel. That Salemenes is.
Arb. But not their king.
Besides, he hates the effeminate thing that governs
For the queen's sake, his sister. Mark you not
He keeps aloof from all the revels?
Bel. But

Arb. And from the council—there he is ever constant.
Bel. And ever thed; what would you have more
To make a rebel out of? A fool reigning,
His blood dishonor'd, and himself disdain'd;
Why, it is his revenge we work for.
Bel. Could
He but be brought to think so: this, I doubt of.
Arb. What, if we sound him?
Bel. Yes—if the time served

Enter BALEA.
Bal. Satrap's! The king commands your presence at
The feast to-night.
Bel. To hear is to obey.
In the pavilion?
Bel. No; here in the palace.
Arb. How! in the palace? it was not thus order'd.
Bel. It is so order'd now.
Arb. And why?
Bel. I know not
May I retire?

Arb. Stay.
Bel. (to Arb. aside.) Hush! let him go his way.
(Alterately to Bal.) Yes, Bales, thank the mon
Of his imperial robe, and say, his slaves
Will take the crumbs he deigns to scatter from
His royal table at the hour—was't midnight?
Bal. It was: the place the hall of Nimrod. Lords
I humble me before you, and depart. [Exit BALEA
Arb. I like not this same sudden change of place;
There is some mystery: wherefore should he change
it?
Bel. Dost he not change a thousand times a day?
Sloth is of all things the most fanciful—
And moves more parasites in its intents
Than generals in their marches, when they seek
To leave their foe at fault.—Why dost thou muse?
Arb. He loved that gay pavilion,—it was ever
His summer dotage.
Bel. And he loved his queen—
And thrice a thousand harlotry besides—
And he has loved all things by turns, except Wisdom and glory.
Arb. Still—I like it not.
If he has changed—why, so must we: the attack
Were easy in the isolated bower,
Beset with drowsy guards and drunken courtiers;
But in the hall of Nimrod—
Bel. Is it so?
Methought the haughty soldier fear'd to mount
A throne too easily—does it disappoint thee
To find there is a slipperier step or two
Than what was counted on?
Arb. When the hour comes
Thou shalt perceive how far I fear or no.
Thou hast seen my life at stake—and gaily play'd for—
But here is more upon the die—a kingdom.

Bel. I have foretold already—thou wilt win it:
Then on, and prosper.

Arb. Now were I a soothsayer,
I would have boded so much to myself.
But be the stars obey’d—I cannot quarrel
With them, nor their interpreter. Who’s here!

Enter Salemenes.

Sale. Satraps!
Bel. My prince!
Sale. Well met—I sought ye both,
But elsewhere than the palace
Arb. Wherefore so?
Sale. ’Tis not the hour. What hour?
Bel. Midnight, my lord!
Sale. What, are you not invited?
Bel. Oh! yes—we had forgotten.
Sale. Is it usual
Thus to forget a sovereign’s invitation?
Arb. Why—we but now received it.
Sale. Then why here?
Arb. On duty.
Bel. On what duty?
Sale. On the state’s.
We have the privilege to approach the presence,
But found the monarch absent.
Sale. And I too
Am upon duty.
Arb. May we crave its purport?
Sale. To arrest two traitors! Guards! Within there!

Enter Guards.

Sale. (continuing.) Satraps,
Your swords.
Bel. (delivering his.) My lord, behold my scimitar.
Arb. (drawing his sword.) Take mine.
Sale. (advancing.) I will.
Arb. But in your heart the blade—
The hilt quits not this hand.
Sale. (drawing.) If how dost thou brave me?
’Tis well—this saves a trial, and false mercy.
Soldiers, hew down the rebel!
Arb. Soldiers! Ay—

Alone you dare not.
Sale. Alone! foolish slave—
What is there in thee that a prince should shrink from
Of open force? We dread thy treason, not
Thy strength: thy tooth is nought, without its venom—
The serpent’s, not the lion’s. Cut him down.
Sale. (interposing.) Arbaces! Are you mad? Have I not render’d
My sword? Then trust like me our sovereign’s justice.
Arb. No—I will sooner trust the stars thou pratest of
And this slight arm, and die a king at least
Of my own breath and body—so far that None shall else chain them.
Sale. (to the Guards.) You hear him and me.
Take him not—kill.

(The Guards attack Arbaces, who defends himself valiantly and dexterously till they waiver.
Sale. Is it even so; and must

I do the hangman’s office? Recreants, see
How you should fell a traitor.

[SAULEMENES attacks ARBACES]

Enter Sardanapalus and Train.

Sale. Hold your hands—
Upon your lives, I say. What, deaf or drunken?
My sword! O fool, I wear no sword: here, fellow,
Give me thy weapon.

[SAIDANAPALUS snatches a sword from one of the soldiers, and makes between the combatants— they separate.]

Sale. In my very palace!
What hinders me from cleaving you in twain,
Audacious browlers?
Bel. Sire, your justice.
Sale. Or—
Your weakness.
Sale. (raising his sword.) How?
Sale. Strike! so the blow’s repeated
Upon your traitor—whom you spare a moment
I trust, for torture—I’m content.
Sale. What—him?
Who dares assail Arbaces?
Sale. I!
Sale. Indeed!
Prince, you forget yourself. Upon what warrant?
Sale. (showing the signet.) Thine.
Arb. (confused.) The king’s!
Sale. Yes!, and let the king confirm it.
Sale. I parted hot from this for such a purpose
Sale. You parted with it for your safety—I
Employ’d it for the best. Pronounce in person
Here I am but your slave—a moment past
I was your representative.
Sale. Then sheathe
Your swords.

[ARBACES and SALEMEDES return their swords to the scabbards.]
Sale. Mine’s sheathed: I pray you sheathe not yours;
’Tis the sole sceptre left thee now with safety.
Sale. A heavy one; the hilt, too, hurts my hand.

(To a Guard.) Here, fellow, take thy weapon back
Well, sir,
What doth this mean?
Sale. The prince must answer, that
Sale. Truth upon my part, treason upon theirs.
Sale. Treason—Arbaces! treachery and Beloses—
That were an union I will not believe.
Sale. Where is the proof?
Sale. I’ll answer that, if once
The king demands your fellow-traitors’ sworn Arb. (to Sale.) A sword which hath been drawn as oft as thing
Against his foes.
Sale. And now against his brother,
And in an hour or so against himself.
Sale. That is not possible: he dared not; no
No—I’ll not hear of such things. These vile bickerings
Are spawn’d in courts by base intrigues and base.
Hirelings, who live by lies on good men’s lives.
You must have been deceived, my brothers.
Sale. First
Let him deliver up his weapon, and Proclaim himself your subject by that duty,
And I will answer all.
Sale. Why, if I thought so
When they shine on my grave I shall know neither
Bel. For neither, sire, say better.
Sar. I will wait, If it so please you, pontiff, for that knowledge.
In the mean time receive your sword, and know That I prefer your service militant Unto your ministry—not loving either.
Sar. (aside.) His lusts have made him mad. Then I must save him, Spite of himself.
Sar. Please you to hear me, satraps! And chiefly thou, my priest, because I doubt thee More than the soldier; and would doubt thee al, Wert thou not half a warrior: let us part In peace—I'll not say pardon—which must be Earn'd by the guilty; this I'll not pronounce ye, Although upon this breath of mine depends Your own; and, deadlier for ye, on my fears. But fear not—for that I am soft, not fearful— And so live on. Were I the thing some think me, Your heads would now be dripping the last drops Of their attainted gore from the high gates Of this our palace, into the dry dust, Their only portion of the coveted kingdom They would be crown'd to reign o'er—let that pass. As I have said, I will not deem ye guilty, Nor doom ye guiltless. / Albeit better men Than ye or I stand ready to arraign you; And should I leave your fate to sterners judges, And proofs of all kinds, I might sacrifice Two men, who, whatso'ever they now are, were Once honest. Ye are free, sirs.
Arb. Sir, this clemency—
Bel. (interrupting him.) Is worthy of yourself; and, although innocent, We thank—
Sar. Priest! keep your thanksgivings for Belus, His offspring needs none.
Bel. But being innocent—
Sar. Be silent—Guilt is loud. If ye are loyal, Ye are injured men, and should be sad, not grateful.
Bel. So we should be, were justice always done By earthly power omnipotent; but innocence Must oft receive her right as a mere favor.
Sar. That's a good sentence for a homily, Though not for this occasion. Prithee keep it To plead thy sovereign's cause before his people. Bel. I trust there is no cause.
Sar. No cause, perhaps; But many causes—if ye meet with such
In the exercise of your inquisitive function On earth, or should ye read of it in heaven In some mysterious twinkle of the stars, Which are your chronicles, I pray you note, That there are worse things betwixt earth and heaven Than him who ruleth many and slays none; And, hating not himself, yet loves his fellows Enough to spare even those who would not spare Lix Were they once masters—but that's doubtful Satraps!
Your swords and persons are at liberty To use them as ye will—but from this hour I have no call for either. Salamene's!
Follow me.
[Exeunt SARDANAPALUS, SALMENES, and the Train, 50, leaving ARABES and BELISES.
Arb. Beleses!
Bel. Now what think you?
Arb. That we are lost
SARDANAPALUS.

Bel. That we have won the kingdom.
Arb. What? thus suspected—with the sword slung o'er us
But by a single hair, and that still waivering,
To be blown down by his imperious breath
Which spared us—why, I know not.

Bel. But let us profit by the interval.
The hour is still upon our—power the same—
The night: the same we destined. He hath changed
Nothing except our ignorance of all
Suspicion into such a certainty
As must make madness of delay.

Arb. And yet—
Bel. What, doubting still?
Arb. He spared our lives, nay, more,
Saved them from Salemences.

Bel. And how long
Will he so spare? till the first drunken minute.
Arb. Or sober, rather. Yet he did it nobly;
Gave royally what we had forfeited
Basely—
Bel. Say bravely.
Arb. Somewhat of both, perhaps.
But it has touch'd me, and, what'ee betide,
I will no further on.

Bel. And lose the world!
Arb. Lose any thing except my own esteem.
Bel. I blush that we should owe our lives to such
A king of distasts!

Arb. But no less we owe them;
And I'll not blush far more to take the grantor's!
Bel. Thou may'st endure what'ee thou wilt, the stars
Have written otherwise.

Arb. Though they came down,
And marshall'd me the way in all their brightness,
I would not follow.

Bel. This is weakness—worse
Than a scared beldam's dreaming of the dead,
And waking in the dark.—Go to—go to.

Arb. Methought he look'd like Nimrod as he spoke,
Even as the proud imperial statue stands
Looking the monarch of the kings around it,
And sways, while they but ornament, the temple.
Bel. I told you that you had too much despis'd him,
And that there was some royalty within him—
What then? he is the nobler foe.

Arb. But we
The meaner:—Would he had not spared us!

Bel. Wouldst thou be sacrificed thus readily?
Arb. No—but it had been better to have died
Than live ungrateful.

Bel. Oh, the souls of some men.
Thou wouldst digest what some call treason, and Fools treachery—and, behold, upon the sudden,
Because for something or for nothing, this Rash reveler steps, ostentatiously,
'Twixt thee and Salemences, thou art turn'd
Into—what shall I say?—Sardanapalus!
I know no name more ignominious.

Arb. But
An hour ago, who dared to term me such
Had held his life but lightly—as it is,
I must forgive you, even as he forgave us—
Semiramis herself would not have done it.

Bel. No—the queen liked no shares of the kingdom,
Not even a husband.

Arb. I must serve him truly—
Bel. And humbly?
Arb. No, sir, proudly—being honest
I shall be nearer thrones than you to heaven;
And if not quite so haughty, yet more lofty.
You may do your own deeming—you have codes,
And mysteries and corollaries of Right and wrong, which I lack for my direction,
And must pursue but what a plain heart teaches.
And now you know me.

Bel. Have you finish'd?
Arb. Yes—
With you.

Bel. And would, perhaps, betray as well
As quit me?
Arb. That's a sacerdotal thought.
And not a soldier's.

Bel. Be it what you will—
Truce with these wrangelings, and but hear me.

Bel. There is more peril in your subtle spirit
Than in a phalanx.

Bel. If it must be so—
I'll on alone.

Arb. Alone!

Bel. Thrones hold but one.

Bel. But this is fill'd.

Bel. With worse than vacancy
A despised monarch. Look to it, Arbaces:
I have still aid'd, cherish'd, loved, and urged you;
Was willing even to serve you, in the hope
To serve and save Assyria. Heaven itself
Seem'd to consent, and all events were friendly,
Even to the last, till that your spirit shrunk
Into a shallow softness; but now, rather Than see my country languish, I will be
Her savior or the victim of her tyrant,
Or one or both, for sometimes both are one;
And, if I win, Arbaces is my servant.

Arb. Your servant!

Bel. Why not? better than be slave
The pardon'd slave of the Sardanapalus.

Enter Pania.

Pan. My lords, I bear an order from the king.
Arb. It is obey'd ere spoken.

Bel. Notwithstanding,
Let's hear it.

Pan. Forthwith, on this very night,
Repair to your respective satrapies
Of Babylon and Media.

Bel. With our troops?

Pan. My order is unto the satrapies and
Their household train.

Bel. But—

Pan. It must be obey'd
Say, we depart.

Bel. My order is to see you
Depart, and not to bear your answer.

Bel. (aside.) Ay!

Well, sir, we will accompany you hence.

Pan. I will retire to marshal forth the guard
Of honor which befits your rank, and wait
Your leisure, so that it the hour exceeds not.

Bel. Now then obey!
BYRON'S WORKS.

Arb. Doubtless.
Bel. Yes, to the gates
That grate the palace, which is now our prison.
No further.
Arb. Thou hast harp'd the truth indeed!
The realm itself, in all its wide extension,
Yawr's dungeons at each step for thee and me.
Bel. Graves!
Arb. If I thought so, this sword should dig
One more than mine.
Bel. It shall have work enough.
Let me hope better than thou augreest;
At present let us hence as best we may.
Thou dost agree with me in understanding
This order as a sentence?
Arb. Why, what other
Interpretation should it bear? it is
The very policy of orient monarchs—
Pardon and poison—favors and a sword—
A distant voyage, and an eternal sleep.
How many satraps in his father's time—
For he I own is, or at least was, bloodless—
Bel. But will not, cannot be so now.
Arb. I doubt it.
How many satraps have I seen set out
In his sire's day for mighty vice-royalties,
While the tombs are on their path! I know not how,
But they all sicken'd by the way, it was
So long and heavy.
Bel. Let us but regain
The free air of the city, and we'll shorten
The journey.
Arb. 'Twill be shorten'd at the gates,
It may be.
Bel. No; they hardly will risk that.
They mean us to die privately, but not
Within the palace or the city walls,
Where we are known and may have partisans:
If they had meant to slay us here, we were
No longer with the living. Let us hence.
Arb. If I but thought he did not mean my life—
Bel. Fool! hence—what else should despotism alarm'd
Mean? Let us but rejoin our troops, and march.
Arb. Towards our provinces?
Bel. No; towards your kindom.
There's time, there's heart, and hope, and power,
And means,
Which their half measure leaves us in full scope.—
Away!
Arb. And I even yet repenting must Relapse to guilt!
Bel. Self defence is a virtue,
Soe bulwark of all right. Away, I say!
Let's leave this place, the air grows thick and coking,
And the walls have a scent of nightshade—hence!
Let us not leave them time for further council.
Our quick departure proves our civic zeal:
Our quick departure kinders our good escort,
The worthy Pania, from anticipating
The orders of some parasangs from hence;
Nay, there's no other choice, but—hence, I say.

[Exit with ARBACES, who follows reluctantly.

Enter SARDANAPALUS and SALEMOVES.

Sar. Well, all is remedied, and without bloodshed,
That worst of mockery's of a remedy;
W're more secure by these men's exile.
Sal. As he who treads on flowers is from the adder
Twined round their roots.
Sar. Why, what wouldst have me do?
Sal. Undo what you have done.
Sar. Revoke my pardon
Sal. Replace the crown now tottering on yr. temples.
Sar. That were tyrannical.
Sal. But sure.
Sar. We are so.
What danger can they work upon the frontier?
Sal. They are not there yet—never should they be so,
Were I well listened to.
Sar. Nay, I have listend
Impartially to thee—why not to them?
Sal. You may know that hereafter; as it is,
I take my leave to order forth the guard.
Sar. And you will join us at the banquet?
Sal. Sire,
Dispense with me—I am no wassailler:
Command me in all service save the Bacchant's.
Sar. Nay, but 'tis fit to revel now and then.
Sal. And fit that some should watch for those who revel
Too oft. Am I permitted to depart?
Sar. Yes—Stay a moment, my good Salemenes
My brother, my best subject, better prince
Than I am king. You should have been the monarch,
And I—know not what, and care not; but Think not I am insensible to all
Thine honest wisdom, and thy rough yet kind
Thought oft reproving, suffurance of my follies
If I have spared these men against thy counsel,
That is, their lives—it is not that I doubt
The advice was sound; but, let them live: we will not
Cavil about their lives—so let them mend them.
Their banishment will leave me still sound sleep,
Which their death had not left me.
Sal. Thus you run
The risk to sleep for ever, to save traitors—
A moment's pang now changed for years of crime
Still let them be made quiet.
Sar. Tempt me not:
My word is past.
Sal. But it may be recall'd.
Sar. Tis royal.
Sal. And should therefore be decisive
This half indulgence of an exile serves
But to provoke—a pardon should be ful,
Or it is none.
Sar. And who persuaded me
After I had repeal'd them, or at least
Only dismiss'd them from our presence, who Urged me to send them to their satrapies?
Sal. True; that I had forgotten; that is, sire,
If they c'rrch reach their satrapies—why, then,
Reprove me more for my advice.
Sar. And if
They do not reach them—look to it!—in safety,
In safety, mark me—and security—
Look to thine own.
Sal. Permit me to depart;
Their safety shall be cared for.
Sar. Get thee hence, thou
And, prithee, think more gently of thy brother
SARDANAPALUS.

Sal. Sire, I shall ever duly serve my sovereign.

(Sal. exits Saucemen.)

Ser. (solus.) That man is of a temper too severe; Hard but as lofty as the rock, and free From all the taints of common earth—while I Am softer clay, impregnated with flowers; But as our mould is, must the produce be. If I have err’d this time, ’tis on the side Where error sits more lightly on that sense, I know not what to call it; but it recks On me oftimes for pain, and sometimes pleasure, A spirit which seems placed about my heart To court its throbs, not quicken them, and ask Questions which mortal never dared to ask me, Nor Baal, though an oracular deity— Albeit his marble face majestical Frows as the shadows of the evening dim His brows to changed expression, till at times I think the statue looks in act to speak. Away with these vain thoughts, I will be joyous— And here comes Joy’s true herald.

Enter MYRRHA.

Myrr. King! the sky Is overcast, and mists muttering thunder, In-clouds that seem approaching fast, and show In forked flashes a commanding tempest. Will you then quit the palace? Ser. Tempest, sayst thou?

Myrr. Ay, my good lord.

Ser. For my own part, I should be Not ill content to vary the smooth scene, And watch the warring elements; but this Would little suit the silken garments and Smooth faces of our festive friends. Say, Myrrha, Art thou of those who dread the roar of clouds? Myrr. In my own country we respect their voices As auguries of Jove.

Ser. Jove—ay, your Baal— Ours also has a property in thunder, And ever and anon some falling bolt Proves his divinity, and yet sometimes Strikes his own altars.

Myrr. That were a dread omen.

Ser. Yes—’tis for the priests. Well, we will not go forth. Beyond the palace walls to-night, but make Our feast within.

Myrr. Now, Jove be praised! that he Hath heard the prayer thou wouldst not hear. The gods Are kinder to thee than thou to thyself, And flash this storm between thee and thy foes, To shield thee from them.

Ser. Child, if there be peril, Methinks it is the same within these walls As on the river’s brink.

Myrr. Not so; these walls Are high and strong, and guarded. Treason has To penetrate through many a winding way, And busy portal; but in the pavilion There is no bulwark.

Ser. No, nor in the palace, Nor in the fortress, nor upon the top Of cloud-fenced Caucasus, where the eagle sits Nested in pathless clefs, if treachery be; Even as the arrow finds the airy king, The steel will reach the earthly. But be calm; The men, or innocent or guilty, are Banish’d, and far upon their way.

Myrr. They live, then?

Ser. So sanguinary? Thou!

Myrr. I would not shrink From just infliction of due punishment On those who seek your life: ver’t otherwise, I should not merit mine. Besides, you heard The princely Saucemen.

Ser. This is strange; The gentle and the austere both against me, And urge me to revenge.

Myrr. ’Tis a Greek virtue.

Ser. But not a kingly one—I’ll none out; or If ever I indulge in’t, it shall be With kings—my equals.

Myrr. These men sought to be so

Ser. Myrrha, this is too feminine, and springs From fear—

Myrr. For you.

Ser. No matter still, ’tis fear. I have observed your sex, once roused to wrath, Are timidly vindictive to a pitch Of perseverance, which I would not copy. I thought you were exempt from this, as from The childish helplessness of Asian woman.

Myrr. My lord, I am no boaster of my love, Nor of my attributes: I have shared your splendor And will partake your fortunes. You may live To find one slave more true than subject myriads; But this the gods avert! I am content To be beloved on trust for what I feel, Rather than prove it to you in your griefs, Which might not yield to any cares of mine.

Ser. Griefs cannot come where perfect love exists Except to heighten it, and vanish from That which it could not scare away. Let’s in— The hour approaches, and we must prepare To meet the invited guests, who grace our feast.

[Exeunt.]
BYRON'S WORKS.

And not gone tracking it through human ashes,
Making a grave with every footstep.
Zam.  No;
All hearts are happy, and all voices bless
The king of peace, who holds a world in jubilee.
Sar.  Art sure of that? I have heard otherwise,
Some say that there be traitors.
Zam.  Traitors they
Who dare to say so!—'Tis impossible.
What cause?
Sar.  What cause? true,—fill the goblet up,
We will not think of them: there are none such,
Or if there be, they are gone.
All.  Guests, to my pledge!
Down on your knees, and drink a measure to
The safety of the king—the monarch, say I!
The god Sardanapalus!

[Zanes and the Guests kneel, and exclaim—

Mightier than

His father Baal, the god Sardanapalus!

[It thunders as they kneel: some start up in confusion.

Zam.  Why do you rise, my friends? in that strong peal

His father gods consented.

Menaced, rather.

King, wilt thou bear this mad impolicy?
Sar.  Impolicy!—nay, if the sires who reign'd
Before me can be gods, I'll not disgrace
Their lineage. But arise, my pious friends;
Hoard your devotion for the thunderer there;
I seek but to be loved, not worship'd.
All.  Both—
Both you must ever be by all true subjects.
Sar.  Methinks the thunders still increase: it is An awful night.

Oh yes, for those who have
No palace to protect their worshippers.
Sar.  That's true, my Myrrha; and could I convert
My realm to one wide shelter for the wretched,
I'd do it.

Thou'rt no god, then, not to be Able to work a will so good and general,
As thy wish would imply.
Sar.  And your gods, then,
Who can, and do not?

Do not speak of that,
Least we provoke them.
Sar.  True, they love not censure Better than mortals. Friends, a thought has struck me.

Were there no temples, would there, think ye, be
Air worshippers? that is, when it is angry,
And pelting as even now.

The Persian prays

Upon his mountain.
Sar.  Yes, when the sun shines.

And I would ask if this your palace were
Unroof'd and desolate, how many flatterers
Would lick the dust in which the king lay low?
Alt.  The fair Ionian is too sarcastic
Upon a nation whom she knows not well;
The Assyrians know no pleasure but their king's;
And homage is their pride.
Sar.  Nay, pardon, guests.
The fair Greek's readiness of speech.

We honor her of all things next to thee.
Hark! what was that?

Zam.  That! nothing but the jar
Of distant portals shaken by the wind.
Alt.  It sounded like the clash of—hark again
Zam.  The big rain pattering on the roof.
Sar.  No more
Myrrha, my love, hast thou thy shell in order?
Singing me a song of Sappho, her, thou know'st,
Who in thy country thrives—

Enter Pania, with his sword and garments bloody and disordered.  The Guests rise in confusion.

Pan. (to the Guards.)  Look to the portals
And with your best speed to the walls without.
Your arms! To arms! the king's in danger.  Mon.
arch!

Excuse this haste,—'tis faith.
Sar.  Speak on.

Pan.  It is
As Salamenes fear'd; the faithless satraps—

Sar.  You are wounded—give some wine.  Take breath, good Pania.

Pan.  'Tis nothing—a mere flesh wound.  I am worn
More with my speed to warn my sovereign,
Then hurt in his defence.

Well, sir, the rebels?

Pan.  Soon as Arbaces and Beleses reach'd
Their stations in the city, they refused
To march; and on my attempt to use the power
Which I was delegated with, they call'd
Upon their troops, who rose in fierce defiance.

All?

Pan.  Too many.

Spare not of thy free speech
To spare mine ears the truth.

My own slight guard
Were faithful, and what's left of it is still so.

And are these all the force still faithful?

No—

The Bactrians, now led on by Salamenes,
Who since then was on his way, still urged
By strong suspicion of the Median chiefs,
Are numerous, and make strong head against
The rebels, fighting inch by inch, and forming
An orb around the palace, where they mean
To centre all their force, and save the king.

(He hesitates.)  I am charged to—

'Tis no time for hesitation.

Pan.  Prince Salamenes doth implore the king
To arm himself, although but for a moment,
And show himself unto the soldiers: his
Sole presence in this instant might do more
Than host's can do in his behalf.

What, ho! My armor there.

And wilt thou?

Will I not?

Ho, there!—but seek not for the buckler: 'tis
Too heavy—a light cuirass and my sword.

Where are the rebels?

Scarce a furlong's length
From the outward wall, the fiercest conflict rages

Sar.  Then I may charge on horseback. Sfero,
Order my horse out.  There is space enough
Even in our courts, and by the outer gate,
To march half the horsemen of Arabia.

[Exit Sfero for the armor

Myr.  How do I love thee!

Sar.  I ne'er doubted it
SARDANAPALUS.

Myr. But now I know thee.
Sar. (to his Attendant.) Bring down my spear I too—
Where's Salemenes?
Pan. Where a soldier should be,
In the thick of the fight.
Sar. Then hasten to him—is
The path still open, and communication
Left 'twixt the palace and the phalanx?
Pan. 'Twas
When I late left him, and I have no fear;
Our troops were steady, and the phalanx form'd.
Sar. Tell him to spare his person for the present,
And that I will not spare my own—and say, I come.
Pan. There's victory in the very word.

[Exit Pania.
Sar. Altada—Zames—forth, and arm ye! There
Is all in readiness in the armory.
See that the women are bestow'd in safety
In the remote parts; let a guard
Be set before them, with strict charge to quit
The post but with their lives—command it, Zames.
Altada, arm yourself, and return here;
Your post is near our person.

[Exit Zames, Altada, and all save Myrrha.
Enter Sphero and others with the King's Arms, &c.
Sph. King! your armor.
Sar. (arming himself.) Give me the cuirass so—my bárdic; now
My sword; I had forgot the helm—where is it?
That's well—no, 'tis too heavy; you mistake, too,
It was not this I meant, but that which bears
A diadem around it.
Sph. Sire, I deem'd
That too conspicuous from the precious stones
To risk your sacred brow beneath—and, trust me,
This is of better metal, though less rich.
Sar. You deem'd! Are you too turn'd a rebel?
Fellow
Your part is to obey; return, and—no—
It is too late—I will go forth without it.
Sph. At least wear this.
Sar. A mountain on my temples.
Sph. Sire, the meannest
Soldier does not forth thus exposed to battle,
All men will recognize you—for the storm
Has ceased, and the moon breaks forth in her brightness.
Sar. I go forth to be recognized, and thus
Shall be so sooner, Now—my spear I'm arm'd.
[In going stops short, and turns to Sphero.
Sphro—I had forgotten, bring the mirror.*
Sph. The mirror, sire?
Sar. Yes, sir, of polish'd brass,
Brought from the spoils of India—but be speedy.

[Exit Sphero.
Sar. Myrrha, retire unto a place of safety.
Why went you not forth with the other damsel's?
Myr. Because my place is here.
Sar. And when I am gone—
Myr. I follow
Sar. You! to battle?
Myr. If it were so,

*Twere not the first Greek girl that trod the path
I will await here your return.
Sar. The place
Is spacious, and the first to be sought out,
If they prevail; and, if it should be so,
And I return not—
Myr. Still we meet again
Sar. How?
Myr. In the spot where all must meet at last—
In Hades! if there be, as I believe,
A shore beyond the Styx: and if there be not,
In ashes.
Sar. Darest thou so much?
Myr. I dare all things—
Except survive what I have loved, to be
A rebel's booty: forth, and do your bravest.

[Re-enter Sphero with the mirror.
Sar. (looking at himself.) This cuirass fits me well, the baldric better,
And the helm next at all. Methinks I seem [Flings away the helmet after trying it again
Passing well in these toys; and now to prove them.
Altada! Where's Altada?
Sph. Waiting, sire,
Without: he has your shield in readiness.
Sar. True; I forgot he is my shield-bearer
By right of blood, derived from age to age.
Myrrha, embrace me;—yet once more—once more
Love me, what'er betide. My chiefest glory
Shall be to make me worthier of your love.
Myr. Go forth, and conquer!

[Exit SARDANAPALUS and Sphero.
Now, I am alone,
All are gone forth, and of that all how few Perhaps return. Let him but vanquish, and Me perish! If he vanquish not, I perish;
For I will not outlive Him; he has wound
About my heart, I know not how nor why.
Not for that he is king; for now his kingdom
Rocks underneath his throne, and the earth
To yield him no more & it than a grave;
And yet I love him more. Oh, mighty Jove!
Forgive this monstrous love for a barbarian,
Who knows not of Olympus! yes, I love him
Now, now, far more than—Hark—to the wa.
shout!
Methinks it nears me. If it should be so,
[She draws forth a small vial.
This cunning Cohlchan poison, which my father
Learn'd to compound on Euxine shores, and taught me a
How to preserve, shall free me! It had freed me
Long ere this hour, but that I loved, until
I half forget I was a slave—where all
Are slaves save one, and proud of servitude,
So they are served in turn by something lower
In the degree of bondage, we forget
That shackles worn like ornaments no less
Are chains. Again that shout! and now the clash
Of arms—and now—and now—

[Enter Altada.
Alt. Ho, Sphero, ho!
Myr. He is not here; what wouldst thou with him? How
Goes on the conflict?
Alt. Dubiously and fiercely,
Myr. And the king?
BYRON'S WORKS.

Alt. Like a king. I must find Siero.
And bring him a new spear and his own helmet.
He fights till now bareheaded, and by far
Too much exposed. The soldiers knew his face,
And the foe too; and in the moon's broad light,
His silk tiara and his flowing hair
Make him a mark too royal. Every arrow
Is pointed at the fair hair and fair features,
And the broad fillet which grows both.

Mjr. Ye gods,
Who falminate o'er my father's land, protect him!
Were you sent by the king?

Alt. By Salemenes,
Who sent me privily upon this charge,
Without the knowledge of the careless sovereign.
The king! the king fights as he revels! ho!
What, Siero! I will seek the army—
He must be there. [Exit Altada—

Mjr. 'Tis no dishonor—no—
'Tis no dishonor to have loved this man.
I almost wish now, what I never wish'd
Before, that he were Grecian. If Alcides
Were shamed in weeping Lydian Omphale's
She-garb, and wielding her vile distaff, surely
He, who springs up a Hercules at once,
Nursed in effeminate arts from youth to manhood,
And rushes from the banquet to the battle,
As though it were a bed of love, deserves
That a Greek girl should be his paramour,
And a Greek bard his minstrel, a Greek tomb
His monument. How goes the strife, sir?

Enter an Officer.

Officer. Lost,
Lost almost past recovery. Zames! Where
Is Zames?

Mjr. Posted with the guard appointed
To watch before the apartment of the women.

[Mjr. (solus.) He's gone; and told no more than That all's lost!
What need have I to know more? In those words,
Those little words, a kingdom and a king,
A line of thirteen ages, and the lives
Of thousands, and the fortunes of all left
With life, are merged; and I, too, with the great,
Like a small bubble breaking with the wave
Which bore it, shall be nothing. At the least
My fate is in my keeping: no proud victor
Shall count me with his spoils.

Enter Pania. Away with me,
Myrrha, without delay; we must not lose
A moment—all that's left us now.

Mjr. The king?

PANIA. [raising his sword to despatch him, exclaims]—Now call upon thy planets; will they shoot
From the sky to preserve their seer and credit?
[They fight; Belbeses is wounded and disarmed.

Bel. But not by thee.

Pania is cast, and rescued Belbeses.

Bel. They assail the King, who, in turn, is rescued by a party of his Soldiers, who drive the Rebels off.

The villain was a prophet after all.
Upon them—ho! there—victory is ours.

[Mjr. (to Pan.) Pursue! Why stand'st thou here, and leave the ranks
Of fellow-soldiers conquering without thee?

PANIA. The King's command was not to quit thee.

Mjr. Think not of me—a single soldier's arm.
"Must not be wanting now. I ask no guard,
I need no guard: what, with a world at stake,
Keep watch upon a woman? Hence, I say,
Or thou art ashamed! Nay, then I will go forth,
A feeble female, 'midst their desperate strife,
And bid thee guard me there—where thou shouldst shield
thy sovereign. [Exit MYRRAH.
Pan. Yet stay, damsel! She's gone.
If aught of ill betide her, better I
Had lost my life. Sardanapalus holds her
Far dearer than his kingdom, yet he fights
For that too; and can I do less than he?
Who never flash'd a scimitar till now?
Myrrha, return, and I obey you, though
In disobedience to the monarch. [Exit PANIA.

Enter ALTADA and SYERO by an opposite door.

Alt. Myrrha! What! gone? yet she was here when the fight raged,
And Pania also. Can aught have befallen them?
Sfe. I saw both safe, when late the rebels fled:
They probably are but retified to make
Their way back to the harem.
Alt. If the king
Prove victor, as it seems even now he must,
And miss his own Ionian, we are doom'd
To worse than captive remains.
Sfe. Let us trace them;
She cannot be fled far; and, found, she makes
A richer prize to our soft sovereign
Than his recover'd kingdom.
Alt. Balz himself
Ne'er fought more fiercely to win empire, than
His silken son to save it; he defies
All augury of foes or friends; and like
The close and sultry summer's day, which bodes
A twilight tempest, bursts forth in such thunder
As sweeps the air, and deluges the earth.
The man's inscrutable.
Sfe. Not more than others.
All are the sons of circumstance: away—
Let's seek the slave out, or prepare to be Tortur'd for his infatuation, and Condemn'd without a crime. [Exeunt.

Enter SALEMENES and SOLDIERS, &c.

Sal. The triumph is Flattering: they are beaten backward from the palace,
And we have open'd regular access
To the troops station'd on the other side
Euphrates, who may still be true; nay, must be,
When they hear of our victory. But where
Is the chief victor? whose the king?

Enter SARDANAPALUS, cum suis, &c., and MYRRAH.

Sar. Here, brother.
Sal. Unhurt, I hope.
Sar. Not quite; but let it pass.
We've clear'd the palace—
Sal. And I trust the city.
Our numbers gather: and I've ordered onward
A cloud of Persians, hitherto reserved, all fresh and gay to pour'd upon them
In their retreat, which soon will be a flight.
Sar. It is already, or at least they march'd
Faster than I could follow with my Bactrians,
Who spared no speed. I am spent: give me a seat
Sal. There stands the throne, sire.
Sar. 'Tis no place to rest on
For mind nor body: let me have a couch,
A peasant's stool, I care not what: so—now
I breathe more freely.
Sal. This great hour has proved
The brightest and most glorious of your life.
Sar. And the most tiresome. Where's my cup bearer?
Bring me some water.
Sal. (smiling.) 'Tis the first time he Ever had such an order: even I,
Your most austere of counsellors, would now
Suggest a purpler beverage.
But there's enough of that shed: as for wine,
I have learn'd to-night the price of the pure element
'thrice have I drank of it, and thrice renew'd,
With greater strength than the grape ever gave me
My charge upon the rebels. Where's the soldier
Who gave me water in his helmet?
One of the Guards.
Sar. Slain, sire! An arrow pierced his brain, while, scattering
The last drops from his helm, he stood in act to place it on his brows.
Sar. Slain! unrewarded!
And slain to serve my thirst: that's hard, poor slave.
Had he but lived, I would have gorged him with Gold: all the gold of earth could ne'er repay
The pleasure of that draught; for I was parch'd
As I am now. [They bring water—he drinks.
I live again—from henceforth
The goblet I reserve for hours of love,
But war on water.
Sal. And that bandage, sire,
Which girds your arm?
Sar. A scratch from brave Beleses.
Myr. Oh! he is wounded!
Sar. Not too much of that;
And yet it feels a little stiff and painful,
Now I am cooler.
Myr. You have bound it with—
Sar. The fillet of my diadem: the first time
That ornament was ever aught to me,
Save an encumbrance.

Myr. (to the attendants.) Summon speedily
A leech of the most skilful, pray, retire;
I will unbind your wound and tend it.
Sar. Do so,
For now it throbs sufficiently; but what
Know'st thou of wounds? yet wherefore do I ask?
Know'st thou, my brother, where I lighted on
This minion?
Sal. Herding with the other females,
Like frighten'd antelopes.
Sar. No: like the dam
Of the young lion, femininely raging,
(And femininely mea'neth furiously.)
Because all passions in excess are female,)
Against the hunter flying with her cub,
She urged on with her voice and gesture, and
Her floating hair and flashing eyes, the soldiers,
In the pursuit.
Sal. Indeed!
You see, this night
Made warriors of more than me. I paused
To look upon her, and her kindled cheek;
Her large black eyes, that flash’d through her long hair
As it stream’d o’er her; her blue veins that rose
Along her most transparent brow; her nostril
Dilated from its symmetry; her lips
Apart; her voice that clove through all the din,
As a lute’s pierceth through the cymbal’s blast,
Jarr’d but not drown’d by the loud brattling; her Waved arms, more dazzling with their own born whiteness
Than the steel her hand held, which she caught up
From a dead soldier’s grasp; all these things made
Her seem unto the troops a prophetess
Of Victory, or Victory herself,
Come down to hail us her’s.

Sal. (aside.)
This is too much;
Again the love-fit’s on him, and all’s lost,
Unless we turn his thoughts.
(Aside.) But pray thee, sire,
Think of your wound—you said even now ‘twas painful.

Sar. That’s true; too; but I must not think of it.

Sal. I have look’d to all things needful, and will now
Receive reports of progress made in such Orders as I had given, and then return
To hear your further pleasure.

Sar. Be it so.
Sal. (in retiring.) Myrrha!

Myr. Prince!

Sal. You have shown a soul to-night,
Which, were he not my sister’s lord—But now
I have no time: thou lovest the king?

Myr. I love
Sardanapalus.

Sal. But wouldst he have him king still?

Myr. I would not have him less than what he should be.

Sal. Well then, to have him king, and yours, and all
He should, or should not be; to have him live,
Let him not sink back into luxury.
You have more power upon his spirit than
Wisdom within these walls, or fierce rebellion
Raging without: look well that he relapse not.

Myr. There needed not the voice of Salemenes
To urge me on to this: I will not fail.
All that a woman’s weakness can—

Sal. Is power
Omnipotent o’er such a heart as his;
Exert it wisely.

Sar. Myrrha! what, at whispers
With my stern brother? I shall soon be jealous.

Myr. (smiling.) You have cause, sire; for on the earth there breathes not
A man more worthy of a woman’s love—
A soldier’s trust—a subject’s reverence—
A king’s esteem—the whole world’s admiration!

Sar. Praise him, but not so warmly. I must not Hear those sweet lips grow eloquent in aught
That throws me into shade; yet you speak truth.

Myr. And now retire, to have your wound look’d to.
Pray, lean on me.

Sar. Yes love but not from pain.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

SARDANAPALUS discovered sleeping upon a Couch and occasionally disturbed in his slumbers, with MYRRA watching.

Myr. (sole, gazing.) I have stolen upon his rest,
‘If rest it be,
Which thus convulses slumber: shall I wake him?
No, he seems calmer. Oh, thou God of Quiet!
Whose reign is o’er seal’d eyelids and soft dreams,
Or deep, deep sleep, so as to be unfathom’d,
Look like thy brother, Death—so still—so stillless—
For then we are happiest; as it may be, we
Are happiest of all within the realm
Of thy stern, silent, and unawakening twin
Again he moves—again the play of pain
Shoots o’er his features, as the sudden gust
Crispe the reluctant lake that lay so calm
Beneath the mountain shadow; or the blast
Ruffles the autumn leaves, that drooping cling
Faintly and motionless to their loved boughs.
I must awake him—yet not yet: who knows
From what I rouse him? It seems pain; but if I quicken him to heavier pain? The fever
Of this tumultuous night, the grief too of His wound, though slight, may cause all this, and shake
Me more to see than him to suffer. No:
Let nature use her own maternal means,—
And I await to second not disturb her.

Sar. (awakening.) Not so; although ye multiplied
the stars,
And gave them to me as a realm to share
From you and with you! I would not so purchase
The empire of eternity. Hence—hence—
Old hunter of the earliest brutes! and ye,
Who hunted fellow-creatures as if brutes!
Once bloody mortals—and now bloodier idols,
If your priests lie not! And thou, ghastly beldame!
Dripping with dusky gore, and trampling on
The carcases of Inde—Away! away!
Where am I? Where the spectres? Where—No—
That is no false phantom: I should know it ’midst
All that the dead dare gloomily raise up
From their black gulf to daunt the living. Myrrha:

Myr. Alas! thou art pale, and on thy brow the drops
Gather like night dew. My beloved, hush—
Calm thee. Thy speech seems of another world,
And thou art loved of this. Be of good cheer;
All will go well.

Sar. Thy hand—so—’tis thy hand;
’Tis flesh; grasp—clasp—yet closer, till I feel Myself that which I was.

Myr. At least know me
For what I am, and ever must be—thine.

Sar. I know it now. I know this life again.
Ah, Myrrha! I have been where we shall be.

Myr. My lord!

Sar. I’ve been in’ the grave—where the worms are lords,
And kings are—But I did not deem it so;
I thought ’twas nothing.

Myr. So it is; except Unto the timid, who anticipate
That which may never be.
Sar. Oh, Myrrha! if Sleep show such things, what may not death disclose?
Myr. I know no evil death can show, which life Has not already shown to those who live Embodied longest. If there be indeed A shore, where mind survives, 'twill be as mind, All unincorporate: or if there fits A shadow of this cumbersome clag of clay, Which stalks, methinks, between our souls and heaven, And feters us to earth—at least the phantom, Whate'er it have to fear, will not fear death.
Sar. I fear it not; but I have felt—have seen— A legion of the dead.
Myr. And so have I. The dust we tread upon was once alive, And wretched. But proceed: what hast thou seen? Speak it, 'twill lighten thy dimm'd eyes:
Sar. Methought—
Myr. Yet pause, thou art tired—in pain—exhausted; all Which can impair both strength and spirit; seek Rather to sleep again.
Sar. Not now—I would not dream; though I know it now to be a dream What I have dreamt:—and canst thou bear to hear it?
Myr. I can bear all things, dreams of life or death, Which I participate with you, in semblance Or full reality.
Sar. And this look'd real, I tell you: after that these eyes were open, I saw them in their flight—for then they fled.
Myr. Say on.
Sar. I saw, that is, I dream'd myself Here—here—every where we are, guests as we were, Myself a host that deem'd himself but guest, Willing to equal all in social freedom; But, on my right hand and my left, instead Of these and Zamas, and our accustomed meeting, Was ranged on my left hand a haughty, dark, And deadly face—I could not recognize it, Yet I had seen it, though I knew not where; The features were a giant's, and the eye Was still, yet lighted; his long locks curl'd down On his vast bust whence a huge quiver rose With shafts-heads feather'd from the eagle's wing, That peep'd up bristling through his serpent hair. I invited him to fill the cup which stood Between us, but he answer'd not—I fill'd it— He took it not, but stared upon me, till I remembr'd the fix'd glare of his eye, and frizzled upon him as a king should frown— His frown'd not in his turn, but look'd upon me With the same aspect, which appall'd me more, Because he changed not; and I turn'd for refuge To milder guests, and sought them on the right, Where thou wert wont to be. But—

[He pauses.
Myr. What instead? In thy own chair—thy own place in the banquet I touched my sweet face in the circle—but Instead—a gray-hair'd, wither'd, bloody-eyed, And bloody-handed, ghastly, ghostly thing, Female in garb, and crown'd upon the brow, Furrow'd with years yet snarcing with the passion

Of vengeance, leering too with that of lust, Sate:—my veins curdled.

Myr. Is this all? Upon Her right hand—her lank, bird-like right hand stood A goblet, bubbling o'er with blood; and on Her left, another, fill'd with—what I saw not, But turn'd from it and her. But all along The table sate a range of crowned wretches, Of various aspects, but of one expression.
Sar. And felt you not this a mere vision?

No. It was so palpable, I could have touch'd them I turn'd from one face to another, in The hope to find at last one which I knew Ere I saw theirs; but no—all turn'd upon me, And stared, but neither ate nor drank, but stared Till I grew stone, as they seem'd half to be, Yet breathing stone, for I felt life in them, And life in me: there was a horrid kind Of sympathy between us, as if they Had lost a part of death to come to me, And I the half of life to sit by them. We were in an existence all apart From heaven or earth—and rather let me see Death all than such a being! Myr. And the end?

Sar. At last I sate marble, as they, when rose The hunter, and the crew; and smiling on me— Yes, the enlarged but noble aspect of The hunter smiled upon me—I sho'd say, His lips, for his eyes moved not—and the woman's Thin lips relax'd to something like a smile. Both rose, and the crown'd figures on each hand Rose also, as if aping their chief shades— Mere mimics even in death—but I sate still: A desperate courage crept through every limb, And at the last I fear'd them not, but laugh'd Full in their phantom faces. But then—then The hunter laid his hand on mine: I took it, And grasp'd it—but it melted from my own, While he too vanish'd, and left nothing but The memory of a hero, for he look'd so.

Myr. And was: the ancestor of heroes, too, And thine less no.

Sar. Ay, Myrrha, but the woman The female who remain'd, she flew upon me, And burnt my lips up with her noisome kisses, And flinging down the goblets on each hand, Methought their poisons flow'd around us, till Each form'd a hideous river. Still she clung The other phantoms, like a row of statues, Stood dull as in our temples, but she still Embraced me, while I shrunk from her, as if, In lieu of her remote descendant, I Had been the son who slew her for her incest. Then—then a chaos of all lost things Throng'd thick and shapeless: I was dead, ya feeling— Buried, and raised again—consumed by worms, Purged by the flames, and wither'd in the air! I can fix nothing further of my thoughts, Save that I long'd for thee, and sought for thee, In all these agonies, and woke and found thee.

Myr. So shalt thou find me ever at thy side, Here and hereafter, if the last may be. But think not of these things—the mere creations Of late events, acting upon a frame
Unused to toil, yet overwrought by toil
Such as might try the sternest.

I am better.

Now that I see a more, what was seen
Seems nothing.

Enter Salamenes.

Sal. Is the king so soon awake?
Sar. Yes, brother, and I saw I had not slept;
For all the predecessors of our line
Rose up, methought, to drag me down to them.
My father was among them, too; but he,
I knew not why, kept from me, leaving me
Between the hunter-founder of our race,
And her, the homicide and husband-killer,
Whom you call glorious.

Sal. So I term you also,
Now you have shown a spirit like to hers.
By daybreak I propose that we set forth,
And charge once more the rebel crew, who still Keep gathering head, repulsed, but not quite quelled.
How wears the night?

Sal. There yet remain some hours
Of darkness: use them for your further rest.
Sar. No, not to-night, if ‘tis not gone: methought
I pass’d hours in that vision.

Scarcely one;
I watch’d by you: it was a heavy hour,
But an hour only.
Sar. Let us then hold council;
To-morrow we set forth.
Sal. But ere that time,
I had a grace to seek.
Sar. ‘Tis granted.
Sal. Hear it.

Ere you reply too readily; and ‘tis
For your ear only.

Myr. Prince, I take my leave.

Exit Myrrha.

Sal. That slave deserves her freedom.
Sar. Freedom only!

That slave deserves to share a throne.
Sal. Your patience—
‘Tis not yet vacant, and ‘tis of its partner
I come to speak with you.
Sar. How! of the queen?
Sal. Every so. I judged it fitting for their safety,
That, ere the dawn, she sets forth with her children
For Laphigniosa, where our kinsman Cotta
Governs; and there at all events secure
My nephews and your sons their lives, and with them
Their just pretensions to the crown in case—
Sal. I perish—as is probable: well thought—
Let them set forth with a sure escort.

Sal. That
Is all provided, and the galley ready
To drop down the Euphrates; but ere they Depart, will you not see—
Sar. My sons? It may
Unman my heart, and the poor boys will weep;
And what can I reply to comfort them,
Save with some hollow hopes, and ill-worn smiles?
You know I cannot sojourn.
Sal. But you can feel;
At least, I trust so: in a word, the queen
Requests to see you ere you part—for ever.
Sar. Unto what end? what purpose? I will grant
Aught—all that she can ask—but such a meeting.
Sal. You know, or ought to know, enough of

Since you have studied them so steadily,
That what they ask in aught that touches on
The heart, is dearer to their feelings or
Their fancy, than the whole external world.
I think as you do of my sister’s wish;
But ‘twas her wish—she is my sister—you
Her husband—will you grant it?
Sar. ‘Twill be useless
But let her come.
Sal. I go.

Exit Salamenes.

Sar. We have lived asurfer
Too long to meet again—and now to meet!
Have I not cares now, and pangs enough
To bear alone, that we must mingle sorrows,
Who have ceased to mingle love?

Re-enter Salamenes and Zarina.

Sal. My sister! Courage, Shame not our blood with trembling, but remember
From whence we sprung. The queen is present, sire.
Zar. I pray thee, brother, leave me.
Sal. Since you ask it.

Exit Salamenes.

Zar. Alone with him! How many a year has past
Though we are still so young, since we have met,
Which I have worn in widowhood of heart.
He loved me not: yet he seems little changed—
Changed to me only—would the change were mutual!
He speaks not—scarcely regards me—not a word—
Nor look—yet he was soft of voice and aspect—
Indifferent, not austere. My lord!
Sar. Zarina!
Zar. No, not Zarina—do not say Zarina.
That tone—that word—annihilate long years,
And things which make them longer.
Sar. ‘Tis not too late
To think of these past dreams. Let’s not reproach—
That is, reproach me not—for the last time—
Zar. And first. I ne’er reproach’d you.
Sar. ‘Tis most true,
And that reproach comes heavier on my heart
Than—But our hearts are not in our own power.
Zar. Nor hands; but I gave both.
Sar. Your brother said
It was your will to see me, ere you went
From Nineveh with—(He hesitates.)
Zar. Our children: it is true.
I wish’d to thank you that you had not divided
My heart from all that’s left it now to love—
Those who are yours and mine, who look like you,
And look upon me as you look’d upon me
Once—but they have not changed.
Sar. Nor ever will
I fail would have them dutiful.
Zar. I cherish
Those infants, not alone from the blind love
Of a fond mother, but as a fond woman.
They are now the only tie between us.
Sar. Deem not
I have not done you justice: rather make them
Resemble your own line than their own sire.
I trust them with you—to you: fit them for
A throne, or, if that be denied—You have heard
Of this night’s tumults?
Zar. I had half forgotten,
And could have welcomed any grief save yours,
Which gave me to behold your face again.
SAR DAN APA LUS.

Sar. The throne—believe it not in fear—but 'tis
In peril; they perhaps may never mount it:
But set them not for this lose sight of it.
I will dare all things to bequeath it them;
But if I fail, then they must win it back
Bravely—and, won, wear it wisely, not as I
Have wasted down my royalty.

Zar. They ne'er
Shall know from me of aught but what may honor
Their father's memory.

Sar. Rather let them hear
The truth from you than from a ramping world.
If they be in adversity, they'll learn
Too soon the scorn of crowds for crownless princes,
And find that all their father's sins are theirs.
My boys!—I could have borne it were I childless.
Zar. Oh! do not say so—do not poison all
My peace left, by unwhipping that thou wert
A father. If thou conquerest, they shall reign,
And honor him who saved the realm for them,
So little cared for as his own; and if—

Sar. 'Tis lost, all earth will cry out thank your father!
And they will swell the echo with a curse.
Zar. That they shall never do; but rather honor
The name of him, who, dying like a king,
In his last hours did more for his own memory
Than many monarchs in a length of days,
Which date the flight of time, but make no annals.
Sar. Our annals draw per chant unto their close;
But at the least, whate'er the past, their end
Shall be like their beginning—memorable.

Zar. Yet, be not rash—be careful! of your life,
Live but for those who love.

Sar. And who are they?
A slave, who loves from passion—I'll not say
Ambition—she has seen thrones shake, and loves;
A few friends, who have revell'd till we are
As one, for they are nothing if I fall;
A brother I have injured—children whom
I have neglected, and a spouse—

Zar. Who loves.

Sar. And pardons?

Zar. I have never thought of this,
And cannot pardon till I have condemn'd,
My wife!—

Zar. New blessings on thee for that word!
I never thought to hear it more—from thee.

Sar. Oh! thou wilt hear it from my subjects Yes—
These slaves whom I have nurtured, pamper'd, fed,
And sworn with peace, and gorg'd with plenty, till
They reign themselves—all monarchs in their mansions,
Now swarm forth in rebellion, and demand
His death, who made their lives a jubilee;
While the few upon whom I have no claim
Are faithful! This is true, yet monstrous.

Zar. Perhaps too natural; for benefits
Turn poison in bad minds.

Sar. And good ones make Good out of evil. Happier than the bee,
Which hives not but from wholesome flowers.

Zar. Then reap
The honey, nor inquire whence 'tis derived
Be satisfied—you are not all abandon'd.

Sar. My life insures me that. If sw long, bethink
you,
Were not I yet a king, should I be mortal;

That is, where mortals are, not where they must be.

Zar. I know not. But yet live for my—that is,
Your children's sake!

Sar. My gentle, wrong'd Zarina!
I am the very slave of circumstance
And impulse—borne away with every breath.
Misplaced upon the throne—misplaced in life.
I know not what I could have been, but feel
I am not what I should be—let it end.
But take this with thee: if I was not form'd
To prize a love like thine, a mind like thine,
Not dote even on thy beauty—as I've doted
On lesser charms, for no cause save that such Devotion was a duty, and I hated
All that look'd like a chain for me or others,
(This even rebellion must avouch;) yet hear
These words, perhaps among my last—that none
Ever valued more thy virtues, though he knew not
To profit by them—as the miner lights
Upon a vein of virgin ore, discovering
That which avail'd him nothing: he hath found it,
But 'tis not his—but some superior's, who Placed him to dig, but not divide the wealth
Which sparkles at his feet: nor dare he lift
Nor poise it, but must grovel on, upturning
The sullen earth.

Zar. Oh! if thou hast at length
Discover'd that my love is worth esteem,
I ask no more—but let us hence together
And I—let me say we—shall yet be happy
Assyria is not all the earth—we'll find
A world out of our own—and be more blest.
Than I have ever been, or thou, with all
An empire to indulge thee.

Enter SALEMENES.

Sal. I must part ye—
The moments, which must not be lost. are passing
Zar. Inhuman brother! wilt thou thus weigh out
Instants so high and blest?

Sal. Blest!

Zar. He hath been
So gentle with me, that I cannot think
Of quitting.

Sal. So—this feminine farewell
Ends as such partings end, in no departure.
I thought as much, and yielded against all
My better bodings. But it must not be.

Zar. Not be?

Sal. Remain, and perish—

Zar. With my husband—

Sal. And children.

Zar. Alas.

Sal. Hear me, sister, like
My sister:—all's prepared to make your safely
Certain, and of the boys too, our last hopes;
'Tis not a single question of mere feeling,
Though that were much—but 'tis a point of state
The rebels would do more to seize upon
The offsprings of their sovereign, and so crush—
Zar. Ah! do not name it.

Sal. Well, then, mark me: when
They are safe beyond the Median's grasp, the rebels
Have miss'd their chief aim—the extinction
Of the line of Nimrod. Though the present king
Fall, his sons live for victory and vengeance
Zar. But could I not remain, alone?

Sal. What! leave
Your childr'en, with two parents, and yet orphans—
In a strange land—so young, so distant?
Zar. No—
My heart will break.
Sal. Now you know all—decide.
Zar. Zarina, he hath spoken well, and we Must yield awhile to this necessity.
Remaining here, you may lose all; departing,
You save the better part of what is left,
To both of us, and to such loyal hearts
As yet beat in these kingdoms.
Sal. The time presses.
Zar. G3, then. If e'er we meet again, perhaps
I may be worthy of you—and, if not,
Remember that my faults, though not atoned for,
Are ended. Yet, I dread thy nature will Grieve more above the blighted name and ashes
Which once were mightiest in Assyria—than—
But I grow womanish again, and must not;
I must learn sternness now. My sins have all
Been of the softer order—hide thy tears—
I do not bid thee not to shed them—twere
Easier to stop Euphrates at its source.
Than one tear of a true and tender heart—
But let me not behold them; they unman me
Here when I had reman'd myself. My brother,
Lend her away.
Zar. Oh, God! I never shall
Behold him more!
Sal. [striving to conduct her.] Nay, sister, I must be obey'd.
Zar. I must remain—away! you shall not hold
me.
What, shall he die alone? I live alone?
Sal. He shall not die alone; but lonely you
Have lived for years.
Zar. That's false! I knew he lived,
And lived upon his image—let me go!
Sal. [conducting her off the stage.] Nay, then, I must use some fraternal force,
Which you will pardon.
Zar. Never. Help me! Oh!
Sardanapalus, wilt thou thus behold me,
Torn from thee?
Sal. Nay—then all is lost again,
If that this moment is not gain'd.
Zar. My brain turns—
My eyes fall—where is he?
Sal. [advancing.] No—set her down.
She's dead—and you have slain her.
Sal. 'Tis the mere
Faintness of o'erwrought passion: in the air
She will recover. Pray, keep back.—[Aside.] I must
Away! myself of this sole moment to Bear her to where her children are embark'd,
I the royal galley on the river.
Sal. [sobus.] This, too—
And this too must I suffer—I, who never Indited purposely on human hearts
A v$	ext{16}$ntary pang! But that is false—
She loved me, and I loved her.—Fatal passion,
Why dost thou not expire at once in hearts
Which thou hast lighted up at once? Zarina!
I must pay dearly for the desolation
Now brought upon thee. Had I never loved
But thee, I should have been an unopposed
Monarch of honoring nations. To what gulfs
A single deviation from the track
Of human duties leads even those who claim
The noma$^g$ of mankind as their born due,
And find it, till they forfeit it themselves!

Enter Myr$^h$.

Myr. You here! Who call'd you?
Myr. No one—but I heart
Far off a voice of wail and lamentation,
And thought—
It forms no portion of your duties
To enter here till sought for.
Myr. Though I might! Perhaps, recall some softer words of yours.
(Although they too were chiding,) which reproved
me
Because I ever dreaded to intrude;
Resisting my own wish and your injunction
To heed no time nor presence, but approach you
Uncall'd for: I retire.
Myr. Yet stay—being here.
I pray you pardon me: events have sour'd me
Till I was peevish—heed it not: I shall Soon be myself again.
Myr. I wait with patience,
What I shall see with pleasure.
Myr. Scarcely a moment
Before your entrance in this hall, Zarina;
Queen of Assyria, departed hence.
Myr. Ah!
Myr. Wherefore do you start?
Myr. Did I do so?
Myr. Twas well you entered by another portal,
Else you had met. That pang at least is spared her.
My. I know to feel for her.
Myr. That is too much,
And beyond nature—tis nor mutual
Nor possible. You cannot pity her,
Nor she aught but
Myr. Despise the favorite slave:
Not more than I have ever scorn'd myself.
Myr. Scorn'd! what, to be the envoy of your sex,
And lord it o'er the heart of the world's lord?
Myr. Were you the lord of twice ten thousand words?
As you are like to lose the one you sway'd—
I did abuse myself as much in being
Your paramour, as though you were a peasant—
Nay, more, if that the peasant were a Greek.
Myr. You talk it well—
And truly.
Myr. In the hour
Of man's adversity all things grow daring
Against the falling; but as I am not Quite fall'n, nor now disposed to bear reproaches,
Perhaps because I merit them too often,
Let us then part while peace is still between us.
Myr. Part!
Myr. Have not all past human beings parted
And must not all the present one day part?
Myr. Why?
Myr. For your safety, which I will have lock'd to
With a strong escort to your native land;
And such gifts, as, if you had not been all
A queen, shall make your dowry worth a kingdom.
Myr. I pray you talk not thus.
Myr. The queen is gone
You need not shame to follow. I would fall
Alone— I seek no partners but in pleasure.
SARDANAPALUS.

Myr. And I no pleasure but in parting not. You shall not force me from you.

Yo. Think well of it—

It s-son may be too late.

Myr. So let it be;

For then you cannot separate me from you. Yo. And will not; but I thought you wish’d it. Myr. I! Yo. You spoke of your absishment. Myr. And I feel it Deeply—more deeply than all things but love. Yo. Then fly from it.

Myr. ’Twill not recall the past—

’Twill not restore my honor, nor my heart. No—here I stand or fall. If that you conquer, I live to joy in your great triumph; should your lot be different, I’ll not weep, but share it. You did not doubt me a few hours ago. Yo. Your courage never—nor your love till now; And none could make me doubt it save yourself. Those words—

Myr. Were words. I pray you, let the proofs Be in the past acts you were pleased to praise This very-night, and in my further bearing, Beside, wherever you are borne by fate. Yo. I am content: and, trusting in my cause, Think we may yet be vict’rs and return To peace—the only victory I covet. To me war is no glory—conquest no Renown. To be forced thus to uphold my right Sites heavier on my heart than all the wrongs These men would bow me down with. Never, never Can I forget this night, even should I live To add it to the memory of others. I thought to have made mine inoffensive rule An era of sweet peace ’midst bloody annals, A green spot amidst desert centuries, On which the future would turn back and smile, And cultivate, or sigh when it could not Recall Sardanapalus’ golden reign. I thought to have made my realm a paradise, And every moon an epoch of new pleasures. I took the rabble’s shouts for love—the breath Of friends for truth—the lips of woman for My only guerdon—so they are my Myrrha: He kisses her. Kiss me. Now let them take my realm and life; They shall have both but never thee! Myr. No, never! Man may despoil his brother man of all That’s great or glittering—kingdoms fall—hosts yield—

Friends fail—slaves fly—and all betray—and, more Than all, the most indebted—but a heart That loves without self-love! ’Tis here—now prove it.

Enter SALEMENES.

Sa. I sought you—How! she here again? Yo. Return not

Now to reproof: methinks your aspect speaks Of higher matter than a woman’s presence. Sa. The only woman whom it much imports me At such a moment now is safe in absence— The queen’s embark’d—

Yo. And well? say that much. Sa. Yes. Her transient weakness has pass’d o’er; at least, It settled into tearless silence: her Pale face and glittering eye, after a glance Upon her sleeping children, were still fix’d Upon the palace towers as the swift galley Stole down the hurrying stream beneath the star light; But she said nothing.

Yo. Would I felt no more Than she has said!

Sal. ’Tis now too late to feel! Your feelings cannot cancel a sole pang: To change them, my advices bring sure tidings That the rebellious Medes and Chaldees, mar shall’d By their two leaders, are already up In arms again; and, serring their ranks, Prepare to attack: they have apparently Been join’d by other satraps.

Yo. What! more rebels Let us be first, then.

Sal. That were hardly prudent Now, though it was our first intention. If By noon to-morrow we are join’d by those I’ve sent for by sure messengers, we shall be In strength enough to venture an attack, Ay, and pursuit too; but till then, my voice Is to await the onset.

Yo. I detest That waiting; though it seems so safe to fight Behind high walls, and hurl down foes into Deep fosses, or behold them sprawl on spikes Strew’d to receive them, still I like it not— My soul seems lukewarm; but when I set on them Though they were piled on mountains, I would have A pluck at them, or perish in hot blood!— Let me then charge. Sal. You talk like a young soldier Yo. I am no soldier, but a man: ay eak not Of soldiership, I loathe the word, and those Who pride themselves upon it; but direct me Where I may pour upon them.

Sa. You must spare To expose your life too hastily; ’tis not Like mine or any other subject’s breath: The whole war turns upon it—with it; this Alone creates it, kindles, and may quench it— Prolong it—end it.

Yo. Then let us end both! ’Twere better thus, perhaps, than prolong either; I’m sick of one, perchance of both. [A trumpet sounds without Hark! Sa. Reply, not listen. Sal. And your wound! Yo. ’Tis bound—'Tis heal’d—I had forgotten it. Away! A leech’s lancet would have scratch’d me deeper, The slave that gave it might be well ashamed To have struck so weakly.

Sa. Now, may none this hour Strike with a better aim! Yo. Ay, if we conquer; But if not, they will only leave to me A task they might have spared their king. Up’s them! [Trumpet sounds again. Sa. I am with you. Yo. Ho, my arms! again, my arms!
ACT V.

SCENE I.

The same Hall in the Palace.

MYRNA and BALEA.

Myr. (at a window.) The day at last has broken.

What a night!

Has usher'd it! How beautiful in heaven!

Though varied with a transitory storm,

More beautiful in that variety!

How hideous upon earth! where peace and hope,

And love and revel, in an hour were trampled

By human passions to a human chaos,

Not yet resolved to separate elements—

'Tis warring still! And can the sun rise,

So bright, so rolling back the clouds into

Vapors more lovely than the unclouded sky,

With golden pinnacles, and snowy mountains,

And billows purpler than the ocean's, making

In heaven a glorious mockery of the earth,

So like we almost deem it permanent;

So fleeting, we can scarcely call it aught

Beyond a vision, 'tis so transiently

Scatter'd along the eternal vault: and yet

It dwells upon the soul, and soothes the soul,

And blends itself into the soul, until

Sunrise and sunset form the haunt'd epoch

Of sorrow and of love; which they who mark not,

Know not the realms where those twin genii

(Who chasten and who purify our hearts,

So that we would not change their sweet rebukes

For all the boisterous joys that ever shook

The air with clamor) build the palaces

Where their fond votaries repose and breathe

Briefly—but in that brief cool calm inhale

Enough of heaven to enable them to bear

The rest of common, heavy, human hours,

And dream them through in placid sufferance;

Though seemingly employ'd like all the rest

Of toiling breathers in allotted tasks

Of pain or pleasure, two names for one feeling,

Which our eternal, restless agony

Would vary in the sound, although the sense

Escapes our highest efforts to be happy.

Bal. You must right calmly: and can you so watch

The sunrise which may be our last?

Myr. It is.

Therefore that I so watch it, and reproach

These eyes, which never may behold it more

For having look'd upon it, oft, oft,

Without the reverence and the rapture due

To that which keeps all earth from being as fragile

As I am in this form. Come, look upon it,

The Chaldee's god, which, when I gaze upon,

I grow almost a convert to your Baal.

Bal. As now he reigns in heaven, so once on earth

He sway'd.

Myr. He sways it now far more, then; never

Had earthly monarch half the peace and glory

Which centres in a single ray of his.

Bal. Surely he is a god!

Myr. So we Greeks deem too;

And yet I sometimes think that gorgeous orb

Must rather be the abodes of gods than one

Of the immortal sovereigns. Now he breaks

Through all the clouds, and fills my eyes with light

That shuts the world out. I can look no more

Bal. Hark! heard you not a sound?

Myr. No, 'twas mere fancy.

They battle it beyond the wall, and not

As in late midnight conflict in the very

Chambers: the palace has become a fortress

Since that insidious hour; and here within

The very centre, girded by vast courts

And regal halls of pyramid proportions,

Which must be carried one by one before

They penetrate to where they then arrived,

We are as much shut in even from the sound

Of peril as from glory.

Bal. But they reach'd

Thus far before.

Myr. Yes, by surprise, and were

Beat back by valor; now at once we have

Courage and vigilance to guard us.

Bal. May they.

Prosper!

*Myr. That is the prayer of many, and

The dread of more: it is an anxious hour,

I strive to keep it from my thoughts. Alas!

How vainly!

Bal. Is it said the king's demeanor

In the late action scarcely more appalling

The rebels than astonish'd his true subjects.

Myr. 'Tis easy to astonish or appal

The vulgar mass which moulds a horde of slaves;

But he did bravely.

Bal. Slew he not Beleses?

I heard the soldiers say he struck him down

Myr. The wretch was overthrown, but rescued to Triumph, perhaps, o'er one who vanquish'd him

In fight, as he had spared him in his peril;

And by that helpless pity risk'd a crown.

Bal. Hark!

Myr. You are right; some steps approach, but slowly.

Enter Soldiers bearing in Salemnes wounded, with a broken Javelin in his side; they set him upon one of the Couches which furnish the Apartment.

Myr. Oh, Jove!

Bal. Then all is over.

Sal. That is false.

Hew down the slave who says so, if a soldier.

Myr. Spare him—he's none: a mere court butterfly,

That flutters in the pageant of a monarch.

Sal. Let him live on, then.

Myr. So wilt thou, I trust.

Sal. I fear we shall live this hour out, and the event,

But doubt it. Wherefore did ye bear me here?

Sal. By the king's order. When the Javelin struck

you,

You fell and faint'd; 'twas his strict command

To bear you to this hall.

Sal. 'Twas not ill done:

For seeming slain in that cold dizzy trance,

The sight might shake our soldiers—but—'tis vain,

I feel it ebbing!

Myr. Let me see the wound;

I am not quite skillless: in my native land

'Tis part of our instruction. 'War being constant,

We are enabled to look on such things.

Sal. Best extr

The Javelin.

Myr. Hold! no, no, it cannot be.

Sal. I am sped, then!
SARDANAPALUS.

Myr. With the blood that fast must follow
The extracted weapon, I do fear thy life.
Sal. And I not death. Where was the king when Convey'd me from the spot where I was striken?
Sol. Upon the same ground, and encouraging
With voice and gesture the dispirited troops
Who had seen you fall, and falter'd back.
Sal. Whom heard ye
Named next to the command?
Sol. I did not hear.
Sal. Fly, then, and tell him, 'twas my last request
That Zames take my post until the junction,
So hoped for, yet delay'd, of Ofratanes,
Satrap of Susa. Leave me here: our troops
Are not so numerous as to spare your absence.
Sol. But, prince—
Sal. Hence, I say! here's a courtier and
A woman, the best chamber company.
As you would not permit me to expire
Upon the field, I'll have no idle soldiers
About my sick couch. Hence! and do my bidding!
[Exeunt the Soldiers.

Myr. Gallant and glorious spirit! must the earth
So soon resign thee?
Sal. Gentle Myrrha, 'tis
The end I would have chosen, had I saved
The monarch or the monarchy by this;
As 'tis I have not outlived them.
Myr. You wax paler.
Sal. Your hand; this broken weapon but prolongs
My pangs, without sustaining life enough.
To make me useful: I would draw it forth
And my life with it, could I but hear how
The fight goes.

[Enter SARDANAPALUS and Soldiers.

Sal. My best brother!
And the battle
Is lost?
Myr. (despondingly.) You see me here.
Sal. I'd rather see you thus.
[Exeunt the soldiers.

Myr. Did you not Receive a token from your dying brother,
Appointing Zames chief?

Sal. I did.
Myr. Where's Zames?
Sal. Dead.
Myr. And Altada?
Sal. Dying.
Myr. Pania? Sero?
Sal. Pania yet lives; but Sero's fled, or captive.
I am alone.
Myr. And is all lost?
Sal. Our walls,
Though thinly mann'd, may still hold out against
Their present force, or aught save treachery:
But I the field—
Myr. I thought 'twas the intent
Of Salemenes not to risk a sally
Till ye were strengthen'd by the expected succors.
Sal. I overruled him.
Myr. Well, the fault's a brave one.
Sal. But fatal. Oh, my brother! I would give
These realms, of which thou wert the ornament,
The sword and shield, the sole-redeeming honor.
To call back—but I will not weep for thee;
Thou shalt be mourn'd for as thou wouldst or mourn'd.
It grieves me most that thou couldst not this life
Believing that I could survive what thou
Hast died for—our long loyalty of race.
If I redeem it, I will give thee blood
Of thousands, tears of millions, for atonement,
(The tears of all the good are thine already,)
If not, we meet again soon, if the spirit
Within us lives beyond:—thou readest mine.
And dost me justice now. Let me once clasp
That yet warm hand, and fold that throbless heart
To this which beats so bitterly. Now, bear
The body hence.

Sal. Where?

Sal. Where is it?

Myr. To my proper chamber
Place it beneath my canopy, as though
The king lay there; when this is done, we will Speak further of the rights due to such ashes.
[Exeunt Soldiers with the body of Salemenes.

Myr. Enter Pania.

Sal. Well, Pania! have you placed the guards and Issued
The orders fix'd on?

Pan. Sire, I have obey'd.
Sal. And do the soldiers keep their hear's up?
Pan. Sire!
Sal. I'm answer'd! When a king asks twice, and has
A question as an answer to his question,
It is a portent. What! they are dishearten'd?
Pan. The death of Salemenes, and the shouts
Of the exulting rebels on his fall,
Have made them—
Sal. Rage—not drop—it should have been.
We'll find the means to rouse them.
Pan. Such a loss
Might sadden even a victory.
Sal. Alas!
Who can so feel it as I feel; but yet,
Though coop'd within these walls, they are strong,
and we
Have those without who will break their way through hosts,
To make their sovereign's dwelling what it was
A palace; not a prison, nor a fortress.

Enter an Officer, hastily.

Sal. Thy face seems ominous. Speak!

Off. I dare not.
Sal. Dare not!

While millions dare revolt with sword in hand!
That's strange. I pray thee break that loyal silence.
Which loathes to shock its sovereign; we can hear
Worse than thou hast to tell.
Pan. Proceed, thou hearst.

Off. The wall which skirted near the river's brink
Is thrown down by the sudden inundation
Of the Euphrates, which now rolling, swolen
From the enormous mountains where it rises,
By the late rains of that tempestuous region,
Overflows its banks, and hath destroyed the bulwark
Pan. That's a black augury! it has been said
For ages, "that the city ne'er should yield
To man, until the river grew its foe."
Though a long line of sovereigns have lain down
Along its golden frame—as hearing for
A time what late was Salamied.) Search.
And you companions: there's enough to load ye,
Though ye be many. Let the slaves be freed, too
And all the inmates of the palace, of Whatever sex, now quit it in an hour.
Thence launch the royal vessels, once form'd so pleasure,
And now to serve for safety, and enthrall
The river's broad and swollen, and uncommanded
(For one man in all the English by these besiegers.
Fly! and be happy!
Pan. Under your protection!
So you accompany your faithful guard.
Sar. No, Pania! that must not be; get thee hence
And leave me to my fate.
Pan. 'Tis the first time
I ever disobey'd: but now—
Sar. So all men
Dare bear me now, and Insolence within Ape treason from without. Question no further
'Tis my command, my last command. Wilt thou
Oppose it? thou?
Pan. But yet—not yet.
Sar. Well, then,
Swear that you will obey when I shall give
The signal.
Pan. With a heavy but true heart,
I promise.
Sar. 'Tis enough. Now order here
Fagots, pine-nuts, and wither'd leaves, and such Things as catch fire and blaze with one sole spark
Bring cedar, too, and precious drugs, and spices,
And mighty planks to nourish a tall pile;
Bring frankincense and myrrh, too, for it is
For a great sacrifice I build the pyre;
And heap them round yon throne.
Pan. My lord!
Sar. I have said it,
And you have sworn.
Pan. And could keep my faith
Without a vow. [Exit Pania.
Myr. What mean you?
Sar. You shall know
Anon—what the whole earth shall never forget.
Pania, returning with a Herald.
Pan. My king, in going forth upon my duty,
This herald has been brought before me, craving
An audience.
Sar. Let him speak.
Her. The King Arbaes—
Sar. What, crown'd already?—But, proceed.
Her. Beleus.
The anointed high-priest—
Sar. Of what god, or demon?
With new kings rise new altars. But, proceed;
You are sent to prate your master's will, and not Reply to mine.
Her. And Satrap Ofratanes—
Sar. Why, he is ours.
Her. (showing a ring.) Be sure that he is now
In the camp of the conquerors; behold
His signet-ring.
Sar. 'Tis his. A worthy triad!
Poor Salamenes! thou hast died in time
To see one treachery the less: this man
Was thy true friend and my most trusted subject.
Proceed.

Her. They offer thee thy life, and freedom
Of choice to single out a residence
In any of the further provinces,
Guarded and watch'd, but not confined in person,
Where thou shalt pass thy days in peace; but on Condition that the three young princes are Given up as hostages.

Sar. (ironically.) The generous victors!
Her. I wait the answer.
Sar. Answer, slave! how long
Have slaves decided on the doom of kings?

Her. Since they were free.

Sar. Mouthpiece of mutiny?

Thou at the least shalt learn the penalty
Of treason, though its proxy only. Pania!
Let his head be thrown from our walls within
The rebels' lines, his carcass down the river.

Away with him!

[PANIA and the Guards seizing him.

Pan. I never yet obey'd
Your orders with more pleasure than the present.

Hence with him, soldiers! do not soil this hall
Of royalty with treasonable gore:
Put him to rest without.

Her. A single word:
My office, king, is sacred.

Sar. And what's mine?

That thou shouldst come and dare to ask of me
To lay it down?

Her. I but obey'd my orders,
At the same peril if refused, as now
Incur'd by my obedience.

Sar. So there are
New monarchs of an hour's growth as despotic
As sovereigns swathed in purple, and enthroned
From birth to manhood!

Her. My life waits your breath.
Yours (I speak humbly)—but it may be—yours
May also be in danger scarce less imminent:
Would it then suit the last hours of a line
Such as is that of Ninrod, to destroy
A peaceful herald, unarm'd, in his office;
And violate not only all that man
Holds sacred between man and man—but that
More holy tie which links us with the gods?

Her. He's right. Let him go free. My life's last act
Shall not be one of wrath. Here, fellow, take [ Gives him a golden cup from a table near.

This golden goblet, let it hold your wine,
And think of me; or melt it into ingots,
And think of nothing but their weight and value.
Her. I thank you doubly for your life, and this
Most gorgeous gift, which renders it more precious.
But must I bear no answer?

Sar. Yes, I ask
An hour's truce to consider.

Her. But an hour's?

Sar. An hour's: if at the expiration of
That time your masters hear no further from me,
They are to deem that I reject their terms,
And actbefittingly.

Her. I shall not fail
To be a faithful legate of your pleasure.

Sar. And, hark! a word more.

Her. I shall not forget it,

What'er it be.

Sar. Commend me to Bele seas;
And tell him, ere a year expire, I summon
Him hence to meet me.

Her. Where?

Sar. At Babylon.

At least from thence he will depart to meet me.

Her. I shall obey you to the letter.

[Sar. [Exit Herald.]

Pania!—

Now, my good Pania!—quick—with what I order'd
Pan. My lord,—the soldiers are already charged.
And, see! they enter.

[Soldiers enter, and form a pile about the Throne, &c.

Sar. Higher, my good soldiers,
And thicker yet; and see that the foundation
Be such as will not speedily exhaust
Its own too subtle flame; nor yet be quench'd
With such obsequious aid would bring to quell it
Let the throne form the core of it: I would not Leave that, save fraught with fire unquenchable,
To the new comers. Frame the whole as if 'Twere to inkindle the strong tower of our Invertebrate enemies. Now it bear's a look! aspect!
How say you, Pania, will this <as> suffice
For a king's obsequies?

Pan. Ay, for a kingdom's.

I understand you, now.

Sar. And blame me?

Let me but fire the pile, and share it with you.

Myr. That duty's mine.

Pan. A woman's!

Myr. Tis the soldier's
Part to die for his sovereign, and why not
The woman's with her lover.

Pan. Tis most strange!

Myr. But not so rare, my Pania, as thou think'st at it
In the meantime, live thou. Farewell! the pile
Is ready.

Pan. I should shame to leave my sovereign
With but a single female to partake
His death.

Sar. Too many far have heralded
Me to the dust, already. Get thee hence;
Enrich thee.

Pan. And live wretchedly!

Think upon
Thy vow:—'tis sacred and irrevocable.

Pan. Since it is so, farewell.

Sar. Search well my chamber
Feel no remorse at bearing off the gold;
Remember, what you leave you leave the slaves
Who slew me: and when you have borne away
All safe off to your boats, blow one long blast
Upon the trumpet as you quit the palace.
The river's brink is too remote, its stream
Too loud at present to permit the echo
To reach distinctly from its banks. Then fly,—
And as you sail, turn back; but still keep on Your way along the Euphrates: if you reach
The land of Paphlagonia, where the queen
Is safe with my three sons in Cottas's court,
Say what you saw at parting, and request
That she remember what I said at one
Parting more mournful still.

Pan. That royal hand

Let me then once more press it to my lips;
And these poor soldiers who throng round you, and
Would fain die with you!

[The Soldiers and PANIA throng round him, kissing his hand and the hem of his robe.]

Sar. My best! my last friends!
Let’s not unmans each other: part at once:
All farewells should be sudden, when for ever,
Else they make an eternity of moments,
And clog the last sands of life with tears.
Hence, and be happy: trust me, I am not Now to be pitied; or far more for what
Is past than present;—for the future, ’tis
In the hands of the deities, if such
There be: I shall know soon. Farewell—Farewell.

[Exeunt PANIA and Soldiers.]

MYR. These men were honest: it is comfort still
That our last looks should be on loving faces.

Sar. And lovely ones, my beautiful—but hear me!
If at this moment, for we now are on
The brink, thou feel’st an inward shrinking from
This leap through flame into the future, say it:
I shall not love thee less; nay, perhaps more,
For yielding to thy nature: and there’s time
Yet for thee to escape hence.

MYR. Shall I light
One of the torches that lie heaped beneath
The ever-burning lamp that burns without,
Before Baal’s shrine, in the adjoining hall?

Sar. Do so. Is that thy answer?

MYR. Thou shalt see.

[Sar. sol但对于 words She’s firm. My fathers! whom I will rejoin,
It may be, purified by death from some
Of the gross stains of too material being,
I would not leave your ancient first abode
To the defilement of usurping bondmen;
If I have not kept your inheritance
As ye bequeathed it, this bright part of it,
Your treasure, your abode, your sacred reliks
Of arms, and records, and monuments, and spoils,
In which they would have revel’d, I bear with me
To you in that absorbing element,
Which most personifies the soul as leaving
The least of matter unconsumed before
Its fiery working: and the light of this Most royal of funereal pyres shall be
Not a mere pillow form’d of cloud and flame,
A beacon in the horizon for a day,
And then a mount of ashes, but a light
To lessen ages, rebel nations, and Voluptuous princes. Time shall quench full many
A people’s records, and a hero’s acts;
Swee’st empire after empire, like this first
Of empires, into nothing; but even then
Shall spare this deed of mine, and hold it up
A problem few dare impugn, and none
Desire—but, it may be, avoid the light
Which led to such a consummation.

MYRHA returns with a lighted Torch in one hand, and a Cup in the other.

MYR. Lo!

I’ve lit the lamp which lights us to the stars.
Sar. And the cup?

MYR. ’Tis my country’s custom to Make a libation to the gods.
Sar. And mine
To make libations among men. I’ve not
Forgot the custom; and although alone,

Will drain one draught in memory of many
A joyous banquet past.

[SARDANAPALUS takes the cup, and after drink ing and tinkling the reversed cup, as a drop falls, exclaims—

Is for the excellent Beleses.

MYR. Why
Dwells thy mind rather upon that man’s name
Than on his mate’s in villany?

Sar. The one
Is a mere soldier, a mere tool, a kind
Of human sword in a fiend’s hand; the other
Is master-mover of his warlike puppet:
But I dismiss them from my mind.—Yet pause,
My Myrrha! dost thou truly follow me,
Freely and fearlessly?

MYR. And dost thou think
A Greek girl dare not do for love, that which
An Indian widow braves for custom?

Sar. Then
We but await the signal.

MYR. It is long
In sounding.

Sar. Now, farewell; one last embrace.

MYR. Embrace, but not the last; there is one more

Sar. True, the commingling fire will mix our ashes

MYR. And pure as is my love to thee, shall they,
Furged from the dross of earth, and earthly passion.
Mix pale with thine. A single thought yet irks me
Sar. Say it.

MYR. It is that no kind hand will gather
The dust of both into one urn.

Sar. The better:
Rather let them be borne abroad upon
The winds of heaven, and scatter’d into air,
Than be polluted more by human hands
Of slaves and traitors; in this blazing palace.
And its enormous walls of reeking ruin.
We leave a nobler monument than Egypt
Hath piled in her brick mountains, o’er dead kings,
Or kine, for none know whether those proud piles
Be for their monarch, or their ox-god Apis:
So much for monuments that have forgotten
Their very record!

MYR. Then farewell, thou earth!
And loveliest spot of earth! farewell, Ionia!
Be thou still free and beautiful, and far
Aloof from desolation! My last prayer
Was for thee, my last thoughts, save one, were of thee!

Sar. And that?

MYR. [The trumpet of PANIA sounds without]

Sar. Hark!

MYR. Now!

Sar. Adieu, Assyria;
I loved thee well, my own, my fathers’ land,
And better as my country than my kingdom.
I satiﬁed thee with peace and joys; and this
Is my reward! and now I owe thee nothing,
Not even a grave.

[He mounts the pile

MYR. Now, Myrrha!

MYR. Art thou ready?

Sar. As the torch in thy grasp.

[As MYRHA springs forward to throw herself into the flames, the Curtain falls.
NOTES TO SARDANAPALUS.

1.

And thou, my own Ionian Myrrha.
Page 349, line 60.

"The Ionian name had been still more comprehensive, having included the Achaian and the Boeotians, who, together with those to whom it was afterwards confined, would make nearly the whole of the Greek nation, and among the orientals it was always the general name for the Greeks."—Milford's Greece, vol. 1. p. 199.

"Sardanapalus
The king, and son of Anacyndaraxes,
In one day built Anchialus and Tarsus.

"For this expedition he took not only a small chosen body of the phalanx, but all his light troops, in the first day's march he reached Anchialus, a town said to have been founded by the King of Assyria, Sardanapalus. The fortifications, in their magnitude and extent, still in Arrian's time, bore the character of greatness, which the Assyrians appear singularly to have affected in works of the kind. A monument representing Sardanapalus was found there, warranted by an inscription in Assyrian characters, of course in the old Assyrian language, which the Greeks, whether well or ill, interpreted thus: 'Sardanapalus, son of Anacyndaraxes, in one day founded Anchialus and Tarsus. Eat, drink, play; all other human joys are not worth a fillip.' Supposing this version nearly exact, (for Arrian says it was not quite so,) whether the purpose has not been to invite to civil order a people disposed to turbulence, rather than to recommend immoderate luxury, may perhaps reasonably be questioned. What, indeed, could be the object of a king of Assyria in founding such towns in a country so distant from his capital, and so divided from it by an immense extent of sandy deserts and lofty mountains, and, still more, how the inhabitants could be at one in circumstances to abandon themselves to the intemperate joys which their prince has been supposed to have recommended, is not obvious; but it may deserve observation that, in that line of coast, the southern of Lesser Asia, ruins of cities, evidently of an age after Alexander yet barely named in history, at this day astonish the adventurous traveller by their magnificence and elegance. Amid the desolation which, under a singularly barbarian government, has for so many centuries been daily spreading in the finest countries of the globe, whether more from soil and climate, or from opportunities for commerce, extraordinary means must have been found for communities to flourish there, whence it may seem that the measures of Sardanapalus were directed by juster view than have been commonly ascribed to him: but that monarch having been the last of a dynasty, ended by a revolution, obloquy on his memory would follow of course from the policy of his successors and their patrons.

"The inconsistency of tradition concerning Sardanapalus is striking in Diodorus's account of him."
WERNER; OR, THE INHERITANCE:
A TRAGEDY.

TO
THE ILLUSTRIOUS GOETHE,
BY ONE OF HIS HUMBlest ADMIRERS,
THIS TRAGEDY IS DEDICATED.

PREFACE.

THE following Drama is taken entirely from the "German's Tale, Kruttmer," published many years ago in Lee's Canterbury Tales; written (I believe) by two sisters, of whom one furnished only this story and another, both of which are considered superior to the remainder of the collection. I have adopted the characters, plan, and even the language, of many parts of this story. Some of the characters are modified or altered, a few of the names changed, and one character (Ida of Stralenheim) added by myself; but in the rest the original is chiefly followed. When I was young, (about fourteen, I think,) I first read this tale, which made a deep impression upon me; and may, indeed, be said to contain the germ of much that I have since written. I am not sure that it ever was very popular; or, at any rate, its popularity has since been eclipsed by that of other great writers in the same department. But I have generally found that those who had read it, agreed with me in their estimate of the singular power of mind and conception which it develops. I should also add conception, rather than execution; for the story might, perhaps, have been developed with greater advantage. Among those whose opinions agreed with mine upon this story, I could mention some very high names; but it is not necessary, nor indeed of any use, for every one must judge according to his own feelings. I merely refer the reader to the original story, that he may see to what extent I have borrowed from it; and am not unwilling that he should find much greater pleasure in perusing it than the drama which is founded upon its contents.

I had begun a drama upon this tale so far back as 1815, (the first I ever attempted, except one at thirteen years old, called "Ulric and Ivina," which I had sense enough to burn,) and had nearly completed an act, when I was interrupted by circumstances. This is somewhere among my papers in England; but as it has not been found, I have rewritten the first, and added the subsequent acts. The whole is neither intended, nor in any shape adapted, for the stage.

Time—The Close of the Thirty Years' War.
ACT I.

SCENE I.

The Hall of a decayed Palace near a small Town on the Northern Frontier of Silesia—the Night tempestuous.

WERNER, and JOSEPHINE, his wife.

Jos. My love, be calmer.

Wer. I am calm.

Jos. Yes, but not to thyself: thy pace is hurried, and no one walks a chamber like to ours with steps like thine when his heart is at rest. Were it a garden, I should deem thee happy, and stepping with the bee from flower to flower; but here!

Wer. 'Tis chill; the tapestry lets through: the wind to which it waves: my blood is frozen.

Jos. Ah, no!

Wer. (smiling.) Why! wouldst thou have it so?

Jos. I would have it a healthful current.

Wer. Let it flow until 'tis split or check'd—how soon, I care not.

Jos. And am I nothing in thy heart?

Wer. All—all.

Jos. Then canst thou wish for that which must break mine?

Wer. (approaching her slowly.) But for thee I had been—no matter what, but much of good and evil; what I am, thou knowest; what I might or should have been, thou knowest not: but still I love thee, nor shalt thou divide us.

[WERNER walks on abruptly, and then approaches JOSEPHINE.]

The storm of the night, perhaps, affects me; I'm a thing of feelings, and have of late been sickly, as, alas! thou know'st by sufferings more than mine, my love! in watching me.

Jos. To see thee well is much—

To see thee happy—

Wer. Where hast thou seen such? Let me be wretched with the rest!

Jos. But think how many in this hour of tempest shiver beneath the biting wind and heavy rain, whose every drop bows them down nearer earth, which hath no chamber for them save beneath her surface.

Wer. And that's not the worst; who cares for chambers? rest is all. The wretches whom thou namest—say, the wind howls round them, and the dull and dropping rain saps in their bones the creeping narrow. I have been a soldier, a hunter, and a traveller, and am a beggar, and should know the thing thou talk'st of.

Jos. And art thou not now shelter'd from them all?

Wer. Yes. And from these alone.

Jos. And that is something.

Wer. True—to a peasant.

Jos. Should the nobly born be thankful for that refuge which their habits of early delicacy render more needful than to the peasant, when the ebb of fortune leaves them on the sheals of life?

Wer. It is not that, thou know'st it is not; we have borne all this, I'll not say patiently, except in thee—but we have borne it.

Jos. Well?

Wer. Something beyond our outward sufferings (though these were enough to gnaw into our souls) Hath stung me oft, and, more than ever, now. When, but for this untoward sickness, which seized me upon this desolate frontier, and hast wasted, not alone my strength, but means and leaves us—no! this is beyond me—but for this I had been happy—now been happy—The splendor of my rank sustained—my name, my father's name—been still upheld; and, more than those—

Jos. (abruptly.) My son—our son—Ulric been clas'd again in these long-empty arms and all a mother's hunger satisfied. Twelve years! he was but eight then—beautiful He was, and beautiful he must be now. My Ulric! my adored!

Wer. I have been full oft the chase of Fortune: now she hath o'ertaken my spirit where it cannot turn at bay,—Sick, poor, and lonely.

Jos. Lonely! my dear husband Wer. Or worse—involving all I love, in this far worse than solitude. Aloné, I had died, and all been over in a nameless grave.

Jos. And I had not outlived thee; but pray take comfort! We have struggled long; and they what strive with fortune win or weary her at last. So that they find the goal or cease to feel further. Take comfort, we shall find our boy.

Wer. We were in sight of him, of every thing which could bring compensation for past sorrow and to be baffled thus!

Jos. We are not baffled.

Wer. Are we not penniless?

Jos. We ne'er were wealthy.

Wer. But I was born to wealth, and rank, and power;

Ex 'by'd them, loved them, and, alas! abused them. Am, forfeited them by my father's wrath, in m—'er-fervent youth; but for the abuse Long, sufferings have stoned. My father's death left the path open, yet not without snares. This cola and creeping kinman, who so long kept his eyes on me, as the snake upon the fluttering bird, hath ere this time upstopt me. Become the master of my rights, and lord of that which 'fits him up to princes in Dominion and d, main.

Jos. Who knows? our son May have returned back to his grandsire, and even now uphold thy rights for thee?

Wer. Tis hopeless.

Since his strange disappearance from my father, Entailing, as it were, my sins upon himself, no tidings have reveal'd his course. I parted with him to his grandsire, on the promise that his anger would stop short of the third generation, but Heaven seems to claim her stern prerogative, and visit upon my boy his father's faults and follies.

Jos. I must hope better still.—at least we have...
BAFFLED THE LONG PURSUIT OF STRALENHEIM.

WER. We should have done, but for this fatal sickness.
More fatal than a mortal malady,
Because it takes not life, but life's sole solace;
Even now I feel my spirit girt about
By the snares of this avaricious fiend:—
How do I know he hath not tracked us here?

JOS. He does not know thy person; and his spies,
Who so long watch'd thee, have been left at Ham-burgh.

OUR UNEXPECTED JOURNEY, AND THIS CHANGE
Of name, leave all discovery far behind:
None hold us here for aught save what we seem.
WER. Save what we seem! save what we are—sick beggars,
Even to our very hopes.—Ha! ha!

JOS. Alas!

WER. Who would read in this form
The high soul of the son of a long line?
Who, in this garb, the heir of princely lands?
Who, in this sunken, sickly eye, the pride
Of rank and ancestry? in this worn cheek
And famine-hollow'd brow, the lord of halls
Which daily feast a thousand vassals?

JOS. You
Ponder'd not thus upon these worldly things,
My Werner! when you deign'd to choose for bride
The foreign daughter of a wandering exile.
WER. An exile's daughter with an outcast son
Were a fit marriage; but I still had hopes
To lift thee to the state we both were born for.
Your father's house was noble though decay'd;
And worthy by its birth to match with ours.

JOS. Your father did not think so, though 'twas noble;
But had my birth been all my claim to match
With thee, I should have deem'd it what it is.
WER. And what is that in thine eyes?

JOS. All which it has done in our behalf,—nothing.
WER. How,—nothing?

JOS. Or worse; for it has been a canker in Thy heart from the beginning: but for this,
We had not felt our poverty but as
Millions of myriads feel it, cheerfully;
But for these phantoms of thy feudal fathers,
Thou mightst have earn'd thy bread, as thousands earn it;
Or, if that seem'd too humble, tried by commerce,
Or other civic means, to amend thy fortunes,
WER. [Ironically.] And been an Hanseatic burgher!

JOS. Excellent!

WER. What'er thou mightst have been, to me thou art
What no state high or low can ever change,
My heart's first choice;—which chose thee, knowing neither
Thy birth, thy hopes, thy pride; nought, save thy sorrows:
While they last, let me comfort or divide them;
When they end, let mine end with them, or thee!
WER. My better angel! such I have ever found thee;

JOS. This rashness, or this weakness of my temper,
Ne'er raised a thought to injure thee or thine.
Thou didst not mar my fortunes: my own nature
In youth was such as to unmake an empire,

Had such been my inheritance; but now
Chasten'd, subdued, out-worn, and taught to know
Myself,—to lose this for our son and thee!

Trust me, when in my two-and-twentieth spring,
My father barr'd me from my father's house,
The last sole scion of a thousand sires,
(For, I was then the last,) it hurt me less
Than to behold my boy and my boy's mother
Excluded in their innocence from what
My faults deserved—exclusion; though then
My passions were all living serpents, and Twined like the gorgon's round me.

JOS. [A loud knocking is heard]
Hark!
WER. A knocking
JOS. Who can it be at this lone hour? We have few visitors.
WER. And poverty hath none,
Save those who come to make it poorer still.
Well, I am prepared.
WER. [Werner puts his hand into his bosom, as if to search for some weapon.]
JOS. Oh, do not look so. I will to the door. It cannot be of import
In this lone spot of wintry desolation;—
The very desert saves man from mankind.

SHE GOES TO THE DOOR

ENTER IDENSTREIN.

IDEN. A fair good evening to my fairer hostess
And worthy!—What's your name, my friend?
WER. Are you
Not afraid to demand it?
IDEN. Not afraid?

WER. Egad! I am afraid. You look as if I asked for something better than your name,
By the face you put on it.

WER. Better, sir!
IDEN. Better or worse, like matrimony: what Shall I say more? You have been a guest this month
Here in the prince's palace—(to be sure,
His highness had resign'd it to the ghosts .
And rats these twelve years—but 'tis still a palace)—
I say you have been our lodger, and as yet
We do not know your name.
WER. My name is Werner.
IDEN. A goodly name, a very worthy name
As e'er was gilt upon a trader's board:
I have a cousin in the lazaretto
Of Hamburg, who has got a wife who bore
The same. He is an officer of trust,
Surgeon's assistant, (hoping to be surgeon,) And has done miracles in the way of business. Perhaps you are related to my relative?
WER. To yours?

JOS. Oh, yes; we are, but distantly
Cannot you humor the dull gossip till

[Aside to Werner.]

WE LEARN HIS PURPOSE?

IDEN. We, I'm glad of that;
I thought so long, such natural yearnings
Play'd round my heart:—blood is not water, cousin,
And so let's have some wine, and drink unto
Our better acquaintance: relatives should be Friends.
WER. You appear to have drank enough already;
And if you had not, I've no wine to offer
Else it were yours: but this you know, or should know:

[Aside to Werner.]
WERNER.

You see I am poor, and sick, and will... but see
That I would be alone; but to your business!
What brings you here?

Iden. Why, what should bring me here? Wer. I know not, though I think that I could guess
That which will send you hence.

Jos. (aside.) Patience, dear Werner.

Iden. You don’t know what has happened, then?
Jos. How should we?

Iden. The river is overflow’d?
Jos. Alas! we have known
That to our sorrow for these five days; since
It keeps us here.

Iden. But what you don’t know is,
That a great personage, who faun would cross,
Against the stream and three postillions’ wishes,
Is drown’d below the ford, with five post-horses
A monkey, and a mastiff, and a valet.
Jos. Poor creatures! are you sure?

Iden. Yes, of the monkey,
And the valet, and the cattle; but as yet
We know not if his excellency’s dead
Or no; your noblemen are hard to drown,
As it is fit that men in office should be;
But what is certain is, that he has swallow’d
Enough of the Oder to have burst two peasants;
And now a Saxon, and Hungarian traveller,
Who, at their proper peril, snatch’d him from
The whirling river, have sent on to crave
A lodging, or a grave, according as
It may turn out with the live or dead body.
Jos. And where will you receive him? here, I hope,
If we can be of service—say the word.

Iden. Here? no; but in the prince’s own apartment,
As fits a noble guest:—’tis damp, no doubt,
Not having been inhabited these twelve years;
But then he comes from a much damper place,
So scarcely will catch cold in’t, if he be Still liable to cold—and if not, why
He’ll be worse lodged to-morrow: nevertheless,
I have ordered fire and all appliances
To be got ready for the worst—that is,
In case he should survive.

Jos. Poor gentleman!
I hope he will with all my heart.

Wer. Intendant,
Have you not learn’d his name? My Josephine,
[Aside to his wife.
Retire; I’ll sift this fool.

Iden. His name! oh Lord!
Who knows if he hath now a name or no?
’Tis time enough to ask it when he’s able
To give an answer; or if not, to put
His heir’s upon his epitaph. Methought
Just now you chid me for demanding names?

Wer. True, true, I did so; you say well and wisely.

Enter Gabor.

Gab. If I intrude, I crave—

Iden. Oh, no intrusion!
This is the palace; this a stranger like
Yourself; I pray you make yourself at home:
But where’s his excellency, and how fares he?

Gab. Wily, and weary, but out of peril:
He paused to change his garments in a cottage,
(Where I doff’d mine for these, and came on hither.)
And has almost recover’d from his drenching.
He will be here anon.

Gab. (to Werner.) This master of the ceremoni
is
The intendant of the palace, I presume:
’Tis a fine building, but decay’d.

Iden. What ho, there! hustle!
Without there, Herman, Weiburg, Peter, Conrad [Give directions to different servants who enter.
A nobleman sleeps here to-night—see that
All is in order in the damask chamber—
Keep up the store—I will myself to the cellar—
And Madame Idenstein (my consort, stranger) shall Furnish forth the bed-apparel; for,
To say the truth, they are marvellous scant of this
Within the palace precincts, since his highness
Lift it some dozen years ago. And then
His excellency will sup, doubtless?

Gab. Faith!
I cannot tell: but I should think the pillow
Would please him better than the table after
His soaking in your river: but for fear
Your viands should be thrown away, I mean
To sup myself, and have a friend without
Who will do honor to your good cheer with
A traveller’s appetite.

Iden. But are you sure
His excellency—But his name: what is it?

Gab. I do not know.

Iden. And yet you saved his life.

Gab. I help’d my friend to do so.

Iden. Well, that’s strange.
To save a man’s life whom you do not know.

Gab. Not so; for there are some I know so well,
I scarce should give myself the trouble.

Iden. Pray,
Good friend, and who may you be?

Gab. By my family
Hungarian.

Iden. Which is call’d?

Gab. It matters little.

Iden. (aside.) I think that all the world are grown anonymous,
Since no one cares to tell what he’s call’d.

Gab. Pray, has his excellency a large suite?

Iden. How many?

Gab. I did not count them.

Iden. We came up by mere accident, and just
In time to drag him through his carriage window.

Iden. Well, what would I give to save a great man,
No doubt you’ll have a swinging sum as recompense.

Gab. Perhaps.

Iden. Now, how much do you reckon on?

Gab. I have not yet put up myself to sale:
In the mean time, my best reward would be
A glass of your Hockheimer—a good glass,
Wreath’d with rich grapes and Bacchanel devices,
O’erflowing with the oldest of your vintage;
For which I promise you, in case you ever
Run hazard of being drown’d, (although I own
It seems, of all deaths, the least likely for you.)
I’ll pull you out for nothing. Quick, my friend,
And think, for every bumper I shall quaff,
A wave the less may roll above your head.

Iden. (aside.) I don’t much like this fellow—close and dry.
He seems, two things which suit me not; however,
Wine he shall have; if that unlocks him not,
I shall not sleep to-night for curiosity.
[Exit Idenstein.

Gab. (to Werner.) This master of the ceremoni
is
The intendant of the palace, I presume:
’Tis a fine building, but decay’d.
BYRON'S WORKS.

Gab. I know no man, not even myself: how should I then know one I no'er beheld till half an hour since?

Wer. Sir, I thank you. Your offer's noble were fit to a friend, and not unkind as to an unknown stranger, though scarcely prudent; but no less I thank you I am a beggar in all save his trade; and when I beg of any one it shall be of him who was the first to offer what few can obtain by asking. Pardon me.

[Exit WERNER.

Gab. (solus.) A goodly fellow by his looks, though worn, as most good fellows are, by pain or pleasure which tear life out of us before our time; I scarce know which most quickly; but he seems to have seen better days, as who has not who has seen yesterday?—but here approaches our sage intendant, with the wine: however, for the cup's sake I'll bear the cupbearer.

Enter IDENSTEIN.

Iten. 'Tis here! the superannuum! twenty years of age, if 'tis a day.

Gab. Which epoch makes young women and old wine; and 'tis great pity, of two such excellent things, increase of years, which still improves the one, should spoil the other. Fill full—Here's to our hostess!—your fair wife! [Takes the glass.

Iten. Fair!—Well, I trust your taste in wine is equal to that you show for beauty; but I pledge you Nevertheless.

Gab. Is not the lovely woman I met in the adjacent hall, who, with an air, and port, and eye, which would have better been 'd this palace in its brightest days, (though in a garb adapted to its present Abandonment,) return'd my salutation:—is not the same your spouse?

Iten. I would she were, but you're mistaken—that's the stranger's wife.

Gab. And by her aspect she might be a prince's: though time hath touch'd her too, she still retains much beauty, and more majesty.

Iten. And that is more than I can say for Madame Idenstein, at least in beauty: as for majesty, she has some of its properties which might be spared—but never mind!

Gab. I don't. But who may be this stranger? He too hath a bearing above his outward fortunes.

Iten. There I differ. He's poor as Job, and not so patient; but who he may be, or what, or aught of him, except his name, (and that I only learn'd to-night,) I know not.

Gab. But how came he here?

Iten. In a most miserable old castle, about a month since, and immediately fell sick, almost to death. He should have died.

Gab. Tender and true—but why?

Iten. Why, what is life without a living? He has not a stiver.

Gab. In that case, I much wonder that a person of your apparent prudence should admit:

Wer. The apartment

Design'd for him you recon'd will be found in a better order for a sickly guest.

Gab. I wonder then you occupied it not, for you seem delicate in health.

Wer. (quickly.) Sir!

Gab. Pray excuse me: have I said ought to offend you?

Wer. Nothing: but we are strangers to each other. Gab. And that's the reason I would have us less so: I thought our bustling guest without bad said you were a chance and passing guest, the counter-part of you and my companions.

Wer. Very true.

Gab. Then, as we never met before, and never, it may be, may again encounter, why, I thought to cheer up this old dungeon here (At least to me) by asking you to share the fare of my companions and myself.

Wer. Pray, pardon me; my health—

Gab. Even as you please, I have been a soldier, and perhaps am blunt in bearing.

Wer. I have also served, and can requite a soldier's greeting.

Gab. In what service?

Wer. (quickly, and then interrupting himself.) I command—no—I mean I served; but it is many years ago, when first Bohemian raised her banner against the Austrian.

Gab. Well, that's over now, and peace has turn'd some thousand gallant hearts adrift to live as they best may; and, to say truth, some take the shortest.

Wer. What is that?

Gab. Whate'er they lay their hands on. All Silesia and Lusatia's woods are tenanted by bands of the late troops, who levy on the country for their maintenance; the Chatelains must keep their castle walls—beyond them 'tis but doubtful travel for your rich count or full-blown baron. My comfort is that, where I may, I've little left to lose now.

Wer. And I—nothing.

Gab. That's harder still. You say you were a soldier.

Wer. I was.

Gab. You look one still. All soldiers are, or should be comrades, even though enemies. Our swords when drawn must cross, our engines aim (While level'd) at each other's hearts; but when a truce, a peace, or what you will, remix the hilt into its scabbard, and lets sleep the spark which lights the matchlock, we are brethren. You are poor and sickly—I am not rich but healthy; I want for nothing which I cannot want; you seem devoid of this—will share it?

[Gabor pulls out his purse.

Gab. Who told you I was a beggar?

Wer. You yourself in saying you were a soldier during peace-time.

Wer. (looking at him with suspicion.) You know me not?
Gusts so forc'd into this noble mansion.

Iden. That's true; but pity, as you know, does make One's heart commit these follies; and besides, They had some valuables left at that time, Which paid their way up to the present hour; And so I thought they might as well be lodged Here as at the small tavern, and I gave them The run of some of the oldest palace rooms. They served to air them, at the least as long As they could pay for fire-wood.

Gb. Poor souls!

Iden. Exceeding poor.

Gb. And yet unused to poverty, If I mistake not. Whither were they going? Iden. Oh! Heaven knows where, unless to heaven itself.

Some days ago that loc^k'd the likeliest journey For Werner.

Gb. Werner! I have heard the name: But it may be a feign'd one.

Iden. Like enough! But hark! a noise of wheels and voices, and A blaze of torches from without. As sure As destiny, his excellency's to me. I must be at my post: will you not join me, To help him from his carriage, and present Your humble duty at the door?

Gb. I dragg'd him From out that carriage when he would have given His barony or county to repel The rushing river from his gurgling throat. He has valets now enough: they stood aloof then, Shaking their dripping ears upon the shore, All roaring, "Help!" but offering none; and As for duty (as you call it)—I did mine then, Now do yours. Hence, and bow and cringe him here!

Iden. I cringe—but I shall lose the opportunity— Plague take it! he'll be here, and I not there! (Exit Idenstein, hastily.)

Re-enter Werner.

Wer. (to himself.) I heard a noise of wheels and voices. How All sounds now jar me. Presence Gab.) Still here! Is he not A spy of my pursuers? His frank offer To suddenly, and to a stranger, wore The aspect of a secret enemy; For friends are slow at such.

Gb. Sir, you seem rapt: And yet the time is not akin to thought. These old walls will be noisy soon. The baron, Or count (for whatsoever this half-drown'd noble May be), for whom this desolate village and Its lone inhabitants show more respect Than did the elements, is come.

Iden. (without.) This way— Your excellency—have a care, The staircase is a little gloomy, and Somewhat decay'd; but if we had expected So high a guest—Pray take my arm, my lord.

Enter Stralenheim, Idenstein, and Attendants— partly his own, and partly retainers of the domain of which Idenstein is Intendant.

Stral. I'll rest me here a moment

Iden. (to the servants.) Ho! a chair Instantly, knaves! [Stralenheim sits down Wer. (aside.) 'Tis he! I'm better now.

Who are these strangers?

Iden. Please you, my good lord, One says he is no stranger. Wer. (aloud and hastily.) Who says that? [They look at him with surprise. Iden. Why, no one spoke of you, or to you—but Here's one his excellency may be pleased To recognize. [Pointing to Gaben Gab. I seek not to disturb His noble memory.

Stral. I apprehend This is one of the strangers to whose aid I owe my rescue.' Is not that the other?

[Pointing to Werner Iden. My state when I was succour'd must excuse My uncertainty to whom I owe so much. Iden. He—no, my lord! he rather wants for rescue Than can afford it. 'Tis a poor sick man, Travel-tired, and lately risen from a bed From whence he never dream'd to rise.

Stral. Methought That there were two.

Gb. There were, in company; But, in the service render'd to your lordship, I need must say but one, and he is absent. The chief part of whatever aid was render'd Was his: it was his fortune to be first. My will was not inferior, but his strength And youth outstripp'd me; therefore do not waste Your thanks on me. I was but a glad second Unto a nobler principal.

Stral. Where is he?

An Atten. My lord, he tarried in the cottage where Your excellency rested for an hour, And said he would be here to-morrow.

Stral. Till That hour arrives, I can but offer thanks, And then—

Gb. I seek no more, and scarce deserve So much. My comrade may speak for himself.

Stral. (fixing his eyes upon Werner; then aside.) It cannot be! and yet he must be look'd to. 'Tis twenty years since I beheld him with These eyes: and, though my agents still have kept Theirs on him, policy has held aloof My own from his, not to alarm him into Suspicion of my plan. Why did I leave At Hamburg those who would have made assurance If this be he or no? I thought, ere now, To have been lord of Seigendorf, and pasted In haste, though even the elements appear To fight against me, and this sudden flood May keep me prisoner here till——

[He pauses, and looks at Werner; then resumes, Pensive. Will it not please you to pass on? Stral. 'Tis past fatigue which gives my weigh'd down spirit An outward show of thought. I will to rest.
Iden. The prince’s chamber is prepared, with all
The very furniture the prince used when
Last here, in its full splendor.

(Aside.) Somewhat tatter’d
And devilish damp, but fine enough by torchlight;
And that’s enough for your right noble blood
Of twenty quarterings upon a hatchment;
So let their bearer sleep ’neath something like one
Now, as he one day will for ever lie.
Strat. (rising and turning to Gabol.) Good night, good people! Sir, I trust to-morrow
Will find me apter to requisite your service.

n the meantime I crave your company
A moment in my chamber.

Gab. I attend you.
Strat. (after a few steps, pauses and calls We-ner.) Friend!

Wer. Sir!
Iden. Sir! Lord—oh Lord! Why don’t you say
His lordship, or his excellency? Pray,
My lord, excuse this poor man’s want of breeding:
He hath not been accustomed to admission
To such a presence.
Strat. (to Idenstein.) Peace, intendant.
Iden. Oh!

I am dumb.
Strat. (to Werner.) Have you been long here?
Wer. Long?
Strat. I sought
An answer, not an echo.
Wer. You may seek
Both from the walls. I am not used to answer
Those whom I know not.
Strat. Indeed! Ne’er the less,
You might reply with courtesy to what
Is ask’d in kindness.
Wer. When I know it such,
I will require—that is reply—in unison.
Strat. The intendant said, you had been detain’d by sickness—
If I could aid you—journeying the same way?
Wer. (quickly.) I am not journeying the same way.
Strat. How know ye
That, ere you know my route?
Wer. Because there is
But one way that the rich and poor must tread
Together. You diverged from that dread path
Some hours ago, and I some days: henceforth
Our roads must lie asunder, though they tend
All to one home.
Strat. Your language is above
Your station.
Wer. (bitterly.) Is it?
Strat. Or, at least, beyond
Your garb.
Wer. ’Tis well that it is not beneath it,
As sometimes happens to the better clad.
But, in a word, what would you with me?
Strat. (startled.) I?
Wer. Yes—you! You know me not, and question me.
And wonder that I answer not—not knowing
My inquisitor. Explain what you would have,
And then I’ll satisfy yourself, or me.
Strat. I know not that you had reasons for reserve.
Wer. Many have such:—Have you none?
Strat. None which can
Interest a mere stranger.

Wer. Then forgive
The same unknown and humble stranger, if
He wishes to remain so to the man
Who can have nought in common with him.
Strat. Sir,
I will not balk your humor, though untoward:
I only meant you service—but good night!
Intendant, show the way! (to Gabol.) Sir, you will Tell me with me?

[Enter Stralenheim and Attendants; Iden-stein and Gabol.

Wer. (solus.) ’Tis he! I am taken in the toils.

Before
I quitted Hamburg, Giulio, his late steward,
Inform’d me that he had obtain’d an order
From Brandenburgh’s elector, for the arrest
Of Kruftzner (such the name I then bore) when I came upon the frontier; the free city
Alone preserved my freedom—till I left
Its walls—fool that I was to quit them! But I deem’d this humble garb, and route obscure,
Had baffled the slow hounds in their pursuit.
What’s to be done? He knows me not by person
Nor could aught, save the eye of apprehension,
Have recognised him, after twenty years,
We met so rarely and so coldly in Our youth. But those about him! Now I can Divine the frankness of the Hungarian who
No doubt is a mere tool and spy of Stralenheim’s
To sound and to secure me. Without means!
Sick, poor—begirt too with the flooding rivers,
Impassable even to the wealthy, with
All the appliances which purchase modes
Of overpowering peril with men’s lives,—
How can I hope? An hour ago methought
My state beyond despair; and now, ’tis such,
The past seems paradise. Another day,
And I’m detected,—on the very eve
Of honors, rights, and my inheritance,
When a few drops of gold might save me still
In favoring an escape.

Enter Idenstein and Fritz, in conversation.

Fritz. Immediately.
Iden. I tell you ’tis impossible.
Fritz. It must
Be tried; however; and if one express
Fail, you must send on others, till the answer
Arrives from Frankfort, from the commandant.
Iden. I will do what I can.
Fritz. And recollect
To spare no trouble; you will be repaid
Tenfold.
Iden. The baron is retired to rest?
Fritz. He hath thrown himself into an easy chair
Beside the fire, and slumbers; and has order’d
He may not be disturb’d until eleven,
When he will take himself to bed.
Iden. Before
An hour is past I’ll do my best to serve him.

Fritz. Remember! [Exit Fritz.
Iden. The devil take these great men! they Think all things made for them. Now here must I
Rouse up some half a dozen shivering vassals
From their scant pallets, and, at peril of Their lives, despatch them o’er the river towards Frankfort. Methinks the baron’s own experience
Some hours ago might teach him fellow-feeling:
But no, ‘’it must,’’ and there’s an end. How now?
Are you there, Mynheer Werner?
Werner. You have left
Your noble guest right quickly.
Jos. It seems to like that none should sleep besides.
Here is a packet for the commandant
Of Frankfort, at all risks and all expenses;
but I must not lose time: Good-night!
[Exit Idenstein]
Werner. So, so, it thickens! Ay, "the commandant."
This tallies well with all the prior steps
Of this cool, calculating fiend, who walks
Between me and my father's house. No doubt
He writes for a detachment to convey me
Into some secret fortress.—Sooner than
This—
[Werner looks around, and matches up a knife lying on a table in a recess.]
—Now I am master of myself at least.
Hark,—footsteps! How do I know that Stralenheim
Will wait for even the show of that authority
Which is to overshadow usurpation?
That he suspects me's certain. I'm alone;
He with a numerous train. I weak; he strong
In gold, in numbers, rank, authority.
I nameless, or shining in my name
Destruction, till I reach my own domain;
He full-blown with his titles, which impose
Still further on these obscure petty burgheurs
Than they could do elsewhere. Hark! nearer still!
I'm to the secret passage, which communicates
With the—No! all is silent—twas my fancy!—
Still as the breathless interval between
The flash and thunder:—I must hush my soul
Amidst its perils. Yet I will retire,
To see if still be unexplored the passage
I left of: it will serve me as a den
Of secrecy for some hours at the worst.
[Werner draws a panel, and exit, closing it
after him.]

Enter Gab and Josephine.
Gab. Where is your husband?
Jos. Here, I thought: I left him
Not long since in his chamber. But these rooms
Have many outlets, and he may be gone
To accompany the intendant.
Gab. Baron Stralenheim
Put many questions to the intendant on
The subject of your lord, and, to be plain,
I have my doubts if he means well.
Jos. Alas! What can there be in common with the proud
And wealthy baron and the unknown Werner?
Gab. That you know best.
Jos. Or, if it were so, how Come you to stir yourself in his behalf,
Rather than that of him whose life you saved?
Gab. I help'd to save him, as in peril: but I did not pledge myself to serve him in Oppression. I know well these nobles, and Their thousand modes of trampling on the poor.
I have proved them; and my spirit boils up when
I find them practising against the weak:—
This is my only motive.
Jos. It would be
Not easy to persuade my consort of
Your good intentions.

Gab. Is he so suspicious?
Jos. He was not once; but time and troubles have Made him what you behold.
Gab. I'm sorry for it.
Suspicion is a heavy armor, and
With its own weight impedes more than protects.
Good night! I trust to meet him at daybreak.
[Exit Gaberet.]

Re-enter Idenstein and some peasants. Josephine retires up the Hall.
First Peasant. But if I'm droun'd?
Iden. Why, you will be well paid for't,
And have risk'd more than drowning for as much,
I doubt not.
Second Peasant. But our wives and families?
Iden. Cannot be worse of than they are, and may Be better.
Third Peasant. I have neither, and will venture.
Iden. That's right. A gallant carle and fit to be
A soldier. I'll promote you to the ranks
In the prince's body-guard—if you succeed;
And you shall have besides in sparkling coin
Two thalers.
Third Peasant. No more!
Iden. Out upon your avarice!
Can that low vice alloy so much ambition?
I tell thee, follow, that two thalers in Small change will subdivide into a treasure.
Do not five hundred thousand heroes daily
Rise and souls for the tiche of one thaler?
When had you half the sum?
Third Peasant. Never—but ne'er
The loss I must have three.
Iden. Have you forgot
Whose vassal you were born, knave?
Third Peasant. No—the prince's,
And not the stranger's.
Iden. Sirrah! in the prince's Absence, I am sovereign: and the baron is
My intimate connexion:—"Cousin Idenstein
(Quoth he) you'll order out a dozen villains."
And so, you villains! troop—march—march, I say.
And if a single dog's-ear of this packet
Be sprinkled by the Oder—look to it!
For every page of paper shall a hide
Of yours be stretch'd as parchment on a drum,
Like Ziska's skin, to beat alarm to all
Refractory vassals, who can not effect
Impossibilities—away, ye earth-worms!
Jos. (coming forward.) I fain would shun these scenes, too oft repeated,
Of feudal tyranny o'er petty victims;
I cannot aid, and will not witness such.
Even here, in this remote, unnamed, dull spot,
The dimnest in the district's map, exist
The insolence of wealth in poverty
O'er something poorer still—the pride of rank
In servitude, o'er something still more servile,
And vice in misery affecting still
A tatter'd splendor. What a state of being!
In Tuscany my own dear sunny land,
Our nobles were but citizens and merchants,
Like Cosmo. We had evils, but not such
As these; and our all-ripe and gushing valleys
Made poverty more cheerful, where each herb
Was in itself a meal, and every vine
Rain'd, as it were, the beverage which makes glad
The heart of man; and the ne'er unfelt sun
But rarely clouded, and when clouded, leaving
His warmth behind in memory of his beams)
Makes the worn mantle, and the thin robe, less
Oppressive than an emperor's jewell'd purple.
But, here! the deserts of the north appear
To imitate the ice-wind of their clime,
Searching the shivering vassal through his rags,
To wring his soul—as the bleak elements
His form. And 'tis to be among these sovereigns
My husband pants! and such his pride of birth—
That twenty years of usage, such as no
Father born in a humble state could nerve
His soul to persecute a son withal,
Hath changed no atom of his early nature; But I, born nobly also; from my father's Kindness was taught a different lesson. Father!
May thy long-tried and now rewarded spirit
Look down on us and our so long desired
Ulrich! I love my son, as thou didst me!
What's that? Thou, Werner! can it be? and thus?

Enter Werner hastily, with the knife in his hand,
by the secret panel, which he closes hurriedly
after him.

Wer. (not at first recognising her.) Discover'd! I then I'll stab——(recognising her.)

Ah! Josephine,
Why art thou not at rest?
What doth this mean?
Wer. (showing a rouleau.) Here's gold—gold,
Josephine,
Will rescue us from this detested dungeon.
Jos. And how obtain'd?—that knife!
Wer. 'Tis bloodless—yet.
Away—we must to our chamber.
Jos. But whence comest thou?
Wer. Ask not! but let us think where we shall go—
This—this will make us way—(showing the gold—)
I'll fit them now.
Jos. I dare not think thee guilty of dishonesty.
Wer. Dishonor!
Jos. I have said it.
Wer. Let us hence;
'Tis the last night, I trust, that we need pass here.
Jos. And not the worst, I hope.
Wer. Hope! I make sure.
But let us to our chamber.
Jos. Yet one question—
What hast thou done?
Wer. (fiercely.) Left one thing undone, which
Had made all well: let me not think of it!
Away
Jos. Alas, that I should doubt of thee!

ACT II.

SCENE I.

A Hall in the same Palace.

Enter Idenstein and Others.

Iden. Fine doings! goodly doings! honest doings:
A baron pillaged in a prince's palace!

Where, till this hour, such a sin ne'er was heard of.
Fritz. It hardly could, unless the rats despoil'd
The mice of a few shreds of tapestry.
Iden. Oh! that I o'er should live to see this day
The honor of our city's gone for ever.
Fritz. Well, but now to discover the delinquent
The baron is determined not to lose
This sum without a search.
Iden. And so am I.
Fritz. But whom do you suspect?
Iden. Suspect! all people
Without—within—above—below—Heaven help me!
Fritz. Is there no other entrance to the chamber?
Iden. None whatsoever.
Fritz. Are you sure of that?
Iden. Certain. I have lived and served here since my birth,
And if there were such, must have heard of such,
Or seen it.
Fritz. Then it must be some one who
Had access to the antechamber.
Iden. Doubtless.
Fritz. The man call'd Werner's poor!
Iden. Poor as a miser,
But lodged so far off, in the other wing,
By which there's no communication with
The baron's chamber, that it can't be he.
Besides, I bade him "good night." in the hall,
Almost a mile off, and which only leads
To his own apartment, about the same time
When this burglarious, larcenous felony
Appears to have been committed.
Fritz. There's another
The stranger—
Iden. The Hungarian?
Fritz. He who help'd
To fish the baron from the Oder.
Iden. Not
Unlikely. But, hold—might it not have been
One of the suite?
Fritz. How? We, sir!
Iden. No—not you,
But some of the inferior knaves. You say
The baron was asleep in the great chair—
The velvet chair—in his embroid'rd night-gown,
His toilet spread before him, and upon it
A cabinet with letters, papers, and Several rouleaux of gold: of which one only
Has disappear'd—the door unbol'd, with
No difficult access to any.
Fritz. Good sir,
Be not so quick; the honor of the corps
Which forms the baron's household's unimpeach'd
From steward to scullion, save in the fair way
Of peculation; such as in accomp'ts,
Weights, meausr's, larder, cellar, buttery,
Where all men take their prey; as also in Postage of letters, gathering of rents,
Purveying feasts, and understanding with
The honest trades who furnish noble masters
But for your petty, picking, downright thievry.
We scorn as we do board-wages. Then
Had one of our folks done it, he would not Have been so poor a spirit as to hazard
His neck for one rouleau, but have sweep'd all;
Also the cabinet, if portable.
Iden. There is some sense in that—
Fritz No, sir, be sure
'Twas none of our corps; but some petty, trivial
WERNER.

Picker and stealer, without art or genius. The only question is—Who else could have Access, save the Hungarian and yourself? Iden. You don’t mean me? Fritz. No, sir; I honor more Your talents— Iden. And my principles, I hope. Fritz. Of course. But to the point: What’s to be done? Iden. Nothing—but there’s a good deal to be said. We’ll offer a reward; move heaven and earth, And the police, (though there’s none nearer than Frankfort;) post notices in manuscript, (For we’ve no printer;) and set by my clerk To read them, (for few can, save he and I.) We’ll send out villains to strip beggars, and, Search empty pockets; also, to arrest All gipsies, and ill-clothed and sallow people. Prisoners we’ll have at least; if not the culprit; And for the baron’s gold—if ‘tis not found, At least we shall have the full satisfaction Of melting twice its substance in the raising Of the ghost of this roulée. Here’s alchemy For your lord’s losses! Fritz. He hath found a better. Iden. Where? Fritz. It is a most immense inheritance. The late Count Siegendorf, his distant kinsman, Is dead near Prague, in his castle, and my lord Is on his way to take possession. Iden. Was there No heir? Fritz. Oh, yes; but he has disappear’d Long from the world’s eye, and perhaps the world. A prodigal son, beneath his father’s ban For the last twenty years; for whom his sire Refused to kill the fattened calf; and, therefore, If living, he must chew the husks still. But The baron would find means to silence him, Were he to reappear; he’s politic, And has much influence with a certain court. Iden. He’s fortunate. Fritz. ‘Tis true, there is a grandson, Whom the late count reclaim’d from his son’s hands, And educated as his heir; but then His birth is doubtful. Iden. How so? Fritz. His sire made A left-hand, love, impudent sort of marriage, With an Italian exile’s dark-eyed daughter: Noble, they say, too; but no match for such A house as Siegendorf’s. The grandsire ill Could brook the alliance; and could ne’er be brought To see the parents, though he took the son. Iden. If he’s a lad of mettle, he may yet. Dispute your claim, and weave a web that may Puzzle your baron to unravel. Fritz. Why, For mettle, he has quite enough: they say, He forms a happy mixture of his sire And grand sire’s qualities,—impetuous as The former, and deep as the latter; but The strangest is, that he too disappear’d Some months ago. Iden. The devil he did! Fritz. Why, yes: It must have been at his suggestion, at An hour so critical as was the eve Of the old man’s death, whose heart was broken by it. Iden. Was there no cause assign’d? Fritz. Plenty, no doubt. And none perhaps the true one. Some aver’d It was to seek his parents; some because The old man held his spirit in so strictly, (But that could scarce be, for he doted on him;) A third believed he wish’d to serve in war, But peace being made soon after his departure, He might have since return’d were that the motive A fourth set charitably have surmised, As there was something strange and mystical in him That in the wild exuberance of his nature He had join’d the black bands, who lay waste Lyæus The mountains of Bohemia and Silesia, Since the last years of war had dwindled into A kind of general condottiere system Of bandit warfare; each troop with its chief, And all against mankind. Iden. That cannot be. A young heir, bred to wealth and luxury, To risk his life and honors with disbanded Soldiers and desperadoes! Fritz. Heaven best known! But there are human natures so allied Unto the savage love of enterprise, That they will seek for peril as a pleasure. I’ve heard that nothing can reclaim your Indian, Or tame the tiger, though their infancy Were fed on milk and honey. After all, Your Wallenstein, your Tilly and Gustavus, Your Bannier, and your Torstenson and Weimar, Were but the same thing upon a grand scale; And now that they are gone, and peace proclaim’d, They who would follow the same pastime must Pursue it on their own account. Here comes The baron, and the Saxon stranger, who Was his chief aid in yesterday’s escape, But did not leave the cottage by the Oder Until this morning. Enter STRALENHEIM and ULRIG. Stral. Since you have refused All compensation, gentle stranger, save Inadequate thanks, you almost check even: Making me feel the worthlessness of words, And blush at my own barren gratitude, They seem so niggardly compared with what Your courteous courage did in my behalf— Ulr. I pray you press the theme no further. Stral. But Can I not serve you? You are young, and of That mould which throws out heroes; fair in favor Brave, I know, by my living now to say so; And doubtless, with such a form and heart, Would look into the fiery eyes of war; As ardently for glory as you dare An obscure death to save an unknown stranger In an as perilous, but opposite element. You are made for the service: I have served; Have rank by birth and soldiership, and friends Who shall be yours. ’Tis true this pause of peace Favors such views at present scantily; But ’twill not last, men’s spirits are too stirring: And, after thirty years of conflict, peace Is but a petty war, as the times show us In every forest, or a mere arm’d truce. War will reclaim his own; and, in the meantime You might obtain a post, which would ensure A higher soon, and, by my influence, fail not
BYRON'S WORKS.

To rise. I speak of Brandenburg, wherein I stand well with the elector; in Bohemia, like you, I am a stranger, and we are now upon its frontier.

Ulr. You perceive my garb is Saxon, and of course my service due to my own sovereign. If I must decline your offer, 'tis with the same feeling which induced it.

Stral. Why, this is mere usury!

I owe my life to you, and you refuse the acquittance of the interest of the debt, to heap more obligations on me, till I bow beneath them.

Ulr. I claim the payment.

Stral. You shall say so when you are nobly born?

Ulr. I have heard my kinsmen say so.

Stral. Your actions show it. Might I ask your name?

Ulr. Uriel.

Stral. Your house's?

Ulr. When I'm worthy of it, I'll answer you.

Stral. (aside.) Most probably an Austrian, whom these unsettled times forbid to boast his lineage on these wild and dangerous frontiers, where the name of his country is abhor'd.

[Aloud to Fritz and Idenstein.]

So, sirs! how have ye sped in your researches?

Iden. Indifferent well, your excellency.

Stral. Then I am to deem the plunderer is caught?

Iden. Humph!—not exactly.

Stral. Or at least suspected!

Iden. Oh! for that matter, very much suspected.

Stral. Who may he be?

Iden. Why, don't you know, my lord?

Stral. How should I? I was fast asleep.

Iden. And so was I, and that's the cause I know no more than does your excellency.

Stral. (to Fritz.) Prithee, Fritz, inform me what hath been, done to trace the fellow?

Fritz. Faith! My lord, not much as yet, except conjecture.

Stral. Besides the loss, (which, I must own, affects me) just now, I understand, I needs would find the villain out of public motives; for so dexterous a spoiler, who could creep through my attendants, and so many people and lighted chambers, on my rest, and snatch the gold before my scarse-closed eyes, would soon leave bare your borough, Sir Intendant!

Iden. True

If there were aught to carry off, my lord.

Ulr. What is all this?

Stral. You join'd us but this mornig, and have not heard that I was robb'd last night.

Ulr. Some rumor of it reach'd me as I pass'd the outer chambers of the palace, but I know no further.

Stral. It is a strange business: the intendant can inform you of the facts.

Iden. Most willingly. You see—

Stral. (impatiently.) Defer your tale till certain of the hearer's patience.

Iden. That can only be approved by proofs. You see—

Stral. (again interrupting him, and addressing Ulric.) In short, I was asleep upon a chair my cabinet before me, with some gold. Upon it, (more than I much like to lose, though in part only;) some ingenious person contrived to glide through all my own attendants, besides those of the palace, and bore away a hundred golden ducats, which to find I would be fain, and there's an end. Perhaps you (as I still am rather faint) would add to yesterday's great obligation, this, though slighter, yet not slight, to aid these men (who seem but lukewarm in recovering it?) Ulr. Most willingly, and without loss of time—

(Iden.) Come hither, mybmheur!

Iden. But so much haste bodet the Right little speed, and—

Ulr. Standing motionless

None; so let's march: we'll talk as we go on.

Iden. But—

Ulr. Show the spot, and then I'll answer you.

Fritz. I will, sir, with his excellency's leave.

Stral. Do so, and take you old ass with you.

Stral. (solus.) A stalwart, active, soldier-looking stripling, handsome as Hercules ere his first labor, and with a brow of thought beyond his years. When in repose, till his eye kindles up in answering yours. I wish I could engage him. I have need of some such spirits near me now, for this inheritance is worth a struggle. And though I am not the man to yield without one, neither are they who now rise up between me and my desire. The boy, they say, 's a bold one; but he hath play'd the truant in some hour of freakish folly, leaving fortune to champion his claims. That's well. The father whom for years I've track'd, as does the bloodhound, new! In sight, but constantly in scent, had put me to fault: but here I have him, and that's better. It must be he! All circumstance proclaims it; and careless voices, knowing not the cause of my inquiries, still confirm it—'Yes! The man, his bearing, and the mystery of his arrival, and the time; the account, too. The intendant gave (for I have not beheld her) of his wife's dignified but foreign aspect; besides the antipathy with which we met, as snakes and lions shrink back from each other, by secret instinct that both must be foes. Deadly, without being natural prey to either;
All—all—confirm it to my mind. However, We'll grapple, n'ertheless. In a few hours, The order comes from Frankfort, if these waters Rise not the higher, (and the weather favors Their quick abatement,) and I'll have him safe Within a dungeon, where he may avouch His real estate and name; and there's no harm done, Should he prove other than I deem. This robbery (Save for the actual loss) is lucky also: He's poor, and that's suspicious—he's unknown, And that's defenseless.—True, we have no proofs Of guilt, but what hath he of innocence? Were he a man indifferent to my prospects, In other bearings, I should rather lay The inculpation on the Hungarian, who Hath something which I like not; and alone Of all around, except the intendant, and The prince's household and my own, had ingress Familiar to the chamber.

Enter Gabor.

Friend, how fare you? Gab As those who fare well everywhere, when they Have sapp'd and slumber'd, no great matter how— And you, my lord? Stcg]. Better in rest than purse: Mine inn is like to cost me dear. Gab. I heard Of your late loss; but 'tis a trifle to One of your order. Stral. You would hardly think so. Gab. I never had so much (At once) in my whole life, and therefore am not Fit to decide. But I came here to see you. Your couriers are turn'd back— I have outstript then,

In my return. Stral. You!—Why? Gab. I went at daybreak, To watch for the abatement of the river, As being anxious to resume my journey. Your messengers were all check'd like myself; And, seeing the case hopeless, I await The current's pleasure. Stral. Would the dogs were in it! Why did they not, at least, attempt the passage? I order'd this at all risks. Gab. Could you order The Oder to divide, as Moses did The Red Sea, (scarcely redder than the flood Of the swoln stream,) and be obey'd, perhaps They might have ventured. Stral. I must see to it: The knaves! the slaves!— but they shall smart for this. [Exit StralENHEIM. Gab. (solus.) There goes my noble, feudal, self-will'd baron!

Epitome of what brave chivalry The preux chevaliers of the good old times Have left us. Yesterday he would have given His lands, (if he hath any,) and, still dearer, His sixteen quarterings, for so much fresh air As would have filled a bladder, while he lay Sorgling and foaming half way through the window Of his o'eract and water-logg'd conveyance: An I now he storms at half a dozen wretches Because they love their lives too! Yet, he's right!

'Tis strange they should, when such as he may put them To hazard at his pleasure. Oh! thou world! Thou art indeed a melancholy jest! [Exit Gabor.

SCENE II.

The Apartment of Werner, in the Palace.

Enter Josephine and Ulric.

Jos. Stand back, and let me look at thee again! My Ulrie!—my beloved!—can it be— After twelve years? Ulr. My dearest mother! Jos. Yes! My dream is realized—how beautiful! How more than all I sigh'd for! Heaven receive A mother's thanks!—a mother's tears of joy! This is indeed thy work!—At such an hour, too, He comes not only as a son, but savior. Ulr. If such a joy await me, it must double What I now feel, and lighten from my heart A part of the long debt of duty, not Of love (for that was ne'er withheld)—forgive me! This long delay was not my fault. Jos. I know it. But cannot think of sorrow now, and doubt If I e'er felt it, 'tis so dazzled from My memory, by this oblivious transport! My son!

Enter Werner. Wer. What have we here, more strangers? Jos. Look upon him! What do you see? Wer. A stripling, For the first time— Ulr. (kneeling.) For twelve long years, my father Wer. Oh, God! Jos. He faints! Wer. Ulr. (Embraces him.) Ulr. My father, Siegendorf! Wer. (starting.) Hush! boy— The walls may hear that name! Ulr. What then? Wer. Why, then,— But we will talk of that anon. Remember, I must be known here but as Werner. Come! Come to my arms again! Why, thou look'st all I should have been, and was not. Josephine! Sure 'tis no father's fondness dazzles me; But had I seen that form amid ten thousand Youth of the choicest, my heart would have chosen This for my son!

Ulr. And yet you knew me not! Wer. Alas! I have had that upon my soul Which makes me look on all men with an eye That only knows the evil at first glance. Ulr. My memory served me far more fondly; I have not forgotten aught; and oftentimes In the proud and princely halls of—(I'll not name them, As you say that 'tis perilous)—but! the pomp Of your sire's feudal mansion, I look'd back To the Bohemian mountains many a sunset, And wept to see another day go down O'er thee and me, with those huge hills between us They shall not part us more. Wer. I know not that Are you aware my father is no more?
Ulr. Oh heavens! I left him in a green old age, And looking like the oak, worn but still steady Amidst the elements, whilst younger trees Fell fast around him. 'Twas scarce three months since.

Wer. Why did you leave him?
Jos. (embracing Ulric.) Can you ask that question?

Is he not here?

Wer. True; he hath sought his parents, And found them; but, oh! how, and in what state Ulric. All shall be better'd. What have we to do is to proceed, and to assert our rights, Or rather yours; for I waive all, unless Your father has disposed in such a sort Of his broad lands as to make mine the foremost, So that I must prefer my claim for form: But I trust better, and that all is yours.

Wer. Have you not heard of Stralenheim?

Ulr. I saved

His life but yesterday: he's here.

Wer. You saved The serpent who will sting us all!

Ulr. You speak

Riddles: what is this Stralenheim to us?

Wer. Every thing. One who claims our father's lands:

Our distant kinsman, and our nearest foe.

Ulr. I never heard his name till now. The count Indeed, spoke sometimes of a kinsman, who, If his own line should fail, might be remotely Involved in the succession; but his titles Were never named before me—and what then? His right must yield to ours.

Wer. Ay, if at Prague:
But here he is all-powerful; and has spread snares for thy father, which, if hitherto He hath escaped them, is by fortune, not By favor.

Ulr. Doth he personally know you?
Wer. No; but he guesses shrewdly at my person, As he betray'd last night; and I, perhaps; But owe my temporary liberty To his uncertainty.

I think you wrong him, (Excuse me for the phrase;) but Stralenheim Is not what you prejudge him, or, if so, He owes me something both for past and present I saved his life, he therefore trusts in me. He hath been plunder'd too, since he came hither: Is sick; a stranger; and as such not now Able to trace the villain who hath robb'd him: I have pledged myself to do so; and the business Which brought me here was chiefly that: but I Have found, in searching for another's dross, My own whole treasure—you, my parents!

Wer. (agitatedly.) Who Taught you to mouth that name of "villain"?

Ulr. What

More noble name belongs to common thieves? Wer. Who taught you thus to brand an unknown being With an infernal stigma?

Ulr. My own feelings

Taught me to name a ruffian from his deeds.

Wer. Who taught you, long-sought and ill-found Ulric boy! that It would be safe for my own son to insult me?

Ulr. I named a villain. What is there in common

With such a being and my father?

Wer. That ruffian is thy father!

Jos. Oh, my son! Believe him not—and yet!—(her voice faltered.)

Ulr. (starts, looks earnestly at Werner, and then says slowly) And you avow it?

Wer. Ulric, before you dare despise your father, Learn to divine and judge his actions. Young, Rash, new to life, and rear'd in luxury's lap, Is it for you to measure passion's force, Or misery's temptation? Wait—(not long, It cometh like the night, and quickly)—Wait.— Wait till, like me, your hopes are blighted—till Sorrow and shame are handmaids of your cabin, Famine and poverty your guests at table; Despair your bedfellow—then rise, but not From sleep, and judge! should that day ever arrive— Should you see then the serpent, who hath coiled Himself around all that is dear and noble Of you and yours, lie slumbering in your path, With but a few folds between your steps and happiness, When â£, who lives but to tear from you name, Lands, life itself, lies at your mercy, with Chance your conductor; midnight for your mantle; The bare knife in your hand, and earth asleep, Even to your deadliest foe; and he as 'twere Inviting death, by looking like it while His death alone can save you:—Thank your God! If then, like me, content with petty plunder, You turn aside—I did so.

Ulr. (abruptly.) But—

Wer. (outragedly.) Hear me! I will not brook a human voice—scarce dare Listen to my own (if that be human still)— Hear me! you do not know this man—I do. He's mean, deceitful, avaricious. You Deem yourself safe, as young and brave; but learn None are secure from desperation, few From subtlety. My worst foe, Stralenheim, Haunted a prince's palace, couch'd within A prince's chamber, lay below my knife! An instant—a mere motion—the least impulse Had swept him all and fears of mine from earth. He was within my power—my knife was raised Withdrawn—and I'm in his:—are you not so? Who tells you that he knows you not? Who says He hath not lure you here to end you? or To plunge you, with your parents, in a dungeon?

[He pauses.]

Ulr. Proceed—proceed!

Wer. Me he hath ever known And hunted through each change of time—name— fortune.

And why not you? Are you more versed in men? He wound snakes round me; flung along my path Reptiles, whom, in my youth I would have spurn'd, Even from my presence; but, in spurrying now, Fill only with fresh venom. Will you be

More patient? Ulric! Ulric!—there are crimes Made venial by the occasion, and temptations Which nature cannot master or forbear.

Ulr. (looks first at him, and then at Josephine.)

My mother!

Wer. Ay! I thought so: you have now Only one parent. I have lost alike Father and son, and stand alone.

Ulr. But stay!

[Wer. Werner rushes out of the chamber]
Jos. (to Ulric.) Follow him not until this storm of passion
Abates. Think'st thou, that were it well for him,
I had not follow'd?

Ulr. I obey you, mother,
Although reluctantly. My first act shall not
Be one of disobedience.

Jos. Oh! he is 'good'!
Condemn him not from his own mouth, but trust
To me, who have borne so much with him for and for him,
That this is but the surface of his soul,
And that the depth is rich in better things.

Ulr. These then are but my father's principles?

Jos. Nor doth he
Think as he speaks. Alas! long years of grief
Have made him sometimes thus.

Ulr. Explain to me
More clearly, then, these claims of Stralenheim,
That, when I see the subject in its bearings,
I may prepare to face him, or at least
To extricate you from your present peril.

Jos. I pledge myself to accomplish this—but would
I had arriv'd a few hours sooner!

Jos. Ay!
Hadst thou but done so!

Enter Gabor and Idenstein, with Attendants.

Gab. (to Ulric.) I have sought you, comrade.

Jos. (to Idenstein.) But for your age and folly, I would—

Iden. Help!
Hands off! Touch an intendant!

Gab. Do not think
I'll honor you so much as to save your throat
From the Ravenstone* by chok'ng you myself.

Iden. Thank you for the respite; but there are Those who have greater need of it than me.

Ulr. Unriddle this vile wrangling, or—

Gab. At once, then,
The baron has been rob'bd, and upon me
This worthy personage has deign'ed to fix
His kind suspicions—me! whom he ne'er saw
Till yester evening.

Iden. Wouldst you have me suspect
My own acquaintance? You have to learn
That I keep better company.

Gab. You shall
Keep the best short'ly, and the last for all men,
The worms! you hound of malice!

[Gabor seizes on him.]

Ulr. (interfering.) Nay, no violence:
He's old, unarm'd—be temperate, Gabor!

Gab. (letting go Idenstein.) True:
I am a fool to lose myself because
Fools deem me knave: it is their homage.

Ulr. (to Idenstein.) How

I'd fear you?

Iden. Help!

Ulr. I have help'd you.

Iden. Kill him! then
I'll say w.

Gab. I am calm—live on!

The Ravenstone, "Ravenstein," is the stone gibbet of Germany, and so called from the raven perching on it.

Iden. That's more
Than you shall do, if there be judge or judgment
In Germany. The baron shall decide!

Gab. Does he abet you in your accusation?

Iden. Does he not?

Gab. Then next time let him go sink
 Ere I go hang for snatch'ng him from drowning
But here he comes!

Enter Stralenheim.

Gab. (goes up to him.) My noble lord, I'm here.

Stral. Well, sir!

Gab. Have you sought with me?

Stral. What should I
Have with you?

Gab. You know best, if yesterday's Flood has not wash'd away your memory;
But that's a trifle. I stand here accused,
In phrases not equivocal, by you
Intendant, of the pillage of your person
Or chamber—is the charge your own or his?

Stral. I accuse no man.

Gab. Then you acquit me, baron!

Stral. I know not whom to accuse, or to acquit,
Or scarcely to suspect.

Gab. But you at least
Should know whom not to suspect. I am insulted—
Oppress'd here by these menials, and I look
To you for remedy—teach them their duty!
To look for thieves at home were part of it,
If duly taught; but, in one word, if I
Have an accuse, let it be a man
Worthy to be so of a man like me.

I am your equal.

Stral. You!

Gab. Ay, sir; and, for
Aught that you know, superior; but proceed—
I do not ask for hints, and surmises,
And circumstance, and proofs; I know enough
Of what I have done for you, and what you owe me.
To have at least waited your payment rather Than paid myself, had I been eager of Your gold. I also know that were I even
The villain I am deem'd, the service render'd
So recently would not permit you to Pursue me to the death, except through shame,
Such as would leave your scutcheon but a blank.

But this is nothing; I demand of you
Justice upon your unjust servants, and
From your own lips a disavowal of
All sanction of their insolence: thus much
You owe to the unknown, who asks no more,
And never thought to have ask'd so much.

Stral. This topic
May be of innocence.

Gab. 'Sdeath! who dare doubt it
Except such villains as ne'er had it?

Stral. You
Are hot, sir.

Gab. Must I turn an icicle.
Before the breath of menials, and their master?

Stral. Ulric! you know this man; I found him in Your company.

Gab. We found you in the Oder
Would we had left you there!

Stral. I give you thanks, sir.

Gab. I've earn'd them; but might have earn'd
More from others,
Perchance, if I had left you to your fate.
Stras. Ulric! you know this man?
Gab. No more than you do.
Ulric. If he avouches not my honor.
Stras. I am satisfied.
Gab. (Ironically.) Right easily, methinks. What is the spell in his asseveration?
Stras. More than in mine?
Gab. I merely said that I was satisfied—not that you were absolved.
Stras. I'm sure.
Gab. (Again! Am I accused or no?)
Stras. (to Josephine.) Who's safe?
Gab. (interrupting her with a stern look, and turning afterwards to Stralenheim.) Both.
Stras. What hath caused all this?
Gab. (talking his sword.) They shall. You have wrong'd me, Ulric,
More with your unknown thoughts than sword; I would
The last were in my bosom rather than
The first in yours. I could have borne you noble's
Absurd insinuations—ignorance
And dull suspicion are a part of his Entail will last him longer than his lands.—
But I may fit him yet:—you have vanquish'd me.
I was the fool of passion to conceive
That I could cope with you, whom I had seen
Already proved by greater perils than Rest in this arm. We may meet by and by,
However—but in friendship. [Exit Gabo.
Stras. I will brook
No more! This outrage following up his insults,
Perhaps his guilt, has cancell'd all the little
I owed him heretofore for the so-vaunted
Aid which he added to your abler succor.
Ulric, you are not hurt?
Stras. Not even by a scratch.
Stras. (to Idenstein.) Intendant take your measures to secure
You know: I revoke my former lenity.
He shall be sent to Frankfort with an escort
The instant that the waters have abated.
Iden. Secure him! he hath got his sword again—
And seems to know the use on't; 'tis his trade,
Belike;—I'm a civilian.
Stras. Fool! are not
You score of vassals dogging at your heels
Enough to seize a dozen such? Hence! after him
Ulr. Baron, I do beseech you!
Stras. I must be
Obey'd. No words!
Iden. Well, if it must be so—
March, vassals! I'm your leader, and will bring
The rear up: a wise general never should Expose his precious life—on which all rests.
I like that article of war. [Exit Idenstein and Attendants
Stras. Come hither,
Ulric: what does that woman here? Oh! now
I recognize her, 'tis the stranger's wife
Whom they name "Werner."
Stras. 'Tis his name.
Indeed.
is not your husband visible, fair dame? —
Jos. Who seeks him?
Stral. No one—for the present: but
I fain would parley, Ulric, with yourself Alone.
Ulr. I will retire with you.
Jos. Not so;
You are the latest stranger, and command
All places here.
(Aside to Ulric as she goes out.) O Ulric! have a care—
Remember what depends on a rash word!
(Ulr to Josephine.)
Fear not!—
[Exit Josephine.]
Stral. Ulric, I think that I may trust you:
You saved my life—and acts like these beget
Unbounded confidence.
Ulr. Say on.
Stral. Mysterious
And long-engender'd circumstances (not
To be now fully enter'd on) have made
This man obnoxious—perhaps fatal to me.
Ulr. Who? Gabor, the Hungarian?
Stral. No—this "Werner"—
With the false name and habit.
Ulr. How can this be?
He is the poorest of the poor—and yellow
Sickness sits cavern'd in his hollow eye:
The man is helpless.
Stral. He is—tis no matter;—
But if he be the man I deem (and that
He is so, all around us here—and much
That is not here—confirm my apprehension)
He must be made secure ere twelve hours further.
Ulr. And what have I to do with this?
Stral. I have sent
To Frankfort, to the governor, my friend,
(I have the authority to do so by An order of the house of Brandenburg,)
For a fit escort—but this cursed flood
Bars all access, and may do for some hours.
Ulr. It is abating.
Stral. That is well.
But how
Am I concern'd?
Stral. As one who did so much
For me, you cannot be indifferent to
That which is of more import to me than
The life you rescued.—Keep your eye on him!
The man avoids me, knows that I now know him.—
Watch him!—as you would watch the wild boar when
He makes against you in the hunter's gap—
Like him he must be spear'd.
Ulr. Why so?
Stral. He stands
Between me and a brave inheritance!
Oh, could you see it! But you shall.
Ulr. I hope so.
Stral. It is the richest of the rich Bohemia, Unsearched by searching war. It lies so near
The strongest city, Prague, that fire and sword
Have skim'd it lightly: so that now, besides
Its own exuberance, it bears double value
Confronted with whole realms afar and near Made deserts.
Ulr. You describe it faithfully.
Stral. Ay—could you see it, you would say so—
but,
As I have said, you shall.
Ulr. I accept the amen
Stral. Then claim a recompense from it and me,
Such as both may make worthy your acceptance
And services to me and mine for ever.
Ulr. And this sole, sick, and miserable wretch—
This way-worn stranger—stands between you and This Paradise?—(As Adam did between The devil and his)—[Aside.]
Stral. He doth.
Ulr. Hath he no right?
Stral. Right! none. A disinherited prodigal,
Who for these twenty years disgraced his lineage
In all his acts—But chiefly by his marriage,
And living amidst commerce-fetching burghers,
And dabbling merchants, in a mart of Jews.
Ulr. He has a wife, then?
Stral. You'd be sorry to Call such your mother. You have seen the woman
He calls his wife.
Ulr. Is she not so?
Stral. No more
Than he's your father—an Italian girl,
The daughter of a banish'd man, who lives
On love and poverty with this same Werner.
Ulr. They are childless, then?
Stral. There is or was a bastard,
Whom the old man—the grandsire (as old age
Is ever doting) took to warm his bosom
As it went chillly downward to the grave:
But the imp stands not in my path—he has fled
No one knows whither; and if he had not,
His claims alone were too contemptible
To stand.—Why do you smile?
Ulr. At your vain fears
A poor man almost in his grasp—a child
Of doubtful birth—can startle a grandee!
Stral. All's to be fear'd, where all is to be gain'd.
Ulr. True; and aught done to save or to obtain it Stral. You have harp'd the very string next to my heart.
I may depend upon you?
Ulr. "Twere too late
To doubt it.
Stral. Let no foolish pity shake
Your bosom (for the appearance of the man
Is pitiful)—he is a wretch, as likely
To have robb'd me as the fellow more suspected,
Except that circumstance is less against him,
He being far off, and in a chamber
Without approach to mine: and, to say truth,
I think too well of blood allied to mine,
To deem he would descend to such an act.
Besides he was a soldier, and a brave one
Once—though too rash.
Ulr. And they, my lord, we know
By our experience never plunder till
They knock the brains out first—which makes them heirs,
Not thieves. The dead, who feel nought, can lose
nothing,
Nor e'er be robb'd: their spoils are a bequest
No more.
Stral. Go to! you are a wag. But say
I may be sure you'll keep an eye on this man,
And let me know his slightest movement towards Concealment or escape?
Ulr. You may be sure
You yourself could no watch him more than I
A Hall in the same Palace, from whence the secret Passage leads.

Enter Werner and Gabor.

GAB. Sir, I have told my tale: if it so please you
To give me refuge for a few hours—well—
If not, I'll try my fortune elsewhere.

WER. How can I, so wretched, give to misery
A shelter—wanting such myself as much
As e'er the hunted deer a covert—
GAB. Or the wounded lion his cool cave. Methinks
You rather look like one would turn at bay,
And rip the hunter's entrails.

WER. Why?
GAB. I care not
If it be so, being much disposed to do
The same myself. But will you shelter me?
I am oppress'd like you—and poor like you—
Disgraced—
WER. (abruptly.) Who told you that I was disgraced?
GAB. No one; nor did I say you were so: with Your poverty my likeness ended; but
I said I was so—and would add, with truth,
As undeservedly as you.

WER. Again!

GAB. As I?
WER. —Or any other honest man,
What the devil would you have? You don't believe me
Guilty of this base theft?

GAB. Why that's my heart of honor: you young gallant—
Your miserly intendant and dense noble—
All—all suspected me; and why? because
I am the worst-clothed and least named among them;
Although, were Musus' lattice in our breasts,
My soul might brook to open it more widely
Than theirs: but thus it is—you poor and helpless—
Both still more than myself.

WER. How know you that?
GAB. You're right: I ask for shelter at the hand
Which I call helpless; if you now deny it,
I were well paid. But you, who seem to have proved
The wholesome bitterness of life, know well,
By sympathy, that all the outspread gold
Of the New World the Spaniard boasts about
Could never tempt the man who knows its worth,
Weigh'd at its proper value in the balance,
Save in such guise (and there I grant its power,
Because I feel it) as may leave no nightmare—
Upon his heart o' nights.

WER. What do you mean?

GAB. Just what I say; I thought my speech was plain:
You are no thief—nor I—and, as true men,
Should aid each other.

WER. It is a damned world, sir.
GAB. So is the nearest of the two next, as
The priests say, (and no doubt they should know best.)
Therefore I'll stick by this—as being loth
To suffer martyrdom, at least with such
An epitaph as larceny upon my tomtom.
It is but a night's lodging which I crave;
To-morrow I will try the waters, as
The dove did, trusting that they have abated.

WER. Abated? Is there hope of that?

GAB. There was At noontido.
WER. Then we may be safe.
GAB. Are you
In peril?
WER. Poverty is ever so.
GAB. That I know by long practice. Will you not Promise to make mine less?
WER. Your poverty?
GAB. No—you don't look a leech: that disorder;
I meant my peril only: you've a roof,
And I have none; I merely seek a covert.

WER. Rightly: for how should such a wretch as I
Have gold?
GAB. Searce honestly, to say the truth can't,
Although I almost wish you had the baron's.
WER. Dare you insinuate?
GAB. What?
WER. Are you aware
To whom you speak?
GAB. No; and I am not used
Greatly to care. (A noise is heard within.) But Hark! they come!

WER. Who come?
GAB. The intendant and his man-bounds after me:
I'd face them—but it were in vain to expect
Justice at hands like theirs. Whence shall I go?
But show me any place. I do assure you,
If there be faith in man, I am most guiltless
Think if it were your own case!

WER. (Aside.) Oh, just God!
Thy hell is not hereafter! Am I dust still?
GAB. I see you're moved; and it shows well in you:
I may live to requite it.

WER. Are you not
A spy of Stralenheim's?
GAB. Not I! and if
I were what, is there to espy in you?
Although I recollect his frequent question
About you and your spouse might lead to some Suspicion; but you best know—what—and why
I am his deadliest foe.

WER. You?
GAB. After such
A treatment for the service which in part
I render'd him, I am his enemy:
If you are not his friend, you will assist me.
WER. I will
GAB. But how?
WER. (showing the panel.) There is a secret spring:
Remember, I discover'd it by chance,
And used it but for safety.
WERNER.

'Gab. Open it, and I will use it for the same.
Wer. As I have said: it leads through winding walls, (So thick as to bear paths within their ribs, Yet lose no jot of strength or stateliness,) And hollow cells, and obscure niches, to I know not whither; you must not advance: Give me your word.
Gab. It is unnecessary;
How should I make my way in darkness through A Gothic labyrinth of unknown windings?
Wer. Yes, but who knows to what place it may lead?
I know not—(mark you!)—but who knows it might not Lead even into the chambers of your foe? So strangely were contrived these galleries By our Teutonic fathers in old days, When man built less against the elements Than his next neighbor. You must not advance Beyond the two first windings; if you do, (Albeit I never pass'd them,) I'll not answer For what you may be led to.
Gab. But I will.
A thousand thanks!
Wer. You'll find the spring more obvious On the other side; and, when you would return, It yields to the least touch.
Gab. I'll in—farewell!
[GABIN goes in by the secret panel.
Wer. (solus,) What have I done? Alas! what had I done Before to make this fearful? Let it be Still some atonement that I save the man, Whose sacrifice had saved perhaps my own— They come! to seek elsewhere what is before them!

Enter Idenstein and Others.
Iden. Is he not here? He must have vanish'd then Through the dim gothic glass by pious aid Of pictured saints upon the red and yellow Casements, through which the sunset streams like sunrise On 10ug pearl-color'd beards and crimson crosses, And gilded croissers, and cross'd arms, and cowls, And helms, and twisted armor, and long swords, All the fantastic furniture of windows Dim with brave knights and holy hermits, whose Likeness and fame alike rest on some panes Of crystal, which each rattling wind proclaims As frail as any other life or glory.
He's gone, however.
Wer. Whom do you seek?
Iden. A villain.
Wer. Why need you come so far, then?
Iden. In the search Of him who robb'd the baron.
Wer. You have divined the man?
Iden. As sure as you Stand there: but where's he gone?
Wer. Who?
Iden. He we sought.
Wer. You see he is not here.
Iden. And yet we traced him Up to this hall. Are you accomplishes? Or deal you in the black art?
Wer. I deal plainly, To many men the blackest.
Iden. It may be I have a question or two for yourself Hereafter; but we must continue now Our search for t'other.
Wer. You had best begin Your inquisition now: I may not be So patient always.
Iden. I should like to know, In good sooth, if you really are the man That Stralenheim's in quest of.
Wer. Insolent! Said you not that he was not here?
Iden. Yes, we; But there's another whom he tracks more keenly And soon, it may be, with authority Both paramount to his and mine. But, come! Bustle, my boys! we are at fault.

[Exit Idenstein and Attendants.
Wer. In what A maze hath my dim destiny involved me! And one base sin hath done me less ill than The leaving undone one far greater. Down, Thou busy devil rising, in my heart! Thou art too late! I'll nought to do with blood.

Enter Ulric.
Ulr. I sought you, father.
Wer. Is't not dangerous?
Ulr. No; Stralenheim is ignorant of all Or any of the ties between us:— He sends me here a spy upon your actions, Deeming me wholly his.
Wer. I cannot think it: 'Tis but a snare he winds about us both, To swoop the sire and son at once.
Ulr. I cannot Pause at each petty fear, and stumble at The doubts that rise like briars in our path, But must break through them, as an unarm'd carse Would, though with naked limbs, were the wolf rustling In the same thicket where he hew'd for bread. Nets are for thrushes, eagles are not caught so We'll overfly or rend them.
Wer. Show me how.
Ulr. Can you not guess?
Wer. I cannot.
Ulr. That is strange Came the thought ne'er into your mind last night? Wer. I understand you not.
Ulr. Then we shall never More understand each other. But to change The topic—
Wer. You mean to pursue it, as 'Tis of our safety.
Ulr. Right; I stand corrected. I see the subject now more clearly, and Our general situation in its bearings. The waters are abating: a few hours Will bring his summons'd myrmidons from Frankfort, When you will be a prisoner, perhaps worse, And I an outcast, bastardized by practice Of this same baron to make way for him.
Wer. And now your remedy! I thought to escape By means of this accursed gold; but now I dare not use it, show it, scarce look on it Methinks it wears upon its face my guilt For motto, not the mintage of the state:
And, for the sovereign's head, my own begirt
With hissing snakes, which curl around my temples,
And cry to all beholders, Lo! a villain!
Ulr. You must not use it, at least now; but take
This ring.
Wer. A gem! It was my father's!
Ulr. And
As such is now your own. With this you must Bide the intendant for his old caliche
And horses to pursue your route at sunrise,
Together with my mother.
Wer. And leave you,
So lately found, in peril too?
Ulr. Fear nothing!
The only fear were if we fled together,
For that would make our ties beyond all doubt.
The waters only lie in floods between
This burgh and Frankfort; so far's in our favor.
The route on to Bohemia, though encumbr'd,
Is not impassable; and when you gain
A few hours' start, the difficulties will be
The same to your pursuers. Once beyond
The frontier, and you're safe.
Wer. My noble boy!
Ulr. Hush! hush! no transports: we'll indulge in them
In Castle Siegendorf! Display no gold:
Show Idenstein the gem, (I know the man,
And have look'd through him;) it will answer thus
A double purpose. Stralenheim lost gold—
No jewel: therefore it could not be his;
And then the man who was possesst of this
Can hardly be suspected of abstraciffin
The baron's coin, when he could thus convert
This ring to more than Stralenheim has lost
By his last night's slumber. Be not over timid
In your address, nor yet too arrogant,
And Idenstein will serve you.
Wer. I will follow
In all things your direction.
Ulr. I would have
Spared you the trouble; but had I appear'd
I'd take an interest in you, and still more
By dabbling with a jewel in your favor,
All had beer, known at once.
Wer. My guardian angel!
This overpays the past. But how wilt thou
Fare in our absence?
Ulr. Stralenheim knows nothing
Of me as aught of kindred with yourself.
I will but wait a day or two with him
To hull all doubts, and then rejoin my father.
Wer. To part no more!
Ulr. I know not that; but at
The least we'll meet again once more.
Wer. My boy!
My friend! my only child, and sole preserver!
Oh, do not hate me!
Ulr. Hate my father.
Wer. Ay,
My father hated me. Why not my son?
Ulr. Your father knew you not as I do.
Wer. Scorpions
Are in thy words! Thou know me? in this guise,
Thou canst not know me, I am not myself;
Yet (hate me not) I will be soon.
Wer. I'll wait!
In the meantime be sure that all a son
Can do for parents shall be done for mine.
Wer. I see it, and I feel it; yet I feel
Further—that you despise me.
Ulr. Wherefore should I
Wer. Must I repeat my humiliation?
Ulr. No!
I have fathom'd it and you. But let us talk
Of this no more. Or if it must be ever,
Not now. Your error has redoubled all
The present difficulties of our house,
At secret war with that of Stralenheim:
All we have now to think of is to baffle
Him. I have shown one way.
Wer. The only one,
And I embrace it, as I did my son,
Who show'd himself and father's safety in
One day.
Ulr. You shall be safe; let that suffice.
Would Stralenheim's appearance in Bohemia
Disturb your right, or mine, if once we were Admitted to our lands?
Wer. Assuredly,
Situ'ate as we are now, although the first
Possessor might, as usual, prove the strongest,
Especially the next in blood.
Ulr. Blood; 'tis
A word of many meanings; in the veins
And out of them, it is a different thing—
And so it should be, when the same in blood
(As it is called) are aliens to each other,
Like Theban brethren: when a part is bad,
A few split ounces purify the rest.
Wer. I do not apprehend you.
Ulr. That may be—
And should, perhaps—and yet—but get ye ready
You and my mother must away to-night.
Here comes the intendant: sound him with the gem
'Twixt sink into his venial soul like lead
Into the deep, and bring up slime and mud,
And ooze too, from the bottom, as the lead doth
With its greased understratum; but no less
Will serve to warn our vessels through these shoals
The freight is rich, so heave the line in time!
Farewell! I scarce have time, but yet your hand,
My father—
Wer. Let me embrace thee!
Ulr. We may be
Observed: subdue your nature to the hour!
Keep off from me as from your foe!
Wer. Accursed
Be he who is the stifling cause which smothers
The best and sweetest feeling of our hearts;
At such an hour too!
Ulr. Yes, curse—it will ease you;
Here is the intendant.

Enter Idenstein.

Master Idenstein
How fare you in your purpose? Have you caught
The rogue?
Iden. No, faith!
Ulr. Well, there are plenty more
You may have better luck another chase.
Where is the baron?
Iden. Gone back to his chamber:
And now I think not, asking after you
With nobly-born impatience.
Ulr. Your great men
Must be answer'd on the instant, as the bound
Of the sting steed replies unto the spur:
Tis well: they have horses, too; for if they had not,
I fear that men must draw their chariots, as
They say kings did Sesostris.

I'd. Who was he?

Ulr. An old Bohemian—an imperial gipsy.

I'd. A gipsy or Bohemian, 'tis the same,
For they pass by both names. 'Was he one?

Ulr. I've heard so; but I must take leave. Intendant,

Your servant!—Werner, (to Werner slightly,) if that be your name,

Yours. [Exeunt I'den.

I'den. A well-spoken, pretty-faced young man!
And prettily behaved! he knows his station,
You see, sir: how he gave to each his due Precedence!

Wer. I perceived it, and applaud
His just discernment and your own.

I'den. That's well—
That's very well. You also know your place, too;
And yet, I don't know that I know your place.

Wer. (showing the ring.) Would this assist your knowledge

I'den. How!—What!—I'gh! and a jewel!

Wer. 'Tis your own on one condition.

I'den. Mine!—Name it!

Wer. That hereafter you permit me
At thrice its value to redeem: 'tis
A family ring.

I'den. A family!—yours!—a gem! I'm breathless!

Wer. You must also furnish me
An hour ere daybreak: let all means to quit
This place.

I'den. But is it real? Let me look on it.

Diamond, by all that's glorious!

Wer. Come! I'll trust you;
You have guess'd, no doubt, that I was born above
My present seeming.

I'den. I can't say I did,
Though this looks like it: this is the true breeding
Of gentle blood.

Wer. I have important reasons
For wishing to continue privately
My journey hence.

I'den. So then you are the man
Whom Stralheim's in quest of?

Wer. I am not;
But being taken for him might conduct
To much embarrassment to me just now,
And to the baron's self hereafter—'tis
To spare both that I would avoid, all bustle.

I'den. Be you the man or no, 'tis not my business;
Besides, I never should obtain the half
From this proud,iggardly noble, who would raise
The country for some missing bits of coin,
And, never offer a precise reward—
But this!—another look!

Wer. Gaze on it freely;
At day-dawn it is yours.

I'den. Oh, thou sweet sparkler!
Thou more than all the stones of philosophy!
Thou touchstone of Philosophy herself!
Thou bright eye of the Mind! thou loadstar of
The soul! the true magnetic Pole to which
All hearts point duly north, like trembling needles!
Thou flaming Spirit of the Earth! which, sitting
High on the monarch's diadem, attractest

More worship than the majesty who sweats
Beneath the crown which makes his head ache, like
Millions of hearts which bleed to lend it lustre;
Shalt thou be mine? I am, methinks, already
A little king, a lucky alchemist!—
A wise magician, who has bound the devil
Without the forfeit of his soul. But come,
Werner, or what else?

Wer. Call me Werner still;
You may yet know me by a loftier title.

I'den. I do believe in thee! thou art the spirit
Of whom I long have dream'd in a low garb.—
But come, I'll serve thee; thou shalt be as free
As air, despite the waters; let us hence:
I'll show thee I am honest!—(oh, thou jewel!)
Thou shalt be furnish'd, Werner, with such means
Of flight, that if 'tis worth a small, not birds
Should overtake thee. Let me gaze again:
I have a foster-brother in the mart
Of Hamburg skill'd in precious stones. How many Carats may it weigh?—Come, Werner I will wing thee.

[Exeunt]

SCENE II.

STRALENHEIM'S Chamber.

STRALENHEIM and FRITZ.

Frits. All's ready, my good lord!

Stral. I am not sleepy,
And yet I must to bed; I fain would say
To rest, but something heavy on my spirit,
Too dull for wakefulness, too quiet for slumber,
Sits on me as a cloud along the sky,
Which will not let the sunbeams through, nor yet
Descend in rain and end, but spreads itself
Twixt earth and heaven, like envy between man
And man, an everlasting mist;—I will Unto my pillow.

Frits. May you rest there well!

Stral. I feel, and fear, I shall.

Frits. And wherefore fear?

Stral. I know not why, and therefore do fear more
Because an undescribable—but this
All folly. Were the locks (as I desired)
Changed, to-day, of this chamber? for last night's Adventure makes it needful.

Frits. Certainly,
According to your order, and beneath
The inspection of myself and the young Saxon
Who saved your life. I think they call him "Ulr.

Stral. You think! you supercilious slave! what right
Have you to tax your memory, which should be
Quick, proud, and happy to retain the name
Of him who saved your master, as a litany
Whose daily repetition marks your duty.—
Get hence! "You think," indeed! you who stood still
Howling and dripping on the bank, whilst I
Lay dying, and the stranger dash'd aside
The roaring torrent, and restored me to Thank him—and despise you. "You think!" and scarce
Can recollect his name! I will not waste
More words on you. Call me betimes.

Frits. Good night!

I trust to-morrow will restore your lordship
To renovated strength and temper.

[The scene closes]
A Garden.

Enter Werner.

Wer. I could not sleep, and now the hour's at hand; All's ready. Idenstein has kept his word; And station'd in the outskirts of the town, Upon the forest's edge, the vehicle Awaits us. Now the dwindling stars begin To pale in heaven; and for the last time I Look on these horrible walls. Oh! never, never Shall I forget them. Here I came most poor, But not dishonour'd: but I leave them with A stain,—if not upon my name, yet in My heart!—a never-dying cancer-worm, Which all the coming splendor of the lands, And rights, and sovereignty of Siegendorf Can scarcely hull a moment. I must find Some means of restitution, which would ease My soul in part; but how without discovery?— It must be done, however; and I'll pause Upon the method the first hour of safety. The madness of my misery led to this Base infamy; repentance must retrieve it: I will have sought of S. Rathenhim's upon My spirit, though he would grasp all of mine; Lands, freedom, life,—and yet he sleeps! as soundly! Perhaps, as infancy, with gorgeous curtains Spread for his canopy, o'er silken pillows, Such as when——Hark! what noise is that? Again The branches shake; and some loose stones have fallen From yonder terrace. [Ulric leaps down from the terrace Ulric! ever welcome! Thrice welcome now! this filial—— Ulr. Stop! Before We approach, tell me—— Wer. Way look you so? Do I Behold my father, or—— Ulr. What? Wer. An assassin? Ulr. Insane or insolent! Wer. Reply, sir, as You prize your life, or mine! Wer. To what must I Answer? Ulr. Are you or are you not the assassin Of Stralenheim? Wer. I never was as yet The murderer of any man. What mean you? Ulr. Did not you this night (as the night before) Retrace the secret passage? Did you not Again revisit Stralenheim's chamber? and—— [Ulric pauses] Wer. Proceed. Ulr. Died he not by your hand? Wer. Great God Ulr. You are innocent, then! my father's inno cent! Embrace me! Yes,—your tone,—your look,—yes, yes— Yet say so. Wer. If I e'er, in heart or mind, Conceived deliberately such a thought, But rather strive to trample back to hell Such thoughts—if e'er they glared a moment through The irritation of my oppressed spirit— May heaven be shut for ever from my hopes As from mine eyes! Ulr. But Stralenheim is dead Wer. 'Tis horrible! 'tis hideous, as 'tis hateful! But what have I to do with this? Ulr. No bolt Is forced, no violence can be detected, Save on his body. Part of his own household Have been alarm'd; but as the intendant is Absent, I took upon myself the care—— Of mustering the police. His chamber has, Past doubt, been enter'd secretly. Excuse me, If nature—— Ulr. Oh, my boy! what unknown woes Of dark fatality, like clouds, are gathering Above our house! Ulr. My father! I acquit you! But will the world do so? will even the judge
In Innocence's shadow, it may be,
Because 'tis dusky
Ulr. And if I do so,
What will mankind, who know you not, or knew
But to oppress? You must not stand the hazard
Away—I'll make all easy. Idenstein
Will for his own sake and his jewel's, hold
His peace—he also is a partner in Your flight—moreover—
Wer. Fly! and leave my name
Link'd with the Hungarian's, or prefer'd as poorest,
To bear the brand of bloodshed?
Ulr. Pshaw! leave
Except our father's sovereignty and castle,
For which you have so long panted and in vain
What name? You have no name, since that you bear
Is feign'd.
Wer. Most true; but still I would not have at Engraved in crimson in men's memories,
Though in this most obscure abodes of men—
Besides, the search—
Ulr. I will provide against Aught that can touch you. No one knows you here
As heir of Siegenfeld: If Idenstein
Suspects, 'tis but suspicion, and he is
A fool: his folly shall have such enjoyment,
Too, that the unknown Werner shall give way
To nearer thoughts of self. The laws (if 'er Laws reach'd this village) are all in abeyance
With the late general war of thirty years,
Or crush'd, or rising slowly from the dust,
To which the march of armies trampled them.
Stralenheim, although noble, is unheeded
Here, save as such—without lands, influence,
Save what hath perish'd with him Few prolong
A week beyond their funeral rites their sway
O'er men, unless by relatives, whose interest
Is roused: such is not here the case; he died
Alone, unknown,—a solitary grave,
Obscure as his deserts, without a scutcheon,
Is all he'll have, or wants. If I discover
The assassin, 'twill be well—if not, believe me
None else; though all the full-fed train of menials
May howl above his ashes (as they did Around him in his danger on the Oder)
Will no more stir a finger now than then.
Hence! hence! I must not hear your answer.—Loona
The stars are almost faded, and the gray
Begins to grizzle the black hair of night.
You shall not answer—pardon me that I
Am peremptory: 'tis your son that speaks,
Your long-lost late-found son.—Let's call my mother:
Softly and swiftly step, and leave the rest
To me: I'll answer for the event as far
As regards you, and that is the chief point,
As my first duty, which shall be observed.
We'll meet in Castle Siegenfeld—once more
Our banners shall be glorious! Think of that Alone, and leave all other thoughts to me,
Whose youth may better battle with them.—Hence!
And may your age be happy!—I will kiss
My mother once more, then Heaven's speed be with you!
Wer. This counsel's safe—but is it honorable?
Ulr. To save a father is a child's chief honor.
ACT IV.

SCENE I.

A Gothic Hall in the Castle of Siegendorf, near Prague.

Enter ERIK and Henrik, retainers of the Count.

ERIK. So better times are come at last; these Old walls new masters and high vassall—both A long desideratum.

HEN. Yes, for masters, It might be unto those who long for novelty, Though made by a new grave: but as for vassall, Methinks the old Count Siegendorf maintain'd His fouldal hospitality as high As e'er another prince of the empire

ERIK. Why, For the mere cup and treacher, we no doubt Fared passing well; but as for merriment And sport, without which salt and sauces season The cheer but scantily, our sizings were Even of the narrowest.

HEN. The old count loved not The roar of revel; are you sure that this does? ERIK. As yet he hath been courteous as his bounteous, And we all love him.

HEN. His reign is as yet Hardly a year o'erpast its honey-moon, And the first year of sovereigns is bridal: A non, we shall perceive his real sway And moods of mind.

ERIK. Pray heaven he keep the present! Then his brave son, Count Ulrice—there's a knight! Pity the wars are c' er! HEN. Why so? ERIK. Look on him!

HEN. And answer that yourself.

ERIK. He's very youthful, And strong and beautiful as a young tiger.

HEN. That's not a faithful vassal's likeness.

ERIK. Perhaps a true one.

ERIK. Pity, as I said, The wars are over. in the hall, who like Count Ulrice for a well-supported pride, Which awes, but yet offends not? in the field, Who like him with his spear in hand, when gnashing His tusks, and rising up from right to left The howling hounds, the boar makes for the thicket? Who back's a horse, or bears a hawk, or wears A sword like him? Whose plume node knightlier? HEN. No one's, I grant you. Do not fear, if war Be long in coming he is of that kind Will make it for himself, if he hath not Already done as much.

ERIK. What do you mean? HEN. You can't deny his train of followers (But few our native fellow vassals born On the domain) are such a sort of knaves As—(Passes.) ERIK. What?

HEN. The war (you love so much) leaves living, Like other parents, she spoils her worst children.

ERIK. Nonsense! they are all brave iron-visaged fellows, Such as old Tilly loved.

HEN. And who loved Tilly t

Ask that of Magdebourg—or for that matter Wallenstein either; they are gone to—

ERIK. But what beyond 'tis not ours to pronounce.

HEN. I wish they had left us something of their rest;
The country (nominally now at peace) Is overrun with—God knows who: they fly By night, and disappear with sunrise; but Leave us no less desolation, may, even more, Than the most open warfare.

ERIK. But Count Ulrice—

What has all this to do with him?

HEN. With him! He—might prevent it. As you say he's fond Of war, why makes he it not on those marauders?

ERIK. You'd better ask himself?

HEN. I would as soon Ask of the lion why he laps not milk.

ERIK. And here he comes!

HEN. The devil! you'll hold your tongue;

ERIK. Why do you turn so pale?

HEN. 'Tis nothing—but Be silent.

ERIK. I will upon what you have said.

HEN. I assure you I meant nothing,—a mere sport Of words, no more; besides, had it been otherwise He is to expouse the gentle baroness Ida of Stralenheim, the late baron's heiress, And she no doubt will soften whatever O'fiercenesse the late long intestine wars Have given all natures, and most unto those Who were born in them, and bred up upon The knees of Hombich; sprinkled, as it were, With blood even at their baptism. Prifthee, peace On all that I have said!

Enter Ulric and Rodolph.

ULR. Good morrow, count.

ULR. Good morrow, worthy Henrick. ERIK. is All ready for the chase?

ERIK. The dogs are order'd Down to the forest, and the vassals out To beat the bushes, and the day looks promising Shall I call forth your excellency's suite? What curser will you please to mount?

ULR. The dun, Walstein.

ERIK. I fear he scarcely has recover'd The toils of Monday: 'twas a noble chase; You spear'd four with your own hand.

ULR. True, good Ern Rodolph! I had forgotten—let it be the gray, then, Old Ziska: he has not been out this fortnight.

ERIK. He shall be straight caparison'd. How many Of your immediate retainers shall Escort you?

ULR. I leave that to Weilburgh, our Master of the horse. [Exit ERIK.

ROD. My lord! Ulr. The news Is awkward from the—(RODOLPH points to Hen- nick.)

How now, Henrick? why Loiter you here?

HEN. For your commands, my lord

ULR. Go to my father, and present my duty
And learn if he would aught with me before
I mount.                              [Exit HENRICK.

Rodolph, our friends have had a check
Upon the frontiers of Franconia; and
'Tis rumor'd that the column sent against them
Is to be strengthened. I must join them soon.
Rod. Best wait for further and more sure advices.
Ulr. I mean it—and indeed it could not well
Have fallen out at a time more opposite to all my plans.
Rod. It will be difficult
To excuse your absence to the count your father.
Ulr. Yes, but the unsettled state of our domain
In high Silesia will permit and cover
My journey. In the mean time, when we are Engaged in the chase, draw off the eighty men
Whom Wolfe leads—keep the forests on your route:
You know it well?
Rod. As well as on that night
When we—

Ulr. We will not speak of that until
We can repeat the same with like success,
And when you have join'd, give Rosenberg this letter.
[Give a letter.

Rod. Add further, that I have sent this slight addition
To our force with you and Wolfe, as herald of My coming, though I could but spare them ill
At this time, as my father loves to keep
Full numbers of retainers round the castle,
Until this marriage, and its feasts and fooleries,
Are rung out with its peal of nuptial nonsense.
Rod. I thought you loved the lady Ida?
Ulr. Why, I do so—but it follows not from that
I would bind in my youth and glorious years,
So brief and burning with a lady's zone,
Although 'twere that of Venus;—but I love her,
As woman should be loved, fairly and solely.
Rod. And constantly?
Ulr. I think so; for I love
Nought else. But I have not the time to pause
Upon these bogwars of the heart. Great things
We have to do ere long. Speed! speed! go Rodolph!

Rod. On my return, however, I shall find
The baroness Ida lost in Countess Siegendorf?
Ulr. Perhaps—my father wishes it; and sooth
'Tis no bad policy: this union with
The last bud of the rival branch at once
Unites the future and destroys the past.
Rod. Adieu.
Ulr. Yet hold—we had better keep together
Until the chase begins; then draw thou off,
And do as I have said.
Rod. I will. But to Return—'twas a most kind act in the count
Your father to send up to Konigsberg
For this fair orphan of the baron, and
To hail her as his daughter.
Ulr. Wondrous kind! Especially as little kindness till
Then grew between them.
Rod. The late baron died
Of a fever did he not?
Ulr. How should I know?
Rod. I have heard it whisper'd there was something strange
About his death—and even the place of it
Is scarcely known.
Ulr. Some obscure viation on
The Saxon or Silesian frontier.
Rod. He
Has left no testament—no farewell words?
Ulr. I am neither confessor nor notary,
So cannot say.
Rod. Ah! here's the lady Ida
Enter Ida STRALENHEIM.
Ulr. You are early, my sweet cousin.
Ida. N't too early
Dear Ulric, if I do not interrupt you.
Why do you call me 'cousin'?
Ulr. (smiling.) Are we not so?
Ida. Yes, but I do not like the name; mech. nics
It sounds so cold, as if you thought upon
Our pedigree, and only weigh'd our blood.
Ulr. (starting.) Flood!
Ida. Why does yours start from your cheeks?
Ulr. Ay! doth it!
Ida. It doth—but no! it rushes like a torrent
Even to your brow again.
Ulr. (recovering himself.) And if it fled,
It only was because your presence sent it
Back to my heart, which beats for you, sweet cousin!
Ulr. Nay, then I'll call you sister.
Ida. I like that name still worse. Would we had ne'er
Been aught of kindred!
Ulr. (gloomily.) Would we never had.
Ida. Oh heavens! and can you wish that?
Ulr. Dearest Ida,
Did not echo your own wish?
Ida. Yes, Ulric,
But then I wish'd it not with such a glance,
And scarce knew what I said; but let me be Sister or cousin, what you will, so that
I still to you am something.
Ulr. You shall be
All—all—
Ida. And you to me are so already;
But I can wait.
Ulr. Dear Ida!
Ida. Call me Ida,
Your Ida, for I would be yours, none else's—
Indeed I have none left, since my poor father—
[She pauses.
Ulr. You have mine—you have me.
Ida. Dear Ulric, how I wish
My father could but view our happiness,
Which wants but this!
Ulr. Indeed!
Ida. You would have loved him.
He you; for the brave ever love each other:
His manners were a little cold, his spirit
Proud, (as is birth's prerogative;) but under This grave exterior—Would you had known each other!
Had such as you been near him on his journey
He had not died without a friend to sooth
His last and lonely moments.
Ulr. Who says that?
Ida. What?
Ulr. That he died alone.
Ida. The general rumour
And disappearance of his servants, who
Have no return'd: that fever was most deadly
Which swept them all away.
BYRON'S

WORKS.

Enter Werner at Count Siegendorp.

Ulr. My father, I salute you, and it grieves me With such brief greeting.—You have heard or bugle;
The vassals wait.

Sieg. So let them.—You forget To-morrow is the appointed festival In Prague for peace restored. You are apt to follow The chase with such an ardor as will scarce Permit you to return to-day, or if Return’d, too much fatigued to join to-morrow The nobles in our marshall'd ranks.

Ulr. You, count, Will well supply the place of both—I am not A lover of these pageantries.

Sieg. No, Ulric;
It were not well that you alone of all
Our young nobility——

Ida. And far the noblest
In aspect and demeanor.

Sieg. (to Ida.) True, dear child,
Though somewhat frankly said for a fair damsel,—
But, Ulric, recollect too our position,
So lately reinstated in our honors:
Believe me, 'twould be mark'd in any house,
But most in ours, that one should be found wanting At such a time and place. Besides, the Heaven Which gave us back our own, in the same moment It spread its peace o'er all, hath double claims On us for thanksgiving: first, for our country; And next, that we are here to share its blessings.

Ulr. (aside.) Devout, too! well, sir, I obey at once.

(Then aloud to a Servant.)

Ludwig, dismiss the train without! [Exit Ludwig.

Ida. And so
You yield at once to him what I for hours
Might supplicate in vain.

Sieg. (smiling.) You are not jealous
Of me, I trust, my pretty rebel! who Would sanction disobedience against all
Except thyself? But fear not: thou shalt rule him Hereafter with a fonder sway and firmer.

Ida. But I should like to govern now.

Sieg. You shall,
Your harp, which by the way awaits you with
The countess in her chamber. She complains That you are a sad traitor to your music:
She attends you.

Ida. Then good morrow, my kind kinsman
Ulric, you'll come and hear me?

Ulr. And by and by.

Ida. Be sure I'll sound it better than your bugles:
Then pray you be as punctual to its notes:
I'll play you King Gustavus' march.

Ulr. And why not,
Old Tilly's?

Sieg. Not that monster's! I should think
My harp-strings rang with groans, and not with music,
Could aught of his sound on it:—but come quickly Your mother will be eager to receive you.

[Exit Ida

Sieg. Ulric, I wish to speak with you alone.

Ulr. My time's your vassal.—
(aside to Rodolph.) Rodolph, hence, and do
As I directed; and by his best speed
And readiest means let Roseueberg reply.
Rod. Count Siegendorf, command you aught? I am bound
Upon a journey past the frontier.
Sieg. (start.) Ah!
Where? on what frontier?
Rod. The Silesian, on
My way—(aside to Ulric)—Where shall I say?
Ulr. (aside to Rodolph.) To Hamburgh.
(Aside to himself.) That Word will I think put a firm padlock on
His further inquisition.
Rod. Count, to Hamburgh.
Sieg. (agitated.) Hamburgh! No, I have nought to do there, nor Am aught connected with that city. Then
God speed you!
Rod. Fare ye well, Count Siegendorf!
[Exit Rodolph.
Sieg. Ulric, this man, who has just departed, is One of those strange companions whom I fain
Would reason with you on.
Ulr. My lord, he is
Noble by birth, of one of the first houses
In Saxony.
Sieg. I talk not of his birth,
But of his bearing. Men speak lightly of him.
Ulr. So they will do of most men. Even the monarch
Is not fenced from his chamberlain's slander. or
The sneer of the last courtier whom he has made Great and ungrateful.
Sieg. If I must be plain,
The world speaks more than lightly of this Rodolph:
They say he is leagued with the "black bands" who still
Ravage the frontier.
Ulr. And will you believe
The world?
Sieg. In this case—yes.
Ulr. In any case
I thought you knew it better than to take
An accusation for a sentence.
Sieg. Son!
I understand you: you refer to—
but
My destiny has so involved about me
Her spider web, that I can only flutter
Like the poor fly, but break it not. Take heed,
Ulric; you have seen to what the passions led me:
Twenty long years of misery and famine
Quench'd them not—twenty thousand more, perchance,
Hereafter (or even here in moments which Might date for years, did Anguish make the dial)
May not obliterate or expiate
The madness and dishonor of an instant.
Ulric, be warn'd by a father!—I was not
By my self, and you behold me!
Ulr. I behold
The prosperous and beloved Siegendorf,
Lord of a prince's appanage, and honor'd
By those he rules and those he ranks with.
Sieg. Ah!
Why wilt thou call me prosperous, while I fear
For thee? Beloved, when thou lov'st me not!
All hearts but one may beat in kindness for me—
But if my son's is cold!—
Ulr. Who dare say that?
Sieg. Noce else but I, who see it—feel it—keener
Than would your adversary, who dared say so,
Your sabre in his heart! Bu mine survives
The wound.
Ulr. You err. My nature is not given
To outward fondling; how should it be so,
After twelve years' divortce from my parents?
Sieg. And did not I too pass those twelve tora
years
In a like absence? But 'tis vain to urge you—
Nature was never call'd back by remonstrance.
Let's change the theme. I wish you to consider
That these young violent nobles of high name,
But dark deeds, (ay, the darkest, if all Rumor Reports be true,) with whom thou consortest,
Will lead thee—
Ulr. (impatiently.) I'll be led by no man.
Sieg. Nor
Be leader of such, I would hope: at once
To wean thee from the perils of thy youth
And haughty spirit, I have thought it well .
That thou shouldst wed the lady Ida—more
As thou appear'st to love her.
Ulr. I have said
I will obey your orders, were they to Unite with Hecate—can a son say more?
Sieg. He says too much in saying this. It is not
The nature of thine age, nor of thy blood,
Nor of thy temperament, to talk so coolly,
Or act so carelessly, in that which is
The bloom or blight of all men's happiness.
(For Glory's pillow is but rest-less, if Love lay not down his cheek thereof:) some strong bias.
Some master fiend is in thy service to Misrule the mortal who believes him slave,
And makes his every thought subservient; else
Thou'dst say at once—'I love young Ida, and Will wed her;' or, 'I love her not, and all
The powers of earth shall never make me.'—So
Would I have answer'd.
Ulr. Sir, you wed for love
Sieg. I did, and it has been my only refuge
In many miseries.
Ulr. Which miseries
Had never been but for this love-match.
Sieg. Still
Against your age and nature? Who at twenty E'er answer'd thus till now?
Ulr. Did you not warn me
Against your own example?
Sieg. Boyish sophist!
In a word, do you love, or love not, Ida?
Ulr. What matters it, if I am ready to Obey you in espousing her?
Sieg. As far
As you feel, nothing, but all life for her.
She's-young—all beautiful—adores you—is
Endow'd with qualities to give happiness,
Such as rounds common life into a dream
Of something which your poets cannot paint,
And (if it were not wisdom to love virtue)
For which Philosophy might barter wisdom:
And giving so much happiness, deserves
A little in return. I would not have her
Break her heart for a man who has none to break
Or wither on her stalk like some pale rose'
Deserted by the bird she thought a nightingale.
According to the Orient tale. She is—
Ulr. The daughter of dead Stridelme, in your for I'll wed her, n'ertheless; though, to say truth,
Thou villainous gold! and thy dead master's doon!
Though he died not by me or mine, as much
As if he were my brother! I have ta'en
His orphan Ida—cherish'd her as one
Who will be mine.

Enter an Attendant.

Att. The abbot, if it please
Your excellency, whom you sent for, waits
Upon you.

[Exit Attendant

Enter the Prior Albert.

Prior. Peace be with these walls, and all Within them!

Sieg. Welcome, welcome, holy father!
And may thy prayer be heard!—all men have need
Of such, and I—

Prior. Have the first claim to all
The prayers of our community, Our convent,
Erected by your ancestors, is still
Protected by their children.

Prior. Yes, good father;
Continue daily orisons for us
In these dim days of heresies and blood,
Though the schismatic Swede, Gustavus, is Gone home.

Prior. To the endless home of unbelievers,
Where there is everlasting wail and wo,
Gnashing of teeth, and tears of blood, and fire
Eternal, and the worm which dieth not!

Sieg. True, father; and to avert those pangs from me,
Who, though of our most faultless holy church,
Yet died without its last and dearest offices,
Which smooth the soul through purgatorial pains,
I have to offer humbly this donation
In masses for his spirit.

[SiEGENDORF offers the gold which he had taken from STRALENHEIM.

Prior. Count, if I receive it, 'tis because I know too well
Refusal would offend you. Be assured
The largess shall be only dealt in alms,
And every mass less sung for the dead.
Our house needs no donations, thanks to yours,
Which has of old endow'd it; but from you
And yours in all meet things 'tis fit we obey.
For whom shall mass be said?

Sieg. (sulking.)

Prior. For— for the dead.
Sieg. His name?

Prior. 'Tis from a soul, and not a name,
I would avert perdition.

Prior. I meant not
To pry into your secret. We will pray
For one unknown, the same as for the proudest.

Sieg. Secret! I have none; but, father, he who's gone
Might have one; or, in short, he did bequeath—
No, not bequeath—but I bestow this sum
For pious purposes.

Prior. A proper deed
In the behalf of our departed friends.

Sieg. But he who's gone was not my friend, but foe,
The deadliest and the staunchest.

Prior. Better still! To employ our means to obtain heaven for the soul
Of our dead enemies is worthy those
Who can forgive them living.
Sieg. But I did not
Forgive this man. I loathed him to the last,
As he did me. I do not love him now,
But—
Prior. Best of all! for this is pure religion;
You faint would rescue him you hate from hell—
An evangelical compassion—with
Your own gold too!
Sieg. Father, 'tis not my gold.
Prior. Whose then? You said it was no legacy.
Sieg. No matter whose—of this be sure, that he
Who own'd it never more will need it, so
In that which it may purchase from your altars:
Tis yours, or theirs.
Prior. Is there no blood upon it?
Sieg. No: but there's worse than blood—eternal shame!
Prior. Did he who own'd it die in his bed?
Sieg. Alas! He did.
Prior. Son! you relapse into revenge,
If you regret your enemy's bloodless death.
Sieg. His death was fathomlessly deep in blood.
Prior. You said he died in his bed, not battle.
Sieg. Died, I scarce know—but—he was stabb'd i' the dark.
And now you have it—perish'd on his pillow
By a cut-throat!—Ay!—you may look upon me!
I am not the man. I'll meet your eye on that point
As I can one day God's.
Prior. Nor did he die,
By means, or men, or instrument of yours?
Sieg. No! by the God who sees and strikes!
Prior. Nor know you
Who slew him?
Sieg. I could only guess at one,
And he to me a stranger, unconnected,
As unemploy'd. Except by one day's knowledge
I never saw the man who was suspected.
Prior. Then you are free from guilt.
Sieg. (ragerly.) Oh! I am I?—say!
Prior. You have said so, and know best.
Sieg. Father! I have spoken
The truth, and nought but truth, if not the whole;
Yet say I am not guilty! for the blood
Of this man weighs on me, as if I shed it,
Though, by the Power who abhorreth human blood
I did not!—nay once spared it, when I might
And could—say, perhaps, should (if our self-safety
Be e'er excusable in such defences
Against the attack of over-potent foes:)
But pray for him, for me, and all my house;
For, as I said, though I be innocent,
I know not why, a like remorse is on me,
As if he had fallen by me or mine. Pray for me,
Father! I have pray'd myself in vain.
Prior. I will
Be comforted! You are innocent, and should Be calm as innocence.
Sieg. But calmness is not Always the attribute of innocence.
I feel it is not.
Prior. But it will be so,
When the mind gathers by its truth within it.
Remember the great festival to-morrow,
In which you rank amidst our chiefest nobles,
As well as your brave son; and smooth your aspect;
Nor in the general orison of thanks
For bloodshad stopt, let blood you shed not rise
A cloud upon your thoughts. This were to be Too sensitive. Take comfort, and forget
Such things, and leave remorse unto the guilty.

ACT V.

SCENE I.

A large and magnificent Gothic Hall in the Castle of Siegendorf, decorated with Trophies, Barques and the Arms of that family.

Enter ARNHEIM and MEISER Attendants of COUNCIL
SIEGENDORF.

Arn. Be quick! the count will soon return: the ladies
Already are at the portal. Have you sent
The messengers in search of him he seeks for?
Meis. I have, in all directions, over Prague
As far as the man's dress and figure could
By your description track him. The devil take These revels and processions! All the pleasure
(If such there be) must fall to the spectators.
I'm sure none doth to us who make the show.
Arn. Go to! my lady countess comes.
Meis. I'd rather
Ride a day's hunting on an outworn jade.
Than follow in the train of a great man
In these dull pageantries.

Att. Begone! and rai
Within.

[Exeunt.

Enter the Countess JOSEPHINE SIEGENDORF and IDA STRALENHEIM.

Jos. Well, Heaven be praised, the show is over.
Ida. How can you say so! I never have I dreamt
Of sought so beautiful. The flowers, the boughs,
The banners, and the nobles, and the knights,
The gems, the robes, the plumes, the nappy faces,
The courtesies, and the incense, and the sun
Streaming through the stain'd windows, even the tombs,
Which look'd so calm, and the celestial hymns,
Which seem'd as if they rather came from heaven
Than mounted there. The bursting organ's loud
Rolling on high like harmonious thunder;
The white robes and the lifted eyes; the world
At peace! and all at peace with one another!
Oh, my sweet mother! [Embracing JOS.
Jos. My beloved child!
For such, I trust, thou shalt be shortly.
Ida. Oh, I am so already. Feel how my heart beats!
Jos. It does, my love; and never may it thro'
With aught more bitter.
Ida. Never shall it do so!
Jos. How should it? What should make us grieve?
I hate
To hear of sorrow: how can we be sad,
Who love each other so entirely? You,
The count, and Ulric, and your daughter Ida
Jos. Poor child!
Ida. Do you pity me?
Jos. No: but I envy
And that in sorrow, not in the world's sense
Of the universal vice, if one vice be
More general than another.

Ida. I'll not hear
A word against a world which still contains
You and my Ulric. Did you ever see
Aught like him? How he tower'd among them all!
How all eyes follow'd him. The flowers fell faster—
rain'd from each lattice at his feet, methought,
Than before all the rest: and where he trod
I dare be sworn that they grew still, nor e'er
Will wither.

Jos. You will spoil him, little flatterer,
If he should hear you.
Ida. But he never will.
I dare not say so much to him—I fear him
Jos. Why so? he loves you well.
Ida. But I can never
Shape my thoughts of him into words to him.
Besides, he sometimes frightens me.
How so?
Jos. A cloud comes o'er his blue eyes suddenly,
Yet he says nothing.
Jos. It is nothing: all men,
Especially in these dark troublous times,
Have much to think of.
Ida. But I cannot think
Of aught save him.
Jos. Yet there are other me'n,
In the world's eye, as goody. There's, for instance,
The young Count Waldorf, who scarce once withdrew
His eyes from yours to-day.
Ida. I did not see him,
But Ulric. Did you not see at the moment
When all knelt, and I wept: and yet methought,
Through my fast tears, though they were thick and warm,
I saw him smiling on me.
Jos. I could not
See aught save heaven, to which my eyes were raised
Together with the people's.
Ida. I thought too
Of heaven, although I look'd on Ulric.
Jos. Come,
Let us retire; they will be here anon
Expectant of the banquet. We will lay
Aside these nodding plumes and dragging trains.
Ida. And, above all, these stiff and heavy jewels,
Which make my head and heart ache, as both throb
Beneath their glitter o'er my brow and zone.
Jos. Do not mother, I am with you.

[Exeunt.]

Enter Count SIEGENDORF, in full dress, from the solemnity, and LUDWIGO.

Sieg. Is he not found?
Lud. Strict search is making every where; and if the man be in Prague, be sure he will be found.
Sieg. Where's Ulric?
Lud. He rode round the other way
With some young nobles; but he left them soon;
And, if I err not, not a minute since
I heard his excellence, with his train,
Galloping o'er the west drawbridge.

Enter Ulric, splendidly dressed
Sieg. (to LUDWIGO.) See they cease not
Their quest of him I have described. (Exit LUDWIGO.)
Oh, Ulric!

How have I long'd for thee!

Ultr. Your wish is granted:

Behold me!

Sieg. I have seen the murderer.
Ultr. Whom? Where?
Sieg. The Hungarian, who slew Stralenheim
Ultr. You dream.
Sieg. I live! and as I live, I saw him—

Heard him! he dared to utter even my name.
Ultr. What name?
Sieg. Werner. 'twas mine.
Ultr. It must be so;
No more: forget it.
Sieg. Never! never! all
My destinies were woven in that name:
It will not be engraved upon my tomb,
But it may lead me there.

Ultr. To the point—the Hungarian!
Sieg. Listen!—The church was throng'd; the hymn was raised;

"Te Deum" pesl'd from nations, rather than
From choirs, in one great cry of "God be praised"
For one day's peace, after thrice ten dread years
Each bloodier than the former: I arose,
With all the nobles, and as I look'd down
Along the lines of lifted faces,—from
Our banner'd and escutcheon'd gallery, I Saw, like a flash of lightning, (for I saw
A moment and no more,) what struck me sightless
To all else—the Hungarian's face! I grew
Sick; and when I recover'd from the mist
Which curl'd about my senses, and again
Look'd down, I saw him not. The thanksgiving
Was over, and we march'd back in procession.

Ultr. Continue.

Sieg. When we reach'd the Mlndau's bridge
The joyous crowd above, the numberless
Barks mann'd with revellers in their best garbs
Which shot along the glancing tide below,
The decorated street, the long array,
The clashing music, and the thundering
Of far artillery, which seem'd to bid
A long and loud farewell to its great doings.

The standards o'er me, and the trampings round,
The roar of rushing thousands,—all—all could not Cross this man from my mind, although my senses
No longer held him palpable.

Ultr. You saw him
No more, then?
Sieg. I look'd as a dying soldier
Looks at a draught of water, for this man;
But still I saw him not; but in his stead—
Ultr. What in his stead?
Sieg. My eye for ever fell
Upon your dancing crest; the loftiest,
As on the loftiest and the loveliest head
It rose the highest of the stream of plumes,
Which overflow'd the glittering streets of Prague.

Ultr. What's this to the Hungarian?
Sieg. Much; for I
Had almost then forgot him in my son;
When just as the artillery ceased, and paused
The music, and the crowd embraced in lieu
Of shouting, I heard in a deep, low voice,
Distinct and keener far upon my ear
Than the late cannon's volume, this word—"Wer mer!"

Ultr. Uttered by—
Sieg. Hr! I turn'd—and saw—and fell

Ultr. And wherefore? Were you seen?
Sieg. The officious carer.

Of those around me dragg'd me from the spot,
Seeing my faintness, ignorant of the cause;
You, too, were too remote in the procession
(The old nobles being divided from their children)
To aid me.

Ulr. But I'll aid you now.

Sieg. In what?

Ulr. In searching for this man, or—When he's found,
What shall we do with him?

Sieg. I know not that.

Ulr. Then whereabouts seek him?

Sieg. Because I cannot rest
Till he is found. His fate, and Stralenheim's,
And curs, seem intertwined! nor can be Unravell'd, till—

Enter an Attendant.

Att. A stranger to wait on Your excellency.

Sieg. Who?

Att. He gave no name.

Sieg. Admit him, ne'ertheless.

[The Attendant introduces GABOR, and afterwards exit.

Ah!

Gab. 'Tis, then, Werner!

Sieg. (haughtily.) The same you knew, sir, by that name; and you!

Gab. (looking round.) I recognize you both: father and son,
It seems. Count, I have heard that you, or yours,
Have lately been in search of me; I am here.

Sieg. I have sought you, and have found you;
you are charged;
(Your own heart may inform you why) with such A crime as—

[He pauses.

Gab. Give it utterance, and then
I'll meet the consequences.

Sieg. You shall do so—

Unlucky—

Gab. First, who accuses me?

Sieg. All things,
If not all men: the universal rumor—
My own presence on the spot—the place—the time,
And every speck of circumstance unite
To fix the blot on you.

Gab. And on me only;
Pause ere you answer: is no other name,
Save mine, stain'd in this business?

Sieg. Trifling villain!
Who play'st with shine own guilt! Of all that breathe
Thou best dost know the innocence of him
'Gainst whom thy breath would blow thy bloody slander,
But I will talk no further with a wretch,
Further then justice asks. Answer at once,
And without quibbling, to my charge.

Gab. 'Tis false!

Sieg. Who says so?

Gab. L.

Sieg. And how disprove it?

Gab. By

The presence of the murderer.

Sieg. Name him?

Gab. He

May have more names than one. Your lordship had so

Once on a time.

Sieg. If you mean me, I dare
Your utmost.

Gab. You may do so, and in safety;
I know the assassin.

Sieg. Where is he?

Gab. (pointing to ULRIC.) Beside you.

[Ulrich rushes forward to attack GABOR; SIEGENDORF interposes.

Sieg. Liar and fiend! but you shall not be slain;
These walls are mine, and you are safe within them
(He turns to Ulrich)

Ulric, repel this calumny, as I
Will do. I show it as a growth so monstrous,
I could not deem it earth-born: but be calm;
It will refuse itself. But touch him not.

[Ulrich endeavors to compose himself.

Gab. Look at him, count, and then hear me.

Sieg. (first to GABOR, and then looking at Ulrich.)
I hear thee

My God! you look—

Ulr. How?

Sieg. As on that dread night
When we met in the garden.

Ulr. (composes himself.) It is nothing.

Gab. Count, you are bound to hear me. I came hither
Not seeking you, but sought.
When I knelt down
Amidst the people in the church, I dream'd not
To find the beggar'd Werner in the seat
Of senators and princes; but you have call'd me,
And we have met.

Gab. Go on, sir.

Sieg. (first) Ist I do so,
Allow me to inquire who professed
By Stralenheim's death? Was't I—as peck is ever,
And poorer by suspicion on my name!
The baron lost in that last outrage neither
Jewels nor gold; his life alone was sought,—
A life which stood between the claims of others
To honors and estates scarce less than princely.

Sieg. These hints, as vague as vain, attach no less
To me than to my son.

Gab. I can't help that,
But let the consequence alight on him
Who feels himself the guilty one among us
I speak to you, Count Siegendorf, because I know you innocent, and deem you just.
But ere I can proceed—dare you protect me?

Dare you command me?

[Siegendorf first looks at the Hungarian, and then at Ulrich, who has un buckled his sabre and is drawing lines with it on the floor—still in its sheath.

Ulr. (looks at his father and says.) Let the man go on!

Gab. I am unarmed, count—bid your son lay down
His sabre.

Ulr. (offers it to him contemptuously.) Take it

Gab. No, sir, 'tis enough.
That we are both unarmed—I would not choose
To wear a steel which may be stain'd with more
Blood than came there in battle.

Ulr. (casts the sabre from him in contempt.) It—or some
Such other weapon, in my hands—spared yours
Once when disarm'd and at my mercy.

Gab. True—

I have not forgotten it: you spared me for
Your own especial purpose—to sustain
Anonymity not my own.

Ulr. Proceed.

The tale is doubtless worthy the relater.
But is it of my father to hear further?

[To Siegfried.]

Sieg (takes his son by the hand.) My son! I know my own innocence, and doubt not
Of yours—but I have promised this man patience;
Let him continue.

Gab. I will not detain you
By speaking of myself much; I began
Life early—and am what the world has made me.
At Frankfort on the Oder, where I pass'd
A winter in obscurity, it was
My chance at several places of resort
(Which I frequented sometimes, but not often)
To hear related a strange circumstance
In February last. A martial force,
Sent by the state, had after strong resistance
Secured a band of desperate men, supposed
Marauders from the hostile camp. They proved,
However, not to be so—but banditti,
Whom either accident or enterprise
Had carried from their usual haunt—the forests
Which skirt Bohemia—even into Lusatia.
Many among them were reported of
High rank—and martial law slept for a time.
At last they were escorted o'er the frontiers,
And placed beneath the civil jurisdiction
Of the free town of Frankfort. Of their fate
I know no more.

Sieg. And what is this to Ulrike?

Gab. Among them there was said to be one man
Of wonderful endowments: birth and fortune,
Youth, strength, and beauty, almost superhuman,
And courage as unrival'd, were proclaim'd
His by the public rumor; and his sway
Not only over his associates, but
His judges, was attributed to witchcraft,
Such was his influence:—I have no great faith
In any magic save that of the mine—
I therefore deem'd him wealthy.—But my soul
Was roused with various feelings to seek out
This prodigy, if only to behold him.

Sieg. And did you so?

Gab. You'll hear. Chance favor'd me,
A popular affray in the public square
Drew crowds together—it was one of those Occasions where men's souls look out of them,
And show them as they are—even in their faces:
The moment my eye met his, I exclaimed,
"This is the man!" though he was then, as since,
With the nobles of the city. I felt sure
I had not err'd, and watch'd him long and nearly:
I noted down his form—his gesture—features,
Stature, and bearing, and amidst them all,
Midst every natural and acquired distinction,
I could discern, methought, the assassin's eye
And gladiator's heart.

Ulr. (smiling.) The tale sounds well.

Gab. And may sound better.—He appear'd to me
One of those beings to whom fortune bends
As she doth to the daring—and on whom
The fate of others oft depend; besides,
An indescribable sensation drew me
Near to this man, as if my point of fortune
Was to be fix'd by him.—There I was wrong.

Sieg And may not be right now.

Gab. I follow'd him.

Solicited his notice—and obtained it—
Though not his friendship:—it was his intention
To leave the city privately—we left it
Together—and together we arrived
In the poor town where Werner was conceal'd,
And Stralenheim was succor'd—Now we are on
The verge—dare you hear further?

Sieg. Or I have heard too much.

Gab. I saw in you
A man above his station—and if not
So high, as now I find you, in my then
Conceptions, 'twas that I had rarely seen
Men such as you appear'd in height of mind
In the most high of worldly rank; you were Poor, even to all save rags: I would have shared
My purse, though slender, with you—you refused it.
Sieg. Doth my refusal make a debt to you,
That thus you urge it?

Gab. Still you owe me something
Though not for that; and I owed you my safety,
At least my seeming safety, when the slaves
Of Stralenheim pursued me on the grounds
That I had rob'd him.

Sieg. Whom and whose house you arraign, reviving viper

Gab. I accuse no man—save in my defence.
You, count, have made yourself accuser—judge.
Your hall's my court, your heart is my tribunal.
Be just, and I'll be merciful!

Sieg. You merciful!

You! Base calumniator!

Gab. I. 'Twill rest
With me at last to be so. You conceal'd me—
In secret passages known to yourself,
You said, and to none else. At dead of night,
Weary with watching in the dark, and dubious
Of tracing back my way, I saw a glimmer,
Through distant crannies, of a twinkling light:
I follow'd it, and reach'd a door—a secret
Portal—which open'd to the chamber, where,
With cautious hand and slow, having first undone
As much as made a crevice of the fastening,
I look'd through and beheld a purple bed,
And on it Stralenheim !—

Sieg. Asleep! And yet
You slew him!—Wretch!

Gab. He was already slain,
And bleeding like a sacrifice. My own
Blood became ice.

Sieg. But he was all alone!
You saw none else? You did not see the—

[He pauses from agitation.

Gab. No

He, whom you dare not name, nor even I
Scare dare to recollect, was not then in The chamber.

Sieg. (to Ulrike.) Then, my boy! thou art guiltless still—

Thou bad'st me say I was so once—Oh! now
Do thou as much?

Gab. Be patient! I can not
Recede now, though it shake the very walls
Which frown above us. You remember,—or
If not, your son does,—that the locks were changed
Beneath his chief inspection on the morn
Which led to this same night: how he had enter'd
He best knows—but within an antechamber.
WERNER.

The door of which was half ajar, I saw
A man who wash’d his bloody hands, and oft
With stern and anxious glance gazed back upon
The bleeding body—but it moved no more.

Sieg. Oh! God of fathers!

Gab. I beheld his features
As I see yours—but yours they were not, though
Resembling them—behold them in Count Ulrich’s!
Distinct, as I beheld them, though the expression
Is not now what it then was;—but it was so
When I first charged him with the crime—so lately.

Sieg. This is so—

Gab. (interrupting him.) Nay—but hear me to the end!

Now you must do so.—I conceived myself
Betray’d by you and him (for now I saw
There was some & between you) into this Pretended den of refuge, to become
The victim of your guilt; and my first thought
Was vengeance: but though arm’d with a short Poniard
(Having left my sword without) I was no match
For him at any time, as had been proved
That morning—either in address or force.
I turn’d and fled—! the dark: chance rather than Skill made me gain the secret door of the hall,
And thence the chamber where you slept; if I
Had found you waking, Heaven alone can tell What vengeance and suspicion might have prompted;
But ne’er slept guilt as Werner slept that night.

Sieg. And yet I had horrid dreams! and such brief
Sleep.
The stars had not gone down when I awoke,
Why didst thou spare me? I dreamt of my father—
And now my dream is out

Goo. Tis not my fault,
If I have read it.—Well! I fled and hid me—
Chance led me here after so many moons—
And show’d me Werner in Count Siegendorf’s
Werner, whom I had sought in huts in vain,
Inhabited the palace of a sovereign!
You sought me and have found me—now you know
My secret, and may weigh its worth.

Sieg. (after a pause.) Indeed!

Gab. Is it revenge or justice which inspires
Your meditation?

Sieg. Neither—I was weighing
The value of your secret.

Gab. You shall know it
At once. — When you were poor, and I, though poor,
Rich enough to relieve such poverty
As might have envied mine, I offer’d you
My purse—you would not share it.—I’ll be franker
With you: you are wealthy, noble, trusted by
The imperial powers—you understand me?

Sieg. Yes.

Gab. Not quite. You think me venal, and scarce true:
Tis no less true, however, that my fortunes
Have made me both at present. You shall aid me;
I would have aided you—and also have
Been somewhat damaged in my name to save Yours and your son’s. Weigh well what I have said.

Sieg. Dare you await the event of a few minutes’
Deliberation?

Gab. (casts his eyes on Ulric who is leaning against a pillar.) If I should do so?

Sieg. I pledge my life for yours. Withdraw into This tower.

[Opens a turret door
Gab. (hesitatingly.) This is the second safe asylum
You have offer’d me.

Sieg. And was not the first so?

Gab. I know not that it was even now—but will approve
The second. And I have still a further shield.—
I did not enter Prague alone; and should I
Be put to rest with Stralenheim, they are
Some tongues without will wag in my behalf;
Be brief in your decision!

Sieg. I will be so.—

My word is sacred and irrevocable
Within these walls, but it extends no further.
Gab. I’ll take it for so much.

Sieg. (points to Ulric’s sabre still upon the ground.)

Take also that—

I saw you eye it eagerly, and him
Distrustfully.

Gab. (takes up the sabre.) I will: and so provide
To sell my life—not cheaply.

[Gabor goes into the turret, which Siegendorf closes.

Sieg. (advances to Ulric.) Now, Count Ulric!

For son I dare not call thee—What sayst thou?

Ulr. His tale is true.

Sieg. * True, monster?

Ulr. Most true, father.

And you did well to listen to it: what
We know, we can provide against. He must Be silenced.

Sieg. Ay, with half of my domains;
And with the other half, could he and thou
Unsay this villainy.

Ulr. It is no more
For trifling or dissembling. I have said,
His story’s true; and he too must be silenced

Sieg. How so?

Ulr. As Stralenheim is. Are you so da.
As never to have hit on this before?

Sieg. Discovery in the act could make me know
His death? Or had the prince’s household been
Then summon’d, would the cry for the police
Been left to such a stranger? Or should I
Have loiter’d on the way? Or could you, Werner,
The object of the baron’s hate and fears,
Have fled, unless by many an hour before
Suspicion woke? I sought and fathomed you,
Doubting if you were false or feeble: I
Perceived you were the latter; and yet so
Confiding have I found you. that I doubted
At times your weakness.

Sieg. Parricide! no less
Than common stabber! What deed of my life,
Or thought of mine, could make you deem me fit
For your accomplice?

Ulr. Father, do not raise
The devil you cannot lay between us. This Is time for union and for action, not
For family disputes. While you were tortured,
Could I be calm? Think you that I have heard
This fellow’s tale without some feeling?—you
Have taught me feeling for you and myself;
For whom or what else did you ever teach it?

Sieg. Oh! my dead father’s curse! tis working worse.
Ulric. Let it work on! the grave will keep it down!
Ashes are feeble foes: it is more easy
To baffle such, than countermine a mole,
Which winds its blind but living path beneath you.
Yet hear me still!—if you condemn me, yet
Remember who hath taught me once too often
To listen to him! Who proclaim’d to me
That there were crimes made venial by the occasion?
That passion was our nature? that the goods
Of Heaven waited on the goods of fortune?
Who show’d me his humanity secured
By his nerves only? Who deprived me of
All power to vindicate myself and race
In open day? By his disgrace which stamp’d
(it might be) hastily on me, and on Himself—a felon’s braud! The man who is
At once both warm and weak invites by deeds
He longs to do, but dare not. Is it strange
That I should act what you could think? We have done
With right and wrong; and now must only ponder
Upon effects, not causes. Stralenheim,
Whose life I saved from impulse, as, unknown,
I would have saved a peasant’s or a dog’s, I slew
Known as our foe—but not from vengeance. He Was a rock in our way which I cut through,
As doth the bolt, because it stood between us
And our true destination—but not idly.
As stranger I preserved him, and he owed me
His life: when due, I but resumed the debt.
He, you, and I stood o’er a gulf wherein
I have plunged our enemy. You, kindled first
The torch—you show’d the path; now trace me that
Of safety—or let me!
Siege. I have done with life!
Ulric. Let us have done with that which cankers life—
Familiar feuds and vain recriminations
Of things which cannot be undone. We have
No more to learn or hide: I know no fear,
And have within these walls men whom
(Although you know them not) dare venture all things.
You stand high with the state: what passes here
Will not excite her too great curiosity:
Keep your own secret, keep a steady eye,
Stir not, and speak not;—leave the rest to me:
We must have no third babblers thrust between us.
[Exit Ulric.]

Siege. (solus.) Am I awake? are these my father’s halls?
And you—my son? My son! mine! who have ever
Abhorr’d both mystery and blood, and yet
Am plunged into the deepest hell of both!
I must be speedy, or more will be shed—
The Hungarians!—Ulric—he hath partisans,
It seems! I might have guess’d as much. Oh fool!
Wolves prowl in company. He hath the key
(As I too of the opposite door which leads Into the turret. Now then! or once more
To be the father of fresh crimes, no less Than of the criminal! Ho! Gabor! Gabor!
[Exit into the turret, closing the door after him.]

SCENE II.

The Interior of the Turret.

Gab and Siegendorf.

Gab. Who calls?
Sieg. I—Siegendorf! Take these, and fly
Lose not a moment!
[ Tears off a diamond star and other jewels, and thrusts them into Gabi’s hand.]
Gab. What am I to do
With these?
Sieg. Whate’er you will: sell them, or hoard
And prosper; but delay not, or you are lost!
Gab. You pledged your honor for my safety?
Sieg. And
Must thus redeem it. Fly! I am not master,
It seems, of my own castle—of my own
Retainers—nay, even of these very walls,
Or I would bid them fall and crush me! Fly:
Or you will be slain by—
Gab. Is it even so?
Farewell, then! Recollect, however, count
You sought this fatal interview?
Sieg. I did:
Let it not be more fatal still!—Begone!
. Gab. By the same path I entered?
Sieg. But lie!—a safe sam
And loiter not in Prague,—you do not know
With whom you have to deal.
Gab. I know too well—
And knew it ere yourself, unhappy sire!
Farewell! [Exit Gabi]
Sieg. (solus and listening.) He hath clear’d the staircase. Ah! I hear
The door sound loud behind him! He is safe!
Safe!—Oh, my father’s spirit!—I am faint—
[He leans down upon a stone seat, near the wall of the tower, in a drooping posture.

Enter Ulric, with others armed, and with weapons drawn.

Ulric. Despatch!—he’s there!
Ludwig. The count, my lord!
Ulric. (recognising Siegendorf.) You here, sir?
Sieg. Yes: if you want another victim, strike!
Ulric. (seeing him stript of his jewels.) Where is the ruffian who hath plunder’d you?
Vassals, despatch in search of him! You see
’Twas as I said—the wretch hath stript my father
Of jewels which might form a prince’s heirem!
Away! I’ll follow you forthwith.
[Exeunt all but Siegendorf and Ulric.]
What’s this?

Where is the villain?
Sieg. There are two, sir: which
Are you in quest of?
Ulric. Let us hear no more
Of this: he must be found. You have not let him Escape?
Sieg. He’s gone.
Ulric. With your connivance?
Sieg. Fool! With
My fullest, freest aid.
Ulric. Then fare you well!
[ Ulric is going]
Sieg. Stop! I command—entreat—implore! Oh Ulric!
Will you then leave me?
What! remain to be denounced—drugg'd, it may be, in chains; and all by your inherent weakness, half-humanity, selfish remorse, and temporising pity, that sacrifices your whole race to save a wretch to profit by our ruin! No, count, henceforth you have no son! Sieg. I never had one; and would you ne'er had borne the useless name! Where will you go? I would not send you forth without protection.

Ulfr. Leave that unto me. I am not alone; nor merely the vain heir of your domains; a thousand, ay, ten thousand swords, hearts, and hands, are mine.

Sieg. The foresters! With whom the Hungarian found you first at Frankfort?

Ulfr. Yes—men—who are worthy of the name! Go tell your senators that they look well to Prague; their feast of peace was early for the times; there are more spirits abroad than have been lain with Wallenstein!

Enter Josephine and Ida.

Jos. What is't we hear? My Siegendorf!

Thank Heav'n, I see your safe!

Sieg. Safe!

Ida. Yes, dear father.

Sieg. No, no; I have no children: never more call me by that worst name of parent.

Jos. What means my good lord?

Sieg. That you have given birth to a demon!

Ida. (taking Ulric's hand.) Who shall dare say this of Ulrie?

Sieg. Ida, beware! there's blood upon that hand!

Ida. (stooping to kiss it,) I'd kiss it off, though it were mine!

Sieg. It is so!

Ulfr. Away! it is your father's! [Exit Ulric.

Ida. Oh, great God! And I have loved this man! [Ida falls senseless—Josephine stands speechless with horror.

Sieg. The wretch hath slain them both!—My Josephine! we are now alone! Would we had ever been so!—All is over for me!—Now open wide, my sire, thy grave; thy curse hath dug it deeper for thy son in mine!—The race of Siegendorf is past!

THE RIGHT HONORABLE FREDERICK, EARL OF CAR-LISLE, KNIGHT OF THE GARTER, ETC., ETC.

THE SECOND EDITION OF THESE POEMS IS INSCRIBED,
BY HIS OBLIGED WARD AND AFFECTIONATE KINSMAN,
THE AUTHOR.

Lord Byron first appeared as an author in November, 1806, when he printed a collection of poems for distribution among his friends. The first copy of this volume, which is a thin quarto, was presented to Mr. Beecher, who immediately perceived, on looking over its pages, that some of the contents were by no means of a description to reflect credit on their author; and at his friendly suggestion the whole impression, with the exception of two, or, at the most, three copies, was committed to the flames. After the destruction of this volume, Lord Byron directed the collection to be reprinted, with the omission of the objectionable poems. This edition, which was confined to a hundred copies, and, like its predecessor, designed for private circulation, was proceeded in so quickly, that at the end of about six weeks, January, 1807, it was ready for delivery. The volume was entitled "Poems on Various Occasions," and was printed at Newark by S. and J. Ridge; the author's name was not given. The dedication was, "To those friends at whose request they were printed, for whose amusement or approbation they were solely intended, these trifles are respectfully dedicated by the author." Immediately following the dedication was this notice:—

"The only apology necessary to be adduced in extenuation of any errors in the following collection is, that the author has not yet completed his nineteenth year. December 23, 1806. The approbation which this volume received from the friends to whom it was submitted induced Lord Byron, more immediately before the public; and in the latter end of May, 1807, this collection, with considerable alterations, the omission of some poems, and the addition of others, was reprinted and published under the title of "Hours of Idleness, a Second Poems, original and translated, by George Gordon, Lord Byron, a Minor." This volume was also printed at Newark. In the four editions of this work, which rapidly succeeded each other, many variations are found: several corrections were made; several pieces were silently withdrawn, and replaced by others; and after the first edition a dedication to Lord Carlisle was prefixed. In the present publication, all those Poems from the "Private Volume, and the early editions of "Hours of Idleness, which were suppressed by the author, are reprinted, and all the variations of the different impressions are noticed.

PREFACE.*

In submitting to the public eye the following collection, I have not only to combat the difficulties tense of verse generally encounter, but may charge of presumption for obtruding myself world, when, without doubt, I might be, at more usefully employed. These productions, the fruits of the lighter hours of a young poet, have lately completed his nineteenth year.

I have seen the internal evidence of a boyish mind, perhaps, unnecessary information. Some written during the disadvantages of illness, self, the voice of Praise, may at least arrest Censure. A considerable portion of these works have been privately printed, at the request of several of my friends. I am sensible of the drawbacks of the plan of a social circle is not the criterion by which my genius is to be estimated, yet, H to do
I must "care greatly," and I have haz-perated reputation and feelings in publishing this works. I "have passed the Rubicon," and must now submit without a murmur; for speak the truth, I have had little success in the last attempt. The shall submit without a murmur; for not without solicitude for the fate of these my expectations are by no means san-probable that I may have dared much care; for, in the words of Cowper, "it is write what may please our friends, who,
ay are such, are apt to be a little biased
" and another to write what may please because they who have no connection, nnowledge of the author, will be sure to they can." To the truth of this, how-not wholly subscribe: on the contrary, I ad that these trifles will not be treated however, is not my vocation; to divert the dull moments of the monotony of a vacant hour,
This sin": little can be expected from using a muse. My wreath, scanty as it all shall derive from these productions;
never attempt to replace its fading
pluck a single additional sprig from groves, at best, an intruder. Though accus-
my younger days, torove a careless Highlands of Scotland, I have not, of had the benefit of such pure air, or so elecid, as might enable me to enter the genuine bards, who have enjoyed both itages. But they derive considerable from their productions, shall expiate my rashness as an inter-without the latter, and in all probaary slight share of the former. I leave others: "Virum volitare per ora." I look to the few who will hear with patience "dulce est desipere in loco."—To the former worthies I resign, withou beping, the hope of immortality, and content my self with the not very magnificent prospect of rank among the nob of gentlemen who write;— my readers must determine whether I dare say "with ease," or the honor of a posthumous page in "The Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors," a work to which the peerage is under infinite obligations, in-such as many names of considerable length, short, and antiquity, are thereby rescued from the obscurity which unluckily overshadowed several voluminous productions of their illustrious bearers.

With slight hopes and some fears, I publish this first and last attempt. To the dictates of young ambition may be ascribed many actions more criminal and equally absurd. To a few of my own age the contents may afford amusement: I trust they will, at least, be found harmless. It is highly improbable, from my situation and pursuits hereafter, that I should ever obtrude myself a second time on the public; nor even in the very doubtful event of present indulgence, shall I be tempted to commit a future trespass of the same nature. The opinion of Dr. Johnson on the Poems of a noble relation of mine," "That when a man of rank appeared in the character of an author, his merit should be hand somely acknowledged," can have little weight with verbal, and still less with periodical censors; but were it otherwise, I should be loth to avail myself of the privilege, and would rather incur the bitterest censure of anonymous criticism than triumph in honors granted solely to a title.

Though a tear dim his eye at this sad separation,
'Tis nature, not fear, that excites his regret;
For distant he goes, with the same emulation,
The fame of his fathers he ne'er can forget.

That fame, and that memory, still will he cherish;
He vows that he ne'er will disgrace your renown;
Like you will he live, or like you will he perish;
When decay'd, may he mingle his dust with your own.

EPITAPH ON A FRIEND.*

A p r e, u n m e n x 1910, e n 1 910. 9 evo.

JH, Friend! for ever loved, for ever dear;†
What fruitless tears have bathed thy honor'd bier!
What sighs re-echo'd to thy parting breath,
Whilst thou wast struggling in the pangs of death!
Could tears retard the tyrant in his course;
Could sighs avert his dart's relentless force,
Could youth and virtue claim a short delay,
Or beauty charm the spectre from his prey;
Thou still hast lived to bless my aching sight,
Thy comrade's honor, and thy friend's delight.
† If yet thy gentle spirit hover nigh
The spot where now thy mouldering ashes lie
Here wilt thou read, recorded on my heart,
A grief too deep to trust the sculptor's art;
No marble marks thy couch of lowly sleep,
But living statues there are seen to weep;
Affliction's semblance bends not o'er thy tomb,
Affliction's self deplores thy youthful doom.
What though thy sire lament his falling line,
A father's sorrows cannot equal mine!
Though none like thee his dying hour will cheer,
Yet other offspring soothe his heartache here:
But who with me shall hold thy former place?
Thine image what new friendship can efface?
Ah none!—a father's tears will cease to flow,
Time will assuage an infant brother's woe;
To all, save one, is consolation known,
While solitary friendship sighs alone.

A FRAGMENT.

WHEN, to their airy hall, my fathers' voice
Shall call my spirit, joyful in their choice;
When, poised upon the gale, my form shall ride,
Or, dark in mist, descend the mountain's side:
Oh may my shade behold no sculptured urns
To mark the spot where earth to earth returns!
§ No lengthened scroll, no praise-encumber'd stone,
My epitaph shall be my name alone:
If that with honor fail to crown my clay,
Oh may no other fame my deeds repay!
That, only that, shall single out the spot;
§ By that remain: be'd, or with that forgot.

No tears did thy humble name adorn;
To me for sorrow was thy absence here."
Then all the joys wealth, force, and friends could prove.
For thee alone I lived, or wish'd to live;"—Reprint.

Oh God! if tramps, this man's word foreshire:
Heart-burnings now, I walk an equal doom,
Content to join thee in thy rapt vision tomb;
Where, this frail bough encompass'd to extend, "
I'll make my last cold pillow on thy breast;
That breast where oft in life I've laid my head,
Yet receive me unclouding with she dead;
This life reign'd without one parting sigh;
Together in one bed of earth we'll lie;"—Private volume.

TO EDDLESTON.*

Let Folly smile, to view the names
Of thee and me in friendship twined;
Yet Virtue will have greater claims
To love, than rank with vice combined.
And though unequal is thy fate,
Since title deck'd my higher birth,
Yet envy not this gaudy state;
Thine is the pride of modest worth.

Our souls at least congenial meet,
Nor can thy lot my rank disgrace;
Our intercourse is not less sweet,
Since worth of rank supplies the place.

REPLY TO SOME VERSES OF J. M. B.
PIGOE, ESQ., ON THE CRUELTY OF HIS MISTRESS.†

Why, Pigot, complain
Of this damsel's disdain,
Why thus in despair do you fret?
For months you may try,
Yet, believe me, a sigh
Will never obtain a coquette.

Would you teach her to love?
For a time seem to rove;
At first she may frown in a pet;
But leave her awhile,
She shortly will smile,
And then you may kiss your coquette.

For such are the airs
Of these fanciful fair's
They think all our homage a debt;
Yet a partial neglect
Soon takes an effect,
And humbles the proudest coquette.

Dissemble your pain,
And lengthen your chain,
And seem her hauteur to regret;
If again you shall sigh,
She no more will deny
That yours is the racy coquette.

If still, from false pride,
Your pangs she deride,
This whimsical virgin forget;
Some other admire,
Who will melt with your fire,
And laugh at the little coquette.

For me, I adore
Some twenty or more,
And love them most dearly; but yet,
Though my heart they enthrall,
I'd abandon them all,
Did they act like your blooming coquette.

No longer repine,
Adopt this design,
And break through her slight-woven net;
Away with despair,
No longer forbear
To fly from the captious coquette.

Then quit her, my friend!
Your bosom defend,
Ere quite with her snares you’re beast:
Lest your deep-wounded heart,
When incensed by the smart,
Should lead you to curse the coquette.

TO THE SIGHING STREPHON.*

YOUR pardon, my friend,
If my rhymes did offend,
Your pardon, a thousand times o’er;
From friendship I strove
Your pangs to remove,
But I swear I will do so no more.

Since your beautiful maid
Your flame has repaid,
No more I your folly regret;
She’s now most divine,
And I bow at the shrine
Of this quickly-reformed coquette.

Yet still, I must own,
I should never have known
From your verses, what else she deserved;
Your pain seem’d so great,
I pitted your fate,
As your fair was so devilish reserved.

Since the balm breathing kiss
Of this magical miss
Can such wonderful transports produce;
Since the “world you forget,
When your lips once have met,”
My counsel will get but abuse.

You say, when “I love,
I know nothing of love;”
’Tis true, I am given to range:
If I rightly remember,
I’ve loved a good number,
Yet there’s pleasure, at least, in a change.

I will not advance,
By the rules of romance,
To humor a whimsical fair;
Though a smile may delight,
Yet a frown won’t affright,
Or drive me to dreadful despair.

While my blood is thus warm
I ne’er shall reform,
To mix in the Platonists’ school;
Of this I am sure,
Was my passion so pure,
Thy mistress would think me a fool.

And if I should shun
Every woman for one,
Whose image must fill my whole breast
Whom I must prefer,
And sigh but for her—
What an insult ‘would be to the rest!

Now, Strephon, good-bye;
I cannot deny
Your passion appears most absurd;
Such love as you plead
Is pure love indeed,
For it only consists in the word

THE TEAR.

* O hestrymarnum fors, tevra sacros
  Dedicamus omnis ex animal quinere
  Pellic 1, le foco qui in aestatem
  Pecus te, pie Nymphas, aeneis.”—Gray.

WHEN Friendship or Love
  Our sympathies move,
  When truth in a glance should appear,
  The lips may beguile
  With a dimple or smile,
  But the test of affection’s a Tear.

  Too oft is a smile
  But the hypocrite’s wile,
  To mask detestation or fear;
  Give me the soft sigh,
  Whilst the soul-telling eye
  Is dimm’d for a time with a Tear.

  Mild Charity’s glow,
  To us mortals below,
  Shows the soul from barbarity clear,
  Compassion will melt,
  Where this virtue is felt,
  And its dew is diffused in a Tear.

  The man doom’d to sail
  With the blast of the gale,
  Through billows Atlantic to steer,
  As he bends o’er the wave
  Which may soon be his grave,
  The green sparkles bright with a Tear.

  The soldier brave’s death
  For a fanciful wreath,
  In Glory’s romantic career;
  But he raises the foe
  When in battle laid low,
  And bathes every wound with a Tear.

  If with a high-bounding pride
  He return to his bride,
  Renouncing the gore-crimson’d spear.
  All his toils are repud
  When, embracing the maid,
  From her eyelid he kisses the Tear.

  Sweet scene of my youth!
  Seat of Friendship and Truth,

* These stanzas were only printed in the private volume.
* This motto was inserted in the first edition of Hours of Idleness.
Where love chased each fast-fleeting year,
Loth to leave thee, I mourned,
For a last look I turn'd,
But thy spire was scarce seen through a Tear.

Though my vows I can pour
To my Mary no more,
My Mary to Love once so dear,
In the shade of her bower
I remember the hour
She rewarded those vows with a Tear.

By another possesor,
May she live ever blest!
Her name still my heart must revere:
With a sigh I resign
What I once thought was mine,
And forgive her deceit with a Tear.

Ye friends of my heart,
Ere from thee I depart,
This hope to my breast is most near:
If again we shall meet
In this rural retreat,
May we meet, as we part, with a Tear.

When my soul wings her flight
To the regions of night,
*And my corse shall recline on its bier,
As ye pass by the tomb
Where my ashes consume,
Oh! moisten their dust with a Tear.*

May no marble bestow
The splendor of wo
Which the children of vanity rear:
No fiction of fame
Shall blazon my name;
All I ask—all I wish—is a Tear.

TO MISS PIGOT.f

ELIZA, what fools are the Mussulman sect,
Who to women deny the soul's future existence,
Could they see thee, Eliza, they'd own their defect,
And this doctrine would meet with a general resistance.

Had their prophet possess'd half an atom of sense,
He ne'er would have women from paradise driven,
Instead of his hours, a flimsy pretence,
With women alone he had peopled his heaven.

Yet still to increase your calamities more,
Not content with depriving your bodies of spirit,
He allot's one poor husband to share amongst four,
With souls you'd dispense; but this last, who could bear it?

His religion to please neither party is made;
On husbands 'tis hard, to the wives most uncivil;
Still I can't contradict, what so of: has been said,
"Though women are angels, yet wedlock's the devil."

*AWAY, away, your flattering arts
May now betray some simpler hearts;
And you will smile at their believing,
And they shall weep at your deceiving."

ANSWER TO THE FOREGOING, ADDRESSED TO MISS ——.

DEAR simple girl, those flattering arts,
From which thou'lt guard frail female hearts
Exist but in imagination—
Mere phantoms of thine own creation;
For he who views that witching grace,
That perfect form, that lovely face,
With eyes admiring, oh! believe me,
He never wishes to deceive thee:
Once in thy polished mirror glance,
Thou'lt there descry that elegance
Which from our sex demands such praises,
But envy in the other raises:
Then he who tells thee of thy beauty,
Believe me, only does his duty:—
Ah! fly not from the candid youth;
It is not flattering,—tis truth.

THE CORNELIAN.†

No specious splendor of this stone
Endears it to my memory ever;
With lustre only once it shone,
And blushes modest as the giver.

Some, who can sneer at friendship's ties,
Have for my weakness oft reproved me;
Yet still the simple gift I prize,—
For I am sure the giver loved me.

He offer'd it with downcast look,
As fearful that I might refuse it;
I told him when the gift I took,
My only fear should be to lose it.

This pledge attentively I view'd,
And sparkling as I held it near,
Methought one drop the stone bedew'd,
And ever since I've loved a tear.

Still, to adorn his humble youth,
Nor wealth nor birth their treasures yield;
But he who seeks the flowers of truth,
Must quit the garden for the field.

'Tis not the plant uprear'd in clothe,
Which beauty shows and sheds perfume;
The flowers which yield the most of both
In Nature's wild luxuriance bloom.

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG LADY.*
Cousin to the Author, and Very Dear to Him.†

Hush'd are the winds, and still the evening gloom,
Not e'en a zephyr wanders through the grove,
Whilst I return to view my Margaret's tomb,
And scatter flowers on the dust I love.

Within this narrow cell reclines her clay,
That clay where once such animation beam'd;
The King of Terrors seized her as his prey,
Not worth, nor beauty, have her life redeem'd.

Oh! could I that King of Terrors pity feel,
Or Heaven reverse the dread decrees of fate!
Not here the mourner would his grief reveal,
Not here the muse her virtues would relate.

But wherefore weep? her matchless spirit soars
Beyond where splendid shines the orb of day;
And weeping angels lead her to those bowers
Where endless pleasures virtuous deeds repay.

And shall presumptuous mortals heaven arraign,
And, madly, godlike providence accuse?
Ah! no, far fly from me attempts so vain,
I'll ne'er submission to my God refuse.

Yet is remembrance of those virtues dear,
Yet fresh the memory of that beauteous face;
Still they call forth my warm affection's tear,
Still in my heart retain their wonted place.

\† To these stanzas, which are from the private volume, the following note was attached: "The author claims the indulgence of the reader more for this piece than, perhaps, any other in the collection; but as it was written at an earlier period than the rest (being composed at the age of fourteen,) and six lines away, he prefers submitting it to the indulgence of his friends in its present state, to making either additions or omissions."

\begin{quote}
Well: we have pass'd some happy hours,
And joy will mingle with our tears;
When thinking on these ancient towers,
The shelter of our infant years;

Where from the gothic casement's height,
We view'd the lake, the park, the dale,
And still, though tears obstruct our sight,
We lingering look a last farewell.

O'er fields through which we used to run,
And spend the hours in childish play;
O'er shades where when our race was done,
Reposing on my breast you lay;

Whilst I, admiring, too remiss,
Forgot to sear the hovering flies,
Yet envied every fly the kiss
It dared to give your slumbering eyes.

See still the little painted bark,
In which I row'd you o'er the lake;
See there, high waving o'er the park,
The elm I clamber'd for your sake.

These times are past—our joys are gone,
You leave me, leave this happy vale;
These scenes I must retrace alone;
Without thee what will they avail?

Who can conceive, who has not proved,
The anguish of a last embrace?
When, torn from all you fondly loved,
You bid a long adieu to peace.

This is the deepest of our woes,
For this these tears our cheeks bedew;
This is of love the final close,
Oh God, the fondest, last adieu!

Since taste has now expunged licentious wit,
Which stamp'd disgrace on all an author writ;
Since now to please with purer scenes we seek,
Nor dare to call the blush from Beauty's cheek;
Oh! let the modest Muse some pity claim,
And meet indulgence, though she find not fame.
Still, not for her alone we wish respect,
Others appear more conscious of defect:
To-night no veteran Rosciu you behold,
In all the arts of scenic action old;
No Cooke, no Kemble, can salute you here,
No Siddons draw the sympathetic tear;
To-night you throng to witness the debut
Of embryo actors, to the Drama new:
Here, then, our almost unfledged wings we try.
Clip not our pinions ere the birds can fly.
Falling in this our first attempt to soar,
Drooping, alas! we fall to rise no more.
HOURS OF IDleness.

Not one poor trembler only fear betrays,
Who hopes, yet almost dreads, to meet your praise;
But all our dramatic persons wait
In fond suspense this crisis of our* fate.
No venal views our progress can retard,
Your generous plaudits are our sole reward;
For these, each Hero all his power displays,
Each timid Heroine shrinks before your gaze.
Surely the last will some protection find;
None to the softer sex can prove unkind:
Th’ whilst Youth and Beauty form the female shield,
The sternest Censor to the fair must yield.
Yet, should our feeble efforts nought avail,
Should, after all, our best endeavors fail,
Still let some mercy in your bosoms live,
And, if you can’t applaud, at least forgive.

TO M. S. G.*

When’er I view those lips of thine
Their hue invites my fervent kiss;
Yet I forget that bliss divine
Alas! it were unhallowed bliss.

When’er I dream of that pure breast,
How could I dwell upon its snows?
Yet is the daring wish reprost,
For that,—would banish its repose.

A glance from thy soul-searching eye
Can raise with hope, depress with fear;
Yet I conceal my love, and why?
I would not force a painful tear.

I ne’er have told my love, yet thou
Hast seen my ardent flame too well;
And shall I plead my passion now,
To make thy bosom’s heaven a hell?

No! for thou never canst be mine,
United by the priest’s decree;
By any ties but those divine,
Mine, my beloved, thou ne’er shalt be.

Then let the secret fire consume,
Let it consume, thou shalt not know;
With joy I court a certain doom,
Rather than spread its guilty glow.

I will not ease my tortured heart,
By driving dove-eyed peace from thine
Rather than such a sting impart,
Each thought presumptuous I resign.

Yes! yield those lips, for which I’d brave
More than I here shall dare to tell
Thy innocence and mine to save.
I bid thee now a last farewell.

Yes, yield that breast to seek despair,
And hope no more thy soft embrace,
Which to obtain my soul would dare,
All, all reproach, but thy disgrace.

At least from guilt shalt thou be free,
No matron shall thy shame reprove,
Though curseless pangs may prey or me,
No martyr shalt thou be to love.

TO CAROLINE.†

Think, when I saw thy beauteous eyes,
Suffused in tears implore to stay;
And heard unmoved thy plenteous sighs,
Which said far more than words can say.

Though keen the grief thy tears express,
When love and hope lay both o’erthrown.
Yet still, my girl, this bleeding breast
Throb’d with deep sorrow as thine own.

BYRON'S WORKS

But when our cheeks with anguish glow'd,
When thy sweet lips were join'd to mine,
The tears that from my eyelids flow'd
Were lost in those which fell from thine.

Thou could'st not feel my burning cheek,
Thy gushing tears had quench'd its flame,
And as thy tongue essay'd to speak,
In sighs alone it breathed my name.

And yet, my girl, we weep in vain,
In vain our fate in sighs deplore;
Remembrance only can remain,—
But that will make us weep the more.

Again, thou best beloved, adieu!
Ah! if thou canst o'ercome regret,
Nor let thy mind past joys review,—
Our only hope is to forget!

TO CAROLINE.∗

WHEN I hear you express an affection so warm,
Ne'er think, my beloved, that I do not believe;
For your lip would the soul of suspicion disarm,
And your eye beams a ray which can never deceive.

Yet still, this fond bosom regrets while adoring,
That love, like the leaf, must fall into the sea,
That age will come on, when remembrance, deploiring,
Contemplates the scenes of her youth with a tear;
That the time must arrive, when no longer retaining
Their emblem, those locks must wave thin to the breeze,
When a few silver hairs of those tresses remaining,
Prove nature a prey to decay and disease.

Tis this, my beloved, which spreads gloom o'er my features,
Though I ne'er shall presume to arraign the decree
Which God has proclaimed, as the fate of his creatures,
In the death which one day will deprive you of me.

Mistake not, sweet skeptic, the cause of emotion,
No doubt can the mind of your lover invade;
He worships each look with such faithful devotion,
A smile can enchant, or a tear can dissuade.

But as death, my beloved, soon or late shall o'er take us,
And our breasts which alive with such sympathy glow,
Will sleep in the grave till the blast shall awake us,
When calling the dead, in earth's bosom laid low:
Oh! then let us drain, while we may, draughts of pleasure,
Which from passion like ours may unceasingly flow;

Let us pass round the cup of love's bliss in due measure,
And quaff the contents as civil nectar below.

1806

TO CAROLINE.∗

Out! when shall the grave hide for ever my sorrow?
Oh! when shall my soul wing her flight from this clay?
The present is hell, and the coming to-morrow
But brings, with new torture, the curse of to-day.

From my eye flows no tear, from my lips fall no curses,
I blast not the fiends who have hurled me from bliss;
For poor is the soul which bewailing rehearses
Its querulous grief, when in anguish like this.

Was my eye 'stead of tears, with red fury flares bright'ning,
Would my lips breathe a flame which no stream could assuage,
On our foes should my glance launch in vengeance its lightning,
With transport my tongue give a loose to its rage.

But now tears and curses, alike unavailing,
Would add to the souls of our tyrants delight,
Could they view us our sad separation bewailing,
Their merciless hearts would rejoice at the sight
Yet still, though we bend with a feign'd resignation,
Life beams not for us with one ray that can cheer;
Love and hope upon earth bring no more consolation,
In the grave is our hope, for in life is our fear.

Oh! when, my adored, in the tomb will they place me,
Since in life, love and friendship for ever are seal'd!
If again in the mansion of death I embrace thee,
Perhaps they will leave unmolested the dead.

STANZAS TO A LADY

WITH THE POEMS OF CAMOENS.

This votive pledge of fond esteem,
Perhaps, dear girl! for me thou'lt prize;
It sings of Love's enchanting dream,
A theme we never can despise.

Who blames it but the envious fool,
The old and disappointed maid?
Or pupil of the prudish school,
In single sorrow doom'd to fade?

THE FIRST KISS OF LOVE.*

"A Varhitoz de xerdaiz
'Epwta mou ev xekl."/

Away with your fictions of flimsy romance
† Those tissues of falsehood which folly has wove;
Give me the mild beam of the soul-breathing glance,
Or the rapture which dwells on the first kiss of love.

Ye rhymer's, whose bosoms with phantasy glow
Whose pastoral passions are made for the grove,
From what blest inspirations your sonnets would flow,
Could you ever have tasted the first kiss of love!

If Apollo should e'er his assistance refuse,
Or the Nine be disposed from your service to rove,
Invoke them no more, bid adieu to the muse,
And try the effect of the first kiss of love.

I hate you, ye cold compositions of art,
Though prudes may condemn me, and bigots reprove,
I court the effusions that spring from the heart
Which throbs with delight to the first kiss of love.

Your shepherds, your flocks; those fantastical themes,
Perhaps may amuse, yet they never can move;
Arcadia displays but a region of dreams;
What are visions like these to the first kiss of love?

Oh! cease to affirm that man since his birth,
§ From Adam till now, has with wretchedness strove;
Some portion of paradise still is on earth,
And Eden revives in the first kiss of love.

When age chills the blood, when our pleasures are past—
For years fleet away with the wings of the dove—
The dearest remembrance will still be the last,
Our sweetest memorial the first kiss of love.

* These stanzas were prefixed to the private volume, and in the first edition of Hours of Idleness, but omitted in the second.

TO MARY.

Oh! did those eyes, instead of fire,
With bright but mild affection shine,
Though they might kindle less desire,
Love, more than mortal, would be thine.

For thou art form'd so heavenly fair,
Howe'er those orbs may wildly beam,
We must admire, but still despair—
That fatal glance forbids esteem.

When nature stamped thy beauteous birth,
So much perfection in thee shone,
She fear'd that too divine for earth,
The skies might claim thee for their own

Therefore, to guard her dearest work,
Lest angels might dispute the prize
She bade a secret lightning lurk
Within those once celestial eyes.

These might the boldest sylph appall,
When gleaming with meridian blaze,
Thy beauty must enrapture all,
But who can dare thine ardent gaze?

'Tis said that Berenice's hair
In stars adorns the vault of heaven:
But they would ne'er permit thee there,
Thou wouldest so far outshine the seven.

For did those eyes as planets roll,
Thy sister-lights would scarce appear:
E'en suns, which systems now control,
Would twinkle dimly through their sphere

TO WOMAN.

WOMAN! experience might have told me
That all must love thee who behold thee;
Surely experience might have taught
Thy finest promises are bought;
But placed in all thy charms before me,
All I forget but to adore thee.
Oh, Memory thou choosest blessing
When join'd with hope, when still possessing
But how much cursed by every lover
When hope is fled and passion's over.
Woman, that fair and fond deceiver,
How prompt are striplings to believe her
How throbs the pulse when first we view
The eye that rolls in glossy blue,
Or sparkles black, or mildly throws
A beam from under hazel brows!
How quick we eruct every oath,
And hear her plight the willing troth
Fondly we hope 'twill last for aye
When, lo! she changes in a day;
This record will for ever stand,
"Woman, thy vows are traced in sand."*
AWAKE, with it my fancy teems;
In sleep, it smiles in fleeting dreams
The vision charms the hours away,
And bids me curse Aurora's ray
For breaking slumbers of delight
Which make me wish for endless night.
Since, oh! what'er my future fate,
Shall joy or woe my steps await,
Tempted by love, by storms bested,
Thine image I can ne'er forget.

Alas! again no more we meet,
No more our former looks repeat;
Then let me breathe this parting prayer
The dictate of my bosom's care:
"May heaven so guard my lovely Quaker
That anguish never can o'ertake her;
That peace and virtue ne'er forsake her,
But bliss be aye her heart's partaker;
Oh! may the happy mortal, fate
To be my dearest ties, related,
For her each hour new joys discover,
And lose the husband in the lover!
May that fair bosom never know
What 'tis to feel the restless wo
Which stings the soul with vain regret,
Of him who never can forget!"

TO A BEAUTIFUL QUAKER.*

Sweet girl! though only once we met,
That meeting I shall ne'er forget;
And though we ne'er may meet again,
Remembrance will thy form retain.
I would not say, "I love," but still
My senses struggle with my will:
In vain to drive thee from my breast,
My thoughts are more and more represt;
In vain I check the rising sighs,
Another to the last replies;
Perhaps this is not love, but yet
Our meeting I can ne'er forget.

What though we never silence broke,
Our eyes a sweeter language spoke;
The tongue in flattering falsehood deals,
And tells a tale it never feels:
Deceit the guilty lips impart,
And hush the mandates of the heart;
But soul's interpreter, the eyes,
Spurn such restraint, and scorn disguise.
As thus our glances oft conversed,
And all our bosoms felt rehearsed,
No spirit, from within reproved us,
Say rather, "Twas the spirit moved us."
Though what they uttered I repress,
Yet I conceive thou'll partly guess;
For as on thee my memory ponders,
Perchance to me thine also wanders.
This for myself, at least, I'll say,
Thy form appears through night, through day:

SONG.*

When I roved a young Highlander o'er the dark heath,
And climb'd thy steep summit, oh Morven, of snow! †
To gaze on the torrent that thunder'd beneath,
Or the mist of the tempest that gathered below; ‡
Untutor'd by science, a stranger to fear,
And rude as the rocks where my infancy grew,
No feeling, save one, to my bosom was dear;
Need I say, my sweet Mary, 'twas centred in you?

Yet it could not be love, for I knewnot the name,—
What passion can dwell in the heart of a child?
But still I perceive an emotion the same
As I felt, when a boy, on the crag-cover'd wild.
One image alone on my bosom impress'd,
I loved my bleak regions, nor panted for new;
And few were my wants, for my wishes were bless'd;
And pure were my thoughts, for my soul was with you.

I arose with the dawn; with my dog as my guide,
From mountain to mountain I bounded along;
I breasted ‡ the billow of Dee's raging tide,
And heard at a distance the Highlander's song:

* To Mary Duff. First published in the second edition of Hours of Illusion.
† Morven, a lofty mountain in Aberdeenshire: "Gormal of snow," is an expression frequently to be found in Caithness.
‡ This will not appear extraordinary to those who have been accustomed to the mountains; it is by no means uncommon to attain the top of Ben- nie Ben-y-bourd, &c., to perceive between the summit and the valley, clouds pouring down rain, and occasionally accompanied by lightning, while the spectator literally looks down upon the storm, perfectly secure from its effects.
§ Reviving the lofty surge.—Shakespeare.
† The Dee is a beautiful river, which rises near Max Lodge, and falls into the sea at New Aberdeen.

This lines were published in the private volume, and the first edition of poem of illness, but subsequently omitted by the author.
HOURS OF IDleness

At eve, on my hearth-cover'd couch of repose,
No dream save of Mary were spread to my view;
And warm to the skies my devotions arose,
For the first of my prayers was a blessing on you.

I left my bleak home, and my visions are gone;
The mountains are vanish'd, my youth is no more:
As the last of my race, I must wither alone,
And delight but in days I have witness'd before:
Ah! splendor has raised, but embitter'd, my lot:
More dear were the scenes which my infancy knew:
Though my hopes may have fail'd, yet they are not forgot;
Though cold is my heart, still it longs with you.

When I see some dark hill point its crest to the sky,
I think of the rocks that o'ershadow Colbleen;
When I see the soft blue of a love-speaking eye,
I think on those eyes that endear'd the rude scene:
When, haply, some light-waving locks I behold,
That faintly resemble my Mary's in hue,
I think of the long-flowing ringlets of gold,
The locks that were sacred to beauty and you.

Yet the day may arrive when the mountains once more
Shall rise to my sight in their mantles of snow:
But while these soar above me unchanged as before,
Will Mary be there to receive me? ah, no!
Adieu, then, ye hills, where my childhood was bred!
Thou sweet flowing Dee, to thy waters adieu!
No home in the forest shall shelter my head,
Ah! Mary, what home could be mine but with you?

TO ——

Oh! yes, I will own we were dear to each other;
The friendships of childhood, though fleeting, are true;
The love which you felt was the love of a brother,
Nor less the affection I cherish'd for you.

But friendship can vary her gentle dominion,
The attachment of years in a moment expires;
Like love, too, she moves on a swift-waving pinion,
But glows not, like love, with unquenchable fires.

Fall oft have we wander'd through Ida together,
And blest were the scenes of our youth, I allow;
In the spring of our life, how serene is the weather,
As winter's rude tempests are gathering now.

In no more with affection shall memory blending
The wonted delights of our childhood retrace;
When pride steals the bosom, the heart is unbending,
And what would be justice appears a disgrace.

However, dear S——, for I still must esteem you—
The few whom I love I can never upbraid—
The chance which has lost may in future redeem you,
Repentance will cancel the vow you have made.

I will not complain, and though chill'd is affection,
With me no corroding resentment shall live:
My bosom is calm'd by the simple reflection,
That both may be wrong, and that both should forgive.

You knew that my soul, that my heart, my existence
If danger demanded, where wholly your own;
You knew me unstable by years or by distance,
I devoted to love and to friendship alone.

You knew— but away with the vain retrospection
The bond of affection no longer endures:
Too late you may droop o'er the fond recollection
And sigh for the friend who was formerly yours.

For the present, we part—I will hope not for ever,
For time and regret will restore you at last;
To forget our dissertation we both should endeavor,
I ask no atonement but days like the past.

'TO MARY,

ON RECEIVING HER PICTURE

This faint resemblance of thy charms,
Though strong as mortal art could give.
My constant heart of fear disarms,
Revives my hopes, and bids me live.

Here I can trace the looks of gold
Which round thy snowy forehead wave,
The cheeks which sprang from Beauty's mould
The lips which made me Beauty's slave.

Here I can trace—ah! no! that eye
Whose azure floats in liquid fire,
Must all the painter's art defy,
And bid him from the task retire.

Here I behold its beauteous hue,
But where's the beam so sweetly straying
Which gave a lustre to its blue,
Like Luna o'er the ocean playing?

Sweet copy! far more dear to me,
Lifeless, unfeeling as thou art,
Than all the living forms could be,
Save her who placed thee next my heart.

She placed it, sad, with needless fear,
'Lest time might shake my wavering soul,
Unconscious that her image there
Held every sense in fast control.

Through hours, through years, through time
twill cheer;
My hope, in gloomy moments, raise; in life's last conflict 'twill appear,
And meet my fond expiring gaze.

* But where's the beam of soft desire
Which gave a lustre to its blue,
Lows, only love could o'er inspire.

* Children is a mountain near the verge of the Highlands, not far from the ruins of Jen Castle.
* This poem was first published in the Hours of Idleness.

TO LESBIA.*

LESBIA since far from you I've ranged,
Our souls with fond affection glow not;
You say 'tis I, not you, have changed,
I'd tell why,—but yet I know not.

Your polish'd brow no cares have crest?
And, Lesbia! we are not much older,
Since trembling first my heart I lost,
Cz told my love with hope grown bolder.

Sixteen was then our utmost age,
Two years have lingering past away, love!
And now new thoughts our minds engage
At least I feel disposed to stray, love!

'Tis I that am alone to blame,
I, that am guilty of love's treason;
Since your sweet breast is still the same,
Caprice must be my only reason.

I do not, love! suspect your truth,
With jealous doubt my bosom heaves not;
Warm was the passion of my youth,
One trace of dark deceit it leaves not.

No, no, my flame was not pretended,
For, oh! I loved you most sincerely;
And though our dream at last has ended—
My bosom still esteems you dearly.

No more we meet in ronder bowers;
Absence has made me prone to roving;
But older, firmer hearts than ours
Have found monody in loving.

Your cheek's soft bloom is unimpair'd,
New beauties still are daily bright'ning,
Your eye for conquest beams prepared,
The forge of love's resistless lightning.

Arm'd thus, to make their bosoms bleed,
Many will strong to sigh like me, love!
More constant they may prove indeed;
Fonder, alas! they never can be, love!

* Only printed in the private volume.

LESBIA addressed to a Young Lady.†

In the author was discharging his pistols in a garden, two ladies passing near the spot were alarmed by the sound of a bullet hissing near them, to one of whom the following stanzas were addressed the next morning.

Doubtless, sweet girl, the hissing lead,
Wafting destruction o'er thy charms,
And hurling o'er thy lovely head,
Has filled that breast with fond alarms.

Surely some envious demon's force,
Vex'd to behold such beauty here,
Impell'd the bullets' viewless course,
Diverted from its first career.

† These stanzas are only found in the private volume.

This word is used by Grey, in his poem of the First Sisters:—

"Iron steet of arrowy shower
Hurtles through the darkest air."

Yes, in that nearly fatal hour
The ball obey'd some hell-born guides,
But Heaven, with interposing power,
In pity turned the death aside.

Yet, as perchance one trembling tear
Upon that thrilling bosom fell;
Which I, th' unconscious cause of fear
Extracted from its glistening cell.

Say, what penance can atone
For such an outrage done to thee?
Arraign'd before thy beauty's throne,
What punishment wilt thou decree?

Might I perform the judge's part,
The sentence I should scarce deplore,
It only would restore a heart
Which but belonged to thee before.

The least atonement I can make
Is to become no longer free;
Henceforth I breathe but for thy sake,
Thou shalt be all in all to me.

But thou, perhaps, may'st now reject
Such expiation of my guilt:
Come then, some other mode elect;
Let it be death, or what thou wilt:

Choose, then, relentless! and I swear
Nought shall thy dread decree prevent
Yet hold—one little word forbear!
Let it be aught but banishment!

LOVE'S LAST ADIEU.∗

"Asi φυτεύσει."—Anacreon.

The roses of love glad the garden of life,
Though nurtured 'mid weeds dropping pestilent dew,
Till Time crops the leaves with unmerciful knife,
Or prunes them for ever in love's last adieu!

In vain with endearments we soothe the sad heart.
In vain do we vow for an age to be true;
The chance of an hour may command us to part.
Or death disunite us in love's last adieu!

Still Hope, breathing peace through the grief-swolles breast,
Will whisper, "Our meeting we yet may renew;"
With this dream of deceit half our sorrow's repast,
Nor taste we the poison of love's last adieu!

Oh! mark you yon pair: in the sunshine of youth,
Love twined round their childhood his flowers as they grew;
They flourish awhile in the season of truth,
Till chill'd by the winter of love's last adieu:

∗ This poem was omitted in the second edition of 'Hours of Idleness.'
Sweet lady! why thus doth a tear steel its way
Down a cheek which outrivals thy bosom in hue?
Yet why do I ask—to distraction prey,
Thy reason has perish'd with love's last adieu!

Oh! who is yeon misanthrope, shunning mankind?
From cities to caves of the forest he flew:
There, raving, he howls his complaint to the wind;
The mountains reverberate love's last adieu!

Now hate rules a heart which in love's easy chains
Once passion's tumultuous blinding flashes knew;
Despair now infames the dark side of his veins;
He ponders in frenzy on love's last adieu!

How he envies the wretch with a soul wrapt in steel!
His pleasures are scarce, yet his troubles are few,
Who laughs at the pang that he never can feel,
And dreads not the anguish of love's last adieu!

Youth flies, life decays, even hope is o'ercast;
No more with love's former devotion we sue:
He spreads his young wing, he retires with the blast!
The shroud of affection is love's last adieu!

In this life of probation for rapture divine,
Astrea* declares that some penance is due;
From him who has worshipp'd at love's gentle shrine
The atonement is ample in love's last adieu!

Who kneels to the god on his altar of light,
Must myrtle and cypress alternately strew:
His myrtle, an emblem of purest delight;
His cypress, the Garland of love's last adieu!

DAMETAS.

In law an infant,† and in years a boy,
In mind a slave to every vicious joy;
From every sense of shame and virtue wean'd;
In lies an adept, in deceit a fiend;
Versed in hypocrisy while yet a child;
Fickle as wind, of inclinations wild;
Woman his dupe, his heedless friend a tool;
Old in the world, though scarcely broke from school;
Dametar ran through all the maze of sin,
And found the goal when others just begin:
Even still conflicting passions shake his soul,
And bid him drain the drops of pleasure's bowl;
But, palled with vice, he breaks his former chain,
And what was once his bliss appears his bane.

TO MARION.

MARION! why that pensive brow?
What disgust to life hast thou?
Change that discontented air;
Frowns become not one so fair.

' tis not love disturbs thy rest,
Love's a stranger to thy breast;
He in dimpling smiles appears,
Or mourns in sweetly timid tears,
Or bends the languid eyelid down,
But shuns the cold forbidding frown.
Then resume thy former fire,
Some will love, and all admire;
While that eye aspect chills us,
Nought but cool indifference thrills us.
Wouldst thou wandering hearts beguile,
Smile at least, or seem to smile.
Eyes like thine were never meant
To hide their orbs in dark restraint;
Spite of all thou fain wouldst say,
Still in truant beams they play.
Thy lips—but here my modest Muse
Her impulse chaste must needs refuse:
She blushes, curt'sies, frowns,—in short, she Dreads lest the subject should transport me;
And flying off in search of reason,
Brings prudence back in proper season.
All I shall therefore say (whate'er
I think, is neither here, nor there)
Is, that such lips, of locks endearing,
Were form'd for better things than scening:
Of soothing compliments divested.
Advice at least's disinterested;
Such is my artless song to thee,
From all the flow of flattery free;
Counsel like mine is as a brother's,
My heart is given to some others;
That is to say, unskill'd to azen.
It shares itself among a dozen.
Marion, adieu! oh! pr'ythee slight not
This warning, though it may delight not;
And, lest my precepts be displeasing
To those who think remonstrance teasing.
At once I'll tell thee our opinion
Concerning woman's soft dominion
How'er we gaze with admiration
On eyes of blue or lips carnation,
How'er the flowing locks attract us,
How'er those beauties may distract us,
Still fickle, we are prone to rove,
These cannot fix our souls to love,
It is not too severe a stricture
To say they form a pretty picture:
But wouldst thou see the secret chain,
Which binds us to your humble train,
To hail you queens of all creation,
Know, in a word, 'tis animation.

OSCAR OF ALVA.*

A TALE.†

How sweetly shines, through azure skies,
The lamp of heaven on Lora's shore;
Where Alva's hoary turrets rise,
And hear the din of arms no more.

* This poem was published for the first time in Hours of Idleness.
† The catastrophe of this tale was suggested by the story of "Jerome's and Learner," in the first volume of the "Armenian, or ethnic-banck;" it also bears some resemblance to a scene in the third act of "Moorish."
BYRON'S WORKS.

But often has yon rolling moon
On Alva's casques of silver play'd;
And view'd at midnight's silent noon,
Her chiefs in gleaming mail array'd:

And on the crimson rocks beneath,
Which scroll o'er ocean's sullen flow,
Pale in the scatter'd ranks of death,
She saw the gasping warrior low;

While many an eye which ne'er again
Could mark the rising orb of day,
Turn'd feebly from the gory plain,
Beheld in death her fading ray.

Once, to those eyes the lamp of Love,
They blest her dear propitious light;
But now she glimmer'd from above,
A sad, funereal torch of night.

Faded is Alva's noble race,
And gray her towers are seen afar;
No more her heroes urge the chase,
Or roll the crimson tide of war.

But who was last of Alva's clan?
Why grows the moss on Alva's stone?
Her towers resound no steps of man,
They echo to the gale alone.

And when that gale is fierce and high,
A sound is heard in yonder hall;
It rises hoarsely through the sky,
And vibrates o'er the mouldering wall.

Yes, when the eddying tempest sighs,
It shakes the shield of Oscar brave;
But there no more his banners rise,
No more his plumes of sable wave.

Fair shone the sun on Oscar's birth,
When Angus hail'd his eldest born;
The vassals round their chieftain's hearth
Crowd to applaud the happy morn.

They feast upon the mountain deer,
The pibroch raised its piercing note,
To gladden more their Highland cheer,
The strains in martial numbers float:

And they who heard the war-notes wild,
Hoped that one day the pibroch's strain
Should play before the hero's child,
While he should lead the tartan train.

Another year is quickly past,
And Angus hail's another son;
His natal day is like the last,
Nor soon the jocund feast was done.

Taught by their sire to bend the bow,
On Alva's dusky hills of wind,
The boys in childhood chased the roe,
And left their hounds in speed behind.

But ere their years of youth are o'er,
They mingle in the ranks of war;
They lightly wheel the bright claymore,
And send the whistling arrow far.

Dark was the flow of Oscar's hair,
Wildly it stream'd along the gale;
But Allan's locks were bright and fair,
And pensive seem'd his cheek, and pale.

But Oscar own'd a hero's soul
His dark eye shone through osams of truth
Allan had early learn'd control,
And smooth his words had been from youth.

Both, both were brave; the Saxon spear
Was shiver'd oft beneath their steel;
And Oscar's bosom scorn'd to fear,
But Oscar's bosom knew to feel;

While Allan's soul belis'd his form,
Unworthy with such charms to dwell:
Keen as the lightning of the storm,
On foes his deadly vengeance fell.

From high Southannon's distant tower
Arrived a young and noble dame;
With Kenneth's lands to form her dower,
Glenalvon's blue-eyed daughter came;

And Oscar claim'd the beauteous bride,
And Angus on his Oscar smiled:
It soothe'd the father's feudal pride
Thus to obtain Glenalvon's child.

Hark to the pibroch's pleasing note!
Hark to the swelling nuptial song!
In joyous strains the voices float,
And still the choral peal prolong.

See how the heroes' blood-red plumes
Assembled wave in Alva's hall,
Each youth his varied plaid assumes,
Attending on their chieftain's call.

It is not war their aid demands,
The pibroch. plays the song of peace;
To Oscar's nuptials throng the bands,
Nor yet the sounds of pleasure cease.

But where is Oscar? sure 'tis late:
Is this a bridegroom's ardent flame?
While thronging guests and ladies wait,
Nor Oscar nor his brother came.

At length young Allan join'd the bride:
"Why comes not Oscar?" Angus said;
"Is not he here?" the youth replied;
"With me he roved not o'er the glade.

"Perchance, forgetful of the day,
'Tis his to chase the bounding roe;
Or ocean's waves prolong his stay;
Yet Oscar's bark is seldom slow."

"Oh, no!" the anguish'd sire rejoind,'"Nor chase, nor wave, my boy delay
Would he to Mora seem unkind?
Would sught to her impede his way?"
- Oh! search, ye chiefs! on! search around:
  Allan, with these through Alva fly;
  Till Oscar, till my son is found,
  Haste, haste, nor dare attempt reply."

All is confusion—through the vale
The name of Oscar hoarsely rings,
It rises on the murm'ring gale,
Till night expands her dusky wings;

It breaks the stillness of the night,
But echoes through her shades in vain:
It sounds through morning's misty light,
But Oscar comes not o'er the plain.

Three days, three sleepless nights, the Chief
For Oscar search'd each mountain cave:
Then hope is lost; in boundless grief
His locks in gray-torn ringlets wave.

"Oscar! my son!—thou God of Hear'n
Restore the prop of sinking age!
Or if that hope no more is given,
Yield his assassin to my rage.

"Yes, on some desert rocky shore
My Oscar's whiten'd bones must lie;
Then grant, thou God! I ask no more,
With him his frantic sire may die!

"Yet he may live,—away, despair!
Be calm, my soul! he yet may live;
T'araign my fate, my voice forbear!
O God! my impious prayer forgive!

'What, if he live for me no more,
I sink forgotten in the dust,
The hope of Alva's age is o'er:
Alas! can pangs like these be just?"

Thus did the hapless parent mourn,
Till Time, who soothes severest woe
Had bade serenity return,
And made the tear-drop cease to flow.

For still some latent hope survived,
That Oscar might once more appear;
His hope now droop'd and now revived,
Till Time had told a tedious year.

Days roll'd along, the orb of light
Again had run his destined race;
No Oscar bless'd his father's sight,
And sorrow left a fainter trace.

For youthful Allan still remain'd,
And now his father's only joy:
And Mora's heart was quickly gain'd,
For beauty crown'd the fair-hair'd boy.

She thought that Oscar low was laid,
And Allan's face was wondrous fair;
If Oscar lived, some other maid
Had claim'd his faithless bosom's care.

And Angus said, if one year more
In fruitless hope was pass'd away,
His fondest scruples should be o'er,
And he would name their nuptial day.

Slow roll'd the moons, but bless at last,
Arrived the dearly destined morn;
The year of anxious trembling past,
What similes the lover's cheeks adorn?

Hark to the piproch's pleasing note!
Hark to the swelling nuptial song!
In joyous strains the voices float,
And still the choral peal prolong.

Again the clan, in festive crowd,
Thro' the gate of Alva's he
The songs of mirth reecho loud,
And all their former joy recall.

But who is he, whose darken'd brow
Glooms in the midst of general mirth?
Before his eye's far fiercer glow
The blue flames curl'd o'er the hearth.

Dark is the robe which wraps his form,
And tali his plume of gory red;
His voice is like the rising storm,
But light and trackless is his tread.

'Tis noon of night, the pledge goes round,
The bridegroom's health is deeply quaff'd;
With shouts the vaulted roofs resound,
And all combine to hail the draught.

Sudden the stranger-chief arose,
And all the clamorous crowd are hush'd
And Angus' cheek with wonder glows,
And Mora's tender bosom blush'd.

"Old man!" he cried, "this pledge is done
Thou saw'st twas duly drank by me;
It hail'd the nuptials of thy son:
Now will I claim a pledge from thee.

"While all around is mirth and joy,
To bless thy Allan's happy lot,
Say, had'st thou ne'er another boy?
Say, why should Oscar be forgot?"

"Alas!" the hapless sire replied,
The big tear starting as he spoke,
"When Oscar left my hall, or died,
This aged heart was almost broke.

"Thrice has the earth revolved her course
Since Oscar's form has bless'd my sight;
And Allan is my last resource,
Since martial Oscar's death or flight."

"Tis well," replied the stranger stern,
And fiercely flash'd his rolling eye;
"Thy Oscar's fate I fain would learn;
Perhaps the hero did not die.

"Percance, if those whom he most loved,
Would call, thy Oscar might return;
Percance the chief has only roved;
For him thy Beltane * yet may burn.

"Fill high the bowl the table round,
We will not claim the pledge by stealth;

* Beltane 'Tree, a highland festival on the first of May, held some feats behind for the occasion.
With wine let every cup be crown'd;
Pledge me departed Oscar's health."

"With all my soul," old Angus said,
And fill'd his goblet to the brim;
"Here's to my boy! alive or dead,
I ne'er shall find a son like him."

"Bravely, old man, this health has sped
But why does Allan trembling stand?
Come, drink remembrance of the dead,
And raise thy cup with firmer hand."

The crimson glow of Allan's face
Was turn'd at once to ghastly hue;
The drops of death each other chase
Adown in agonizing dew.

Thrice did he raise the goblet high,
And thrice his lips refused to taste;
For thrice he caught the stranger's eye
On his with deadly fury placed.

"And is it thus a brother hails
A brother's fond remembrance here?
If thus affection's strength prevails,
What might we not expect from fear?"

Roused by the sneer, he raised the bowl,
"Would Oscar now could share our mirth"
Internal fear appall'd his soul;
He said, and dash'd the cup to earth.

"That! the! I hear my murderer's voice!"
Loud shrieks a darkly gleaming form;
"A murderer's voice!" the roof replies,
And deeply swells the bursting storm.

The tapers wink, the chieftains shrink,
The stranger's gone,—amidst the crew
A form was seen in tartan green,
And tall the shade terrific grew.

His waist was bound with a broad belt round,
His plume of sable stream'd on high;
But his breast was bare, with the red wounds there,
And fix'd was the glare of his glassy eye.

And thrice he smiled, with his eye so wild,
On Angus' rending low the knee;
And thrice he frown'd on a chief on the ground,
Whom shivering crowds with horror see.

The bolts loud roll, from pole to pole,
The thunders through the welkin ring,
And th'o' gleaming form, through the mist of the storm
Was borne on high by the whirlwind's wing.

Cold was the feast, the revel ceased:
Who lies upon the stony floor?
Oblivion press'd old Angus' breast,*
At length his life-pulse throbs once more

"Away, away! let the leech essay
To pour the light on Allan's eyes;"
His sand is done,—his race is run;
Oh! never more shall Allan rise!

* Old Angus press'd the earth with his breast. First Edition.

But Oscar's breast is cold as clay
His locks are lifted by the gale;
And Allan's barbed arrow lay
With him in dark Glentarnar's vale.

And whence the dreadful stranger came
Or who, no mortal wight can tell;
But no one doubts the form of flame,
For Alva's sons knew Oscar well.

Ambition nerved young Allan's hand,
Exulting demons wing'd his dart;
While Envy waved her burning brand,
And pour'd her venom round his heart.

Swift is the shaft of Allan's bow:
Whose streaming life-blood stains his side
Dark Oscar's sable crest is low,
The dart has drunk his vital tide.

And Mora's eye could Allan move,
She lade his wounded pride rebel;
Alas! that eyes which beam'd with love,
Should urge the soul to deeds of hell!

Lo! seest thou not a lonely tomb,
Which rises o'er a warrior dead?
It glimmers through the twilight gloom;
Oh! that is Allan's nuptial bed.

Far, distant far, the noble grave
Which held his clan's great ashes stood;
And o'er his corse no banners wave,
For they were stain'd with kindred blood.

What minstrel gray, what hoary bard,
Shall Allan's deeds on harp-strings raise?
The song is glory's chief reward,
But who can strike a murderer's praise?

Unstrung, untouch'd, the harp must stand,
No minstrel dare the theme awake;
Guilt would benumb his palsied hand,
His harp in shuddering chords would break.

No lyre of fame, no hallow'd verse,
Shall sound his glory's high in air;
A dying father's bitter curse,
A brother's death groan echoes there.

TO THE DUKE OF DORSET.

In looking over my papers to select a few additional poems for this second edition, I found the following lines, which I had totally forgotten, composed in the summer of 1803, a short time previous to my departure from Italy.

\begin{quote}
They were addressed to a young schoolfellow of high rank, who had been my frequent companion in some rambles through the neighboring country however, he never saw the lines, and most probably never will. As, on a re-reading, I found them not worse than some other pieces in the collection, have now published them, for the first time, after a slight revision.
\end{quote}

DORSET! whose early steps with mine have stray'd,
Exploring every path of Ida's glade,
Whom still affection taught me to defend,
And made me less a tyrant than a friend;
HOURS OF IDLENESS. — Page 429.
HOURS OF IDleness

1. Though the harsh custom, of our youthful band
Bade thee obey, and gave me to command:*
Thee on whose head a few short years will shower
The gifts of riches and the pride of power;
E'en now a name illustrious is thine own,
Kenown's in rank, not far beneath the throne.
Yet Dorset, let not this seduce thy soul
To shun fair science, or evade control;
Though passive tutors, fearful to displease
The titled child, whose future breath may raise,
View ducal errors with indolent eyes,
And wink at faults they tremble to chastise.

Were youthful parasites, who bend the knee
To wealth, their golden idol, not to thee,—
And even in simple boyhood's opening dawn
Some slaves are found to flatter and to fawn.—
When these declare, "That pomp alone should wait
On one by birth predestined to be great;
That books were only meant for drudging fools,
That gallant spirits scorn the common rules,"
Believe them not,—they point the path to shame,
And seek to blast the honors of thy name.

Turn to the few in Ida's early throng,
Whose souls disdain not to condemn the wrong;
Or if, amidst the comrades of thy youth,
None dare to raise the stern voice of truth,
Ask thine own heart; 'twill bid thee, boy, forbear;
For well I know that virtue lingers there.

Yes! I have mark'd thee many a passing day,
But now new scenes invite me far away;
Yes! I have mark'd within that generous mind
A soul, if well matured, to bless mankind.
Ah! though myself by nature haughty, wild,
Whom indiscretion hail'd her favorite child;
Though every error stamps me for her own,
And dooms my fall, I fain would fall alone;
Though my proud heart no precept now can tame,
I love the virtues which I cannot claim.

'Tis not enough, with other sons of power,
To gleam the lambent meteor of an hour.
To swell some peerage page in feeble pride,
With long-drawn names that grace no page beside;
Then share with titled crowds the common lot—
In life just gazed at, in the grave forgot;
While nought divides thee from the vulgar dead,
Except the dull, cold stone that hides thy head,
The moulder 'scutcheon, or the herald's roll,
That well-emblazon'd but neglected scroll,
Where lords, unhon'd, in the tomb may find
One spot, to leave a worthless name behind:
There sleep, unnoticed as the gloomy vaults
† That veil their dust, their follies, and their faults.
A race with old armorial lists o'erspread,
In records destined never to be read.

Pain would I view thee, with prophetic eyes,
Exalted more among the good and wise,
A glorious and a long career pursue,
As first in rank, the first in talent too;
Spare every vice, each little meanness shun;
Not Fortune's minion, but her noblest son.

Turn to the annals of a former day,
Bright are the deeds thine earlier shrines display.
One, though a courtier, lived a man of worth,
And call'd, proud boast! the British drama forth.

Another view, not less renowned for wit;
Alike for courts, and camps, or senates fit;
Bold in the field, and favor'd by the Nine;
In every splendid part ordain'd to shine;
Far, far distinguish'd from the glittering throng,
The pride of princes, and the boast of song.†
Such were thy fathers; thus preserve their name;
Not heir to titles only, but to fame.
The hours draw nigh, a few brief days will close,
To me, this little scene of joys and woes;
Each knell of Time now warns me to resign
Shades where Hope, Peace and Friendship all were mine:

Hope, that could vary like the rainbow's hue,
And gild their pinions as the moments flew;
Peace, that reflection never frown'd away,
By dreams of ill to cloud some future day;
Friendship, whose truth let childhood only tell
Alas! they love not long who love so well.
To these adieu! nor let me linger o'er Scenes hail'd as exiles hail their native shore.
Receding slowly through the dark-blue deep,
Beheld by eyes that mourn, yet cannot weep.

Dorset, farewell! I will not ask one part
Of sad remembrance in so young a heart;
The coming morrow from thy youthful mind
Will sweep my name, nor leave a trace behind.
And yet, perhaps, in some maturer year,
Since chance has thrown us in the self-same sphere
Since the same senate, may the same debate
May one day claim our suffrage for the state,
We hence may meet, and pass each other by
With faint regard, or cold and distant eye.
For me, in future, neither friend nor foe
A stranger to thyself, thy zeal or wo,
With thee no more again I hope to trace
The recollection of our early race:
No more, as once, in social hours rejoice,
Or hear, unless in crowds, thy well-known voice.
Still, if the wishes of a heart untang'd
To veil those feelings which perchance it ought,
If these—but let me cease the lengthen'd strain—
Oh! if these wishes are not breathed in vain,
The guardian seraph who directs thy fate,
Will leave thee glorious as he found thee great.

ADRIAN'S ADDRESS TO HIS SOUL WHEN DYING.

Ah! gentle, fleeting, wav'ring sprite,
Friend and associate of this clay!
To what unknown region borne,
Wilt thou now-wing thy distant flight?
No more with wonted humor gay,
But pallid, cheerless, and forlorn.

TRANSLATION FROM CATULLUS.

"LUCTUS DE MORTE PASSERIBIS"

Ye Cupids, drop each little head,
Nor let your wings with joy be spread;
My Lesbia's favorite bird is dead,
Whom dearer than her eyes she loved
For he was gentle, and so true,
Obedient to her call he flew,
No fear, no wild alarm he knew,
But lightly o'er her bosom moved:

And softly fluttering here and there,
He never sought to clear the air,
But chirrump'd oft, and, free from care,
Tuned to her ear his grateful strain.
Now having passed the gloomy bourn,
His death and Lesbia's grief I mourn,
Who sighs, alas! but sighs in vain.

Oh! curst be thou, devouring grave!
Whose jaws eternal victims crave,

From whom no earthly power can save
For thou hast ta'en the bird away;
From thee my Lesbia's eyes o'erflow,
Her swollen cheeks with weeping glow;
Thou art the cause of all her woe,
Receptacle of life's decay.

IMITATED FROM CATULLUS.

TO ELLEN.

Oh! might I kiss those eyes of fire,
A million scars would quench desire:
Still would I steep my lips in bliss,
And dwell an age on every kiss;
Nor then my soul should sated be;
Still would I kiss and cling to thee:
Naught should my kiss from thine disperse,
Still would we kiss, and kiss for ever;
E'en though the numbers'did exceed
The yellow harvest's countless seed.
To part would be a vain endeavor:
Could I desist?—ah! never—never.

ODE 3, LIB. 3

The man of firm and noble soul
No factions clamors can control;
No threatening tyrant's darkling brew
Can swerve him from his just intent;
Gales the warring waves which plough,

By Auster on the billows spent,
To curb the Adriatic main,
Would saw his fix'd determined mind in vain.

HOURS OF IDleness.

After and the red right arm of Jove,
Hurtling his lightnings from above,
With all his terrors then unfurl'd,
He would unmoved, unawed behold.
The flames of an expiring world,
Again in crashing chaos roll'd,
In vast promiscuous ruin hurled,
Might light his glorious funeral pile;
Still dauntless, midst the wreck of earth he'd smile.

TRANSLATION FROM ANACREON.

TO HIS LYRE.

I wish to tune my quivering lyre
To deeds of fame and notes of fire;
To echo, from its rising swell,
How heroes fought and nations fell,
When Atreus' sons advanced to war,
Or Tyrian Cadmus roved afar:
But still, to martial strains unknown,
My lyre recurs to love alone.

Fired with the hope of future fame,
I seek some nobler hero's name:
The dying chords are strung anew,
To war, to war, my harp is due:
With glowing strings, the epic strain
To Jove's great son I raise again;
Alcides and his glorious deeds,
Beneath whose arm the Hydra bleeds,
All, all in vain; my wayward lyre
Wakes silver notes of soft desire.
Adieu, ye chiefs renown'd in arms!
Adieu! the clang of war's alarms!
To other deeds my soul is strung,
And sweeter notes shall now be sung;
My harp shall all its powers reveal,
To tell the tale my heart must feel;
Love, love alone, my lyre shall claim,
In songs of bliss and sighs of shame.

ODE III.

'Twas now the hour when Night had driven
Her car half round yon sable heaven;
Bootes, only, seem'd to roll
His arctic charge around the pole;
While mortals, lost in gentle sleep,
Forgot to smile, or cease to weep:
At tis a lone hour, the Lapian boy,
Descending from the realms of joy,
Quick to my gate directs his course,
And knockes with all his little force.
My visions fled, alarm'd I rose,—
"What stranger breaks my blest repose?"
"Alas!" replies the wily child,
In faltering accents sweetly mild,
"A hapless infant here I roam,
Far from my dear maternal home.
Oh! shield me from the wintry blast!
The nightly storm is puring fast.

---

No prowling robber lingers here,
A wandering baby who can fear?"
I heard his seeming artless tale,
I heard his sighs upon the gale:
My breast was never pity's foe.
But felt for all the baby's wo.
I drew the bar, and by the light
Young Love, the infant, met my sight:
His bow across his shoulders flung,
And thence his fatal quiver hung,
(Ah! little did I think the dart
Would rankle soon within my heart.)
With care I tend my weary guest,
His little fingers chill my breast;
His glossy curls, his azure wing,
Which drop with nightly showers, I wrung:
His shivering limbs the embers warm;
And now reviving from the storm,
Scarce had he felt his wonted glow,
Than swift he seiz'd his slender bow:
"I fain would know, my gentle host,
He cried, "if this its strength has lost;
I fear, relax'd with midnight dews,
The strings their former aid refuse."
With poison tipt, his arrow flies,
Deep in my tortured heart it lies;
Then loud the joyous urchin laugh'd:
"My bow can still impel the shaft:
'Tis firmly fix'd, thy sighs reveal it;
Say, courteous host, canst thou not feel it?"

FRAGMENTS OF SCHOOL EXERCISES.

FROM THE PROMETHEUS VINC'TUS OF AESCHYLUS.

GREAT Jove, to whose almighty throne
Both gods and mortals homage pay,
Ne'er may my soul thy power disown,
Thy dread behest ne'er disobey.
Oft shall the sacred victim fall
In sea-girt ocean's mossy hall;
My voice shall raise no impious strain
Against him who rules the sky and azure main.

---

How different now thy joyless fate,
Since first Helen's bride,
When placed aloft in godlike state,
The blushing beauty by thy side,
Thou sat'st, while reverend Ocean smiled,
And mirthful strains the hours beguiled,
The Nymphs and Tritons danced around,
Nor yet thy doom was fix'd, nor Jove relentless frown'd.

THE EPISODE OF NISUS AND EURYALUS.

A PARAPHRASE FROM THE IENEID, LIB. IX.

Nisus, the guardian of the portal, stood,
Eager to gild his arms with hostile blood;
Well skill'd in fight the quivering lance to wield.
O'er his arrows through the embattled field.
BYRON'S WORKS.

*From Ida torn, he left his sylvan cave,
And sought a foreign home, a distant grave.
To watch the movements of the Daunian host,
With him Euryalus sustains the post;*

No lovelier men adorn'd the ranks of Troy,
And beardless bloom yet graced the gallant boy;
Though few the seasons of his youthful life,
As yet a novice in the martial strife,

Twa's his, with beauty, valor's gifts to share—
A soul heroic, as his form was fair:
These burn with one pure flame of generous love;
In peace, in war, united still they move;
Friendship and glory form their joint reward;
And now combined they hold their nightly guard.

"What god," exclaim'd the first, "instills this fire!
Or, in itself a god, what great desire?
My laboring soul, with anxious thought oppressed,
Abhors this station of inglorious rest;
The love of fame with this can ill accord,
Be 't to pursue the garland of my sword.
Seest thou my camp, with torches twinkling dim,
Where: to:ken slumbers wrap each lazy limb?
Where confidence and ease the watch disdain,
And drowsy Silenice holds her sable reign?
Then hear my thought:—In deep and sullen grief
Our troops and leaders mourn their absent chief:
Now could the gifts and promised prize be thine,
(Thed, the danger, and the fame be mine,) Were this decreed, beneath yon rising mound, Methinks, an easy path perchance were found;
Which past, I speed my way to Pallas' walls,
And lend Enaeas from Invander's halls."

With equal ardor fired, and warlike joy,
His glowing friend address'd the Dardan boy:
"These deeds, my Nisus, shalt thou dare alone?
Must all the fame, the peril, be thine own?
Am I by thee despised, and left afar,
As one unfit to share the toils of war?
Not thus his son the great Ophelles taught;
Not thus my sire in Argive combats fought;
Not thus, when Ilion fell by heavenly hate,
I track'd Enaeas through the walks of fate:
Then how'st my deeds, my breast devoid of fear,
And hostile life-drop dim my gory spear.
Here is a soul with hope immortal burns,
And life, ignoble life, for glory spurns.
Fame, fame is cheaply earn'd by fleeting breath.
The price of honor is the sleep of death."

Then Nisus,—"Calm thy bosom's fond alarms: Thy heart beats fiercely to the din of arms. More dear thy worth and valor than my own,
I swear by him who fills Olympus! throne! So may I triumph, as I speak the truth,
And claim the laurel and thy youth! But shool! I fall,—and he who dares advance
Through hostile regions, must abide by chance,—

---

If some Rutulian arm, with adverse blow,
Should lay the friend who ever loved thee low,
Live thou—such beauties I would fain preserve—
Thy budding years a lengthen'd term deserve.
When humbled in the dust, let some one be,
Whose gentle eyes will shed one tear for me;
Whose manly arm may snatch me back by force
Or wealth redeem from fees my captive bire.
Or, if my destiny these last deny,
If in the speller's power my soul decline,
Thy pious care may raise a simple tomb,
To mark thy love, and signalize my doom.
Why should thy doting wretched mother weep? Her only boy, reclined in endless sleep? Who, for thy sake, the tempest's fury dared,
Who, for thy sake, war's deadly peril shared;
Who braved what woman never braved before,
And left her native for the Latian shore."

"In vain you damp the ardor of my soul,"
Replied Euryalus; "it sears control!
Hence, all your tears and complaints!"—Their brother guards arose
Roused by their call, nor court again repose;
The pair, buoy'd up on Hope's exulting wing,
Their stations leave, and speed to seek the king.

Now o'er the earth a solemn stillness ran,
And lull'd alike the cares of brute and man;
Save where the Dardan leaders nightly hold
Alternate converse, and their plans unfold.
On one great point the council are agreed,
An instant message to their prince decreed; Each lean'd upon the lance he well could wield,
And poised with easy arm his ancient shield;
When Nisus and his friend their leave request
To offer something to their high bequest.
With anxious tremors, yet unawed by fear,
The faithful pair before the throne appear:
Julus greets them; at his kind command,
The elder first address'd the hoary band.

"With patience" (thus Hyrtacides began)
"Attend, nor judge from youth our humble plea.
Where yonder beacons half expiring bear
Our aspiring foes; and future's ancient dream,
Nor heed that we a secret path have traced,
Between the ocean and the portal placed.
Beneath: the covert of the blackening smoke,
Whose shade securely our design will cloak!
If you, ye chiefs, and fortune, will allow,
We'll bend our course to yonder mountain's brow
Where Pallas' walls at distance meet the sight,
Seen o'er the glade, when not obscured by night:
Then shall Æneas in his pride return,
While hostile matrons raise their offspring's urn;
And Latian spoils a prudent heaped of dead,
Shall mark the haven of our hero's tread.
Such is our purpose, not unknown the way;
Where yonder torrent's devious waters stray,
Oft have we seen, when hunting by the stream
The distant spires above the valleys gleam."

Mature in years, for sober wisdom famed,
Moved by the speech, Aethelies here exclaim'd,
"Ye parent gods! who rule the fate of Troy,
Still dwells the Dardan spirit in the boy;
When minds like these in striplings thus ye raise
Yours is the godlike act; be yours the praise;
In gallant youth, my fainting hopes revive,
And Ilion's wonted glories still survive."

* Him Ida sent, a hunter now no more, To combat foes upon a foreign shore, Near him, the berolent of the Trojan band, Did sile Euryalus, his humble war, stood: Few are the weanes of his youthful life, As yet a novice in the martial arts:—The gods to him unwoed gifts impart, A female's beauty, with a hero's heart. These burn with one pure flame of generous love, to poesy, in war, united still they roose; Friendship and glory form their joint reward, and now combined they own the grace they guard.

Sach was the original version of this passage, as given in one private ed. in which no more than the above fragment was retained.
The trench is pass'd, and, favor'd by the night,
Through sleeping foes they wheel their wary flight.
When shall the sleep of many a foe be o'er?
Alas! some slumber who shall wake no more!
Chariots and bridles, mix'd with arms, are seen;
And flowing flasks, and scatter'd troops between.
Bacchus and Mars to rule the camp combine;
A mingled chaos this of war and wine.
"Now," cries the first to deeds of blood prepare.
With men the duress and the task, we share:
Here lies our path; lest any hand arise,
Watch thou, while many a dreamy chieftain dies;
I'll carve our passage through the heedless foe,
And clear thy road with many a deadly blow."
His whisperings accents then the youth repress'd,
And pierced proud Rhamnes through his panting breast;
Stretch'd at his ease, th' incautious king repos'd;
Debauch, and not fatigue, his eyes had closed:
To Turnus dear, a prophet and a prince,
His omens more than augur's skill devise;
But he, who, thus foretold the fate of all,
Could not avert his own untimely fall.
Next Remus' armor-bearer, hapless fell,
And three unhappy slaves the carnage swell.
The charioteer along his coursers' sides
Expires, the steel his sever'd neck divides;
And, last, his lord is number'd with the dead;
Bounding convulsive, flies the gasping head;
From the swell'n veins the blackening torrents pour.
Stain'd is the couch and earth with clotting gore.
Young Lamyrs and Lamus next expire,
And gay Serranus, fell'd with youthful fire.

HOURS OF IDleness.

Then in his warm embrace the boys he press'd,
And, quivering, strain'd them to his aged breast;
With tears the burning cheek of each bedew'd,
And, sobbing, thus his first discourse renew'd:
"What gift, my countrymen, what martial prize
Can we bestow, which you may not despise?
Our deities the first best boon have given—
Internal virtues are the gift of Heaven.
What poor rewards can bless your deeds on earth,
Doubtless await such young, exalted worth.
Æneas and Ascanius shall combine
To yield applause, far, far surpassing mine."
Iulus then:—"By all the powers above!
By those Penates * who my country love!
By hony Vesta's sacred fane, I swear
My hopes are all in you, ye generous pair!
Restore my father to my grateful sight,
And all my sorrows yield to one delight.
Nisus! two silver goblets are thine own,
Saved from Arisha's stately domes o'erthrown!
My sire secured them on that fatal day.
Nor left such bowls an Argive robber's prey:
Two massy tripods, also, shall be thine;
Two talents polished from the glittering mine:
An ancient cup, which Tyrian Dido gave,
While yet our vessels press'd the Punic wave;
But when the hostile chiefs at length bow'd down,
When great Æneas wears Hesperia's crown,
The casque, the buckler, and the fiery steed
Which Turnus guides with more than mortal speed,
Are thine; no envious lot shall then be cast,
I pledge my word, irrevocably past:
May never, twelve slaves, and twice six captive dames,
To soothe thy softer hours with amorous flames,
And all the realms which now the Latins sway,
The labors of to-night shall well repay.
But thou, my generous youth, whose tender years
And near my own, whose worth my heart revere,
Henceforth affection, sweetly thus begun,
Shall join our bosoms and our souls in one;
Without thy aid, nothing shall be mine;
With thy advice, no great design;
Alas! through life esteem'd, thou godlike boy,
In war my bulwark, and in peace my joy."

To him Euryalus:—"No day shall shame
The rising glories which from this I claim.
Fortune may favor, or the skies may frown,
But valor, spite of fate, obtains renown.
Yet, ere from hence our eager steps depart,
One boon I beg, the nearest to my heart;
My mother, sprung from Priam's royal line,
Like thine ennobled, hardly less divine;
Nor Troy nor king Acestes' realms restrain
Her feeble age from dangers of the main;
Alone she came, all selfish fears above,
A bright example of maternal love,
Unknown the secret enterprise I brave,
Last grief should bend my parent to the grave;
From this alone no fond aidice I seek,
No fainting mother's lips have press'd my cheek;
By gloomy night and thy right hand I vow
Her parted tears would shake my purpose now;
Do thou, my prince, her falling age sustain,
In thee her much-loved child may live again;

BYRON'S WORKS.

Half the long night in childish games was pass'd:
Lull'd by the potent grape, he slept at last;
Ah! happier far had he the morn survey'd,
And till Aurora's dawn his skill display'd.

In slaughter'd folds, the keepers lost in sleep,
His hungry fangs a lion thus may steep;
'Mid the sad-dock, at dead of night, he prowls,
With madder glutted, and in carnage rolls;
Insta-rate still, through teeming herds he roams;
In seas of gore the lordly tyrant soams.

Nor less the other's deadly vengeance came,
But falls on feeble crowds without a name:
His wound unconscious Fadus scarce can feel,
Yet wakeful Rhaesus sees the threatening steel;
His coward breast behind a jar he hides,
And vainly in the weak defence confides:
Full in his heart, the falchion searched his veins,
The reeking weapon bears alternate stains;
Through wine and blood, commingling as they flow,
One feeble spirit seeks the shades below.

Now where Messapus dwelt the fear of their way,
Whose fires emit a faint and trembling ray;
There, unconfined, behold each grazing steed,
Unwatch'd, unheed'd, on the herbage feed:
Brave Nisus here arrests his comrade's arm,
Too flush'd with carnage, and with conquest warm:
"Hence let us haste, the dangerous path is pass'd;"
Full foes enough to-night have breath'd their last:
Soon will the day those eastern clouds adorn;
Now let us speed, nor tempt the rising morn."

What silver arms, with various art emboss'd,
What bows and mantles in confusion toss'd,
They leave regardless! yet one glittering prize
Attracts the younger hero's wandering eyes;
The gilded harness Rhamnes' coursers felt,
The gems which studd'd the monarch's golden belt;
This from the pallid corse was quickly torn,
Once by a line of former chieftains worn.
Th' exulting boy the studded girdle wears,
Messapus' helm his head in triumph bears;
Then from the tents their cantious steps they bend
To seek the vale where safer paths extend.

Just at this hour a band of Latian horse
To Turnus' camp pursue their destined course;
While the slow foot their tardy march delay,
The knights, impatient, spur along the way:
Three hundred mail-clad men, by Volscens led,
To Turnus with their master's promise sped;
Now they approach the trench, and view the walls,
When, on the left, a light reflection falls;
The plunder'd helmet through the waning night,
Sheds forth a silver radiance, glancing bright.
Volscens with question loud the pair alarms:—
"Stand, striplings! stand! why early thus in arms? From whence, to whom?"—He meets with no reply:
Trusting the covert of the night, they fly;
The thicket's depth with hurried pace they tread,
While round the wood the hostile squadron spread.

With brakes entangled, scare a path between, "Drearly and dark appeareth the sylvan scene:
Euryalus his heavy spoils impede,
The boughs and winding turns his steps mislead;
But Nisus scourc along the forest's maze
To where Latinus' steeds in safety graze,

Then backward o'er the plain his eyes extend,
On every side they seek his absent friend.
"O God! my boy," he cries, "of me bereft,
In what impending perils art thou left!"
Listening he runs—above the wavy trees,
Tumultuous voices swell the passing breeze;
The war-cry rises, thundering hoofs around
Wake the dark echoes of the trembling ground.
Again he turns, of footsteps hear the noise;
The sound elates, the sight his hope destroys.
The hapless boy a ruffian train surround,
While lengthening shades his weary way confound,
Him with loud shouts the furious knights pursue,
Struggling in vain, a captive to the crew.
What can his friend 'gainst thronging numbers dare!
Ah! must he rush, his comrade's fate to share?
What force, what aid, what stratagem essay,
Back to redeem the Latian spoiler's prey?"
His life a votive ransom nobly give,
Or die with him for whom he wish'd to live;
Poising with strength his lifted lance on high,
On Luna's orb he cast his frenzied eye:
"Goddesse serene, transcending every star!
Queen of the sky, whose beams are seen afar!
By night heaven owns thy sway, by day the grove,
When, as chaste Dian, here thou deign'st to rove;
If e'er myself, or sires, have sought to grace
Thine altars with the produce of the chase,
Speed, speed my dart to pierce yon vaunting crowd,
To free my friend and scatter far the proud."
Thus having said, the hissing dart he flung;
Through parted shades the hurtling weapons sung;
The thristy point in Sulmo's entrails lay,
Transfix'd his heart, and stretch'd him on the clay:
He sob's, he dies,—the troop in wild amaze,
Unconscious whence the death, with horror gaze.
While pale they stare, through Tagus' temple riven,
A second shaft with equal force is driven:
Fierce Volscens rolls around his lowering eyes;
Veil'd by the night, secure the Trojan lies;
Burning with wrath, he viewed his soldiers fall.
"Thou youth accurst, thy life shall pay for all!"
Quick from the sheath his flaming glaive he drew.
And, raging, on the boy defenceless flew.
Nisus no more the blackening shade conceals,
Forth, forth he starts, and all his love reveals,
Aghast, confus'd, his fears to madness rise,
And pour these accents, shrieking as he flies,
"Me, me,—your vengeance hurl on me alone;
Here sheathe the steel, my blood is all your own.
Ye starry spheres! thou conscious Heaven! attest;
He could not—durst not—do! the guile confest;
All, all was mine—his early fate suspend
He only loved too well his hapless friend:
Spare, spare, ye chiefs! from him your rage remove
His fault was friendship, all his crime was love."
He pray'd in vain; the dark assassin's sword
Pierced the fair side, the snowy bosom gored;
Lowly to earth inclines his plume-clad crest,
And sanguine torrents mantle o'er his breast:
As some young rose, whose blossom scents the air,
Languid in death, expires beneath the share;
Or crimson poppy, sinking with the shower.
Declining gently, falls a fading flower;
Thus, sweetly drooping, bends his lovely head,
And lingering beauty hovers round the dead.

But fiery Nisus stems the battle's tide,
Revenge his leader, and despair his guide:
Volscns he seeks amst the gathering host,
Volscns mst soon appose his comrade's ghost;
Steel, flashing, yours on steel, foe crowds on foe;
Rage nerves his arm, fate gleams in every blow;
In vain beneath unnumber'd wounds he bleeds,
Nor wounds, nor death, distracted Nisus heed;
In viewless circles wheel'd, his falchion flies,
Nor quits the hero's grasp till Volscns dies;
Deep in his throat its end the weapon found,
The tyrant's soul fled groaning through the wound.
Thus Nisus all his fond affection proved—
Dying, revenged the fate of him he loved;
Then on his bosom sought his wonted place,
And death was heavenly in his friend's embrace!

Celestial pair! if aught my verse can claim,
Wafted on Time's broad pinion, yours is fame!
Ages on ages shall your fate admire,
Nor future day shall see your names expire,
While stands the Capitol, immortal dome!
And vanquish'd millions hail their empress, Rome!

TRANSLATION FROM THE MEDEA OF EURIPIDES.*

WHEN fierce conflicting passions urge
The breast where love is wont to glow,
What mind can stem the stormy surge,
Which rolls the tide of human wo?
The hope of praise, the dread of shame,
Can rouse the tortured breast no more;
The wild desire, the guilty flame,
Absorbs each wish it felt before.

But if affection gently thrills
The soul by purer dreams possesst,
The pleasing balm of mortal ills
In love can soothe the aching breast:
If thou comest in disguise;†
Fair Venus! from thy native heaven,
What heart unfeeling would despise
The sweetest boon the gods have given?

But never from thy golden bow
May I beneath the shaft expire!
Whose creeping venom, sure and slow,
Awakes an all-consuming fire:
Ye racking doubts! ye jealous fears!
With others wage internal war;
Repentance, source of future tears,
From me be ever distant far!

May no distracting thoughts destroy
The holy calm of sacred love!
May all the hours be winged with joy,
Whichover faithful hearts above!
Fair Venus! on thy myrtle shrine
May I with some fond lover sigh,
Whose heart may mingle pure with mine—
With me to live, with me to die!

My native soil! beloved before,
Now dearer as my peaceful home,
Ne'er may I quit thy rocky shore
A hapless banish'd wretch to roam!
This very day, this very hour,
May I resign this fleeting breath!
Nor quit my silent humble bow;
A doom to me far worse than death

Have I not heard the exile's sigh,
And seen the exile's silent tear,
Through distant climes condemn'd to fly
A pensive weary wanderer here?
Ah! hapless dame! no sire bewails,
No friend thy wretched fate deplores.
No kindred voice with rapture hails
Thy steps within a stranger's doors.

Perish the fiend whose iron heart,
To fair affection's truth unknown,
Bids her he fondly loved depart,
Unpity'd, helpless, and alone:
Who ne'er unlocks with silver key†
The milder treasurers of his soul,—
May such a friend be far from me.

And ocean's storms between us roll.

THOUGHTS

SUGGESTED BY A COLLEGE EXAMINATION.†

HIGH in the midst, surrounded by his peers,
MAONUS his ample front sublime uprears:
Placed on his chair of state, he seems a god,
While Sophs and Freshmen tremble at his nod.
As all around sit wrapt in speechless gloom,
His voice in thunder shakes the sounding dome
Denouncing dire reproach to luckless foot
Unskil'd to plod in mathematical rules.

Happy the youth in Euclid's axioms tried,
Though little versed in any art beside;
Who, scarcely skill'd in English line to pen,
Scans Attic metres with a critic's ken.

What though he knows not how his fathers blest,
When civil discord piled the fields with dead,
When Edward bade his conquering bands advance,
Or Henry trampled on the crest of France;
Though marveling at the name of Magna Charta,
Yet well he recollects the laws of Sparta;
Can tell what edicts sage Lycurgus made,
While Blackstone's on the shelf neglected laid;

Meno, who accompanied Jason to Corinth, was deserbed by him for the daughter of Creon, king of that city. The chorus from this which is taken here addresses Meno; though a considerable library is used with the original, by expanding the idea, as also in some other parts of the translation.

† The original is "Καθαρόν δ' ἐν οἷς εἴληθα γονεῖν"; literally "disclosing the bright key of the mind." 2 No reflection is here intended against the person mentioned under the name of Magnus. He is merely represented as performing an unavoidable function of his office. Indeed, such an attempt could only recur upon myself; as that gentleman is now so much distinguished by his eloquence, and the dignified propriety with which he fills his situation, as he was in his younger days for wit and conversancy.

* The above note was added in the first edition of the Hours of Idleness.

† The above note was added in the first edition of the Hours of Idleness.
Of Grecian dramas vaunts the deathless fame,
Of Avon's bard remembering scarce the name.

Such is the youth whose scientific pate
Class-honors, medals, fellowships, await;
Or even, perhaps, the declamation prize,
If to such glorious height he lifts his eyes
But, lo! no common orator can hope
The envied silver cup within his scope.
Not that our heads much eloquence require,
Th' Athenian's glowing style, or Tully's fire.
A manner clear or warm is useless, since
We do not try by speaking to convince.
Be other orators of pleasing proud:
We speak to please ourselves, not move the crowd:
Our gravity prefers the muttering tone,
A proper mixture of the squeak and groan;
No borrowed grace of action must be seen;
The slightest motion would please the Dean;
Whilst every starving graduate would prate
Against what he could never imitate.

The man who hopes to obtain the promised cup
Must in one posture stand, and ne'er look up;
Nor stop, but rattle over every word—
Not matter what, so it can not be heard.
Thus let him hurry on, nor think to rest;
Who speaks the fastest's sure to speak the best;
Who utters most within the shortest space,
May safely hope to win the wordy race.

The sons of science these, who, thus repaid,
Linger in ease in Granta's sluggish shade;
Where on Cam's sedgy bank supine they lie
Unknown—unhonour'd live, unwept—for die:
Dull as the pictures which adorn their halls,
They think all learning fix'd within their walls:
In manners rude in foolish forms precise,
All modern arts affecting to despise;
Yet prizeing Bentley's, * Brunck's, * or Porson's† note,
More than the verse on which the critic wrote:
† Vain as their honors, heavy as their ale,
Sad as their wit, and tedious as their tale;
To friendship dead, though not untaught to feel,
When Self and Church demand a bigot zeal.
With eager haste they court the lord of power,
Whether 'tis Pitt or Petty rules the hour;‡
‡ To him with suppliant smiles they bend the head,
‡ While distant mitres to their eyes are spread.
But should a storm o'erwhelm him with disgrace,
They'd fly to seek the next who fill'd his place.
Such are the men who learning's treasures guard;
Such is their practice, such is their reward!
This much at least we may presume to say—
The premium can't exceed the price they pay.

TO THE EARL OF——.*

"To asperer aurus
Sic memor, et est collauda ac oblatum ingenio."

Phaonius Pæonius

FRIEND of my youth! when young we roved
Like striplings mutually beloved
With friendship's purest glow,
The bliss which wing'd those rosy hours
Was such as pleasure seldom showers
On mortals here below.

The recollection seems alone
Dearer than all the joys I've known
When distant far from you:
Though pain, 'tis still a pleasing pain,
To trace those days and hours again,
And sigh again adieu!

My pensive memory lingers o'er
Those scenes to be enjoy'd no more,
Those scenes regretted ever:
The measure of our youth is full,
Life's evening dream is dark and dull,
And we may meet—ah! never!

As when one parent spring supplies
Two streams which from one fountain rise,
Together join'd in vain;
How soon, diverging from their source,
Each, murmuring, seeks another course
Till mingled in the main!

Our vital streams of weal or wo,
Though near, alas! distinctly flow,
Nor mingle as before:
Now swift or slow, now black or clear
Till death's unfathom'd gulf appear,
And both shall quit the shore,

Our souls, our friend! which once supplied
One wish, nor breathed a thought beside,
Now flow in different channels:
Disdaining humbler rural sports,
'Tis yours to mix in polish'd courts,
And shine in fashion's annals:

'Tis mine to waste on love my time,
Or vent my reveries in rhyme
Without the aid of reason;
For sense and reason (critics know it)
Have quittd every amorous poet,
Nor left a thought to seize on.

Poor LITTLE! sweet, melodious bard!
Of late esteem'd it monstrous hard
That he who sang before all,
He who the lore of love expanded,
By dire reviewers should be branded
As void of wit and moral.†

And yet, while Beauty's praise is thine,
Harmonious favorite of the Nine!

* These stanzas were first published in the second edition of Hours of Illusion.
† These stanzas were written soon after the appearance of a severe critique, in a northern review, on a new publication of the British Assassin.
Repine not at thy lot:
Yhy soothing rays may still be read,
When Persecution's arm is dead,
And critics are forgot.

Still I must yield those worthies merit
Who chasten, with unsparing spirit,
Bad rhymes, and those who write them;
And though myself may be the next
By critic sarcasm be vex'd,
I really will not fight them.*

Perhaps they would do quite as well
To break the rudely sounding shell
Of such a young beginner.
He who offends at pert nineteen,
Ere thirty may become, I ween,
A very harden'd sinner.

Now, I must return to you;
And sure, apologies are due:
Accept, then, my concession.
In truth, dear ——, in fancy's flight,
I soar along from left to right;
My muse admires digression.

I think I said 'twould be your fate
To add one star to royal state,—
May regal smiles attend you
And should a noble monarch reign,
You will not seek his smiles in vain,
If worth can recommend you.

Yet, since in danger courts abound,
Where specious rivals glitter round,
From shares may saints preserve you
And grant your love nor friendship ne'er
From any claim a kindred care
But those who best deserve you.

Not for a moment may you stray:
From truth's secure unerring way!
May no delights decoy!
O'er roses may your footsteps move!
Your smiles be ever smiles of love!
Your tears be tears of joy!

Oh! if you wish that happiness
Your coming days and years may bless,
And virtues crown your brow,
Be still, as you were wont to be,
Spotless as you've been known to me,—
Be still as you are now.

And though some trifling share of praise,
To cheer my last declining days,
To me were doubly dear;
Whilst blessing your beloved name,
I'd rise at once a poet's fame,
To prove a prophet here.

* A hard (bitter) reference to a specific critic's review of their work.

A MEDLEY.

Oh! could Le Saon's* demon's gift
Be realized at my desire,
This night my trembling form he'd lift
To place it on St. Mary's spire.

Then would, unroof'd, old Grant's halls
Pedantic inmates full display;
Fellows who dream on lawn or stalls,
The price of venal votes to pay.

Then would I view each rival wight,
Petty and Palmerston survey;
Who canvass there with all their might,
Against the next elective day.

Lo! candidates and voters lie;
All hull'd in sleep, a godly number!
A race renown'd for piety.
Whose conscience won't disturb their slumber.

Lord H——, indeed, may not demur;
Fellows are sage reflecting men:
They know preferment can occur
But very seldom, now and then.

They know the chancellor has got
Some pretty livings in disposal:
Each hopes that one may be his lot,
And therefore smiles on his proposal.

Now from the soporific scene
I'll turn mine eye, as night grows later,
To view unheeded and unseen
The studious sons of Alma Mater.

There, in apartments small and damp,
The candidate for college prizes
Sits poring by the midnight lamp;
Goes late to bed, yet early rises.

He surely well deserves to gain them,
With all the honors of his college,
Who, striving hardly to obtain them,
Thus seeks unprofitable knowledge:

Who sacrifices hours of rest
To scan precisely metres Attic;
Or agitates his anxious breast
In solving problems mathematieal:

* The motto was not given in the private volume.

† The Deux Bois of Le Sage, where Asmodeus, the demon, pinn'd
Don Celia to an eternal elusion, and unroof'd the houses for inspection.

‡ Lo! candidates and voters lie, &c. The fourth and fifth stanzas, which are given here as they were printed in the Hours of Idleness, run as follows in the private volume:—

"One on his power and place depends,
The other on the Lord knows what;
Each to some eloquence pretends,
Though neither will convince by that.

"The first, indeed, may not demur."

§ From the soporific scene. In the private volume, From convulsion...
Who reads false quantities in Sele,*
Or puzzles o'er the deep triangle;
Deprived of many a wholesome meal,
In barbarous Latin † doom'd to wrangle:
Renouncing every pleasing page
From authors of historic use;
Preferring to the letter'd sage
The square of the hypothenuse.‡
Still, harmless are these occupations,
That hurt none but the hapless student,
Compared with other recreations,
Which bring together the imprudent.
Whose daring revels shock the sight,
When vice and infamy combine,
When drunkenness and dice invite,
As every sense is steep'd in wine.
Not so the methodistic crew,
Who plans of reformation lay;
In humble attitude they sue,
And for the sins of others pray:
Forgetting that their pride of spirit,
Their exultation in their trial,
Detracts most largely from the merit
Of all their boasted self-denial.
'Tis morn: from these I turn my sight:
What scene is this which meets the eye? A numerous crowd, array'd in white,§
Across the green in numbers fly.
Loud rings in air the chapel bell;
'Tis hush'd—what sounds are these I hear? The organ's soft, celestial swell Rolls deeply on the listen'ing ear.
To this is join'd the sacred song,
The royal minstrel's hallow'd strain; Though he who hears the music long, Will never wish to hear again.
Our choir would scarcely be excused,
Even as a band of raw beginners; All mercy now must be refused To such a set of croaking sinners.
If David, when his toils were ended, Had heard these blockheads sing before him, To us his psalms had ne'er descend'd,— In furious mood he would have tore 'em.
The luckless Israelites, when taken, By some inhuman tyrant's order, Were asked to sing, by joy forsaken On Babylonian river's border.

Oh! had they sung in notes like these, Inspired by strategem or fear, They might have set their hearts at ease The devil a soul had stay'd to hear.
But if I scribble longer * now,
The deuce a soul will stay to read My pen is blunt, my ink is low; 'Tis almost time to stop indeed.
Therefore, farewell, old GRANTA's spires: No more like Cleofas I fly; No more thy theme my muse inspires The reader's tired, and so am I.

ANSWER TO SOME ELEGANT VERSES

SENT BY A FRIEND TO THE AUTHOR, COMPLAINING THAT ONE OF HIS DESCRIPTIONS WAS RATHER TOO WARMLY DRAWN.†

"But if any old lady, knight, priest, or physician, Should condemn me for printing a second edition; If good Muslim Scepticism my work should abuse, May I venture to give her a smack of my muse?"

CANDOUR compels me, BECHER! to commend The verse which blends the censor with the friend. Your strong, yet just, reproofs extorts applause From me, the headless and imprudent † cause. For this wild ‡ error which pervades my strain, I sue for pardon,—must I sue in vain? The wise sometimes from Wisdom's ways depart; Can youth then hush the dictates of the heart? Precepts of prudence curb, but can't control, The fierce emotions of the flowing soul. When love's delirium haunts the glowing mind, Limping Decorum lingers far behind: Vainly the dotard mends her prudish pace, Outstrip and vanquish'd in the mental chase. The young, the old, have worn the chains of love Let those they ne'er confined my lay reprove: Let those whose souls contenm the pleasing power Their censures on the hapless victim shower. Oh! how I hate the nerveless, frigid song, The ceaseless echo of the rhyming throng, Whose laud'rd lines in chilling numbers flow, To paint & pang the author ne'er can know! The artless Helicon I boast in youth;— My lyre, the heart; my muse, the simple truth, Far be't from me the "virgin's mind" to "taint;" Seduction's dread is here no slight restraint. The maid whose virgin breast is void of guile, Whose wishes dimple in a modest smile, Whose downcast eye disdains the wanton leer, Firm in her virtue's strength, yet not severe— She whom a conscious grace shall thus refine, Will ne'er be "tainted" by a strain of mire. But for the nymph whose premature desires Torment the bosom with unanny fires,

No not to snare her willing heart is spread;
She would have fallen, though she ne'er had read.

Whose souls, to feeling and to nature true,
Will spare the childish verse, and not destroy
The light effusions of a heedless boy.
I seek not glory from the senseless crowd;
Of fancied laurels I shall ne'er be proud;
Their warmest plaudits I would scarcely prize,
*Leah sneers or censures I alike despise.

LACHIN Y. GAIR.*

Lachin y. Gair, or, as it is pronounced in the Ewe, Loch na Garr, towers proudly prominent in the Northern Highlands, near Inverness. One of our modern tourists mentions it as the highest mountain, perhaps, in Great Britain. By this as it may, it is certainly one of the most sublime and picturesque among our "Caledonian Alps." Its appearance is of a dusky hue, but the summit is the seat of eternal snows. Near Lachin y. Gair I spent some of the early part of my life, the recollection of which has given birth to the following stanzas.

Away, ye gay landscapes, ye gardens of roses!
In you let the minions of luxury rove;
Restore me the rocks where the snow-flake repose,
Though still they are sacred to freedom and love;
Yet, Caledonia, beloved are your mountains,
Round their white summits though elements war;
Though cataraets foam 'stead of smooth-flowing fountains,
I sigh for the valley of dark Loch na Garr.

Ah! where my young footsteps in infancy wander'd;
My cap was the bonnet, my cloak was the plaid;
On chieftains long perish'd my memory ponder'd,
As daily I strode through the pine-covered glade.
I sought not my home till the day's dying glory
Gave place to the rays of the bright polar star;
For fancy was cheer'd by traditional story,
Disclosed by the natives of dark Loch na Garr.

"Shades of the dead! have I not heard your voices Rise on the night-rolling breath of the gale?"
Surely the soul of the hero rejoices,
And rides on the wind o'er his own Highland vale.
Round Loch na Garr while the stormy mist gathers,
Winter presides in his cold icy car;
Mounds there encircle the forms of my fathers;
They dwell in the tempests of dark Loch na Garr.

"Ill-star'd,"† though brave, did no visions foreboding,
Tell you that fate had forsaken your cause?"
Ah! were you destined to die at Culloden?
Victory crown'd not your fall with applause:

TO ROMANCE;†

Parent of golden dreams, Romance!
Auspicous queen of childish joys,
Who lead'st along, in airy dance,
Thy votive train of girls and boys;
At length, in spells no longer bound,
I break the fetters of my youth;
No more I tread thy mystic round,
But leave thy realms for those of Truth.

And yet 'tis hard to quit the dreams
Which haunt the unsuspicuous soul,
Where every nymph a goddess seems,
Whose eyes through rays immortal roll
While Fancy holds her boundless reign,
And all assume a varied hue;
When virgins seem no longer vain,
And even woman's smiles are true

And must we own thee but a name,
And from thy hall of clouds descend?
Nor find a sylph in every dame,
A Pylades* in every friend?
But leave at once thy realms of air
To mingling hands of fairy elves?
Confess that woman's face is fair,
And friends have feeling for themselves?

With shame I own I've felt thy sway;
Repentent, now thy reign is o'er:
No more thy precepts I obey,
No more on fancied pinions soar.
Fond fool! to love a sparkling eye,
And think that eye to truth was dear;
To trust a passing wanton's sigh,
And melt beneath a wanton's tear.

Romance - disgusted with deceit,
Far from thy motley court I fly
Where Affectation holds her seat,
And sickly Sensibility;
Whose silly tears can never flow
For any pangs excepting thine;
Who turns aside from real wo,
To steep in dew thy gaudy shrine.

Now join with sable Sympathy,
With cypress crown'd, array'd in weeds,
Who heaves with thee her simple sigh,
Whose breast for every bosom bleeds;
And call thy sylvan female choir,
To mourn a swain for ever gone,
Who once could glow with equal fire,
But bends not now before thy throne.

Ye genial nymphs, whose ready tears
On all occasions swiftly flow;
Whose bosoms heave with fancied fears,
With fancied flames and frenzy glow;
Say, will you mourn my absent name,
Apostate from your gentle train?
An infant bard at least may claim
From you a sympathetic strain.

Adieu, fond race! a long adieu!
The hour of fate is hovering nigh;
E'en now the gulf appears in view,
Where unlimteded you must lie:
Oblivion's blackening lake is seen,
Convulsed by gales you cannot weather;
Where you, and eke your gentle queen,
Alas! must perish altogether.

But not from thee, dark pile! departs the chief;
His feudal realm in other regions lay:
In thee the wounded conscience courts relief
Retiring from the garish blaze of day.

Yes, in thy gloomy cells and shades profound
The monk abjured a world he ne'er could view
Or blood-stain'd guilt repenting solace found.
Or innocence from stern oppression flew.

A monarch bade thee from that wild arise, [prov]
Where Sherwood's outlaws once were wont to
And superstition's crimes, of various dyes,
Sought shelter in the priest's protecting cowl.

Where now the grass exhales a murky dew,
The humid pall of life-extinguish'd clay,
In sainted fame the sacred fathers grew,
Nor raised their pious voices but to pray.

Where now the bats their waving wings extend,
Soon as the gloaming * spreads her waning shade,
The choir did oft their mingling vespers blend,
Or matin orisons to Mary I paid.

Years roll on years; to ages, ages yield;
Abbots to abbots, in a line, succeed;
Religion's charter their protecting shield,
Till royal sacrifice their doom decreed.

One holy HENRY reared the Gothic walls,
And bade the pious inmates rest in peace;
Another HENRY the kind gift recalls,
And bids devotion's hallow'd echoes cease.

Vain is each threat or supplicating prayer;
He drives them exiles from their blest abode,
To roam a dreary world in deep despair —
No friend, no home, no refuge, but their God.

Hark how the hall, resounding to the strain,
Shakes with the martial music's novel din!
The heralds of a warrior's haughty reign,
High crested banners, wave thy walls within.

Of changing sentinels the distant hum,
The mirth of feasts, the clang of burnish'd arms
The braying trumpet and the hoarser drum,
Unite in concert with increased alarms.

An abbey once, a regal fortress I now,
Encircled by insulting rebel powers,
War's dread machines o'erhang thy threat'ning brow,
And dart destruction in sulphurous showers.

Ah vain defence! the hostile traitor's siege,
Though oft repulsed by guile, 'o comes the brave;
His thronging foes oppress the faithful liege,
Rebellion's reeking standards o'er him wave.

* As one poem on this subject is printed in the beginning, the author had originally, no intention of inserting the following; it is now added at the particular request of some friends. See page 413 of this edition.

† This word is used by Walter Scott in his poem, "The Wild Huntsman," very expressive with a want.

‡ "It is the voice of years that are gone! they roll before me with all their hectic." — Campbell.

NEWSTEAD! fast-falling, once resplendent dome!
Religion's shrine! repentant HENRY's pride!
Of warriors, monks, and dames the cloister'd tomb,
Whose pensive shades around thy ruins glide.

Hast to thy pile! more honor'd in thy fall
Than modern mansions in their pillar'd state;
Proudly majestic frowns thy vaulted hall,
Scowling defiance on the blasts of fate.

No mail-clad serfs, obedient to their lord,
In grim array the crimson cross I demand;
Or gay assemble round the festive board,
Their chief's retainers, an immortal band:

Else might inspiring Fancy's magic eye
Retrace their progress through the lapse of time;
Marking each ardent youth, ordain'd to die,
A votive pilgrim in Judith's clime.

As "gloaming," the Scottish word for twilight, is far more poetical, and has been recommending by many eminent literary men, particularly Mr. Moore in his Letters to Burns, I have ventured to use it on account of its harmony.

* Gloaming spreads her waning shade. In the private volume, Twilight wields a waning shade.

HOURS OF IDleness.

Not unsavaged the raging baron yields;
The blood of traitors smells the purple plain:
Unconqu’rd still, his falchion there he wields,
And days of glory yet for him remain.

still in that hour the warrior wish’d to strew
Self-garter’d laurels on a self-sought grave;
But Charles’ protecting genius hither flew,
The monarch’s friend, the monarch’s hope, to save.

Trembling, she snatch’d him* from th’ unequal
In other fields the torrent to repel; [strife.
For clo’er combats, here, reserved his life,
To lead the band where godlike Falkland† fell.

From thee, poor pike! to lawless plunder given,
While dying groans their painful requiem sound,
Far different incense now ascends to heaven,
Such victims wallow on the gory ground.

There many a pale and ruthless robber’s corse,
Noisome and ghast, defiles thy sacred sod;
’O er mingling man, and horse commix’d with horse,
Corruption’s heap, the savage scowler’s trod.

Graves, long with rank and sighing weeds o’erspread.
Ransack’d, resign perforce their mortal mould.
From ruffian fangs escape not even the dead,
Raked from repose in search for buried gold.

Hush’d is the harp, unstrung the warlike lyre,
The minstrel’s palsied hand reclines in death;
No more he strikes the quivering chords with fire,
Or sings the glories of the martial* wreath.

At length, the sated murderers, gorged with prey,
Retire; the clamor of the fight is o’er;
Silence again resumes her awful sway,
And sable Horror guards the massy door.

tere Desolation holds her dreary court;
What satellites declare her dismal reign!
Shrieking their dirge, ill-omen’d birds resort,
To flit their vigils in the hoary fane.

Soon a new morn’s restoring beams dispel
The clouds of anarchy from Britain’s skies;
The fierce usurper seeks his native hell,
And Nature triumphs as the tyrant dies.

With storms she welcomes his expiring groans;
Winds whirl, responsive, greet his laboring breath;
Earth shudders, as her caves receive his bones,
Lavishing the offering of so dark a death.

The regal ruler* now resumes the helm,
He guides through gentle seas the prow of state.
Hope cheer’s, with wonted smiles, the peaceful calm,
And heals the bleeding wounds of wearied state.

The gloomy tenants, Newstead! of thy cells,
Howling, resign their violated nest.
Again the master on his tenure dwells,
Enjoy’d, from absence, with enrap’tur’d zeal.

Vassals, within thy hospitable pale,
Loudly carousing, bless their lord’s return;
Culture again adorns the gladdening vale,
And matrons, once lamenting, cease to mourn.

A thousand songs on tuneful echo float,
Unwonted foliage mantles o’er the tree.
And hark! the horns proclaim a mellow note
The hunters’ cry hangs lengthening on the breeze.

Beneath their courser’s hoofs the valleys shake;
What fears, what anxious hopes, attend the chase?
The dying stag seeks refuge in the lake;
Exulting shouts announce the finish’d race.

Ah happy days! too happy to endure!
Such sports our plain forefathers knew.
No splendid vices glitter’d to allure;
Their joys were many, as their cares were few.

From these descending, sons to sire’s succeed;
Time steals along, and Death upbraids the past;
Another chief impels the foaming steed,
Another crowd pursue the panting hart.

Newstead! what saddening change of scene is thine!
Thy yawning arch betokens slow decay;
The last and youngest of a noble line
Now holds thy moulderling turrets in his sway.

Deserted now, he scans thy gray worn towers;
Taw vainlets, where dead of feudal ages sleep;
Thy cloisters, perversive to the wintry showers;
These, these he views, and views them but in weep.

Yet are his tears no emblem of regret;
Cheer’d affection only bids them flow.
Pride, hope, and love, forbid him to forget,
But warm his bosom with impasion’d glow.

Yet he prefers thee to the gilded domes
Or gewgaw grottos of the vainly great.
Yet lingers’ mid thy damp and mossy tombs,
Nor breathes a murmur ‘gainst the will of fate.

Haply thy sun, emerging, yet may shine,
Thee to irradiate with meridian ray;
+ Hours splendid as the past may still be thine,
And bless thy future as thy former day.

ON A CHANGE OF MASTERS AT A GREAT PUBLIC SCHOOL. *

WHERE are those honors, Ida! once your own, When Probust fill'd your magisterial throne? As ancient Rome, fast falling to disgrace, Hail'd a barbarian in her Cæsar's place, So you, degenerate, share as hard a fate, And scat Pompeius, where your Probust sate. Of narrow brain, yet of a narrower soul, Pompeus holds you in his harsh control; Pompeus, by magical virtue sway'd, With florid jargon, and with vain parade; With noisy nonsense, and new-fangled rules, Such as were ne'er before enforced in schools. Mistrusting pedantry for learning's laws, He governs, sanction'd but by self-applause. With him the same dire fate attending Rome, Ill-fated Ida! soon must stamp your doom: Like her o'erthrown, forever lost to fame, No trace of science left you but the name. July, 1805.

CHILDISH RECOLLECTIONS. §

I

WHEN slow Disease, with all her host of pains, Chills the warm tide which flows along the veins;

* These lines were only printed in the private volume. Lord Byron most severely regretted having written this and the subsequent attack on Dr. Botler, contained in the poem called Childish Recollections. A reconciliation took place between them before Lord Byron's first departure for Greece; and Mr. Moore informs us that, "not content with this private assault on Dr. Botler, it was Lord Byron's intention, had he been published another edition of the Hours of Idleness, to substitute for the offensive verses against that gentleman, frank avowal of the wrong he had been guilty of, in giving vent to them."

† Life of Byron, vol. 1, p. 188.

‡ Pompous, Dr. Botler.

§ This poem was published in the private volume; and, with many additions and corrections, in the first edition of Hours of Idleness; but was afterwards suppressed.

If the private volume the poem opened with the following lines:

"Hence! I was an unwary song of varied tunes, Which youth commands, masterly age reproves; Which every reigning bard repeats by rote, By thousands echoed to the solemn mass! Tired of the dull, growing, graces mild, My soul is prating to be free again. Farewell! I ye nymphs propitious to my verse, Some other Damon will your charms assume; Some other poet will his pens, in hope of bliss, Or dwell in rapture on your nectar'd side. Those bosoms, grateful to my absent sight, No more esteem my senses in delight: Those bowers, form'd of animated snow, Allike are business, are offending now. Those to some happier lover I resign— The memory of those joys alone is mine. Content no more shall brand my humble name The child of passion and the feel of fame. Weak of love, of life, deceased with spleen, I rest a perfect Thracian, not elsewhere. World! I renounce thee! all my hope's o'ercast! One sigh I give thee, but that sigh's the last. Friends, foes, and enemies in haste are hale! Would I could add, remembrance of you too! Yet, though the future dark and cheerless gleams, The curse of memory, horrid in my dreams, Deeps with glowing pencil all these years, Ere yet my cup, expans'd, flows with tears; Still rules my sense with tyrannic sway, The past confounding with the present day. Also I in vain I check the musing thought: It'll recur, unkind'd for and unwasteful. My view to Fancy's eye, &c. &c., &c. as in twenty-nine."

When Health, affrighted, spreads her rosy wing And flies with every changing gale of spring; Not to the aching frame alone confined, Unyielding pang's assail the drooping mind: What grisly forms, the spectre-train of wo, Bid shuddering Nature shrink beneath the blow, With Resignation wage relentless strife, While Hope retires appali'd and clings to life. Yet less the pang when through the tedious hom Remembrance sheds around her genial power, Calls back the vanish'd days to rapture given, When love was bliss, and Beauty formed our heaven Or, dear to youth, portrays each childish scene, Those fairy bowers, where all in turn have been. As when through clouds that pour the summer storm

The orb of day unveils his distant form, Gilds with faint beams the crystal dews of rain, And dimly twinkle o'er the watery plain; Thus, while the future dark and cheerless gleams, The sun of memory, glowing through my dreams, Though sunk the radiance of his former blaze, To scenes far distant points his paler rays; Still rules my sense with unbounded sway, The past confounding with the present day.

Oft does my heart indulge the rising thought, Which still recurs, uncon'd for and unsought: My soul to Fancy's fond suggestion yields, And roams romantic o'er her airy fields: Scenes of my youth, developed, crowd to view, To which I long have bade a last adieu! Seats of delight, inspiring youthful fames; Friends lost to me for aye, except in dreams; Some who in marble prematurely sleep, Whose forms I now remember but to weep; Some who yet urge the same scholastic course Of early science, future fame the source; Who, still contending in the studious race, In quick full stop the entire season; These with a thousand visions now unite, To dazzle, though they please, my aching sight.*

IDA! bless'd spot, where Science holds her reign, How joyous once I join'd thy youthful train! Bright in idea gleams thy lofty spire, Again I mingle with thy playful choir; Our tricks of mischief, every childish game, Unchanged by time or distance, seem the same; Through winding paths along the glade, I trace The social smile of every welcome face; My wonted haunts; my scenes of joy and woe. Each early boyish friend, or youthful foe, Our guards dissolved, but not my friendship pass'd: I bless the former, and forgive the last. Hours of my youth! when, nurtured in my breast, To love a stranger, friendship made me bless'd;— Friendship, the dear peculiar bond of youth, When every artless bosom throws with truth; Untaught by worldly wisdom how to reign, And check each impulse with prudential rein; When all we feel, our honest souls disclose— In love to friends, in open hate to foes; No varnish'd tales the lips of youth repeat, No dear-bought knowledge purchased by deceit.

* The next fifty-six lines, to "Here first remember'd be the joyous band," were added in the first edition of Hours of Idleness.
HOURS OF IDleness

With him, for years, we search’d the classic page,
And fear’d the master, though we loved the rage.
Retired at last, his small yet peaceful seat
From learning’s labor is the blest retreat.
* Pompous fills his magisterial chair;
Pompous governs,—but, my muse, forbear:
Contempt, in silence, be the pedant’s lot;
His name and precepts be alike forgot:†
No more his mention shall my verse degrade,
To him my tribute is already paid.†

† High, through those elms, with hoary branches crown’d,
Fair Ida’s bower adorns the landscape round;
There Science, from her favor’d seat, surveys
The vale where rural Nature claims her praise;
To her awhile resigns her youthful train,
Who move in joy, and dance along the plain;
In scatter’d groups each favor’d haunt pursues;
Repeat old pastimes, and discover new;
Flush’d with his rays, beneath the noontide sun,
In rival bands between the wickets run,
Drive o’er the sword the ball with active force,
Or chase with nimble feet its rapid course.
But those with slower steps direct their way
Where Bront’s cool waves in limpid current’s stray,
While yonder few search out some green retreat,
And arbors shade them from the summer heat;
Others again, a pert and lively crew,
Some rough and thoughtless stranger placed in view
With frolic quaint their antic jests expose,
And tease the grumbling rustic as he goes;
Nor rest with this, but many a passing fray
Tradition treasures for a future day:
“Twas here the gather’d swains for vengeance fought,
And here we earn’d the conquest dearly bought
Here have we flied before superior might,
And here renew’d the wild tumultuous flight.’
While thus our souls with early passions swell,
In lingering tones resounds the distant bell;
Th’ allotted hour of daily sport is o’er,
And Learning beckons from her temple’s door.
No splendid tables grace her simple hall,
But ruder records fill the dusky wall;

* Pompous fills his magisterial chair;
Pompous governs, &c.

Had Lord Byron published another edition of Hours of Idleness, it was his intention to give the following turn to this passage—

“Another fills his magisterial chair;
Reluctant owns a stranger’s care.
Oh! may the honors crown his future name,—
If such his virtues, each shall be his fame.”

Moore’s Life of Byron, vol. I. p. 188.

† His name, &c. Instead of this fine, the private volume reads,

“Boo! shall his shallow precepts be forg’d.”

† This alludes to a character printed in a former private edition for the persiflage of some friends, which, with many other pieces, is withheld from the present volume. To draw the attention of the public to insignificance, would be deservedly reprehended; and another reason, though not of equal consequence, may be given in the following couplet—

“Satire or sense, alas! can Spence feel I
Who breaks a butterfly upon the wheel!”

POPE.—Prologue to the Satires.

§ The evening hundred and twenty-two lines, to

“Alone I best and dearest of my friends,” are not found in the private volume, but were introduced in the first edition of Hours of Idleness.

* Those pieces are reprinted in the second edition. The character alluded to is contained in the preceding poem.
I've or each
The one long graved, the other just begun;
These shall survive alike when son and sire
Beneath one common stroke of fate expire:
Perhaps their last memorial these alone,
Denied in death a monumental stone,
Whilst to the gale in mournful cadence wave
The sighing weeds that hide their nameless grave.
And here my name, and many an early friend's,
Along the wall in lengthen'd line extends.
Though still our deeds amuse the youthful race,
Who tread our steps, and fill our former place,
Who young obeys their lords in silent awe,
Whose nod commanded, and whose voice was law,
And now in turn possess the reins of power,
To rule the little tyrants of an hour;
Though sometimes with the tales of ancient day
They pass the dreary winter's eve away
"And thus our former rulers stemm'd the tide,
And thus they dealt the combat side by side;
Just in this place the mouldering walls they scaled,
Nor bolts nor bars against their strength avail'd;
Here Probus came, the rising fray to quell,
And here he falter'd forth his last farewell;
And here one night abroad they dared to roam,
While bold Pompeus bravely stayed at home;"
While others speak, the hour must soon arrive,
When names of these, like ours, alone survive:
Yet a few years, one general wreck will whelm
The faint remembrance of our fairy realm.

Dear honest race, though now we meet no more,
One last long look on what we were before—
Our first kind greetings, and our last adieu—
Drew tears from eyes unused to weep with you.
Through splendid circles, fashion's gaudy world,
Where folly's glaring standard waves unfurl'd,
I plunged to drown in noise my fond regret,
And all I sought or hoped was to forget.
Vain wish! if chance some well-remember'd face,
Some old companion of my early race,
Advanced to claim his friend, with honest joy,
My eyes, my heart proclaim'd me still a boy;
The glittering scene, the fluttering groups around,
Were quite forgotten when my friend was found;
The smiles of beauty—(for, alas! I've known
What 'tis to bend before Love's mighty throne)—
The smiles of beauty, though those smiles were dear,
Could hardly charm me when that friend was near:
My thoughts wilder'd in the fond surprise,
The woods of Ida danced before my eyes;
I saw the sprightly wanderers pour along,
I saw and join'd again the joyous throng;
Panting, again I traced her lofty grove,
And friendship's feelings triumph'd over love.

Yet why should I alone with such delight
Retrace the circuit of my former flight?
Is there no cause beyond the common claim
Endear'd to all in childhood's very name?
Ah! sure some stronger impulse vibrates here,
Which whispers friendship will be doubly dear
To one who thus for kindred hearts must roam,
And seek abroad the love denied at home.
Those hearts, dear Ida, have I found in thee—
A home, a world, a paradise to me.
Stern death forbad my orphan youth to share
The tender guidance of a father's care:
Can rank, or e'en a guardian's name, supply
The love which glister's in a father's eye?
For this can wealth or title's sound alone,
Made by a parent's early loss my own?
What brother springs a brother's love to seek?
What sister's gentle kiss has prest my cheek?
For me how dull the vacant moments rise,
To no fond bosom link'd by kindred ties!
Oft in the progress of some fleeting dream
Fraternals smiles collected round me seem;
While still the visions to my heart are prest,
The voice of love will murmur in my rest:
I hear—I wake—and in the sound rejoice;
I hear again,—but, ah! no brother's voice.
A hermit, 'midst of crowds, I fain must stray
Alone, though thousand pilgrims fill the way;
While these a thousand kindred wreaths entwine
I cannot call on—single blossom mine:
What then remains? in solitude to groan,
To mix in friendship, or to sigh alone?
Thus must I cling to some redeeming hand,
And none more dear than Ida's social band.

* Alonzo! best and dearest of my friends,
Thy name ennobles him who thus commends:
From this fond tribute thou canst gain no praise,
The praise is his who now that tribute pays.
Oh! in the promise of thy early youth,
If hope anticipate the words of truth,
Some loftier bard shall sing thy glorious name,
To build his own upon thy deathless fame.*
Friend of my heart, and foremost of the list
Of those with whom I lived supremely blest,
Oft have we drain'd the font of ancient lore;
Though drinking deeply, thirsting still the more
Yet when confinement's lingering hour was done
Our sports, our studies, and our souls were one:
Together we impell'd the flying ball;
Together waited in our tutor's hall;
Together join'd in cricket's manly toil,
Or shared the produce of the river's spoil;
Or plunging from the green declining shore,
Our pliant* limbs the buoyant billows bore;
In every element, unchanged, the same,
All, that all brothers should be but the name.

Nor yet are you forgot, my jocund boy!—
Dawes, the harbinger of childish joy,
For ever foremost in the ranks of fun,
The laughing herald of the harmless pun;
Yet with a breast of such materials made—
Anxious to please, of pleasing half afraid;
Candid and liberal, with a heart of steel
In danger's path, though not untaught to feel.
Still I remember in the factious strife
The rustic's musket aim'd against my life:
High poise'd in air the massy weapon hung,
A cry of terror burst from every tongue;
Whilst I, in combat with another foe,
Fought on, unconscious of th' impending blow,——

HOURS OF IDLENESS.

Your arm, brave boy, arrested his career—
Forward you spring, insensible to fear:
Disarm'd and baffled by your courting hand,
The gnarled savage roll'd upon the sand:
* An act like this can simple thanks repay?
Or all the labors of a grateful lay?
Oh no! 'ware'er my breast forgets the deed,
That instant, Davus, it deserves to bleed.

LYCUS! on me thy claims are justly great:
Thy milder virtues could my muse relate,
To thee alone, unrival'd, would belong
The feeble efforts of my lengthen'd song.
Well canst thou boast to lead in senate's fit—
A Spartan firmness with Athenian wit:
Though yet in embryo these perfection shine,
LYCUS' thy father's fame will soon be thine.
Where learning nurtures the superior mind,
What may we hope from genius thus refined!
When time at length matures thy growing years,
How wilt thou tower above thy-fellow peers!
Prudence and sense, a spirit belying fear,
With honor's soul, united beam in thee.

Shall fair EURYALUS pass by unsung?
From ancient lineage, not unworthy, sprung:
What though one sad dissenion bade us part,
That name is yet embalm'd within my heart;
Yet at the mention does that heart rebound,
And palpitate responsive to the sound.
Envy dissolved our ties, and not our will:
We once were friends,—I'll think we are so still.
A form uniting nature's partial mould,
A heart untainted, we in thee behold:
Yet not the senate's thunder thou shalt wield,
Nor seek for glory in the tented field;
To minds of ruder texture these be given—
Thy soul shall nearer soar its native heaven.
Haply in polish'd courts might be thy seat,
But that thy tongue could never forge deceit;
The courtier's supple bow and sneering smile,
The flow of compliment, the slippery wile,
Would make that breast with indignation burn,
And all the glittering snares to tempt thee spurn.

* An act like this, &c. In the private volume, the last four lines of this paragraph were as follows—
"Thus did you save that life I sacred prime—
A life unworthy such a sacrifice:"
Oh! when my breast forgets the generous deed,
That instant, Davus, it deserves to bleed."

† In the private volume, we find the following lines concluding the character of Lycaus: and the remainder of the passage relating to him was originally given as descriptive of a friend entitled CHORUS, of whom no mention is made in the last published copy of the poem:

"For ever to possess a friend in thee was bliss unbroth, though not unsought by me.
Thy soul was form'd for love alone,
To early praises and to have unknown;
Thy mind, in union with thy beauteous form,
Was gentle, but swift to deem the storm;
That face, an index of unflinching worth,
Proclaim'd a heart abstracted from the earth.
Oh, when despair'd with sad foreboding gloom,
I cast my eyes upon our favor'd tomb,
I've seen those sympathetic eyes of sorrow
With kind compassion for thy comrade's wo;
Or, when less mournful subjects form'd our themes,
We tried a thousand fond romantic schemes,
Oft hast thou sworn, in friendship's soothing sway,
